are included in the term "contemplation of death." The other members of the court who concur in the decision concur only in the result; see infra. Without expressly stating any general rule, other courts from this state have held gifts inter vivos to be in contemplation of death, and therefore taxable. Re Hodges (1915) 215 N. Y. 447, 109 N. E. 559; Re Thompson (1914) 85 Misc. 291, 147 N. Y. Supp. 157, affirmed in (1915) 167 App. Div. 356, 153 N. Y. Supp. 164, affirmed without opinion in (1916) 217 N. Y. 609, 111 N. E. 1101; Re Von Bermuth (1913) 143 N. Y. Supp. 672. The later cases in New York have not generally followed the rule which confines the meaning of the words "in contemplation of death" to gifts causa mortis, but have held gifts inter vivos subject to the tax in a proper case.

The view confining the meaning of the phrase "in contemplation of death" to a gift causa mortis has been repudiated in other states. Rosenthal v. People (1904) 211 Ill. 306, 71 N. E. 1121; Re Benton (1908) 234 Ill. 366, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 458, 84 N. E. 1026, 14 Ann. Cas. 107; Conway's Estate v. State (1918) — Ind. App. —, 120 N. E. 717; State v. Pabst (1909) 189 Wis. 561, 121 N. W. 351. In Merrifield's Estate v. People (1904) 212 Ill. 400, 72 N. E. 446, a gift inter vivos was held subject to taxation if made in contemplation of death. A gift inter vivos if made in contemplation of death is subject to the tax without regard to any intent to evade the payment of the tax. Rosenthal v. People (1904) 211 Ill. 306, 71 N. E. 1121.

III. Joint tenancies.

In the case of joint tenancies there are two transfers that have been urged as taxable. There is (a) the transfer of the property to the joint tenants, and (b) the succession to the whole estate by the survivor upon the death of one of the joint tenants. It seems clear that there is no transfer in contemplation of death, in the succession to the entire property by the survivor upon the death of one of the tenants. Whatever transfer or succession takes place at this time is a transfer or succession at death, and not in contemplation of death. It is stated in Re Tilley (1915) 166 App. Div. 240, 151 N. Y. Supp. 79, affirmed without opinion in (1915) 215 N. Y. 702, 109 N. E. 1094, that "no right passes by the death of one of the parties, for where the deposit is in the joint names of the parties and the intent appears—as it now must under the statute—to create the joint tenancy, its effect is to vest title in the entire fund in the survivor. . . . The right of survivorship vests in the creation of the joint tenancy, and the only question determined by death is which shall take the entire estate. Under such circumstances, it is clear that there is no succession to be taxed, for it was not 'made in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor, or donor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death.' The possession is given upon the creation of the estate; the rights are absolutely and conclusively fixed, and the only question which is contingent is, Which of two or more joint tenants shall eventually own the entire estate?"

But the transfer to the joint tenants stands on the same ground as any other transfer; if it is a gift and made in contemplation of the death of the transferor, it is taxable. Whether a gift to a joint tenancy is or is not a gift in contemplation of death is a question of fact. As shown above, the rule is adhered to in some New York cases that a gift inter vivos is not subject to the tax unless made with the intent to evade the tax. This theory is adhered to in Re Stebbins (1907) 52 Misc. 438, 103 N. Y. Supp. 563, followed in Re Graves (1907) 52 Misc. 433, 103 N. Y. Supp. 571, in holding that joint bank accounts payable to husband or wife or the survivor were not taxable as gifts in contemplation of death. See Re Tilley (1915) 166 App. Div. 240, 151 N. Y. Supp. 79, affirmed without opinion in (1915) 215 N. Y. 702, 109 N. E. 1094, infra. But, under the general rule that gifts inter vivos may be made in contemplation of death, within the meaning of the taxing law, no question of fraud or intent to evade the tax is involved, but merely a question of fact.

The question of presumption arises in this connection. No presumption that a transfer is in contemplation of death arises from a transfer to a joint tenancy. In Re Tilley (N. Y.) supra, the court, in holding that the survivor of a joint tenancy existing in a bank account was not liable to pay a tax in respect to one half the account, states that "while there might be a joint tenancy created which would be so obviously fraudulent in its inception as to take it out of the general rule, we are persuaded that where an account is created in the manner permitted by the Banking Law, with all of its incidents known and recognized in the law, it cannot be presumed that there was any other intention than that which the law ascribes to such an act, and that property thus disposed of is not 'made in contemplation of . . . death,' as that language is understood in the jurisprudence of this state." The Banking Law of this state referred to made a joint bank deposit in form to be paid to either of the depositors or the survivor of them, the property of such persons as joint tenants, and provided that the same, together with all interest thereon, should be held for the exclusive use of the depositors, and might be paid to either during the lifetime of both, or to the survivor after the death of one of them, and such payment, and the receipt or acquittance of the one to whom such payment is made, is made a valid and sufficient release and discharge to the bank. At least, there is no conclusive presumption from a transfer to a joint tenancy that there is a transfer in contemplation of death. In one part of the opinion in Re Gurnsey (1918) 177 Cal. 211, 170 Pac. 402, the creation of a joint tenancy (which in this case was a joint bank account) is stated of itself to raise no inference or presumption that it was done in contemplation of death; in another part of the opinion it is stated that the creation of a joint bank account and the addition to it of deposits made by way of gifts from the community property to the joint estate do not constitute conclusive evidence that the gifts were made in contemplation of death. In this case a finding of the trial court that the transfer was not made in contemplation of death was sustained.

Even if a joint tenancy is created in contemplation of death, it is not subject to the tax if created for a valuable and adequate consideration. McDougald v. Boyd (1916) 172 Cal. 753, 159 Pac. 168.

Upon the general question of consideration, see note to People v. Porter, post, 1041.

IV. Antenuptial agreements.

A transfer in pursuance of an antenuptial agreement is generally held not to be a transfer in contemplation of death. In Re Minor (1919) — Cal. —, 4 A.L.R. 456, 180 Pac. 813, there was held to be no transfer in contemplation of death where, upon the marriage of a man seventy-eight years of age, but in good health and physically and mentally active in the successful management of extensive business interests, to a woman twenty-nine years of age, an oral antenuptial agreement was entered into by and between them whereby it was agreed that the woman should receive the sum of $100,000 as a marriage settlement, an agreement that was partially performed on the day of the marriage by the payment of $50,000 in cash, and over three years after the marriage by the execution of a written instrument whereby she acknowledged the prior payment of $50,000 in cash for and on account of the antenuptial agreement, and also the transfer and indorsement to her by her husband on the day of the execution of the written instrument, in full and final performance of the oral antenuptial agreement, of a fully secured promissory note in the sum of $50,000 originally executed and made payable to the husband, which instrument contained a further clause wherein and whereby the wife promised on behalf of herself, her heirs, etc., in consideration of the full performance of the antenuptial agreement, to relieve and forever discharge the husband, his heirs, executors, and administrators, from any claim to an interest in his estate; this agreement was executed over three years before the death of the husband, and about three years before he executed his last will and testament, in which he referred to the amount given his wife under the antenuptial agreement as her share of his estate; these facts were held by the supreme court not to support the finding of the trial court that the transfers in controversy were made in contemplation of death. The court, in distinguishing other cases in which transfers in pursuance of an antenuptial agreement were held to be in contemplation of death, states that in the case at bar the parties primarily contemplated matrimony, and a marriage settlement as a condition precedent thereto; that the controlling consideration of the transfer was the marriage,—a circumstance which necessarily excluded the idea that a desire to make a testamentary disposition was in any substantial sense a direct cause of the transfer.

That a transfer under an antenuptial agreement is not a transfer in contemplation of death is further supported in the following decisions: A transfer to the intended wife under an antenuptial agreement of securities which, on the following day, were retransferred to the intended husband under a trust agreement that the securities were to become the absolute property of the survivor,—a transaction which was confirmed by the will of the husband,—was held not to be a transfer in contemplation of death, in Re Miller (1902) 77 App. Div. 473, 78 N. Y. Supp. 930. Property which passed to the wife upon the death of her husband under an antenuptial contract by the terms of which the intended wife was paid a sum in cash, and the husband agreed to provide for her from his estate in case she should survive him, a further sum, in pursuance of which agreement the sum in question was paid, was held not to be taxable as a transfer in contemplation of death, in Re Baker (1903) 83 App. Div. 530, 82 N. Y. Supp. 890, affirmed without opinion in (1904) 178

N. Y. 575, 70 N. E. 1094. The provision thus made in the antenuptial contract was to be accepted by the wife in lieu of her dower rights in the decedent's estate and all other rights as his widow. The decree of the surrogate court was affirmed in this case. In Re Vanderbilt (1918) 184 App. Div. 661, 172 N. Y. Supp. 511, affirmed without opinion in (1919) 226 N. Y. 638, 123 N. E. 893, the court, in dealing with an antenuptial agreement under which the husband agreed to bequeath certain property to the wife provided she should survive him, states, generally, that the agreement was not made in contemplation of death.

See Re Wadsworth (1917) 100 Misc. 439, 166 N. Y. Supp. 716, affirmed without opinion in (1918) 185 App. Div. 944, 172 N. Y. Supp. 924, cited in II. b, 2, of note to People v. Porter, post, 1061.

The general question of the applicability of inheritance or succession tax law to antenuptial contract is discussed in the note to Re Minor, 4 A.L.R. 456.

V. Application to various states of facts.

As shown in the introduction to this note, the question whether a transfer is in contemplation of death is one of fact. Some appellate courts, upon appeals from decisions upon the existence of a transfer in contemplation of death, have applied the rule of procedure that if there is any evidence to sustain the finding of the trial court upon a question of fact, that finding must be affirmed. The finding of the trial court that there was no gift in contemplation of death was affirmed in the case of a transfer of shares of stock in a corporation which the transferor had organized to care for large properties which had been left her upon the death of her husband, the transfer taking place less than one month before her death, at the age of seventy-nine years, where it appeared that at the time of the transfer the donor had no thought of death, but intended taking a trip to Europe, and was having a large mansion repaired preparatory to her own reoccupancy of it. Spreckels v. State (1916) 30 Cal. App. 363, 158 Pac. 549. The finding of the trial court that there was no transfer in contemplation of death was sustained in McDougald v. Wulzen (1917) 34 Cal. App. 21, 166 Pac. 1033, where the transfer was made by a man eighty-three years of age, in reasonably good health for one of his years, to his wife, the transferrer stating that he did not wish to be longer bothered with the property, and that he would give it to his wife to do with as she wished. It is stated that it may be conceded that if the trial court had found that the transfers were made in contemplation of death, the appellate court would have sustained such finding; still, the trial court having found otherwise, and its function being to place a construction upon the evidence before it, and it appearing that the construction so given is not unreasonable, its finding cannot be disturbed. The finding of the appraiser that there was no transfer in contemplation of death was affirmed in Re Crary (1900) 31 Misc. 72, 64 N. Y. Supp. 566, under the rule of practice as to the effect of finding the fact by a trial court, where it appeared that the transfers in question were made within two months prior to the decease of the donor, and constituted about one fifth of a large estate, and where it further appeared that the donor had contemplated the transfers for about one year prior to their being made, and that he had been accustomed to making considerable gifts from time to time, to members of his family.

On this theory of procedure findings that there was a transfer in contemplation of death have also been affirmed. The finding of the trial court that a transfer of property was made in contemplation of the death of the grantor is sustained by evidence showing that the grantor was seventy-nine years of age when he made the conveyance, which was one year and five days before his death; that the conveyances were made to his children at a time when the grantor was in normal health, never having consulted a physician except for rheumatism, and that one purpose, at least, of the conveyances, was to relieve the grantor of the care of the property. The court states that while there is no direct evidence warranting the trial court's inference that the conveyances were made in contemplation of death, when the age, condition of health, statements, conduct, and surroundings of the deceased are considered in connection with the conveyances made by him, it appears that the trial court may reasonably have drawn such inference, though it may be said that other and contrary inferences may, with equal or greater certainty, be drawn from the facts and circumstances shown by the evidence. Conway's Estate v. State (1918) — Ind. App. —, 120 N. E. 717. A transfer by a man about seventy-five years of age, suffering from a cancer and in such physical condition that he must have realized that his death within a comparatively short period of time was inevitable, of all the real estate which he owned, and consisting of the larger part of his entire estate, to his daughter, two months before his death, was held to be a transfer in contemplation of death in Re Fitzgibbon (1919) 106 Misc. 130, 173 N. Y. Supp. 898. The evidence in this case was held to sustain the finding of the appraisers that the transfer was made in contemplation of death.

The majority of courts, however, have not applied this rule of procedure; at least not expressly, but have seemingly decided the question as an original one. In the great majority of these cases, however, the decision of the trial court is affirmed.

Facts which were held to show gifts or transfers in contemplation of death appear in the following cases:

See the reported case (PEOPLE v. DANKS, ante, 1023).

A gift by one suffering from sarcoma, made a few days before an operation therefor, which was the last of several operations which had been performed for the same purpose, but without checking the disease, another gift about six months thereafter, when the donor had again begun to fail from the disease in question, both of which were made to the wife of the donor, were held to be transfers in contemplation of death, and therefore taxable under the statute. Re Reynolds (1915) 169 Cal. 600, 147 Pac. 268. Trial court affirmed.

A transfer by one who had undergone several operations for sarcoma, without success, about four months before his death, to his son, of a department store owned by him, was held to be a gift in contemplation of death in Re Reynolds (Cal.) supra.

A conveyance by a donor eighty years of age to a corporation the membership of which was limited to his son, when the donor's physical condition was such that, if a reasonable man, he must have apprehended that death was likely to occur at any time, and when, without any material change or improvement in his physical condition, death did occur a little more than six months after the execution of the deed which operated as a transfer of all the property owned by the donor at the time, and which was made for a stated consideration of $10 and the support of the grantor for life, was held to be a transfer in contemplation of death, and taxable as such, in Abstract & Title Guaranty Co. v. State (1916) 173 Cal. 691, 161 Pac. 264. Trial court affirmed.

A gift of the value of $150,000, made by a man sixty-one years of age, to his wife, thirty-three days before his death, and after he had developed symptoms indicating a fatal disease, was held to be a gift in contemplation of death, although the physician did not tell the donor that he was going to die, nor did he ask the physician what was the matter with him, but talked about going abroad to recuperate, and said nothing about his death. Rosenthal v. People (1904) 211 Ill. 306, 71 N. E. 1121. About the time of the gift, a will was prepared by the donor. The court states that the preparation of the will under the circumstances and in view of the rapid progress of the disease is strong evidence that death was expected, and no other moving cause than the expectation of death is apparent; and that while the widow and physician testified that the deceased did not expect to die, they also said that it was not the subject of conversation at all, and in view of his condition, it is a fair inference that he was not so dull of comprehension as to suppose that he would get well. The order of the county court, assessing a transfer tax, was affirmed.

A gift of practically all the donor's property to his wife and children, immediately preceding a surgical operation for a disease with which he had suffered for some time, was held to be a gift in contemplation of death in Merrifield's Estate v. People (1904) 212 Ill. 400, 72 N. E. 446. The decision of the trial court, levying an inheritance tax, was affirmed.

A gift of personal property by an old man suffering from an incurable disease, to avoid its falling into the hands of a person who might otherwise get it in case of his death, is a gift in contemplation of death, within the meaning of a statute taxing such gift. Re Benton (1908) 234 Ill. 366, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 458, 84 N. E. 1026, 14 Ann. Cas. 107. The judgment of the county court levying a tax was sustained.

A transfer of property by trust deed by a man who had suffered from diabetes for fifteen years, and had made various unsuccessful efforts to check the disease, the transfer being made when he was declining rapidly, so that a frequent consultation of physicians was necessary, was held to be a transfer in contemplation of death, in State v. Pabst (1909) 139 Wis. 561, 121 N. W. 351.

An assignment of a large estate in trust by the owner, who was suffering from locomotor ataxia, of which disease he was aware, was held to be a transfer in contemplation of death, although made six years before his death, in Bullen's Estate (1910) 143 Wis. 512, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1114, 128 N. W. 109. The owner had reserved the right to revoke and vacate the trust at any time during his lifetime, and had made some changes in the trust after it was first created, but the securities constituting the trust had remained with the trustee.

A transfer by a woman past seventy-nine years of age, afflicted with consumption, from which she knew she could never recover, of a large part of her property to nieces, who were the residuary legatees under her will, and to whom the property would have passed under the will, was held to be a transfer in contemplation of death, in Re Birdsall (1897) 22 Misc. 180, 49 N. Y. Supp. 450, affirmed without opinion in (1899) 43 App. Div. 624, 60 N. Y. Supp. 783. The surrogate states that it is true "that at the time the deeds were delivered, nothing was said by the testatrix with respect to her decease or the probability of life, but the circumstances lead us irresistibly to the conclusion that she was contemplating this event at the time of making said transfer, and that the same was made in view of that event." The court then points out the age of the donor, and that she had been under the constant and almost daily care of her physician, who had informed her that she could not be cured, that the only thing he could do for her was to make her feel better, that she knew she was liable to be taken worse and die at any time, or, upon the contrary, that she might live for a considerable period of time, and concludes that "taking all these facts and circumstances into consideration, it seems to us that no other conclusion can be reached than that the testatrix, in making this transfer of property, was considering, thinking of, and contemplating the fact that she was approaching the end of her lease of life, and that her act in making such transfer was in contemplation of that event."

A transfer of real estate of considerable value, by a man seventy-six years of age, who was suffering from an illness concerning which he stated, in making the transfer, that he did not know when it would take a turn for the worse, to his adopted son, was held to be a transfer in contemplation of death in Re Price (1909) 62 Misc. 149, 116 N. Y. Supp. 283. There was evidence that the motive which prompted the transfer in this case was to save the transferee from the possible annoyance and trouble which the decedent contemplated might ensue when a will made by him was presented for probate; but the court concludes from all the circumstances that he must have contemplated the probability of his own death within a very short time. As a matter of fact, it occurred ten days after the execution and delivery of the deed.

A transfer of real estate by a man seventy-nine years of age, in failing health, and suffering from an attack of la grippe, to his wife seven days before his death, is held to be a transfer in contemplation of death in Re Thompson (1914) 85 Misc. 291, 147 N. Y. Supp. 157, affirmed in (1915) 167 App. Div. 356, 153 N. Y. Supp. 164, which is affirmed without opinion in (1916) 217 N. Y. 609, 111 N. E. 1101. The finding of the appraisers that this transfer was subject to the tax was affirmed. The decedent stated at the time of making the conveyance that his attorney had been instructed to prepare the conveyance "so that his wife would take the property when he died."

A transfer of securities by a husband when confined to his bed by sickness, to his wife, the husband stating that he was not satisfied with the provisions contained in his will for her benefit, and wanted to make her a present of some of his securities, was held to be a transfer in contemplation of death in Re Hodges (1914) 86 Misc. 367, 148 N. Y. Supp. 424, affirmed in (1915) 168 App. Div. 913, 152 N. Y. Supp. 1117, which is affirmed in (1915) 215 N. Y. 447, 109 N. E. 559. The court states that as the decedent had been growing weaker for about six months prior to the date of this transfer, and as his enfeebled condition about the time of the transfer rendered it impossible for him to leave his home, he must have been conscious of the probability of his early death. It is further stated that the fact that he apprehended his early dissolution is manifest from his expressed dissatisfaction with the provisions of his will for the benefit of his wife, and his desire to supplement such provisions with gifts of substantial value.

A gift made by a physician who was, on the same evening, making a stethoscopic examination of his own chest, and who, seven hours thereafter, was found dead, to a donee for whom he had long intended to make provision to take effect on his death, and for whom, except for such gift, he had made no such provision, has been held to be a gift in contemplation of death in Re Dee (1913) 148 N. Y. Supp. 423, affirmed without opinion in (1914) 210 N. Y. 625, 104 N. E. 1128.

Facts which were held not to show gifts or transfers in contemplation of death appear in the following cases:

A conveyance of a little less than one half of a large estate to a trustee by a man about sixty-nine years of age, when not under any apprehension of immediate death, although subject to attacks of heart disease, was held not to be a transfer in contemplation of death, in People v. Kelley (1905) 218 Ill. 509, 75 N. E. 1038. The trust in this case was made for the benefit of the grantor's sons, and for the purpose of enabling them to live in the manner called for by their station in life. The judgment of the county court finding the gift not made in contemplation of death, and therefore denying the tax, was affirmed.

A gift of money made by a wife five days before her death, but when, so far as appears, she had no reason to apprehend her death, is not a gift in contemplation of death, and therefore not taxable. Re Von Bernuth (1913) 143 N. Y. Supp. 672. The gift in this case was accomplished by the wife authorizing the husband to draw the money out of a joint account which the husband and wife had in a bank. It is assumed that the money belonged to the wife, and that the gift was made to the husband at the time he was so authorized to draw it. A former order entered on the appraiser's report, fixing the tax on this gift, was reversed.

Gifts of money extending over a long period of years, made not when the donor was ill or at or near the time of his death, were held not to have been made in contemplation of death, in Re Klein (1915) 92 Misc. 318, 156 N. Y. Supp. 585.

The court in Re Masury (1898) 28 App. Div. 580, 51 N. Y. Supp. 331, affirmed without opinion in (1899) 159 N. Y. 532, 53 N. E. 1127, states that it would not be contended that a series of transfers beginning back a number of years, made in favor of adopted sons of the creator of the trust, were made in contemplation of the death of the grantor in any legal sense.

A gift of a homestead by a man in comparatively good health, a year before his death, to his daughter, with whom he was living on the homestead, was held not to be a gift in contemplation of death, in Re Roach (1905) 10 Ont. L. Rep. 208. The conveyance was at once registered, but no change of possession took place, and the donor and donee continued to live together in the house until the donor's death. The court states that there was no reason to expect a fatal termination to any existing disorder in case of the donor; that, although he was an old man, he was not at the time under actual medical treatment, and may well have expected to live, as he did, for a considerable time after making the conveyance in question.

A transfer of all of an estate valued at about $125,000, a few years before the owner's death, to one who was not related to him either by blood or marriage, in pursuance of his agreement with the donee to so convey the property in consideration of her care of an invalid daughter of the donor, is not a transfer in contemplation of death, within the meaning of the Inheritance Tax Act. People v. Burkhalter (1910) 247 Ill. 600, 139 Am. St. Rep. 351, 93 N. E. 379. The court, after stating that the transferrer realized that he could live but a few years longer, and expected his invalid daughter would outlive him, and that the care of her future was an object of great solicitude to him, states that in this sense his act in transferring his property may be said to have been made in contemplation of his death, but he did not transfer his property to his daughter, or in trust for her; "instead, he sold it in consideration of a contract for her care, the performance of which began and was completed in his lifetime. The property itself was not devoted to the use of his daughter except indirectly as it would enable the appellee [the transferee of the property] to carry out her personal contract. It was not his impending death which was the impelling motive for making this disposition of his property, but his desire to provide for his daughter's future, whether he lived or died." Ibid. The judgment of the county court, that the property was not subject to the provisions of the Inheritance Tax Law, was affirmed. It seems that this conveyance might have been held free from the tax on the theory that it was for a valuable consideration.

As pointed out above, some cases in New York take the view that only gifts causa mortis are included in the meaning of transfers in "contemplation of death," that a gift inter vivos is not subject to a tax under this provision unless it was made and received with the intent and for the purpose of evading the tax. Although the courts which take this view have emphasized the necessity of the conditional character of the gift to bring it within the meaning of the words, "contemplation of death," no very strong test of this theory appears in the decided cases, such as an absolute gift of property by a person a short time before his death, and when he was in immediate fear of death. Upon the facts appearing in a majority of the cases decided under this theory, it is a matter of speculation whether the results that have been reached would not have been the same under the general theory. Seemingly the result in some of the cases would have been the same. The tendency, however, is to hold the transfer not to be in contemplation of death. Facts appeared in the following cases which were held not to show a transfer in contemplation of death:

A transfer of securities, by a man seventy-two years of age, not in good health, but then recovering from an illness, with the intention of ridding himself of the care of the property, to one who agreed to pay him an annuity and to secure such payment by depositing the securities with a trust company which was authorized to collect the dividends on the securities or sell in default of payment of the annuity, was held not to be a transfer in contemplation of death, where there was no power of revocation reserved. It was provided in the agreement that the transferee should be at liberty, with the consent of the transferor, to sell any of the named securities and substitute others in their place, to be held by the trust company in the same manner as the original securities. Re Edgerton (1898) 35 App Div. 125, 64 N. Y. Supp. 700, affirmed without opinion in (1899) 158 N. Y. 671, 52 N. E. 1124. The transfer in this case was made about five years before the death of the transferor. The decision of the surrogate was affirmed.

A transfer of one third of a large estate by a father nearly eighty-seven years of age, but in possession of his mental faculties unimpaired, although enfeebled physically because of old age, to his children, for the express purpose of relieving himself from the burden of caring for the property, has been held not to be a transfer in contemplation of death, where it was not made for the purpose of evading the tax. Re Spaulding (1900) 49 App. Div. 541, 68 N. Y. Supp. 694, affirmed without opinion in (1900) 163 N. Y. 607, 57 N. E. 1124. The court states that "it may be assumed, considering the age of the deceased at the time of his death, his enfeebled condition, the steady and continuous failing of his physical powers, what he said to his son at the time the gifts were made, that the deceased knew he would not long continue to live; that death at most was not many years distant, and that he wished his three children to be the absolute owners and possessed of a part of his property before that event should take place; but there is no evidence tending to show that the gifts were made when the donor was in extremis, when he was dangerously ill, in danger of immediate death, in peril, afflicted with an acute disease, or anything of the kind. He was simply an old man, feeble as the result of old age, and he must have known that he could not live many years longer; but whether a few months, one, two, or five years, was not known to him, and could not be determined with any degree of accuracy. . . . As a matter of fact he lived a year and six months after the first gift was made, and ten months after the second gift was made, and up to within two months of his death had never called or required the services of a physician." The order of the surrogate, reversing the appraiser's report, was affirmed.

Transfers of corporate stock to the daughter and grandson of the transferor, made three years before his death, and when he was in vigorous health, and acting as president of one of the corporations the stock of which was transferred, and as director of another, were held not to be transfers in contemplation of death, in Re Bul-lard (1902) 76 App. Div. 207, 78 N. Y. Supp. 491. The dividends from the stock were paid to the transferor during his lifetime, but there was no agreement that they should be so paid. The decision of the surrogate, reversing the appraiser's report, was affirmed.

A transfer of corporate stock by a husband who was in general good health, to his wife, after the husband had reached a time in life when he desired some rest from the cares and responsibilities of business, but when, so far as the evidence shows, there was no immediate danger of death, was held not to be a transfer in contemplation of death, in Re Graves (1907) 52 Misc. 433, 103 N. Y. Supp. 571. The transfer in this case took place three years before the death of the donor, and at a time when he was attending to business, although troubled with a disabled hand. A former order of the surrogate, made upon the report of the appraiser, assessing the tax, was reversed.

A transfer of all but one share of stock in a corporation in which the transferor was president, to his wife, at a time when he was sick, and after his physician had assured him that upon his recovery it would be necessary for him to take a long vacation, was held not to be a transfer in contemplation of death, in Re Mahlstedt (1901) 67 App. Div. 178, 73 N. Y.

Supp. 818, affirmed without opinion in (1902) 171 N. Y. 652, 63 N. E. 1119. At the time of making the transfer the transferor expressed a desire that he might transfer his property to his wife, so that she could become a member of the corporation at once and transact the business in his place. The fact that the transferor retained one share of stock so that he might be a member of the corporation is regarded as an important fact by the court. The question is discussed as follows: "It may be that the transfer of the property was made in contemplation of death in the sense that many men who have accumulated property make some disposition of it in contemplation of the fact that they must die at some time, but the fact that Mr. Mahlstedt retained one share of the stock, which could be of no possible use to him as property if he was about to die, and which would pass by the will he had just executed to his wife, seems to us strong evidence that he did not believe that he was going to die of his present illness, but that he expected to live, and wanted to retain his right to vote in the corporation, perhaps as a mere matter of sentiment. The fact that he did die within about three weeks of the transfer, and that he died of the same illness with which he was afflicted at the time, has no bearing upon the question. The only point to be determined is whether the transfer was made in the then belief that he was not going to get well,—that it was made in contemplation of his impending death, and for the purpose of defrauding the state of the transfer tax." The decision of the surrogate, affirming the tax, was reversed.

In Re Hendricks (1914) 163 App. Div. 413, 148 N. Y. Supp. 511, affirmed without opinion in (1915) 214 N. Y. 663, 108 N. E. 1095, a transfer of stock reserving a life income by a husband seventy-four years of age, in good health, was held not to be a taxable transfer. The stocks in this case were not transferred on the corporate books until after the husband's death, and he exercised control over them; but of this it is stated that the source of the donor's control was an agreement subsequent to the gift, and not a condition attached to it. The court does not clearly indicate whether the transfer in this case was sought to be held taxable as a transfer in contemplation of death, or as one intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death. The decision of the surrogate, affirming the tax apparently on both grounds, was reversed by the appellate division.

A deed of real estate which contained a provision that the grantee should not mortgage or encumber the property without the consent of the grantor, and that, on the death of the grantor, the property would become the sole and exclusive property of the grantee, which was delivered to the grantee, but not recorded until after the death of the grantor, about four years after the execution of the deed, was held not to be a gift in contemplation of death, in Re Reynolds (1916) 163 N. Y. Supp. 803.

See Re Cornell (1901) 66 App. Div. 162, 73 N. Y. Supp. 32, modified in (1902) 170 N. Y. 428, 63 N. E. 445, supra, I.

The cases under the New York theory confining the meaning of the words "in contemplation of death," to gifts causa mortis, which have taxed the transfer, are not satisfactory authority upon whether there was a transfer in contemplation of death. A transfer by a man who was sick, of a large part of his property to his son, was held taxable in Re Palmer (1907) 117 App. Div. 360, 102 N. Y. Supp. 236, where the transfer, although in form absolute, in fact was in trust for the heirs of the transferer. Smith, J., took the view that there was a transfer in contemplation of death, but the other members of the court, who concurred in the result, did so on another theory. Partnership property passing to a son from his father, who was his copartner, under an agreement between them, by which the son assumed active control and management of the partnership business, and agreed to pay the father a certain per cent, was held to be taxable in Re Van Cott (1917) 180 App. Div. 814, 168 N. Y. Supp. 95, on the theory that the transfer was intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death. It was urged in this case that the transfer was not a transfer in contemplation of death, within the meaning of the Transfer Tax Law, and hence not taxable; but the court does not consider this provision of the tax law.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. N. Thomas and E. P. Field for appellee.

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the people from the order of the county court of Warren county, fixing the inheritance tax on the estate of J. Thatcher Porter, deceased. The principal question involved is whether the conveyance in the lifetime of the deceased of 200 acres of real estate to Alvin Porter, his son, is subject to an inheritance tax under the laws of the state.

J. Thatcher Porter died intestate on September 13, 1917. At the time of his death he was seised and possessed of real estate and personalty, over and above indebtedness, amounting to about $97,000, on which the county court assessed an inheritance tax as provided by law. The court held the 200 acres deeded to Alvin Porter were transferred as compensation for services rendered by him to the deceased, and that the conveyance was based upon a full and valuable consideration, and that the property, and the conveyance thereof, are not subject to the assessment of an inheritance tax. The transfer of the 200 acres to Alvin Porter is dated April 6, 1916.

Appellant contends, first, that the conveyance was made in contemplation of death, and that this was the impelling motive causing the grantor to make the conveyance in spite of the fact that it may have been made to compensate the grantee for services rendered, and that while the sense of obligation contributed to the gift, such was not the impelling motive; second, that the conveyance was intended to, and did, take effect after the death, and that such consideration as was present was but a moral obligation, and not a legal one, and did not take the transfer out of the terms, spirit, or meaning of the statute.

It appears from the evidence that the grantor at the time of this conveyance was about seventy-five years of age, feeble, afflicted with disease, and subject to sinking spells, presumed to be the result of heart trouble. The testimony tends to show that for two years previous to his death his health was such that death might be expected to occur at any time; that at the time of the conveyance in question, and for some time previous thereto, he was under the care and treatment of a physician; that his health gradually failed until his death, on September 13, 1917. The evidence further tends to show that Alvin Porter, who was forty-seven years of age, had remained at home with his parents and managed the farm of some 480 acres, including the land in question, for his father up to the time of his father's death. There was no change in possession of the 200 acres in question until after the death of the grantor. The grantee stated that in his opinion this conveyance was made in contemplation of death, and not to take effect in possession until after the death of the grantor, but that the conveyance was made for the purpose of compensating him for services rendered to the grantor in his lifetime. Alvin received none of the proceeds from this land until after the death of his father, although the management of the land was under his control and direction, with the other lands then owned by his father. The father received the profits and paid the taxes and operating expenses from the proceeds. The testimony further tends to show that it was the understanding between Alvin and his father that the business should be conducted just the same as it had been prior to the conveyance, until the death of the grantor. The evidence fails to show any specific agreement or understanding between Alvin and his father concerning any compensation to be paid to Alvin for his services, he testifying that at the time he performed the services he believed his father would do the right thing under the circumstances. The evidence shows the value of the land to be $36,000. There is evidence showing, or tending to show, at least, that the fair value of services rendered by Alvin to his father since his majority to the date of the conveyance approximates the fair cash market value of the land in question at the time of the conveyance.

That portion of § 1 of the statute concerning tax on gifts, legacies, inheritances, transfers, etc., is as follows: "A tax shall be and is hereby imposed upon the transfer of any property, real, personal, or mixed, or of any interest therein or income therefrom, in trust or otherwise. . . ."

"3. When the transfer is of property made by a resident . . . by deed, grant, bargain, sale or gift, made in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor, or donor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death." Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1917, p. 2500.

The general rule with relation to the assessment of an inheritance tax is, that where the conveyance is intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the donor, it is subject to an inheritance tax, and this

Tax—inheritance—conveyance—to take effect after death.

even though the intention of the parties is not evidenced in writing. People v. Moir, 207 Ill. 180, 99 Am. St. Rep. 205, 69 N. E. 905. "A gift is made in contemplation of an event when it is made in expectation of that event and having it in view; and a gift made when the donor is looking forward to his death as impending, and in view of that event, is within the language of the statute." Rosenthal v. People, 211 Ill. 306, 71 N. E. 1121. So, also, it was held in Merrifield v. People, 212 Ill. 400, 72 N. E. 446, that where property is conveyed without consideration, though by an absolute deed, followed by enjoyment and possession by the grantee during the grantor's life, such transfer is taxable under § 1 of the Inheritance Tax Law if the transfer was made in the contemplation of the death of the grantor. It was held in Re Benton, 234 Ill. 366, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 458, 84 N. E. 1026, 14 Ann. Cas. 107, that a gift made in contemplation of death, as expressed in the Inheritance Tax Law, is not restricted to a gift causa mortis, but includes gifts inter vivos if they are made when the donor is looking forward to his death as impending, and made in view of that event, for the purpose of placing his estate, or some part thereof, in the hands of the person whom he desires to enjoy it after his death. In the case of People v. Carpenter, 264 Ill. 400, 106 N. E. 302, the words, "in contemplation of death," used in the Inheritance Tax Statute, are held to mean, not the general expectation of all rational mortals that they will die some time, but an apprehension of death arising from some existing infirmity or impending peril. In People v. Burkhalter, 247 Ill. 600, 139 Am. St. Rep. 351, 93 N. E. 379, the rule is laid down that where transfers of property take effect in possession and enjoyment during the lifetime of the grantor, they are not subject to an inheritance tax unless the grantor's contemplation of death was the impelling motive which caused him to make such transfer. If such was the impelling motive, the transfers are subject to the tax, and this though no evidence of that motive appears in the deed. In the case at bar the county court found that there was a full and adequate consideration for the transfer in question, and held that, by reason of such full and adequate consideration, the Inheritance Tax Statute is not applicable. In People v. Orendorff, 262 Ill. 246, 104 N. E. 656, the rule is laid down that only the beneficiary's interest passing from the decedent to the heir as a result of the death is taxable, and that an absolute transfer of property, made in good faith, for a valuable consideration, and not made in contemplation of death, is not subject to the inheritance tax.

It is contended on the part of the appellee that the transfer in question was for a valuable consideration, and that, even though made in contemplation of death, and the enjoyment and possession thereof postponed until the death of the grantor, such transfer is, nevertheless, not subject to an inheritance tax. Were such to be held to be the rule, we can see no application of it where there does not appear to have been a valuable consideration moving from the grantee to the grantor. The rule is that where parties live together as members of one family the law does not imply a contract on the part of one to pay for the services rendered by another, but the presumption arising from the relation is that such services are rendered gratuitously. In such a case there can be a recovery only by proving the making of an express contract, or circumstances from which a reasonable inference would arise that such a contract was in fact made. A moral obligation does not suffice for a consideration unless the moral obligation was once a legal one. Finch v. Green, 225 Ill. 304, 80 N. E. 318.

Appellee relies on the case of Legate v. Legate, 249 Ill. 359, 94 N. E. 498. That case was a bill in chancery reforming a deed executed by Israel Legate to Sarah Legate, his sister. The opinion in that case is based on the finding of the court that Israel intended to convey certain property, and that the property was left out of the deed through a mistake of the scrivener, and that there was a valuable consideration for the conveyance. The rule is, however, laid down in that case, that where members of a family reside together and some of them render services for others, the presumption of law arising from the relation is that such services are rendered gratuitously, and that no recovery can be had for such services without proving an express contract, or circumstances from which the law would imply a contract. In this case the evidence of the appellee shows that there was no contract that he should receive either the property in question or any other financial gain for his services, and we are of the opinion that no consideration based upon a legal obligation existed. This being true, and it appearing from the statements of the appellee himself, as well as from other evidence in the record, that the transfer was made in contemplation of death, and the enjoyment and possession thereof postponed until the death of the grantor, such transfer and the property therein involved are subject to an inheritance tax.

The county court found the fair cash market value of the 200 acres of land to be, at the time of the transfer, $36,000. Upon a review of the evidence we are of the opinion that said finding was justified.

The cause will therefore be remanded to the County Court, with directions to enter an order assessing an inheritance tax against the property on the basis of the value of the same found by the court, and in accordance with the statute in such case made and provided.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

I. Transfers by will.

a. Rule that transfer is taxable.

There is a difference of opinion whether property which passes under a will is free from an inheritance tax where it is devised or bequeathed in pursuance of a contract, upon a consideration, entered into by the testator in his lifetime. It will be observed that some jurisdictions have not been consistent, sometimes adhering to one rule and sometimes to the other. This question has frequently arisen in case of devises or bequests in payment for services rendered the testator. One line of authorities holds that the fact that a devise or bequest is made in payment of services, as agreed by the testator, does not free it from the inheritance or succession tax where the statute itself makes no exception. State v. Mollier (1915) 96 Kan. 514, L.R.A.1916C, 551, 152 Pac. 771; Clarke v. Treasurer (1917) 226 Mass. 301, L.R.A.1917D, 800, 115 N. E. 416; Cart- er v. Craig (1914) 77 N. H. 200, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 211, 90 Atl. 598, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 1179; Re Gould (1898) 156 N. Y. 423, 51 N. E. 287; Tyson's Appeal (1849) 10 Pa. 220. (But see Pennsylvania cases in I. b.) In State v. Mollier (Kan.) supra, a transfer by will in pursuance of an agreement in the lifetime of the testator, with the transferee, that if she would make a home with him, act as his housekeeper, and look after his welfare as long as he lived, he would make a will and bequeath to her all his property, an agreement which the transferee fully performed on her part, was held subject to the transfer tax. A bequest to one in pursuance of a contract entered into between the decedent and the legatee to bequeath to her a stated sum in consideration of her services as his housekeeper was held to be taxable in Clarke v. Treasurer (1917) 226 Mass. 301, L.R.A.1917D, 800, 115 N. E. 416. A bequest to one upon condition that he make no charge or demand against the estate of the testatrix for boarding or services rendered her was held to be subject to the collateral inheritance tax in Tyson's Appeal (1849) 10 Pa. 220. See facts set out in Carter v. Craig (1914) 77 N. H. 200, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 211, 90 Atl. 598, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 1179, and Re Gould (1898) 156 N. Y. 423, 51 N. E. 287, infra.

Some doubt is thrown upon the authority of Re Gould (N. Y.) supra, by the decision in Re Vanderbilt (1918) 184 App. Div. 661, 172 N. Y. Supp. 511, affirmed without opinion in (1919) 226 N. Y. 638, 123 N. E. 893, infra. And see Re Orvis (1918) 223

N. Y. 1, 3 A.L.R. 1636, 119 N. E. 88, infra, III. The surrogate in Re Vanderbilt, 102 Misc. 497, 169 N. Y. Supp. 201, in distinguishing the two cases, said that the amount of the bequest in Re Gould was "not an amount determined by previous agreement, but was the valuation placed by the decedent upon his son's services. It might be excessive or it might be inadequate, but if the beneficiary refused to accept it, he would be compelled to establish the value of his services in an action brought for that purpose." This seems to be contrary to the assumption of the court of appeals in Re Gould. It is true that the court of appeals does not expressly say that the legatee might have rejected the legacy and recovered the same amount as a creditor of the estate, but the court does say: "If Jay Gould did owe his son George $5,000,000 for services, and we must assume that he did, he selected a method of payment which brought the transaction within the taxing provisions of the statute." The appellate division in Re Vanderbilt makes no attempt to harmonize that case with or distinguish it from Re Gould.

This theory under which transfers by will in payment of an obligation of the testator are taxable has also been applied to bequests and devises in satisfaction of contracts other than those for services. Thus, a bequest in satisfaction of the testator's obligations under an antenuptial contract has been held taxable. Hill v. Treasurer (1917) 227 Mass. 331, 116 N. E. 309; Atty. Gen. v. Murray (1886) Ir. L. R. 20 C. L. 124; and see Re Kidd (1907) 188 N. Y. 274, 80 N. E. 924, infra, II. b, 2. In Hill v. Treasurer (Mass.) supra, the provision in the will was more in the nature of a direction to the executors to pay the widow the sum provided in the antenuptial contract; the testator there recognized his antenuptial contract in his will, and provided that the sum called for by the contract should be paid his widow, but authorized her to take securities instead of cash, and the widow elected to take the securities (as to a mere direction to pay, see Re Burhans (1917) 100 Misc. 646, 166 N. Y. Supp. 1027, infra). The residue of an estate which the testator devised to the trustees of his marriage settlement, in accordance with the terms of the settlement, was held not to be a debt due by him, and, therefore was subject to probate duty. Atty. Gen. v. Murray (1886) Ir. L. R. 20 C. L. 124. Where there had been no deed of settlement, an appointment of a legacy, by one authorized to charge an estate for the benefit of any woman he might marry, to his wife in full of her jointure and in bar of dower, was held to be subject to legacy duty, as it could not be considered as a purchase of the wife's right of dower, but as a gift. Henniker v. Atty. Gen. (1852) 8 Exch. 257, 155 Eng. Reprint, 1843, 22 L. J. Exch. N. S. 41, 16 Jur. 1143.

Where a donee of a power of appointment exercised the power by directing her executors to pay all her debts, including a debt for which she had given a bond, it was held in Re Rogers (1902) 71 App. Div. 461, 75 N. Y. Supp. 835, affirmed without opinion in (1902) 172 N. Y. 617, 64 N. E. 1125, that the creditor who accepted payment in this way was subject to the tax. It is stated that the creditor was not obliged to accept this provision of the will for the payment of his debt, but if he did accept it, there was no way to avoid the payment of the tax which the state imposes as a condition of receiving a transfer under the will of the decedent.

In Ransom v. United States (1879) Fed. Cas. No. 11,574, a devise by a wife to her husband of real estate which had been purchased and paid for by him, but conveyed to her upon the understanding that she should make her will devising the property to him, in case she died before he did, was held to be subject to the tax, under the Internal Revenue Act of 1864, which subjected dispositions of real estate by will to a tax. The court states that the fact that the will was made on account of an agreement to that effect by the wife when she took her title rendered it none the less an instrument creating a beneficial interest in the husband on her death, and that, under the statute, is a succession to be taxed. The question of consideration is not expressly discussed in this case. Compare with Re Galot (1919) 106 Misc. 310, 174 N. Y. Supp. 492, infra, I. b, and Nelson v. Schoonover (1913) 89 Kan. 779, 132 Pac. 1183, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 147, infra, II. b, 1.

Under the theory now under discussion, not only is a bequest or devise in payment of a past consideration taxable where the legatee or devisee accepts the same instead of filing his claim as a creditor, but a bequest in payment of a future consideration is held taxable. A bequest in consideration of services to be rendered by the legatee as executor and trustee is held subject to the tax. Re Huber (1903) 86 App. Div. 458, 83 N. Y. Supp. 769; Re Thorley [1891] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 613, 60 L. J. Ch. N. S. 537, 64 L. T. N. S. 515, 39 Week. Rep. 565. In England, however, an executor or trustee is not entitled to any compensation for his services in the absence of an expressed provision to the contrary; accordingly, a legacy to a trustee in payment of his services in carrying on testator's business is held to be a pure gift, and as such subject to the legacy tax. Re Thorley (Eng.) supra; see statute infra. See Turner v. Martin (1857) 7 De G. M. & G. 429, 44 Eng. Reprint, 168, 3 Jur. N. S. 397, 26 L. J. Ch. N. S. 216, 5 Week. Rep. 277, infra.

A provision that the testator's son should receive a stipulated sum while he was managing testator's business in conjunction with trustees appointed by the testator was held to be a legacy and taxable under § 4 of the Act 8 & 9 Vict. chap. 76, which provides that "every gift by any will or testamentary instrument . . . which by virtue of any such will or testamentary instrument is or shall be payable, or shall have effect or be satisfied out of the personal or movable estate of such person . . . shall be deemed a legacy . . . and shall be subject and liable to the said duties." Re Thorley (Eng.) supra.

See generally the Pennsylvania cases, which for convenience have been grouped together, infra, I. b, beginning with Walters's Estate (1887) 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 447, as to bequests for future services.

The statutes involved in the foregoing cases make no exception of transfers for a valuable consideration, in subjecting transfer by will to an inheritance tax. The statute involved in Carter v. Craig (1914) 77 N. H. 200, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 211, 90 Atl. 598, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 1179, provides that "all property within the jurisdiction of the estate, real or personal, or any interest therein . . . which shall pass by will . . . shall be subject to a tax of 5 per cent of its value for the use of the state." See statute involved in Re Gould (1898) 166 N. Y. 423, 51 N. E. 287, infra.

An exception in some statutes of transfers for a consideration has been held to apply only to transfers in the lifetime of the testator. Thus, a statute which provides that "all property . . . which shall pass by will, or by the laws regulating intestate succession, or by deed, grant, or gift, except in cases of a bona fide purchase for full consideration in money or money's worth, made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor," was construed in Clarke v. Treasurer (1917) 226 Mass. 301, L.R.A.1917D, 800, 115 N. E. 416, as meaning that only when the property passed by "deed, grant, or gift," was it excepted when upon a full consideration, and not where it passed by will or by the laws regulating intestate succession. A similar construction was put upon the statute involved in State v. Mollier (1915) 96 Kan. 514, L.R.A.1916C, 551, 152 Pac. 771, which imposed an inheritance or succession tax upon all property "which shall pass by will or by the laws regulating intestate succession, or by deed, grant, or gift made in contemplation of death, or made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor, to any person absolutely or in trust,—except in case of a bona fide purchase for full consideration in money or money's worth." The exemption mentioned in this statute of certain transfers which were made for full consideration in money or money's worth was held to apply solely to transfers by deed or grant, made in the lifetime of the transferrer, and to have no application to the transmission of property by will.

The theory of the foregoing cases is that since the statutes involved made no exception of transfers for a consideration, the courts can make no such exception. If the legatee or devisee accepts the bequest or devise in satisfaction of his debt, the transfer is subject to the tax. In Carter v. Craig (1914) 77 N. H. 200, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 211, 90 Atl. 598, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 1179, there was held to be a taxable transfer where property was devised to one in pursuance of a contract between the testator and the devisee, entered into in the testator's lifetime, that the devisee should care for the testator and his wife during their lives and the life of the survivor, in consideration of which the property in question would be bequeathed and devised to him. The court states that "the contract was to bequeath and devise the property to Stone. It was not a contract to convey, but to make a will in his favor; and French having made the will and Stone having accepted its provisions and taken title to the property thereunder, the transmission was by will and is subject to the tax. . . . It can make no difference that there was a valid consideration for the contract to transfer the property by will. The imposition of the tax is not limited to property passing gratuitously by will, but extends to 'all property' so passing. If the legislature had intended to limit the imposition of the tax to property passing gratuitously, it could easily have said so; but by providing that all property passing by will should be subject to the tax, it manifested an intention not to so limit it." A bequest by a testator to his son in consideration of services rendered by the son under an agreement with his father, the sum bequeathed having been agreed upon by the parties, was held to be taxable in Re Gould (1898) 156 N. Y. 423, 51 N. E. 287, where the son accepted the bequest in payment of his services. The statute involved in this case provided that "a tax shall be and is hereby imposed upon the transfer of any property . . . when the transfer is by will." The court states that "it will be noted that the imposition of the tax is not limited to property gratuitously given by will, but is extended to all property so transferred. . . . If Jay Gould did owe his son George $5,000,000 for services, and we must assume that he did, he selected a method of payment which brought the transaction within the taxing provisions of the statute. Whether this action was taken by Jay Gould for the purpose of absolutely securing to the state the tax, or because he wished to retain possession of all his property during his life, or for some other satisfactory reason, we need not inquire. The question of motive on the part of the testator is not for our consideration. We are not dealing with the taxing statute which undertakes to tax all property transferred by will and which is applicable to every transaction of that kind, whether advisedly or mistakenly entered upon and carried out. . . . So far in the progress of this proceeding, the question as to the right of the state to collect a tax upon the property has been disposed of by the court below as if the statute provided in terms that only property 'gratuitously given by will' should be taxed. But the statute does not so provide, and the duty of the court is to read it as it is written."

There is a suggestion in Re Gould (N. Y.) supra, that the legatee might have refused to accept compensation under the will, and could have recovered against the estate under the agreement with his father, in which event the amount recovered would not have been taxable. There is a similar suggestion in Hill v. Treasurer (1917) 227 Mass. 331, 116 N. E. 509, that the widow might refuse to take the legacy and insist on her rights under the antenuptial contract in the statement that "the tax is due because, by his will, Mr. Hill gave his wife the option of taking a legacy in satisfaction of her rights as a creditor, and she elected to do so." And see Re Doty (1893) 7 Misc. 193, 27 N. Y. Supp. 653; Re Burhans (1917) 100 Misc. 646, 166 N. Y. Supp. 1027, infra. See Re Schmoll (1919) 108 Misc. 492, 177 N. Y. Supp. 670, infra, II. b, 2.

In some cases involving legacies in payment of services, the court, in holding the transfer subject to the tax, has expressly based the decision upon what appeared to be the fact, that there was no legal liability to the legatee, hence the legacy was a voluntary gift. In Re Doty (1893) 7 Misc. 193, 27 N. Y. Supp. 653, the court states that the "existence of a claim which the testator might be honorably but not legally bound to pay is insufficient; it must be one to which there is no legal defense, and which the creditor can enforce by legal proceedings. If this were not the legal rule, a testator might either designedly or otherwise defeat the object of the statute, and render it practically useless by simply reciting in his will that the legacy is in consideration of care, attention, kindness, favors received from, or services performed by, the legatee at some period of the testator's life." The decision in Re Doty rests in part, at least, upon the acceptance of the provisions made in the will by the legatee, and failure to prove any legal right he may have had against the estate of the testatrix. The rule holding the transfer by will taxable is especially applicable where there is no legal liability which is canceled by the bequest or devise. A direction to the executors and trustees of a decedent who, years previously to his decease, had been a bankrupt, to pay to creditors which were not paid in full a certain sum, was held to be a direction to pay a legacy, and therefore subject to the legacy duty. Turner v. Martin (1857) 7 De M. & G. 429, 44 Eng. Reprint, 168, 3 Jur. N. S. 397, 26 L. J. Ch. N. S. 216, 5 Week. Rep. 277. See Re Thorley [1891] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 613, 60 L. J. Ch. N. S. 537, 64 L. T. N. S. 515, 39 Week. Rep. 565, and Henniker v. Atty. Gen. (1852) 8 Exch. 257, 155 Eng. Reprint, 1343, 22 L. J. Exch. N. S. 41, 16 Jur. 1143, su*pra*. See Gibbon's Estate (1883) 13 W. N. C. (Pa.) 99, infra, I. b. Compare with the reported case (PEOPLE v. PORTER, ante, 1041) as to moral obligation.

A distinction has been made between a bequest in payment of obligations of the testator and a direction to the executor to pay the debt; the mere mention of a debt in the will, and direction of the executors to pay it, is held not to subject it to the tax, where the creditor presents his claim and has it allowed as a debt. Re Burhans (1917) 100 Misc. 646, 166 N. Y. Supp. 1027. The debt involved in this case was a promissory note which the testator had given to one who acted as his housekeeper, and a condition was written in the note, that the note was payable only on condition that the payee remain and continue to serve and act as his housekeeper until the date of his death, otherwise to be of no force and effect. The will contained a direction to his executors to use and expend the amount called for in the note in the payment of the note, and also such amount as would pay the interest accrued and due thereon at the time of payment. The court, in distinguishing the case from Re Gould (1898) 156 N. Y. 423, 51 N. E. 287, supra, states that "in the case at bar there is a valid obligation for a good and valuable consideration, executed by the obligor, naming the exact amount the obligee is entitled to receive. There is no proof of any conversation or agreement with the testator, to receive payment by will, nor any proof of any knowledge by Miss McNeil [the payee of the note] during the lifetime of the testator of the provisions of the will. Nor is there any proof that she has accepted or agreed to the provisions of the will as to the payment of her claim. On the contrary, there is proof that she presented her claim by virtue of the note in question, and that the executor allowed it as a debt." Compare with Hill v. Treasurer (1917) 227 Mass. 331, 116 N. E. 509, supra.

Where the legatee has not accepted anything under the will, there is no taxable transfer although the will contains some directions as to the method of paying the testator's obligation. Thus, where the husband in his will recites a separation agreement previously entered into between himself and his wife, by the terms of which she was to receive a life annuity, with the right to a gross sum in satisfaction of the annuity payment in case she survive her husband, and provides for the methods of meeting the payments of the annuity, or the gross sum in case she elects to take, and the wife makes no election to take a gross sum, the annuity due her is not taxable. Re Daniell (1903) 40 Misc. 329, 81 N. Y. Supp. 1033. Compare with Re Vanderbilt (N. Y.) infra, I. b.

Property transferred by executors of a will under direction by the decedent, who was a trustee, to set apart out of his estate a sufficient sum of money to meet the obligations of the trust, or to pay the beneficiaries a sum agreed upon in compromise, is not a taxable transfer. Re Hamilton (1917) 100 Misc. 61, 164 N. Y. Supp. 938. In distinguishing Re Gould (N. Y.) supra, the court states that in the case at bar there was no debt, and, therefore, no claim or interest which was soluble out of the general assets of the decedent; that "here the right of the two beneficiaries had no concern with any property of which the decedent died seised, but, far from that, it impinged only upon a fund which was separated from the decedent's estate both before and after his death."

It is the theory of some cases that a legacy or devise in payment of a debt or in discharge of an obligation of the testator is not subject to a succession tax. Re Vanderbilt (1918) 184 App. Div. 661, 172 N. Y. Supp. 511, affirmed without opinion in (1919) 226 N. Y. 638, 123 N. E. 893; Re Stebbins (1907) 52 Misc. 438, 103 N. Y. Supp. 563 (obiter); Re Rogers (1890) 2 Connolly, 198, 10 N. Y. Supp. 22; Re Hulse (1890) 39 N. Y. S. R. 402, 15 N. Y. Supp. 770; Re Underhill (1890) 2 Connolly, 262, 20 N. Y. Supp. 134; Re Galot (1919) 106 Misc. 310, 174 N. Y. Supp. 492; Clark's Estate (1901) 10

Pa. Dist. R. 378; Quin's Estate (1880) 18 Phila. (Pa.) 840.

This rule has been applied to devises or bequests in payment of services. In Re Hulse (1890) 39 N. Y. S. R. 402, 15 N. Y. Supp. 770, a gift by a testatrix of all her property to her nephew "in consideration of a home for me at his house during my life," made in pursuance of an agreement to furnish the home for the testatrix, was held not to be taxable. It is stated that although the property is given to the legatee as a legacy, he is really to receive it in satisfaction of a claim which he might enforce as a creditor against the estate of the deceased. See Re Underhill (N. Y.) infra.

This rule has been applied to bequests or devises in payment of testator's debts without making the source of the debt to appear. A bequest of a specified sum to the testator's foreman on condition that he should accept the same in full of all unsettled accounts and claims was held to be free from the transfer tax where it appeared that the amount of the foreman's claims was in excess of the sum bequeathed, but that he was willing to accept the legacy in full. Re Underhill (1890) 2 Connolly, 262, 20 N. Y. Supp. 134. The court argues that had no bequest been made in this form, but the foreman's claims been left in a class of debts which a testator usually directs the executors to pay, it would certainly have been exempt from taxation; "if he had simply bequeathed $4,000 without the mention of any claim, then it would have been taxable. Where a testator chooses to provide in the form of a bequest for the payment of a just debt, with a view possibly of obviating any question in the mind of his executors as to its amount or validity, he could do so with great propriety, but by doing it he could not clothe it with the character of a gift. Under the circumstances it will readily be seen that by this provision of the will, no property is 'transferred by deed, grant, sale, or gift,' as contemplated by the first section of this act," to the foreman. In Quin's Estate (Pa.) supra, a gift by testator to a creditor, and in satisfaction of his claim, of the precise sum due, with interest, is held to fall neither within the letter nor spirit of the Inheritance Tax Act; such fund or property cannot be said to pass to the creditor under the will any more than in case of a general testamentary direction to pay debts. In Re Rogers (1890) 2 Connoly, 198, 10 N. Y. Supp. 22, the bequest was not absolute, but was a bequest to the creditor "so far as his interests may appear and be proved." The court states that whether he takes anything under the will depends upon his being able to prove a debt; that he takes nothing if there is no debt, so that while he may be entitled to receive something by virtue of the will, he does not get it as a gift in payment of the debt. The bequest in this case was of an interest in an insurance policy, and it is stated that it may be that unless the creditor had been provided for in this way by the will he would not have been able to collect the debt, by reason of the terms of the contract of insurance. Still, whatever he may get even by virtue of the will, is simply the payment of a debt.

A transfer by the will of a decedent of real estate which had been conveyed to him in his lifetime upon his agreement to transfer and convey to the grantors upon his death, free and clear of encumbrances, is not a taxable transfer, since it is not a gift or gratuity, but founded on a contract made for a valuable and adequate consideration. Re Galot (1919) 106 Misc. 310, 174 N. Y. Supp. 492. Compare with Ransom v. United States (Fed.) supra, I. a, and Nelson v. Schoonover (1913) 89 Kan. 779, 182 Pac. 1183, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 147, infra, II. b, 1.

The rule has been applied to bequests in payment of sums provided by antenuptial contracts. In Re Vanderbilt (1918) 184 App. Div. 661, 172 N. Y. Supp. 511, affirmed without opinion in (1919) 226 N. Y. 638, 123 N. E. 893, there was held to be no taxable transfer although the widow accepted securities, as authorized by will, in lieu of the payment of money provided for in the antenuptial contract. The court states that the widow's right to receive the securities did not grow out of the will; that its source was in the antenuptial agreement, and the obligation would have been enforced against the estate had there been no will; that the agreement rested upon a valuable consideration which was executed by the marriage, and the mere fact "that the method of payment and satisfaction of the obligation was directed by the will did not change the inherent character of the obligation." The testamentary provision in the Vanderbilt Case was not merely a direction to pay, but was a bequest of the sum called for in the antenuptial agreement in cash, or, in the discretion of the executors, in securities to be selected by them from the personal property. The executors transferred securities in payment of the bequest and these were accepted. Compare with Re Kidd (N. Y.) infra, II. b, 2. It is not clear that the transfer in Re Miller (1902) 77 App. Div. 473, 78 N. Y. Supp. 930, was urged as taxable because of having been made under the will of the deceased husband. The court, however, holds the transfer in that case was not made under the will, as there had been a previous and absolute transfer of the property mentioned in the will to the wife at the time of the marriage. The decision in Re Vanderbilt and its affirmation by the court of appeals throws considerable doubt upon the decision in Re Gould (N. Y.) supra, I. a, for it seems that the language used by the appellate division cannot be reconciled with the theory of Re Gould. See further comment, supra, I. a.

A direction to executors to pay the creditor a sum equal to the debt, but without mentioning the debt, was held to be a direction to pay the debt, and not subject to the tax. Smith's Estate (1912) 22 Pa. Dist. R. 464. Compare with Re Burhans (1917) 100 Misc. 646, 166 N. Y. Supp. 1027, supra, I. a.

Under the rule now under discussion, the obligation must be a legal one. Gibbon's Estate (1883) 13 W. N. C. (Pa.) 99, holding a bequest to one "as an acknowledgment of her valuable services in my family, covering a period of thirty years," subject to the tax, the court saying that the principle in the foregoing cases cannot apply where, as in the case at bar, "no claim such as could have been enforced by suit exists, and where the legacy is a pure gratuity, based upon the faithful performance of services which, if not already compensated, must have been rendered without expectation of reward, and without liability on the part of the person receiving them." Compare with the cases cited in I. a, supra, as to the necessity of the obligation being a legal one.

It has been held in Pennsylvania that a bequest to a named person on condition that he act as executor and trustee of the testator's estate is not taxable. In Clark's Estate (1901) 10 Pa. Dist. R. 378, it is stated to have been conceded that collateral inheritance taxes are chargeable only against gratuities, and that legacies by way of compensation are exempt. Compare with cases cited under I. a, as to the taxability of bequests in payment of the services of an executor or trustee.

The Pennsylvania cases have not been consistent as to whether a bequest or devise in payment of future services is subject to a tax. As just stated, a bequest to an executor and trustee is not taxable; but a bequest to a church of a stated sum, in consideration of which the testator expresses a desire that the church shall care for the family cemetery lot of the testator, has been held subject to a tax. Walters's Estate (1887) 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 447. The court here makes a distinction between a legacy given in payment of a debt which is a legal obligation in the lifetime of the testator and a legacy given for the faithful performance of services, where there was no legal liability on the part of the testator therefor. The court states that "in the case in hand the church had not kept these graves in repair, there was no contract with the church in regard to them, and no indebtedness by the testator to the church therefor, and the legacy cannot be treated as a payment of a debt, for none existed. The church, if they accept the bequest, can probably be required to perform the condition annexed to it, and it does not matter in this regard whether it be treated as a trust or as a liability caused by the acceptance of the bequest. Probably no technical trust exists here and the obligation is one simply imposed upon and accepted by the beneficiary, and to be enforced as such." A bequest to a church on condition that the church bell shall be rung at stated periods is subject to the inheritance tax. Gilpin's Estate (1887) 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 122. Money paid out by executors under a provision in a will directing the executors to spend a specified sum for masses is held taxable in Pennsylvania. Nead's Estate (1914) 55 Pa. Super. Ct. 578. A bequest for masses has been held taxable where it was in the form of a bequest to the pastor of a specified church. Seibert's Appeal (1886) 3 Sadler (Pa.) 412, 18 W. N. C. (Pa.) 276, 6 Atl. 105.

II. Transfers by deed, grant, gift, or contract.

a. In general.

Many statutes subjecting to an inheritance or succession tax property transferred by the owner in his lifetime, or passing at his death, under an agreement entered into by him in his lifetime, except from their operation transfers upon a consideration. These statutes are discussed infra. Other statutes make no such exception. It is a general principle, however, announced in many cases involving transfers of property within the lifetime of the owner, or under contract entered into in his lifetime, that the inheritance or succession tax statutes are not intended to tax transfers for a valuable consideration, even though the language of the statutes makes no exception of such transfers. Blair v. Herold (1907) 150 Fed. 199, affirmed in (1908) 86 C. C. A. 64, 158 Fed. 804; Abstract & Title Guaranty Co. v. State (1916) 173 Cal. 691, 161 Pac. 264; Re Orvis (1918) 223 N. Y. 1, 3 A.L.R. 1636, 119 N. E. 88; Re Miller (1902) 77 App. Div. 473, 78 N. Y. Supp.

930; Re Baker (1903) 83 App. Div. 530, 82 N. Y. Supp. 290, affirmed without opinion in (1904) 173 N. Y. 575, 70 N. E. 1094; Re Stebbins (1907) 52 Misc. 438, 103 N. Y. State* (1897) 55 Ohio St. 613, 45 N. E. 1046. The court in Re Orvis (1918) 223 N. Y. 1, 3 A.L.R. 1636, 119 N. E. 88, after stating that the language of the New York statute, literally adopted and applied, would subject to a tax transfers upon a valuable consideration, continues that "the nature of the tax . . . and the language of the statute, considered in its entirety, have convinced us that the legislature did not, however, intend that conclusion. Transfers resting upon a valuable and adequate consideration, although within the classification of the statute, are not within the intendment of it, and are not taxable. . . . The legislature did not intend that a purchaser who had paid full value for the property transferred should directly or indirectly pay the tax beside."

The rule that a transfer upon a consideration is not subject to the inheritance or succession tax is further supported, at least impliedly, by all cases cited in II. b, infra, which consider the sufficiency of the consideration. Some of the cases cited in that subdivision, however, were decided under statutes providing that a consideration frees the transfer of a tax.

A contrary opinion is expressed obiter in Carter v. Craig (1914) 77 N. H. 200, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 211, 90 Atl. 598, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 1179, where the court, after holding that a transfer by will, in pursuance of a contract, is subject to the tax, continues that the same intention is manifested in the further provisions of the Inheritance Tax Statute, which subjected to the tax, "all property . . . which shall pass . . . by deed, grant, sale, or gift, made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor." The court states that "the terms 'deed' and 'grant' do not indicate that the transfers must be gratuitous to be subject to the tax. Transfers by such methods of conveyance are usually based upon a consideration, and a 'sale' always is. The only limitation on the imposition of the tax upon such transfers, gratuitous or otherwise, would seem to be when they are not made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor, bargainor, or donor."

A transfer of property by judgment of the court specifically enforcing an antenuptial contract entered into by the decedent, by the terms of which he agreed—in consideration of the marriage and the promise of the intended wife to turn over to him, for use in his business, the sum of $40,000—to will his property to the plaintiff in the specific performance action, a daughter of his intended wife, was held to be taxable in Re Kidd (1907) 188 N. Y. 274, 80 N. E. 924. The court states that the antenuptial contract was not a contract to convey, but a contract to make a will in plaintiff's favor; that had the deceased performed his agreement and given her his property by will, the estate would have been subject to the tax; that the question is not affected by the failure of the testator to carry out his promise, and the necessity of resorting to a court for relief. The court in Re Kidd does not expressly consider the effect of a consideration upon the taxability of the transfer, and states that its decision is distinguishable from Re Baker (1903) 83 App. Div. 530, 82 N.

Y. Supp. 390, affirmed without opinion in (1904) 178 N. Y. 575, 70 N. E. 1094. In Re Baker sums paid to a widow from the estate of her deceased husband, in satisfaction of the provisions made for her in an antenuptial contract, were held not taxable, on the theory that this was a contract "entered into between the decedent and the claimant, which was founded upon a perfectly good and valuable consideration, and one which is regarded with favor by the law." The court concludes that "the tax imposed by the statute in question is a tax on the right of succession . . . 'and a payment of an obligation dependent upon a valuable consideration is not a succession in any sense.' " On the effect of consideration, it is difficult to reconcile the decision in Re Kidd with the decision in Re Baker. The theory of Re Baker, however, is consistent with Re Vanderbilt (1918) 194 App. Div. 661, 172 N. Y. Supp. 511, affirmed without opinion in (1919) 226 N. Y. 688, 123 N. E. 893, and Re Orvis (N. Y.) supra, so that if there is any conflict between Re Baker and Re Kidd, the former is the law, as established by the latest decisions.

As stated above, under some statutes it is expressly provided that transfers on a consideration are not subject to the tax. Some statutes, in taxing transfers in contemplation of the death of the transferor and transfers intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death, limit the "transfers" to those made without valuable and adequate consideration. United States v. Hart (1880) 4 Fed. 292; Re Reynolds (1915) 169 Cal. 600, 147 Pac. 268; McDougald v. Boyd (1916) 172 Cal. 753, 159 Pac. 168; Nickel v. State (1918) — Cal. —, 175 Pac. 641. See State v. Mollier (1915) 96 Kan. 514, L.R.A.1916C, 551, 152 Pac. 771, and Clarke v. Treasurer (1917) 226 Mass. 301, L.R.A.1917D, 800, 115 N. E. 416, supra, I. a. Under such a statute it is stated in Re Reynolds (1915) 169 Cal. 600, 147 Pac. 268, that the words, "made without valuable and adequate consideration," which were added to the California statute, served but to clarify, and not to change, the pre-existing law, for it had long and uniformly been held that transfers made upon valuable and adequate considerations were not within the purview of the Inheritance Tax Act.

Other statutes provide that when the transfer is "a bona fide purchase for full consideration in money or money's worth," a tax shall not be levied. State Street Trust Co. v. Treasurer (1911) 209 Mass. 373, 95 N. E. 851. The Massachusetts statute is held to require not only a valuable, but an adequate, compensation. Ibid.

There are a number of death duties in England. The two duties involved in the question under annotation herein have been the succession duty and the estate duty. Section 17 of the Succession Duty Act (16 & 17 Vict. chap. 51) provides that "no bond or contract made by any person bona fide for valuable consideration in money or money's worth, for the payment of money or money's worth after the death of any other person, shall create the relation of predecessor and successor," etc. This has been held to apply to other cases than those in which the relation of debtor and creditor subsists. Oldfield v. Preston (1861) 3 De G. F. & J. 398, 45 Eng. Reprint, 932, 31 L. J. Ch. N. S. 256, 5 L. T. N. S. 650, 8 Jur. N. S. 107, 10 Week. Rep. 257. The court in Fryer v. Morland (1876) L. R. 3 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 675, states that "looking, therefore, at the act as a whole, it is in fact an act to grant a duty on successions to property by persons succeeding to estates by gratuitous title. That is its meaning. It assumes that a man gets something on the death of the prior owner, either by way of settlement or by way of gift or descent, and thereby gets a profit. The only exception that I can find to that on principle is that a marriage consideration is treated as if it were a gratuitous title for this purpose. That kind of contract which is made on marriage to provide for the issue is treated as succession. That seems the general notion of the thing. It is opposed to that notion to imagine that a purchaser for value who has paid the full value of the property is to pay the duty besides."

The Customs & Inland Revenue Act of 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. chap. 12), § 38, imposed a stamp duty on accounts of personal property, and by subsec. 2 provided that personal property should include "(c) any property passing under any past or future voluntary settlement made by any person dying on or after such day [viz., 1st June, 1881], by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will, whereby an interest in such property for life or any other period determinable by reference to death is reserved either expressly or by implication to the settlor." Subsection 2 (a) of the Customs & Inland Revenue Act of 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. chap. 12), § 38, provides that "any property taken as a donatio mortis causa, made by any person dying on or after the 1st day of June, 1881, or taken under a voluntary disposition, made by any person so dying, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos, whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust, or otherwise, which shall not have been bona fide made three months before the death of the deceased. . . ." This was amended by the Customs & Inland Revenue Act of 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. chap. 7, § 11, subsec. 1, as follows: "Subsection 2 of § 38 of the Customs & Inland Revenue Act 1881 is hereby amended as follows: The description of property marked (a) shall be read as if the word 'twelve' were substituted for the word 'three' therein, and the said description of property shall include property taken under any gift, whenever made, of which property bona fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained, to the entire exclusion of the donor, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise." The term "voluntary settlement," as used in this act, has generally been held to mean a settlement without consideration; a settlement upon a consideration is not taxable thereunder. The consideration, however, must not only be valuable, but it must be adequate. Crossman v. Reg. (1886) L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. (Eng.) 256, 56 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 241, 55 L. T. N. S. 848, 35 Week. Rep. 303 (considering subsec. 2 (c) of § 38 of the Customs & Inland Revenue Act of 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. chap. 12)). A statute taxing property "voluntarily" transferred as a donatio mortis causa has been held to tax only such property as is transferred without consideration. Atty. Gen. v. Brown (1903) 5 Ont. L. Rep. 167. In Atty. Gen. v. Ellis [1895] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 466, 64 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 813, 15 Reports, 584, 73 L. T. N. S. 190, 350, 44 Week. Rep. 13, 59 J. P. 774, a different theory was advanced as to the meaning of the term "voluntarily." Under the provision of the Customs & Inland Revenue Act of 1881, amended in 1889, which expressly taxed property which has been "voluntarily" transferred to or vested in the decedent and any other person jointly, whether by disposition or otherwise, so that the beneficial interest therein or in some part thereof passes or accrues by survivorship on his death to such other person, the court holds that the word "voluntarily" is not used in the sense of "without consideration," but in its ordinary sense of freely, without compulsion, and "not under any obligation." It is accordingly held that so much of personal property as had been bought by the decedent and transferred to a joint tenancy was subject to the tax. But in Atty. Gen. v. Smyth [1905] 2 Ir. R. 553, the court, in discussing Atty. Gen. v. Ellis, states that that case was decided upon the authority of Art Union v. Savoy [1894] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 609,—a decision which, after it had been followed in Atty. Gen. v. Ellis (Eng.) supra, was reversed by the House of Lords in [1896] A. C. 296, 65 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 161, 74 L. T. N. S. 497, 45 Week. Rep. 34, 60 J. P. 660. And it is stated that the latter case deprives Atty. Gen. v. Ellis (Eng.) supra, of all authority, and justifies, if it does not require, "voluntarily" being read as the adverb derived from "voluntary," and as meaning, "without consideration."

The Finance Act of 1894, which is termed an Estate Duty Act, imposes upon executors the obligation of paying an estate duty, but provides that an allowance shall be made for debts, but that no allowance shall be made for debts incurred by the deceased "unless such debts were incurred bona fide for full consideration in money or money's worth, wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit." Re Gray [1896] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 620, 74 L. T. N. S. 275, 60 J. P. 814, 65 L. J. Ch. N. S. 462, 44 Week. Rep. 466.

It thus appears that, either by construction or by express statutory provision, transfers of or succession to property in the lifetime of the owner or upon his death, by virtue of some contract, are not taxable where there has been a consideration. This rule is further supported—impliedly, at least—by the cases cited in II. b, which consider the sufficiency of the consideration. A sum of money which was a part of the purchase price of land, and which, by the terms of the sale, was payable after the purchaser's death, and was charged on his estate, was held not taxable in Fryer v. Morland (1876) L. R. 3 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 675, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 817, 35 L. T. N. S. 458, 25 Week. Rep. 21. In Re Baker (1910) 67 Misc. 360, 124 N. Y. Supp. 827, there was held to be no transfer tax upon cash received by executors of a decedent as the purchase price of the land, which the decedent in her lifetime had contracted to sell, and had left a conveyance thereof, which was delivered on the day after her death.

Sections 1 and 2 of the English Statute of 16 & 17 Vict. chap. 51, expressly subjects to a tax money "payable under any engagement." The exception of property payable by virtue of a contract, upon a consideration, is contained in § 17. Some cases have held taxable property passing upon death, under a contract of the decedent, without discussion of the question of consideration. In fact, although it is spoken of in these cases as being paid under an agreement or a contract, it is not altogether clear that there was a consideration. In

Atty. Gen. v. Montefiore (1888) L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. (Eng.) 461, 59 L. T. N. S. 364, 37 Week. Rep. 237, a transfer of bank stock by executors, to the trustees of a synagogue and college, in pursuance of the decedent's agreement, was held subject to the tax.

It thus appears that either by express statutory provisions or by judicial construction a transfer of, or succession to, property, is not subject to a transfer or succession tax if there is a consideration. An interesting question as to the burden of proof arises in this connection. This question is merely touched upon in the present discussion, without any attempt to exhaust the decisions thereon. It is a general principle of inheritance or succession tax law that the burden is on the state to show the existence of the conditions under which the tax is leviable. This principle is applied in relation to consideration, and it is held that the burden is on the state to show that there was not a consideration for the transfer. Re De Eschoriaza (1914) 87 Misc. 515, 149 N. Y. Supp. 796. In order to establish liability for the tax under a statute imposing a tax only upon such transfers as are made "without valuable and adequate consideration," it has been held essential for the state to allege and prove that the consideration for such transfer was not "valuable and adequate." McDougald v. Boyd (1916) 172 Cal. 753, 159 Pac. 168; Nickel v. State (1918) — Cal. —, 175 Pac. 641. The state must show that there was a gift. A gift will not be presumed from possession that is as consistent with the theory that a valuable consideration was paid as with the theory that the property was received by way of a gift. Re Wallace (1914) 149 N. Y. Supp. 534. It has been held, however, in a case in which there was no evidence of any pecuniary consideration for the conveyance, that the failure of the executor to adduce such testimony may be taken as conclusive proof that there was no such consideration. Re Price (1909) 62 Misc. 149, 116 N. Y. Supp. 288.

Under a statute levying a tax upon all property transferred, etc., "except in cases of a bona fide purchase for full consideration," etc., it has been stated that "to have the benefit of the exemption, they (the legatees) must bring themselves within its terms." State Street Trust Co. v. Treasurer (1911) 209 Mass. 373, 95 N. E. 851. Under the English Finance Act of 1894, which levies a tax upon estates generally, but provides that the tax shall not be payable in certain cases, the burden is upon one who would free himself from the payment of the tax to bring his case within the exception. Atty. Gen. v. Smith-Marriott [1899] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 595, 69 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 59, 74 J. P. 54, 48 Week. Rep. 12, 81 L. T. N. S. 359, 15 Times L. R. 497.

As shown above, a consideration frees a transfer of or succession to property by deed, grant, or contract, of the inheritance tax. The consideration, however, must, under the uniform rule of the cases, be not only valuable, but adequate. Not every consideration prevents a transfer from being voluntary, or from being a gift. As stated in Atty. Gen. v. Johnson [1903] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 617, 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 323, 67 J. P. 113, 51 Week. Rep. 487, 88 L. T. N. S. 445, 19 L. T. N. S. 324, it is intended "that property shall be treated as taken under a 'gift,' although such gift may have been made under a contract by which the donor takes a benefit." "The fact that something was given in exchange by the donee does not prevent the transaction from being a gift if one can see from the nature of it that it was intended as a gift." Atty. Gen. v. Holden [1903] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 832, 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 420, 67 J. P. 185, 51 Week. Rep. 685, 88 L. T. N. S. 729, 19 Times L. R. 385. It has been urged that a consideration which will support a contract between the parties, or as against subsequent purchasers, is sufficient to free the transfer from the succession tax; that so long as the consideration is a good one, the quantum or adequacy of it is immaterial.

But these contentions have been denied. The court in Crossman v. Reg. (1886) L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. (Eng.) 256, states that a settlement is voluntary within the meaning of the act, "even though, on the face of the deed, and in fact, we may find that there was sufficient consideration to support a contract between the parties, and to take it out of the operation of the Statute of 27 Eliz. as regards a subsequent purchaser. In other words, it does not, in our opinion, follow of necessity that because a settlement may be valid as against a subsequent purchaser, it cannot be a voluntary settlement within the meaning of the Act of 1881. The character and amount of consideration for the settlement are, no doubt, very important elements to be taken into account, as also are the relations of the parties. Nobody would dream of calling that a voluntary deed which was executed upon substantial pecuniary or other consideration moving from the transferee, whether such transferee were a son of the settlor or a stranger; but a totally different view might reasonably be taken if the amount of consideration, though sufficient to support a contract, was palpably inadequate to the value of the property transferred, and the transferee was a near and dear relative of the settlor." The court in Re Orvis (1918) 223 N. Y. 1, 8 A.L.R. 1636, 119 N. E. 86, after stating that the intention of the statute there involved was to tax transfers which were in their nature and character instruments or sources of bounty or benefaction, and which can be classed as similar in nature and effect with transfers by will or the intestate laws, because they accomplish a transfer of property donative in effect, under circumstances which impress on it the characteristics of a disposition made at the time of the testator's death, continues: "In all cases in which the value of the consideration for the property transferred under the statutory conditions is so disproportionately less than the value of the property transferred that the transfer is, in the light of reason or of ordinary intelligence and judgment, beneficent and donative, the transfer is taxable. The taxability does not depend upon fraud or an attempt to evade the statute, nor does it depend upon the purpose or inducement of the transfer, nor does it depend upon the form given the transfer. The law searches out the reality, and is not altered or controlled by the form. . . . If, in truth, it in effect bestows under the statutory conditions a bounty or benefaction, and is not a transfer for money's worth, it is taxable."

The general purpose of the English statutes relating to succession duties, and the effect of consideration thereon, is well stated in Lethbridge v. Atty. Gen. [1907] A. C. (Eng.) 19. The court was dealing with § 2, subsec. 1 (d) of the Finance Act of 1894, but what is said with reference to the effect of consideration applies generally. Lord Loreburn, L. C., states: "The general purpose of this subsection is to prevent a man escaping estate duty by subtracting from his means, during life, moneys or money's worth, which, when he dies, are to reappear in the form of a beneficial interest accruing or arising on his death. Now it is not subtracting from his means if the deceased has received a full equivalent in return for whatever he has laid out."

What constitutes a valuable and adequate consideration within the meaning of the above rule, freeing transfers for a valuable and adequate consideration from the tax, depends largely upon the facts in the individual case, although the sufficiency of certain considerations, such as marriage, is a question of law. A recital of consideration in a deed from a mother to her sons, "of the love and affection that I have for my sons, and the further consideration of the assistance they have rendered me since the death of my husband," imports a consideration sufficiently valuable and adequate to take the case out of the category of a deed of gift. United States v. Hart (1880) 4 Fed. 292. An allegation in a petition to quiet title against the state's lien for inheritance taxes, that the claim of the state is "without right," is in effect an allegation that there was a valuable and adequate consideration for a transfer which recites that it was made "in consideration of $10 and other good and valuable considerations." Nickel v. State (1918) — Cal. —, 175 Pac. 641.

A moral obligation to the transferee is not sufficient to relieve a transfer made in contemplation of death, from the tax. PEOPLE v. PORTER (reported herewith) ante, 1041. Compare with the cases of transfers by will upon a moral obligation, supra, I.

A sum paid by the father to a son about to be married, in consideration of the agreement of the bride's father to settle on the bride a specified sum, was held to be taxable under the Finance Act of 1894 in Atty. Gen. v. Holden [1903] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 832. The payment involved in the Holden Case was made within twelve months prior to the death of the father. The court refers to the facts of the case and continues: "There was no obligation which existed under which the defendant's father was bound to pay the money, but he made a gift to his son, in exchange for which he received nothing. . . . Though the father received nothing, his daughter-in-law received a settlement upon her. It appears to me that, by parity of reasoning with the case of Atty. Gen. v. Worrall (Eng.) infra, II. b, 4, that fact must be regarded as not preventing what the father-in-law had done from being a gift. It might, indeed, prevent the transaction from being a pure and simple gift, although in this case I think it was in fact a pure and simple gift because the consideration did not proceed to the defendant's father. But, however that may be, I am unable to find that there is anything in the circumstances of this case to distinguish it from the former decision."

A promise to make a gift, in binding form because under seal, after the death of the person so agreeing, is not a consideration for the making of the gift in the person's lifetime by a deed executed and expressed to be instead of the gift to be made after death, and the amount of the gift is taxable under § 2, subsec. 1 (c) of the Finance

Act of 1894, where the donor died within twelve months from the making of the gift. Atty. Gen. v. Cobham (1904) 90 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 816, 20 Times L. R. 337.

The expectant interest which a devisee has in the estate of the devisor does not furnish a consideration for a conveyance in the lifetime of the devisor, within the meaning of the Internal Revenue Act of 1864, taxing a deed or gift or other assurance of title made without valuable or adequate consideration. United States v. Banks (1883) 17 Fed. 322.

The benefit accruing or arising to an owner of property charged with the payment of an annuity by the cesser of the annuity is not freed from estate duty under the provision of the Finance Act of 1894, that "estate duty shall not be payable . . . in respect of the determination of any annuity for life where . . . such annuity . . . was granted for full consideration in money or money's worth paid to the . . . grantor for his own use or benefit," because of the fact that by agreement with the annuitant in her lifetime certain property on which the annuity had been a charge was released, and the annuity made a charge upon other property. Atty. Gen. v. Smith-Marriott [1899] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 595. The court states that it is unable to see anything which fairly comes within the words "full consideration in money or money's worth." That the arrangement by which the annuity was shifted was not the creation of a new annuity, but was a mere transfer of the burden thereof, which was always upon the owner of the property, from one portion of his property to another.

A transfer obtained in an action in the nature of specific performance, brought by a husband against the estate of his deceased wife, to obtain title to the property, was held not subject to a transfer tax, where the land had originally been bought by the husband, who paid for it with his own means, but title had been taken in the name of his wife under an agreement that she was to make a will devising it to him,—an agreement which she did not keep. Nelson v. Schoonover (1913) 89 Kam. 779, 132 Pac. 1183, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 147.

See Ransom v. United States (1879) Fed. Cas. No. 11,574, supra, I. a, and Re Galot (1919) 106 Misc. 310, 174 N. Y. Supp. 492, supra, I. b.

See Re Demers (1903) 41 Misc. 470, 84 N. Y. Supp. 1109, infra, II. b, 2.

In the following cases, there has been held on the facts to be no consideration sufficient to relieve the transfer of the tax:

A transfer of a store in value exceeding $100,000, made to the son of the donor upon his agreement to assume an indebtedness of $30,000, and the further agreement to pay $600 a month during the donor's life, was held not to be a transfer for an adequate consideration, and was therefore held taxable in Re Reynolds (1915) 169 Cal. 600, 147 Pac. 268. At the time of the transfer in question, the donor was suffering from an incurable disease, and it was known that the days of his life were numbered. The court states that if there was any element of a valuable consideration in this transfer, it was not adequate from any commercial point of view.

A succession upon the death of a life tenant to a sum of money which a tenant in tail in the remainder charged upon the reversionary estate in consideration of an annuity which the life tenant paid him was held taxable in Re Jenkinson (1857) 24 Beav. 64, 58 Eng. Reprint, 281, 26 L. J. Ch. N. S. 241, 3 Jur. N. S. 279, 5 Week. Rep. 301, but there was little discussion of the question of consideration.

In the following cases there has been held to be a sufficient consideration:

A transfer of a note of doubtful value to one in consideration of his agreement to pay the transferer the interest thereon so long as he lives was held not to be a taxable transfer, in Garman's Estate (1885) 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 550.

tax upon the payment of life insurance policies to the son upon the death of his father, the insured, where the son, within the lifetime of his father, mortgaged his inheritance, in consideration of which the insurance policies were assigned to him, with an annuity amounting to a specified sum, plus a sum equal to the amount of the premiums on the insurance policies. Under the agreement it was optional with the son whether to keep up the policies or surrender them; if he elected to surrender them or any of them, he could not only retain the surrender value for his own purposes, but his annuity of a specified sum would be augmented by a sum equal in amount to the premiums on the policies surrendered. The court reviews the fact and states that the son undoubtedly gave full value in money or money's worth for all the benefit he received.

2. Marriage.

In the American cases marriage is generally regarded as a consideration which will relieve a transfer of the tax. Re Miller (1902) 77 App. Div. 473, 78 N. Y. Supp. 930; Re Baker (1908) 83 App. Div. 530, 82 N. Y. Supp. 390, affirmed without opinion in (1904) 178 N. Y. 575, 70 N. E. 1094. See Re Vanderbilt (1918) 184 App. Div. 661, 172 N. Y. Supp. 511, affirmed without opinion in (1919) 226 N. Y. 638, 123 N. E. 803, supra, I. b.

It is held in Re Demers (1908) 41 Misc. 470, 84 N. Y. Supp. 1109, that a transfer of the property of an intestate by the judgment of a court enforcing a contract between the intestate and the mother of the plaintiff, by the terms of which the plaintiff, then a child, and natural daughter of the intestate, was to be surrendered to him, and was to have all his property upon his death, was not taxable. The court states that the contract was upon a valuable consideration, hence the transfer was not a gift; that it was not a transfer under the intestate laws, as the plaintiff was not the next of kin to the decedent.

Where the husband failed to make provision in the will according to the terms of the antenuptial agreement, and upon his death his widow disregarded the provisions of the will and claimed under the antenuptial agreement, the property transferred to her under such agreement is held not subject to the transfer tax. Re Schmoll (1919) 108 Misc. 492, 177 N. Y. Supp. 670.

An agreement to marry the transferor of property is a valuable consideration which will prevent a transfer in pursuance thereof being taxable, even though made in contemplation of death, and even though the marriage does not take place. Re Wadsworth (1917) 190 Misc. 499, 166 N. Y. Supp. 716 (obiter), affirmed without opinion (1918) 185 App. Div. 944, 172 N. Y. Supp. 924.

Assuming that Re Kidd (1907) 188 N. Y. 274, 80 N. E. 924, supra, II. a, is authority upon the effect of consideration, that decision is based upon the theory that a consideration did not relieve the transfer there involved of the tax, and does not deny the proposition that marriage is a consideration. See discussion of this case, supra, II. a.

But in England, notwithstanding marriage is recognized as a valuable consideration for contracts generally, it is uniformly held that it is not such a consideration as will free a transfer of property from death duties under the peculiar wording of the English statutes. This has been held under the Succession Duty Act above set out. Floyer v. Bankes (1863) 3 De G. J. & S. 306, 46 Eng. Reprint, 654, 9 Jur. N. S. 1255, 9 L. T. N. S. 353, 3 New Reports, 16, 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1, 12 Week. Rep. 28. See obiter in Fryer v. Morland (1876) L. R. 3 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 675, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 817, 35 L. T. N. S. 458, 25 Week. Rep. 21, supra. The court in Floyer v. Bankes (Eng.) supra, states that the description of contracts which are excepted as those made bona fide, "in consideration of money or money's worth," excludes the consideration of marriage. That marriage is not such a consideration as relieves a transfer of the tax has also been held under the Finance Act of 1894. Re Gray [1896] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 620. The court, in holding the payment by executors of a sum which the testator covenanted to pay to the trustees of his son's marriage settlement subject to the tax, says of the obligation: "The debt was, no doubt, created for full consideration, but not a consideration in money or money's worth, and therefore it is a debt for which no allowance is to be made in determining the value of the testator's estate for the purpose of estate duty, though in general such an allowance must be made for debts."

Applying this rule to the case of an antenuptial contract by which certain hereditaments, part of settled estates, held under a power of appointment, were limited to the use of the intended wife in case she survived her intended husband, for and during the term of her natural life, for her jointure and in lieu of and in satisfaction of dower, it was held that property arising under the contract in favor of the wife upon the death of the husband was taxable. Floyer v. Bankes (1863) 3 De G. J. & S. 306, 46 Eng. Reprint, 654, 9 Jur. N. S. 1255, 9 L. T. N. S. 353, 3 New Reports, 16, 38 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1, 12 Week. Rep. 28, supra. The succession of a wife, upon the death of her husband, to insurance money under policies which the husband had covenanted to maintain and assign to trustees of their marriage settlement, was held not freed from estate duty by virtue of the provision of the Finance Act of 1894, that estate duty shall not be payable in respect of property passing on the death of the deceased by reason only of a bona fide purchase from the person under whose disposition the property passes. Atty. Gen. v. Dobree [1900] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 442, 69 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 223, 64 J. P. 24, 43 Week. Rep. 413, 81 L. T. N. S. 607, 16 Times L. R. 80. See Re Gray (Eng.) supra.

There was held to be a taxable succession under the Finance Act of 1894 upon the death of one who, within twelve months prior to his death, had conveyed real estate to trustees of a marriage settlement upon the marriage of his son, in Atty. Gen. v. Smyth [1905] 2 Ir. R. 553.

There is held to be taxable succession in Lord Advocate v. Roberts (1858) 10 Sc. Sess. Cas. 2d series, 449, upon the payment by executors of a decedent of the amount called for by a marriage settlement in which the decedent, upon the marriage of his daughter, bound himself to pay the sum to the trustees of the marriage settlement at the first term after his death. This decision was rendered under the 16th and 17th Vict. chapter 51. The court considers the 17th section, and holds that the transfer does not come within the exception.

A settlement in consideration of marriage and the payment of money was held not exempt from the succession duty, even to the value of the money consideration, in Atty. Gen. v. Rathdonnell (1893) Ir. L. R. 32 C. L. 575. But, under the Finance Acts of 1894 and 1896, a transfer of property under a settlement in consideration of marriage and the payment of money was held free from the estate duty to the extent of the money consideration. Re Lombard [1904] 2 Ir. R. 621.

Children of a wife by a former marriage were held not to be within the consideration of the marriage, and therefore a provision for them in the marriage settlement was held a voluntary disposition, in Atty. Gen. v. Smith [1895] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 341.

The Finance Act of 1894 required the consideration for a debt to be for the deceased's own use and benefit in order that the debt be free from estate duty. In Re Gray [1896] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 620, 74 L. T. N. S. 275, 60 J. P. 314, 44 Week. Rep. 406, 65 L. J. Ch. N. S. 462, a sum which the testator had covenanted to pay to the trustees of his son's marriage settlement was held to be a debt which was not incurred for testator's use and benefit, and was therefore taxable on this ground in addition to the ground that marriage did not constitute a consideration.

See Atty. Gen. v. Holden [1903] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 832, 88 L. T. N. S. 729, 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 420, 67 J. P. 135, 51 Week. Rep. 685, 19 Times L. R. 385, supra, II. b, 1.

In the case of property passing to the survivor of a joint tenancy, some cases have merely announced the general rule without considering what amounts to a consideration. Thus, the interest passing to the survivor of a joint tenancy created by contribution from both tenants has been held to pass upon a valuable consideration, and is therefore not taxable, even though made in contemplation of death. Re Heiser (1913) 85 Misc. 271, 147 N. Y. Supp. 557; Re Dalsimer (1914) 148 N. Y. Supp. 914. That there is no taxable transfer in the succession to real property by a surviving joint tenant where the property had been conveyed by the deceased joint tenant to herself and the survivor as joint tenants upon a valuable consideration is held in Re De Eschoriaza (1914) 87 Misc. 515, 149 N. Y. Supp. 796; Re Klatzl (1914) 149 N. Y. Supp. 794, reversed on other grounds in (1915) 216 N. Y. 83, 110 N. E. 181. See Atty. Gen. v. Ellis [1895] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 466, 64 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 813, 15 Reports, 584, 73 L. T. N. S. 190, 350, 44 Week. Rep. 13, 59 J. P. 774, supra, II. a.

A transfer of property to a joint tenant upon the death of one of the tenants was held taxable in United States v. Robertson (1910) 106 C. C. A. 149, 183 Fed. 711, without any discussion of the question of consideration.

In the case of survivorship agreements, as in the case of joint tenancies, some cases decide the general principle rather than determine what amounts to a consideration within that principle. The interest passing to a son under a partnership agreement with his father by which the son, upon the death of the father within the term of the partnership, became vested with the father's interest for a recited consideration, was held not taxable in Blair v. Herold (1907) 150 Fed. 199, affirmed in (1908) 86 C. C. A. 64, 158 Fed. 804. A partnership agreement that, upon the death of one partner, the "good will" should belong to the survivors, is stated in Re Bor- den (1916) 95 Misc. 443, 159 N. Y. Supp. 846, to have been made upon a valuable consideration, and therefore the transfer of the good will to the surviving partners by virtue of the agreement was not taxable.

Other cases have considered whether the consideration was sufficient. In the three following cases the consideration there appearing was held sufficient:

A succession by the surviving partners to the good will of the partnership upon the death of one of their number was held not taxable under the Finance Act of 1894, because made for a full consideration in money or money's worth, where the transfer took place under a provision in the partnership agreement that if the decedent, who was the father of the surviving partners, should die or otherwise cease to be a partner, his share should accrue to his sons in equal shares, subject only to their paying the value of the share, ascertained by a special general account, to be made without any valuation of or allowance for good will, which good will should accrue to the sons in equal shares, where it appeared that the partnership was advantageous to the father, in that he was to have his capital employed as long as he lived in a lucrative business where the profits were earned by the efforts of his two sons, he not being bound to give any more attention to the business than he chose, and where he had the absolute control and right of final decision in case there was any difference of opinion among the partners as to its management, and where the good will, of which little was thought, was to pass with the rest of the corpus of the father's interest on payment of a price which was liberal in itself. Atty. Gen. v. Boden [1912] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 539, 105 L. T. 247, 81 L. J. K. B. N. S. 704. A transfer of money and notes secured by a mortgage by way of a donatio mortis causa, in pursuance of an agreement between the transferor and the transferee whereby they were to combine their chattel property and their personal energies in the working of a farm owned by the transferrer, upon a mutual obligation that the survivor should become possessed of the whole personality resulting from this co-operation of goods and labor, was held not to be a taxable transfer, in Atty. Gen. v. Brown (1908) 5 Ont. L. Rep. 167. Where a tontine insurance contract provides that the subscribers may subscribe on their own or any other life or lives, and that when the number of nominees is reduced to a certain number, the fund shall be divided among the subscribers whose nominees are living, the succession of the various subscribers to this fund when the conditions upon which it is to be divided occur is not taxable under the succession duty tax, since this interest is derived by contract bona fide, for a valuable consideration in money. Oldfield v. Preston (1861) 8 De G. F. & J. 398, 45 Eng. Reprint, 932, 31 L. J. Ch. N. S. 256, 5 L. T. N. S. 650, 8 Jur. N. S. 107, 10 Week. Rep. 257.

In other cases the consideration has been held insufficient:

In Brown v. Atty. Gen. (1898) 79 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 572, 15 Times L. R. 109, there was held to be a taxable transfer under the Succession Duty Act (16 & 17 Vict. chap. 51) on the theory that the father intended a gift to the son where the son succeeded to a partnership valued at about £60,000 upon the death of his father, upon giving bond to the father's executors for the payment of £10,000, although there was a provision in the partnership agreement that in the event of the son's death during the term, the father was to have back the business capital, but was to pay to the son's executors $15,000.

It seems to be the theory of some cases that the mutual promises of the parties to a mutual survivorship agreement do not furnish a sufficient consideration. A transfer to the survivor under a contract between two partners by which a fund was established to belong to the partners jointly during life, and to the survivor upon the death of either, for the continuation of the business, was held to be a transfer in effect beneficent and donative, and therefore not free from the tax, as having been made upon a valuable consideration. Re Orvis (1918) 223 N. Y. 1, 3 A.L.R. 1636, 119 N. E. 88. A transfer of partnership stock to the surviving partner by executors of a deceased partner under a provision in the will of the decedent, reaffirming an agreement made between him and the surviving partner by the terms of which the survivor of the partnership should have the right to purchase the partnership stock of the deceased member at an arbitrary price agreed upon, was held a transfer taxable at the actual value of the stock thus transferred, and not limited to the arbitrary price agreed upon. Re Cory (1917) 177 App. Div. 871, 164 N. Y. Supp. 956, affirmed in (1917) 221 N. Y. 612, 117 N. E. 1065. There is a strong dissenting opinion in the appellate division, which takes the view that the agreement between the partners is one for a valuable consideration, that the transfer was under this agreement, and not taxable. In the majority opinion it is stated that the contract was purely executory, and no consideration passed from one party to the other except the mutual promises, and no debt was created from one party to the other. It has been held that the interest of a deceased member of a partnership in the good will, which passed to the surviving members of the copartnership upon the death of the decedent, under an agreement that in the event of the dissolution of the copartnership by reason of the death of any member, the good will and the right to use the firm name, etc., were to belong to and become the property of the survivors without compensation, is taxable at its value, and it is stated that this is true, even though the agreement is for a valuable consideration. Re Hellman (1918) 172 N. Y. Supp. 671. The statute under which this transfer is taxable is not set out. It does not appear that the court in Re Hellman uses the expression "valuable consideration" to mean both "valuable" and "adequate." So far as the case lends any support to the proposition that a transfer for a valuable and adequate consideration is subject to a tax, it is contrary to the practically uniform rule.

The general question of whether personal property passing under a mutual survivorship agreement is subject to a transfer or succession tax is discussed in the note to Re Orvis, 3 A.L.R. 1640.

4. Annuities and fixed charges.

Whether an annuity to the transferor is sufficient consideration to free the transfer from the tax depends upon the facts of the individual case.

An absolute covenant by the son of the owner of shares of stock, to whom the owner transferred the stock, to pay the father interest at 4 per cent per annum during his lifetime, irrespective of the company's earnings, and annuities to the widow and another son, was held not to be a sufficient consideration to prevent the transfer from being a voluntary one within the meaning of Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1881. Crossman v. Reg. (1886) L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. (Eng.) 256, 56 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 241, 55 L. T. N. S. 848, 35 Week. Rep. 303. The transfer involved in this case was under an indenture dated the 12th of July, and was to take place as from the 1st of October following, "or as from the death of him, the said Robert Crossman, which shall first happen." The said Crossman died one week after the indentures of appointment were made, and before any payment of an annuity had been made.

A gift made more than twelve months prior to the donor's death is free from the tax if it is absolute, but not if the donor reserves any interest.

A transaction by which the son of a mortgagee purchased the equity of redemption of the mortgagor, whereupon his father, the mortgagee, conveyed to him the mortgage upon his agreement to pay his father an annuity, was held to be a taxable transfer within the amendment of 1889 to the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1881. Lord Esher, M. R., states that the transaction amounted to "a 'gift' within that enactment. I have already said what was given was the mortgage debt, which was personal property. Also, I think that possession of the property was not assumed and retained by the donee 'to the entire exclusion of any benefit to the donor by contract or otherwise.' It appears to me that the covenant by the son to pay an annuity to the father prevented this from being a pure and simple gift, and therefore it comes within the statute." Atty. Gen. v. Worrall [1895] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 99.

The payment in lieu of a legacy to a missionary society of a sum of money in consideration of a life annuity to the person making the payment and his wife was held to be a gift within the meaning of § 2, subsection 1 (c) of the Finance Act of 1894, which incorporated the provisions of § 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1889, and therefore taxable. Atty. Gen. v. Johnson [1903] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 617. The court, speaking of the particular transaction in the case at bar, states that if the substance of the transaction be looked at "it seems to us that it was intended not to be a matter of pure business, but one of bounty on the part of Mr. Burton. The facts that the payment was made 'in lieu of a legacy,' and that the amount paid largely exceeded the market value of the annuities agreed to be paid to Mr. and Mrs. Burton, are sufficient to establish this." Accordingly the entire amount of the sum paid was held subject to the tax, and not merely the difference between the actual value of the annuity and the sum paid.

There was held to be a taxable transfer under § 7 of the Succession Duty Act of 1853, under the facts stated in Atty. Gen. v. Johnson (Eng.) supra.

A transfer of shares of stock by a father to his sons, upon their covenant to pay him 4 per cent per annum on the value of the shares, during his lifetime, was held in effect to reserve to the father a life interest in the shares, and therefore to be within the meaning of this provision of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. chap. 12), § 38, declaring taxable any property passing "by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will, whereby an interest in such property for life or any other period determinable by reference to death is reserved either exprssly or by implication to the settlor." Crossman v. Reg. (Eng.) supra.

Under the amendment of 1889 it is not necessary that the benefit to the donor be by way of reservation out of the subject-matter of the gift. Atty. Gen. v. Worrall (Eng.) supra.

Whether an agreement to support the donor is a valuable and adequate consideration depends upon the facts of the individual case. An agreement to support the transferor was coupled with an assumption of debts in Re Reynolds (1915) 169 Cal. 600, 147 Pac. 268; at the time of the agreement the transferor was in failing health, and knew that he was afflicted with a fatal disease which would soon result in his death. The court referred to the assumption of indebtedness, and states that this agreement, together with "the further agreement to pay $600 a month during the donor's life (which agreement itself does not seem to have been observed), certainly do not measure up to the requirements of the law of a valuable and adequate consideration."

An agreement to support the donor, who was eighty years of age and very feeble, a sufferer from Bright's disease, whose circulatory organs were in a state of arterial sclerosis, resulting in a functional derangement of all the organs, and who was unable to care for himself, was held to support a finding of inadequate consideration for a conveyance of 2,000 acres of land. Abstract, Guaranty & Title Co. v. State (1916) 173 Cal. 691, 161 Pac. 264. The value of the land was not shown, but the court assumed it to have been of considerable value.

An agreement by a man fifty-four years of age, to give up a position worth about $8,500 per annum, and, with his wife, care for and support an elderly woman in feeble health, was held not to be an adequate consideration for the transfer to him of property worth between $90,000 and $100,000, in State Street Trust Co. v. Treasurer (1911) 209 Mass. 378, 95 N. E. 851.

An agreement by one woman to give such care to another as may suit her convenience was held to be a consideration in no manner commensurate with the transfer of property worth $80,000, in Re Dobson (1911) 73 Misc. 170, 132 N. Y. Supp. 472.

In the following cases there was held to be a consideration:

An agreement by a woman to care for and support a man during the period of his natural life, and to marry him when he is legally free to marry, has been held a valuable consideration which will prevent a transfer in consideration thereof being taxable, even though made in contemplation of death. Re Wadsworth (1917) 100 Misc. 439, 166 N. Y. Supp. 716, affirmed without opinion (1918) 185 App. Div. 944, 172 N. Y. Supp. 924.

An agreement to care for and maintain an elderly husband and wife was held to be good consideration for the conveyance of property worth about $70,000, in Re Hess (1906) 110 App. Div. 476, 96 N. Y. Supp. 990, affirmed in (1907) 187 N. Y. 554, 80 N. E. 1111, but the transfer in this case was held not taxable because it was not made in contemplation of death, nor was it a transfer intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death, so the matter of consideration was not important.

A conveyance of property to one who agrees to support the grantor for life was held not subject to an inheritance tax, in Lamb v. Morrow (1908) 140 Iowa, 89, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 226, 117 N. W. 1118, but there is no discussion of the question of consideration.

A conveyance was made in People v. Burkhalter (1910) 247 Ill. 600, 139 Am. St. Rep. 351, 93 N. E. 379, to one upon her agreement to take care of and support the daughter of the transferor. The court, however, does not discuss the effect of consideration for this transfer, but holds it was not one in contemplation of death, and therefore not taxable, for that reason.

A transfer by an elderly bachelor, of real estate by deed which recited a consideration of $1 cash, natural love and affection, and other good and valuable considerations, to his sister, who had taken care of him, and to whom he had recognized himself as indebted, was held not to be a taxable transfer, in Lawall's Estate (1918) 55 Pa. Super. Ct. 228, but this is based by the court upon the theory that it was not a transfer intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor, and not upon the fact that it was upon an adequate consideration.

Where the consideration consists of services, it is the theory of some courts that the value of the services may be inquired into and ascertained, and where they equal or exceed the fair value of the property transferred, no tax can be imposed; but if they fall below such value, in the absence of a statute making provision for a reduction and the taxing of the excess only, the entire amount is taxable. State Street Trust Co. v. Treasurer (Mass.) supra.

2. An issue unsupported by evidence should not be submitted to the jury.

Account — rendition of bill to father.

3. The sending to a father of a bill against his minor son is not notice that a claim has been or is then made against the father for payment.

Parent and child — ratification of contract by son.

4. A father's reply to a bill against his son sent to him that there would be no payment for some time yet is not a ratification of the procuring of the service by the son.

Contract — by son for father — ratification.

5. Failure of a man to reply to a bill against himself for work done for his son, which is sent to the son, is not evidence of ratification of the contract in the absence of evidence that it came to his attention.

Evidence — failure of defendant to testify — effect.

6. Failure of defendant to testify does not supply the want of affirmative evidence to make out a case.

Parent and child — failure to provide service — absence of knowledge.

7. A father cannot be charged with liability for dental work done for his son because of neglect to provide it, in the absence of anything to show knowledge on his part that it was necessary.

Evidence — as to amount of bill — failure to dispute.

8. The jury is not bound to allow the amount of a bill rendered for dental service, although there is no evidence to dispute that of plaintiff as to its correctness.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Worcester County (Keating, J.) made during the trial of an action brought to recover for dental services rendered by plaintiff to defendant's son which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Arthur Monroe, for defendant: There was no evidence of authorization or ratification by defendant.

Lamson v. Varnum, 171 Mass. 287, 50 N. E. 615.

To show neglect on the parent's part, some evidence of refusal to supply necessities or notice that they were needed by the child is essential.

Farmington v. Jones, 36 N. H. 271.

The direction of a verdict for plaintiff was wrong because there was no evidence of credit given to defendant, or that the bill was charged to him.

Gordon v. Potter, 17 Vt. 348; Bartels v. Moore, 9 Daly, 235.

Mr. Charles S. Murphy for plaintiff.

Jenney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Harold Hunter, the minor son of the defendant, came to the plaintiff, a dentist, for professional work. There was evidence that he was then between seventeen and eighteen years of age; that "his teeth needed attention very much;" and that, while there was not "any immediate suffering on his part," the condition of his teeth could not have continued long without injury to his health. The plaintiff testified that he "put in . . . eight amalgam fillings, two cement fillings, eleven enamel and three porcelain teeth, and treated the roots of four." The work commenced October 27, 1917, and continued from time to time until May 4, 1918. It was not contracted on the father's credit, but was charged to the son personally, nothing being said about payment by his father, or, indeed, by anyone. The father's name then was unknown to the plaintiff. Shortly after the completion of the work, a bill was sent to the son and, no response being made, the plaintiff ascertained the name of the father and sent bills to him. The evidence justified a finding that some of the bills sent to the father were made to the son. One of the bills made to the son and sent to the father had indorsed thereon: "Will you kindly let me have the above amount this month?" This was returned by the defendant to the plaintiff, with the following words written thereon by him:

You won't get any money on this bill for quite some time yet.

Fred N. Hunter.

December 1, 1918, a bill which might have been found to have been made to the defendant was mailed to the son. It did not appear when this bill was called to the attention of the defendant, but he produced it in a mutilated condition at the trial. The writ was dated December 10, 1918.

There was no evidence that the defendant knew that his son was receiving the services, and it did not appear that the son was living at home, was in school, or at work. There was nothing to show that the father had not been willing to have his son's teeth cared for in a reasonable manner, or that he had not amply provided for such attention as he was reasonably able to pay for. On the other hand, there was no evidence that in fact the father knew of the condition of the teeth, or that his lack of knowledge was caused by any negligence on his part.

This action was brought in the central district court of Worcester, and the father and son both testified in that court. They were present at the trial in the superior court, but did not testify, the defendant resting his case on the plaintiff's evidence.

In order to maintain the action, it was necessary for the plaintiff to establish "either that the work done was authorized by the defendant, or that it was necessary for the health and comfort of the defendant's minor son, and that the defendant negligently failed to provide for him a dentist, or means to procure the services of a dentist, to do the work." Lamson v. Varnum, 171 Mass. 237, 238, 50 N. E. 615.

The judge submitted three questions to the jury which are printed in the margin.<sup>1</sup> These questions embraced all the issues involved in the question of liability, but did not require any finding as to amount. The defendant excepted to the submission of questions one and three, but did not except to the second issue, or to the instructions given relative thereto. The affirmative answer to this question established the necessity of the work for the health of the son. Strong v. Foote, 42 Conn. 203.

The evidence did not warrant the submission of the first issue to the jury. It did not appear that the defendant was apprised that the work was contemplated or knew of it while in progress; it was not performed on his credit; and there was no special exigency rendering the interference of a third party reasonable and proper. On the facts stated, it could not be found properly that the defendant authorized the work. Dodge v. Adams, 19 Pick. 429; Angel v. McLehan, 16 Mass. 28, 8 Am. Dec. 118. Lamson v. Varnum, supra, is not an authority for the plaintiff. In that case, the minor directed the charge to be made to his father in whose family he then lived, and statements of the charge were sent to the father. No reply thereto having been made, it was held that the jury might consider whether the father would have been likely to have made some answer if the bill had been contracted without his authority. The plaintiff also relies on Auringer v. Cochrane, 225 Mass. 273, 114 N. E. 355, but in that case the finding for the plaintiff was upheld as to goods furnished after notice that his wife and daughter were dealing with the plaintiff on his credit, because the silence of the defendant after such notice authorized an "implied understanding . . . that he would be responsible." In this case no such facts appeared. Neither does Vaughan v. Mansfield, 229 Mass. 352, 118 N. E. 652, help the plaintiff, as there was evidence warranting a finding that the defendant knew of the services which were being performed and made no objection.

The first issue also related to ratification. Apart from the question whether there is any consideration for a promise, express or implied, to pay for services rendered to a son on his own credit (see Dodge v. Adams, supra; Dearborn v. Bowman, 3 Met. 155), and apart from the difficulty as to the ratification of an act not purporting to be done, and, so far as the evidence shows, not in fact performed in behalf of the father or on his credit (see New England Dredging Co. v. Rockport Granite Co. 149 Mass. 361, 21 N. E. 947), there was no sufficient evidence of ratification. The only testimony bearing on this subject was that a bill made to the son and sent to the father, with a request thereon for payment, was returned by him with his indorsement that ~~the plaintiff would not get any payment~~ "for quite some time yet," and the fact of his silence as to a bill made to him but mailed to the son nine days before the institution of this action, it not appearing that he saw or knew of the bill before the action was commenced. The sending of the bill to the father was not notice that a claim had been or was then made against

"2. Was the work done by the plaintiff necessary for the health and comfort of the defendant's minor son?"

"3. Did the defendant neglect to furnish his son the dental service that he needed?"

him. Therefore, his answer was neither an admission of liability nor evidence of ratification. Clearly, too, the bill made to the father but not sent to him, or, so far as shown, brought to his attention before suit, was inadmissible to prove liability or ratification, and although admitted without exception or restriction did not in any way support the plaintiff's case. Kumin v. Fine, 229 Mass. 75, — A.L.R. —, 118 N. E. 187; Callahan v. Goldman, 216 Mass. 234, 103 N. E. 687. The failure of the defendant and of his son to testify although present in court was not equivalent to affirmative proof of facts necessary to maintain the action. The defendant was not bound to offer any evidence unless and until evidence was offered by the plaintiff warranting the submission of the case to the jury. The exceptions to the submission of the first question, to so much of the charge as related to authorization and ratification and to the effect of the bill of December 1, must be sustained.

The exceptions relating to the issue as to the defendant's neglect must be sustained as there was no evidence that the father knew or ought to have known of the condition of his son's teeth or that he neglected to provide for their care. The work was done without any inquiry and without notice to the father although it extended over many months. As Dewey, J., in Dodge v. Adams, supra, at page 432, of 19

absence of

Pick., says: "There is an entire absence of all those circumstances that would create such an obligation as would furnish a legal consideration for an express promise. The proof of such facts must come from the plaintiff. The burden is on him to show that there existed a necessity for furnishing these supplies, and that this necessity was occasioned by the defendant. The plaintiff, having failed to do so, has furnished no sufficient evidence to maintain his action."

After the answers had been returned, the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff in the full amount claimed and the defendant excepted. This situation is not likely to exist at another trial, but even though there was no evidence to meet that of the plaintiff as to the amount of his charge, the jury were not obliged to find in his favor for that sum. McDonough v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 228 Mass. 450, 117 N. E. 836; Maynard v. Royal Worcester Corset Co. 200 Mass. 1, 8, 85 N. E. 877; Walsh's Case, 227 Mass. 341, 344, 6 A.L.R. 567, 116 N. E. 496, 15 N. C. C. A. 345. The remaining exception has been waived.

Exceptions sustained.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of parent for dental services to minor child.

It will be seen that the reported case (STIMPSON v. HUNTER, ante, 1067) quotes the principle laid down in Lamson v. Varnum (1898) 171 Mass. 237, 50 N. E. 615, infra, that to succeed the plaintiff must establish "either that the work done was authorized by the defendant, or that it was necessary for the health and comfort of the defendant's minor son, and that the defendant negligently failed to provide for him a dentist, or means to procure the services of a dentist, to do the work."

In Sullivan v. Liggins (1914) 149 N. Y. Supp. 517, the facts are reported only in the court's opinion, reversing a judgment in favor of a dentist against the infant's father, which is as follows: "There may be circumstances where services or commodities of which a child stands in immediate need render the previous assent of the parent unreasonable or inexpedient to seek. In such a case the person procuring the supply is the agent of the parent ex necessitate. Ketchem v. Marsland (1896) 18 Misc. 452, 42 N. Y. Supp. 7. That cannot be said of this case, where the suit is by a dentist to recover on a bill for $85 for dental work in filling the teeth of the defendant's eighteen-year-old son without the knowledge or consent of the parent. For a bill of such character the assent of the parent cannot be implied, particularly when the dentist never before performed work for the parent, or any member of his family, and where the parent was not shown to have had any knowledge of the performance of the services until after their completion. Where an infant goes to a strange dentist, by whom no member of his family has ever been treated before, and has dental work performed upon a representation that his father will pay, the dentist should first ascertain whether or not the father has authorized the work to be done, and if he fails to do so he cannot hold the father upon the theory of implied contract for necessities."

In Ketchem v. Marsland (N. Y.) supra, the court sustained a verdict for the plaintiff in an action for the fair and reasonable value of services rendered by the plaintiff as a dentist in filling and regulating the position of the teeth of the defendant's infant daughter while she was temporarily residing apart from her parents with their assent during the summer, in the care of a woman at whose direct request the dental services were alleged to have been performed. It was held that, the services not being of sudden and urgent necessity, the child's custodian had exceeded her power in requesting them, but that the defendant had ratified the act. It was considered that ratification was to be inferred from the defendant's silence, the court pointing out that here the ratification attached to an agency which had been exceeded; the facts being that the plaintiff sent a bill to the defendant for these services and received no answer, and during the ensuing three years, up to the time of the commencement of the action, several communications of his to the defendant with regard to his claim met with no better response.

In Lamson v. Varnum (1898) 171 Mass. 237, 50 N. E. 615, the defendant's son, a boy nineteen or twenty years of age, living in his father's family, suffering with toothache, applied to the plaintiff for treatment. After the services were rendered he told the plaintiff to make the charge to his father. There was evidence that twice during the lifetime of the son the plaintiff sent a statement of his charge for the services to the defendant, and received no reply. It was held to be a question for the jury whether the work was authorized by the defendant, and their verdict against him was not disturbed.

Compare the reported case (STIMPSON v. HUNTER, ante, 1067).

INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION OF WISCONSIN et al., Respts.

(— Wis. —, 174 N. W. 899.)

Workmen's compensation — injury to employee by fire — course of employment.

1. The foreman of the pattern department of an iron company may be found to be performing service arising out of and incidental to his employment in turning back to extinguish an incipient fire in the plant which he discovers while leaving the property long after termination of the regular working hours.

Master and servant — course of employment — extinguishment of fire.

2. The foreman of the pattern department of an iron foundry cannot, as matter of law, be regarded as a stranger in turning back when leaving the plant after working hours to extinguish an incipient fire which he has discovered, although he has not been directed by any superior officer to perform such duty.

Workmen's compensation — wife living with husband — keeping house for son.

3. A woman cannot be said not to be living with her husband within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act from the fact that owing to ill health she is, by agreement with her husband, keeping an apartment for her son because of the lighter work than would be required at her husband's home, if she intends to return to her husband as soon as she is able.

— dependence on husband for support.

4. That a woman has sufficient property to maintain her does not prevent the operation of the provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act, that a woman living with her husband is presumed to be solely and wholly dependent upon him for support.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Dane County (Stevens, J.) affirming an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to defendant as guardian of the wife of deceased. Affirmed.

Statement by Eschweiler, J.:

An award was made by the Industrial Commission of Wisconsin to the defendant, John D. Rowland, as guardian of Marie J. Hansen, an incompetent person, of the sum of $2,907.24 as compensation by reason of the death of Louis Hansen, husband of said Marie J. Hansen, against the plaintiff Belle City Malleable Iron Company, as employer, and the Wisconsin Mutual Liability Company, as insurer.

The deceased for a long period of years had been employed by the plaintiff employer as millwright and foreman of the pattern department. He had charge and supervision of the patterns used by the employer in its work. His duties required him to be at the plant of the plaintiff employer, not only during the customary working hours, but at other times. On Saturday, January 5, 1918, the plant shut down as usual, so far as the rest of the employees were concerned, at noon; but Hansen was in the premises during all of the afternoon, engaged in checking over the patterns and working with an inspector from out of town. This work ceased at 5 o'clock, and the deceased then started for home. Just as he was leaving the plant, and at about 5 minutes past 5, it was discovered that fire had broken out in the basement of one of the buildings of plaintiff. Deceased immediately turned back, requested another employee to get a pail of water to assist him in putting out the fire, and was last seen just outside one of the buildings. His body was discovered on the following Wednesday morning in the basement of one of the destroyed buildings, some 75 feet away from the part of the plant in which the pattern department was located.

Deceased and applicant were married in January, 1900; in 1913 she had a serious operation, and her physical and mental health was substantially impaired from that time. She suffered from delusions, and at times was very violent. In the fall of 1913 she went to a sanatorium at Oconomowoc, Wisconsin, returned to Racine about February, 1914, and lived with deceased until the following November, when, after making a trip to California, she returned to the sanatorium, remaining there until May, 1915. In January, 1915, on application of her husband, a guardian was appointed for her property. In July, 1915, she returned to the sanatorium, remaining there until September. From that date until November, 1916, she lived with her husband. She then went as a voluntary patient to the state hospital at Mendota, from there to Waukegan, Illinois, and in January, 1917, again to the sanatorium at Oconomowoc, remaining there until May. In the summer or fall of 1917 she went to Chicago, and kept house for her adult son by a former marriage in a three-room flat furnished by him. She did not live in the same house with her husband at any time after September, 1916. She had consulted an attorney concerning the bringing of a divorce action in 1914 or 1915, but none was started.

At the time of her marriage in 1900 she had some property of her own. The earnings of her husband from that time on were kept subject to the control and disposition of the two jointly. The homestead, a good-sized house of eight to ten rooms in Racine, was in her name, and worth from $4,000 to $5,000. She had invested in interest-bearing securities about $15,000. The income from such investments, together with small amounts of the principal at times, were used for her care, and the deceased advanced but slight amounts during the last two years of his life for her support, but appears to have paid for the expenses of her trip to California. No call appears to have been made upon him by her or her guardian for funds during this period; at least, none to which he failed to respond. In her own testimony before the commission she said, in substance, among other things:

"We were very happy together. He was a good man; he always used to provide for me. I agreed with him to live in Chicago with my son until I got well. My staying in Chicago was a sort of visit with my son."

Shortly before the death, she told her son of her intention of going back to her husband. From the testimony of the son, as well as others, it appears that at times she expressed herself as not wanting to live with her husband, and at other times as desirous of doing so. The commission found that applicant was living with Louis Hansen at the time of his death, within the meaning of subdivision 3 of § 2394-10, Stat., and therefore entitled to a death benefit.

The plaintiff employer and insurer brought this action in the circuit court for Dane county to review the determination of the commission in such award, and from the judgment of the circuit court, affirming such award, this appeal is taken.

Messrs. Roehr & Steinmetz, for appellants:

The burden of proof is upon the applicant to show that the deceased met with an industrial accident and that at the time the deceased was performing services growing out of and incidental to his employment.

Mrs. Hansen was not living with her husband at the time of his death within the meaning of the statute, and she was not dependent upon him for support.

Eschweiler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants contend on this appeal, first, that Hansen was not within the course of his employment in entering the burning building where he met his death; second, that the applicant, Marie J. Hansen, was not living with her husband at the time of his death within the provisions of § 2394-10, subd. 3, Stat.; and, lastly, that she was not a dependent upon him within the meaning of the same statute.

We are satisfied that the evidence supports the conclusion of the commission that at the time of his death Louis Hansen was performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment within the meaning of § 2394-3, subd. 2, Stat. He must have entered the building voluntarily, and knowing the possibility of danger in so doing from its being then on fire. But it is a reasonable inference that he did so for either one or both of these purposes: (1) Under the specific duty

injury to employee by fire—
course of employment.

devolving upon him to have charge of and look after the valuable patterns essential for the work being done by his employer; (2) from the sense of obligation to use a reasonable amount of care to save his employer's property at a time of such emergency.

As to each of these it needed no specific instructions from any superior to perform such services or voluntarily assume such responsibility while making an effort within the field of reasonable care to save the property of his employer. While so doing he cannot be considered, as a matter of law, to be a stranger. McPhee's Case, 222 Mass. 1, 4, 109 N. E. 638, 10 N. C. C. A. 257; Munn v. Industrial Bd. 274 Ill. 70, 113 N. E. 110, 12 N. C. C. A. 652. We do not think that either the letter or the spirit of the Workmen's Compensation Act requires that such employee should be penalized for obeying such a natural and commendable instinct on his part.

On the third point urged by appellants, we hold that under the testimony of Mrs. Hansen, to the effect that she was living with her son only temporarily rather than with her husband, and by reason of an agreement between the deceased and herself on account of her ill health, and that the work required in the apartment furnished by the son was much less of a strain upon her than at the homestead, and that

of his death. Northwestern Iron Co. v. Industrial Commission, 154 Wis. 97, 101, L.R.A.1916A, 366, 142 N. W. 271, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 877.

Having properly held that she was living with her husband at the time of his death, then § 2394-10, subd. 3 (a), establishes a conclusive presumption that she was solely and wholly dependent upon him for support. That she had property of her own, even were the income therefrom sufficient to, and for a time actually had been alone used for, her support, would be entirely immaterial.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

The question of the right to compensation for injuries received while performing service for an employer before or after hours as arising out of and in the course of the employment is discussed in the annotation on page 1078. It will be noticed that the court upheld this right in the reported case (BELLE CITY MALLEABLE IRON CO. v. INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION, ante, 1071) where the injuries were sustained by a foreman who turned back, when leaving long after working hours, to extinguish a fire.

STATE INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION, Respt.

(322 N. Y. 382, 118 N. E. 805.)

Workmen's compensation — injury after working hours — course of employment.

Injury to a cigar packer who at times delivered ordered cigars, by falling down a stairway when on his way, at his employer's request, to make a delivery, is within the course of and arises out of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, although the injury occurred after he had returned to the factory which he had left at the termination of his day's work.

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming an award of the Industrial Commission to claimants in a proceeding by them under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for the death of their decedent. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Decedent was not engaged in a hazardous employment at the time of his injury within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Law.

Cardozo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The award is for death benefits to the widow and minor child of one Grieb, an employee. Workmen's Compensation Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 67) § 16. The employee was a cigar packer in the city of Syracuse. He was a piece worker, receiving $1.25 for packing a thousand cigars. When not busy packing, his custom was to deliver cigars to customers if so requested by his employer. He did this frequently during working hours. Sometimes he did it after working hours, and then his employer gave him car fares and the price of a drink.

On Saturday, September 30, 1916, Grieb left the factory in the afternoon about 4 o'clock. In the evening, he passed by with two friends, who had been fellow employees. They saw a light in the factory, and went upstairs. They found the employer tying up two boxes of cigars. He had called that evening at the Amos Hotel, had been asked by the proprietor to deliver some cigars, and had gone to the factory to get them. After some talk about other matters, the employer asked Grieb to deliver the boxes at the hotel, and to take the bill with him, presumably for collection. Grieb consented, and received the boxes and the bill. He left his employer and his two friends in the factory. On his way downstairs, he fell, and was killed.

The argument is made that the injury did not arise out of or in the course of the servant's employment. I think that is too narrow a view. If Grieb had been injured during working hours, it would make no difference that his service was gratuitous. If the service was incidental to the employer's business and was rendered at the employer's request, it would be part of the employment within the meaning of this statute. Any other ruling would discourage helpful loyalty. Hartz v. Hartford Faience Co. 90 Conn. 539, 97 Atl. 1020. In that case a shipping clerk, whose duty was to keep the books, lent a hand of his own motion in the delivery of merchandise. His claim for compensation was sustained. We do not need to go so far. We cannot doubt that in the case cited the claim would have been valid if custom or special request had established the approval of the employer. To hold otherwise would lead to strange conclusions. It cannot be that an employer may ask a clerk to assist mechanics in repairing dangerous machinery, and then be heard to say that because the service was gratuitous, the employee, if injured, is outside the pale of the employment. Pro hac vice, by force of custom or request, the employment is enlarged. Lane v. Lusty [1915] 3 K. B. 230 [1915] W. N. 252, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1342, 113 L. T. N. S. 615, 8 B. W. C. C. 518; Mann v. Glastonbury Knitting Co. 90 Conn. 116, L.R.A.1916D, 86, 96 Atl. 368. We have already held that in determining the relation of employer and employee, the payment of wages is not the sole test. De Noyer v. Cavanaugh, 221 N. Y. 273, 116 N. E. 992. We should hold the same thing now.

It is plain, therefore, that Grieb's service, if it had been rendered during working hours, would have been incidental to his employment.

Workmen's compensation—
injury after working hours—course of employment.

To overturn this award, it is necessary to hold that the service ceased to be incidental because rendered after hours. That will never do. The law does not insist that an employee shall work with his eye upon the clock. Services rendered in a spirit of helpful loyalty, after closing time has come, have the same protection as the services of the drone or the laggard. Larke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 90 Conn. 303, 308, L.R.A.1916E, 584, 97 Atl. 320. But the argument is that because the employee had left for the day, and had then returned, his rights are different. Why he returned, we do not know. Perhaps it was idle curiosity. Perhaps the unexpected light which he saw in the factory after closing made him feel that investigation was due in the interest of his employer. At all events, when he reached there, he found business in progress. His employer had prepared cigars for delivery, and was writing out the bill. What Grieb then undertook to do with his employer's approval was just as much a part of the business as if it had been done in the noonday sun. He was not only to deliver the cigars. He was also to collect the money. That is the plain implication of the request that he should take the bill with him. Moreover, it is a fair inference that he expected to return, and bring the money back, for he did not take his companions with him, but left them behind. How far he had to go we do not know. There is no evidence where the Amos Hotel is situated. There is nothing to show that the employee would have passed it in going to his home. I do not say that the case would be different if such things had been proved. It is enough to say that they are not here. This case is not one where the servant goes out primarily on his own business or for his personal convenience, and only incidentally and by the way does something for the master. All the circumstances point to the conclusion that Grieb left the factory on the fatal errand for the sole purpose of helping the master in the transaction of the master's business. It was not mere friendship, it was the relation of employer and employee, that led the one to request the service and the other to render it. If such a service is not incidental to the employment within the meaning of this statute, loyalty and helpfulness have earned a poor reward.

I do not think our law commits us to so harsh a holding. A service does not cease to be part of an employment because it is occasional or trivial. The Master of the Rolls said in McDonald v. The Banana [1908] 2 K. B. 926, 929: "If I send my domestic servant in the evening with a letter to a friend, and he is knocked down by a motor omnibus on his way to or from my friend's house," there will be a liability under the English statute.

The statement, when made, was a dictum, but a recent case in the House of Lords (Dennis v. White [1917] A. C. 479, 86 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1074, 116 L. T. N. S. 774, 38 Times L. R. 484, 61 Sol. Jo. 558, 10 B. W. C. C. 280, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 325, 15 N. C. C. A. 294), reviewing all the precedents, and sweeping aside many finespun distinctions, makes it clear that the dictum was sound and just. See also Hughes v. Batt [1915] S. C. 150, 52 Scot. L. R. 93, 8 B. W. C. C. 362, cited in Dennis v. White, supra, at page 484. We should interpret and apply our own statute in the same large spirit. I cannot doubt that, if it is thus read, the claimant's case will be found within it.

To reach this conclusion, there is no need to attempt a precise or comprehensive definition of the term "employment." One must leave such problems to be worked out by the process of exclusion and inclusion in particular cases, rather than by "a fixed standard of measurement." John Stewart & Son v. Longhurst [1917] A. C. 249, 258, 86 L. J. K. B. N. S. 729, 116 L. T. N. S. 763, 38 Times L. R. 285, 61 Sol. Jo. 414, 10 B. W. C. C. 266, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 196. It is enough that here the employee was in the general service of the employer; that the service rendered was incidental to the business; that it was one which this employee had been accustomed to render upon request; and that the errand was the cause of his presence on the stairway. The inference is legitimate that it was not the comradeship of friends, but the tacit sanctions of a relation of power and dependence, which prompted the master's request and the servant's acquiescence.

The order should be affirmed, with costs.

ANNOTATION.

Workmen's compensation: injuries received while performing service for employer before or after hours as arising out of and in the course of employment.

Where an employee was injured before or after hours while performing some service for the benefit of his employer, it has been held that the injuries occurred in the course of and arose out of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Acts. Atolia Min. Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 175 Cal. 691, 167 Pac. 148; Munn v. Industrial Bd. (1916) 274 Ill. 70, 118 N. E. 110, 12 N. C. C. A. 652; Mueller Constr. Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1918) 283 Ill. 148, L.R.A.1918F, 891, 118 N.

E. 1028, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 808; Meyers v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1917) 199 Mich. 184, 165 N. W. 708; GRIEB v. HAMMERLE (reported herewith) ante, 1075.

It will be observed that in GRIEB v. HAMMERLE (reported herewith) ante, 1075, an injury to a cigar packer by falling down a stairway when on his way to make a delivery of cigars at his employer's request, was held to have been received within the course of, and to have arisen out of, his employment, notwithstanding the fact that the request to deliver and the injury occurred when he had returned to the factory at night after having left it at the end of his day's work.

And in Mueller Constr. Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1918) 283 Ill. 148, L.R.A. 1918F, 891, 110 N. E. 1028, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 808, an injury to a foreman of construction of a building by being struck by an automobile while on his way to telephone for lumber was held to have arisen out of and in the course of his employment, although it appeared that according to his custom he was at the building where he was working some time before the workmen were due, and that the injury occurred about twenty minutes before the hour he was paid to begin work. The court said: "The statute makes the employer liable for all accidental injuries sustained, 'arising out of and in the course of the employment.' The words, 'arising out of,' and the words, 'in the course of,' are used conjunctively. In order to satisfy the statute, both conditions must concur. It is not sufficient that the accident occur in the course of the employment, but the causative danger must also arise out of it. The words, 'arising out of,' refer to the origin or cause of the accident, and are descriptive of its character, while the words, 'in the course of,' refer to the time, place, and circumstances under which the accident takes place. . . . As a part of defendant in error's duties, he was required to order materials as needed, and it may fairly be said, as an incident to such employment, that he would have occasion to use and did use a telephone. As none was provided, he would go to some near-by place to use a telephone as occasion required. In going to and returning from such a place, we think he was as much in the course of his employment as he would have been in going to and returning from a telephone, if one had been installed on the premises. In such case there can be no question but that, had he been injured, the injury would have occurred in the course of his employment. In the instant case, as was his custom, he had reported at the building in advance of his men, and at the time of the accident was on his way to telephone about a matter which was a part of his employer's business, in the usual course of his employment. Under these facts there can be no serious question but that the accident occurred in the course of the employment. That it occurred before the actual time for the commencement of work is not controlling. Too great stress cannot be placed on the exact time when the earning of wages commenced and ended, but a reasonable time must be allowed before and after such time, and included within such period of employment, where the employee is at a place where he might reasonably be expected to be at such time, and is injured in the course of the duties of his employment. What would be a reasonable time in such case must, to a large extent, depend upon the particular facts and circumstances of each case."

And in Atolia Min. Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 175 Cal. 691, 167 Pac. 148, a miner was held entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, where after his hours of labor, in accordance with a prevalent custom, he revisited the mine to make sure that there was no danger to other workers from an unexploded charge, and was shot by a guard, such injuries being held to have grown out of and to have occurred in the course of his employment.

And in Meyers v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1917) 199 Mich. 134, 165 N. W. 703, it was held that a locomotive fireman, a part of whose duty it was to see that his engine was properly equipped, might be found to have suffered an injury arising out of his employment where it appeared that he went to his engine about two hours before his regular time, having put on his working clothes, and that some time thereafter he was found dead, with grease on his hands and face.

And it has been held that an injury to a casual laborer who had been employed by a farmer to assist in threshing arose out of and in the course of his employment by the farmer, although the injury occurred after the threshing had been finished and the laborer paid, and while the latter was assisting in moving the machine from the premises, it being usual and customary for casual laborers following threshing machines to help get the machine from road to the stack and back to the road. Newson v. Burstall (1915) 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. (Eng.) 535, 112 L. T. N. S. 792, 59 Sol. Jo. 204, 8 B. W. C. C. 21.

And in Southern Surety Co. v. Stubbs (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 199 S. W. 343, it was held that an employee was acting in the course of his employment and that the accident resulting in his death arose out of the employment where it appeared that he was employed as assistant engineer on a dredge, and lived on it; that they stopped dredging on account of a storm; that after stopping such work he was drowned while assisting in an attempt to save the dredge, which finally capsized and sank.

And in BELLE CITY MALLEABLE IRON CO. v. INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 1071, an employee was held to have been performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment within the Wisconsin Workmen's Compensation Act, when he met his death, it appearing that he was employed as a millwright and foreman of the pattern department of a factory; that his duties required him to be at the plant after the customary hours for other workers; that on the day of his death he remained at the factory on Saturday afternoon after it had shut down at noon and worked until 5 o'clock, and had just started for home when he discovered that a fire had broken out in the plant, and he turned back to put out the fire and was killed while so doing.

And in Milwaukee v. Fera (1917) — Wis. —, 174 N. W. 926, it was held that an employee was performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment where it appeared that he was employed to collect garbage, and that after having taken his last load was driving his horse and wagon, which belonged to his employer, to the barn to put them up until the next day, when the horse became frightened and injured him.

And in Munn v. Industrial Bd. (1916) 274 Ill. 70, 113 N. E. 110, 12 N. C. C. A. 662, the industrial board's decision that an injury to a janitor arose out of, and was received in the course of, his employment, was affirmed upon the board's finding of facts to the effect that the deceased was employed as a janitor whose duty it was to operate an elevator and fire the boilers; that one of the tenants in the building accumulated large amounts of film scraps which were left in bags, and that the deceased took these away, receiving a small sum from the tenant for this service; that on the day in question about an hour after his day's work was over, he, not having left the premises, discovered fire in the basement and attempted to put it out, but was overcome with fumes of smoke; that after he was restored he went back into the boiler room and moved some boxes containing film scraps; that he said that someone had set the film scraps on fire and that he must get what remained out of the rooms or he would lose his job; that he returned home and in a short time died as a result of inhaling the gases. The recital of facts was held not conclusive that the fire was caused by the film scraps clandestinely brought on the premises by the deceased in his own interest, and that the fire would not otherwise have occurred. The court said: "The mere fact that at the time of the accident Caspersen's day's service, according to the terms of his employment, had ended, is not sufficient to authorize a reversal of the finding that the accident arose out of and was received in the course of his employment. The industrial board found that upon his return to the boiler room the second time he put in some coal. An employee should not be penalized for working overtime if he wishes to do so, or for endeavoring to save his master's property."

In Re Cele (1919) 189 App. Div. 306, 178 N. Y. Supp. 451, where an employee was killed while helping extinguish a fire in his employer's plant, which started about twenty minutes after he had ceased work, it was held that the accident causing his death did not arise out of or in the course of his employment, it appearing that he was an associate member of the village fire department, and that the village had paid the statutory sum provided for in case an active member of the department died from injuries received in the performance of duties as a fireman. The decision in GRIEB v. HAMMERLE, supra, was distinguished on the ground that the employee in that case was performing a service specially requested by the employer, whereas in the case at bar the employee was rendering services as a fireman at the time of the accident, and was subject to the direction of the chief of the fire department, and not of his employer. The court said: "The fact that the fire occurred on the premises of his employer was a coincidence. If it had occurred elsewhere, the legal aspect of the case would not be different. Cole may have responded more willingly because the fire was on his employer's premises. It is impossible to determine whether he did or not. It is immaterial. No duty required him to act. No request to do so came from his employer. His allegiance and duty were to the organization with which he was acting, and to the orders, direction, and control of its chief engineer alone he was subject. We do not hold that if the deceased, pursuant to a request of his employer, had acted as a fireman, with the acquiescence of the chief engineer of the fire department and subject to his orders, liability would not exist on the part of the appellants. But such request by the employer was not expressed, and the circumstances clearly are not such as to justify an inference of an implied request, even assuming that an implied request would create liability against the appellants."

And it has been held that a rodman in the employ of a county road authority whose employment was solely to sweep and put blinding on the road was not injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment where he was injured when stepping down from a steam road roller belonging to his employers, upon which he had gone for the purpose of breaking up the boiler fire so as to get up steam by 7 A. M. under an arrangement with the engineman to break up the fire so as to save the engineer and fireman, who had gone home for the night, from returning before 7 A. M. *M'Allan v. MILL CREEK COAL & COKE COMPANY et al., Appts.,

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION.

(— W. Va. —, 100 S. E. 557.)

Commerce — regulation of electric rates.

1. The regulation of the rates at which electric current, transported or transmitted from one state to another, shall be sold in the latter state, is, so long as the rate fixed is not confiscatory or discriminatory against citizens of another state, a matter essentially local in its nature, and not of such national importance as to require a general system and uniformity of regulation.

Public service corporation — what is — hydro-electric company.

2. A hydro-electric company, organized in Virginia to engage in the business of a general electric lighting and power company and for the sale and disposal of its electric power to the public, and selling its product to customers in this state, is, as to its business transacted within this state, a "public service corporation," within the terms of chapter 150, Code of West Virginia.

— public service — furnishing electricity.

3. Where a hydro-electric company, a public service corporation within the terms of chapter 150, Code, by its charter expressly engages to serve the public, and subjects itself unreservedly to the laws and regulations of the governmental power having jurisdiction in the place where it proposes to conduct its business, and its prolonged subsequent conduct is entirely consistent therewith, the electric service rendered by the company to industrial concerns, to be used by them for private profit, is a "public service," within the provisions of the Public Service Commission Act, and subject to regulation by the Commission.

4. The transportation or transmission of electric current from state to state through appropriate instrumentalities is "commerce" between the states.

5. In determining when commerce ceases to be interstate and becomes intrastate, the essential character or unity of the movement is decisive.

— stopping to change voltage.

6. The transportation or transmission of electric current direct from the seller in one state to the consumer in another, for immediate or practically immediate use, subject only to a temporary stop en route for the purpose of reducing the current to a commercial voltage, remains "interstate commerce" until the commodity has reached its goal, unless theretofore sold to independent distributing companies in the latter state for resale to local consumers.

— exclusiveness of Federal power.

7. As to those forms of interstate commerce which are of national importance, and require a general system and uniformity of regulation, the Federal power is exclusive, and the state may not act, even if Congress has not exerted its paramount legislative authority as to them.

— power of state.

8. But where the subject is of local rather than national importance, admitting of diversity of treatment according to the special requirements of local conditions, the state may exercise its regulatory authority within reasonable limits till Congress acts.

[See 5 R. C. L. 701.]

Contract — impairment — public welfare.

9. Private contract rights must yield to the public welfare, where the latter is appropriately declared and defined, and the two conflict.

[See 6 R. C. L. 707.]

Constitutional law — due process — fixing rates.

10. Reasonable rates for electric energy, prescribed by a state in the exercise of its police power through the instrumentality of its Public Service Commission, are not repugnant to the contract or due process of law clauses of the Federal Constitution (art. 1, § 10, cl. 1, and Amendment 14), merely because, if given effect, they will supersede the rates designated in a private contract between the company and a customer, entered into prior to the enactment of the law creating the Commission.

Public Service Commission — finding of facts — review.

11. Findings of fact by the Public Service Commission, based upon evidence to support them, generally will not be reviewed by this court.

Constitutional law — what is police power.

12. The police power of the state embraces regulations designed to promote the public convenience or the general welfare or prosperity, as well as those in the interest of the public health, morals, and safety.

Commerce — police power of the state
— validity of exercise.

13. A state's exercise of police power affecting interstate commerce is not valid if a direct or undue burden is imposed upon such commerce.

[See 6 R. C. L. 200.]

APPEAL by protestants from an order of the Public Service Commission directing the continuance of a former increase of 20 per cent and allowing a further increase of the same amount in existing rates of the Appalachian Power Company, in an application by it for leave to increase its industrial power rates to its customers. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. G. Fox, and Sanders & Crockett, for appellants:

Applicant is engaged in interstate commerce, hence is not subject to any regulation of rates by the authorities of the state of West Virginia.

Mr. W. B. Kegley, for appellant Carter Coal Company:

Even though the state may lawfully declare the status of a business and by legislative act fix such status as to future transactions, such legislation cannot have the effect to retroactively impart a character or status to the business or transaction which did not exist, from its essential nature, prior to such legislation.

Lynch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions presented upon this appeal originated in an application made by the Appalachian Power Company, a Virginia corporation doing business in this state as well as in Virginia, to the Public Service Commission of West Virginia for an increase of 30 per cent in the rates in force December 31, 1918. Thirteen months prior to that date the Commission had ordered an increase of 20 per cent in the rates theretofore existing, pursuant to an agreement between the power company and its customers, and as an emergency measure made necessary by the war, though many of such customers, including appellants, held unexpired contracts with the company, fixing lower rates to be paid for its service. The increase of 20 per cent presumably not proving sufficient to enable the company to meet the additional costs incident to war conditions, application was made for the additional 30 per cent increase. After full investigation and hearing, the Commission, by an order of April 28, 1919, directed the continuance of the former increase of 20 per cent, and allowed a further increase of the same amount, effective April 1, 1919. It is from that order that the present appeal was taken by numerous coal companies served by the power company in this state.

The Appalachian Power Company was organized in 1911 for the purpose of engaging in the business of a general electric lighting and power company, "for the production of electric power intended to be used for public service." Hydro-electric stations of great capacity were constructed on New river, in Virginia, and the current there generated carried into West Virginia by two high-tension transmission lines, to three substations in this state, where it is transformed or reduced from 88,000 volts to commercial voltages ranging from 13,200 to 110, and from these points distributed, measured, and sold to the company's West Virginia consumers. These three transforming or reducing substations alone, one at Switchback, one at Bluefield, and one at Coalwood, represent an investment, exclusive of generating machinery, of $400,000, $80,000, and $60,000, respectively. The Commission found that the fair value of the power company's investment as a rate base upon which it was entitled to earn a reasonable return, as of September 30, 1918, was approximately $9,860,000. It further found that the company had not, during any year of its history, earned a return sufficient to pay its fixed charges and to enable it to set aside a fund to cover accrued depreciation, and that the operations of the company since it commenced business had resulted, as of September 30, 1918, in a deficit of "something in excess of $1,000,000."

At the time of the applications for increased rates and of the orders of the Commission allowing them, many of the customers of the power company were using its current under unexpired contracts having several years yet to run. These contracts definitely fixed the rates chargeable for the service rendered. The Commission, however, in effect annulled the provisions of these agreements in so far as they related to rates, by authorizing a total and aggregate increase of 40 per cent, finding that the new rates were necessary in order to enable the company to earn a fair return on its investment.

jurisdiction and powers in authorizing the increase, in the face of specific rates fixed by contracts having several years yet to run, protestants rely upon four propositions: (1) That the Appalachian Power Company, disposing in West Virginia of electric power generated outside of this state, is not within the purview of the West Virginia Public Service Commission Act, chapter 150 of the Code; (2) that, as the electric power furnished in West Virginia originates at the power company's developments in Virginia, its business in this state is interstate commerce, and the Public Service Commission, therefore, has no jurisdiction in the premises; (3) that protestants' rates are fixed by contracts entered into prior to the passage of the act creating the Commission, and any interference now with such contracts would impair the obligations thereof, and deprive protestants of their property without due process of law; (4) that the rates fixed are unreasonable.

With respect to the first ground relied on by petitioners there can be no reasonable doubt. The charter of the Appalachian Power Company states that the purposes of its organization, among others, are: "To do the business of a general electric lighting and power company, with works to be purchased, leased, or constructed, maintained, and operated for the production of electric power intended to be used for public service, and for the sale and disposal thereof to the public."

The charter authorizes the company to transmit, use, or dispose of its electrical power or energy in the states of Virginia, West Virginia, Tennessee, and North Carolina. While it is given full power to contract with the public "for such price or prices, and on such terms and conditions, as to this corporation may seem proper," yet in the same connection it is provided expressly that "said company shall be bound to furnish at reasonable rates any person, company or corporation along its lines with electric energy, and to charge uniformly therefor to all persons, companies, or corporations using the same, under like conditions as to cost of supply; all subject to the laws and regulations of the governmental power having jurisdiction in the place or places in which such business or businesses are conducted." (Italics ours.)

A certified copy of its certificate of incorporation was duly filed with the secretary of state of this state, and properly recorded, as required by § 30, chap. 54 (§ 2929), Code of West Virginia. It was under such provisions as these that the power company commenced, and has continued, to transact its business in this state.

Not only is the public character of the service to be rendered by the Appalachian Power Company expressly asserted in the articles of incorporation, but its subsequent acts pursuant thereto have partaken distinctly of the same characteristics. The findings of fact of the Public Service Commission sufficiently disclose that fact: "The applicant is now serving as a public utility with light, heat, and power," twelve towns in Virginia, six in West Virginia, twenty-five coal-mining plants in Virginia, seventy-six in West Virginia, and the street railway systems of the Bluestone Traction Company and the Princeton Traction Company. "It furnishes 60 per cent of the power used in coal mining in the Norfolk & Western and Pocahontas territory, and all the power used in mining in the Mullens district on the Virginian Railroad, and 90 per cent of the power used in coal mining in the Clinchfield district."

Its charter requires it to serve the public along its lines at reasonable and uniform rates, and subjects all phases of its business to the laws and regulations "of the governmental power having jurisdiction in the place or places in which such business or businesses are conducted." The scope of its activities in West Virginia shows the generality of the service performed here, and state officials having occasion to deal with it, including the Public Service Commission, have recognized and treated it as a public service corporation. Moreover, a like service furnished by electric power, heat, and light companies is of such a public nature as warrants the bestowal upon them of the power of eminent domain. Pittsburg Hydro-Electric Co. v. Liston, 70 W. Va. 83, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 602, 73 S. E. 86.

Furthermore, the power company involved here falls within the express language of the West Virginia Public Service Commission Act, chapter 150, Code. Section 3 (§ 638) provides: "The jurisdiction of the Commission shall extend to and include: . . . (c) Gas companies, electric lighting companies and municipalities furnishing gas or electricity for lighting, heating or power purposes; and (d) hydro-electric companies for the generation and transmission of light, heat or power. . . . The words 'public service corporation' used in this act shall include all persons, . . . firms, corporations, municipalities and agencies engaged or employed in any business herein enumerated, or in any other public service business whether above enumerated or not, whether incorporated or not."

There can be no doubt that the power company is a public service corporation within the scope of that act. Wingrove v. Public Service Commission, 74 W. Va. 190, L.R.A.1918A, 210, 81 S. E. 734.

But protestants raise the further jurisdictional question that, granting certain phases of applicant's business to be public in nature, such as the service rendered to domestic consumers and traction companies, the furnishing of electric current to industrial concerns to be used by them for private profit is not of such a public character as to subject such service to regulation by the Commission. They contend that such service is purely a matter of private concern, to be regulated by individual contract between the power company and the management of the industrial enterprise, and that, if the legislature did include that phase of applicant's business within the scope of the Public Service Commission Act, it had no constitutional authority to exercise its regulatory power with respect thereto. This question is not argued at length by protestants, nor do they cite authority on the point. But the particular facts of the case do not necessitate an extensive consideration of the constitutional question involved, for here the company, by its charter, has dedicated all of its activities to the service of the public and to regulation by it. When, through the years of its existence, it has subjected and still is subjecting itself voluntarily, in all phases of its business, "to the laws and regulations of the governmental power having jurisdiction in the place or places in which such business or businesses are conducted," does it lie with this court, or with those who have dealt with the company subsequent to its organization, to say that the extent of its public service is more limited than the company, through its recorded charter, admits it to be? It has never questioned the authority of the Public Service Commission to regulate all phases of its business, and when it thus dedicates itself unreservedly to the service of the public, it is hardly fitting that this court, or any minority of the public which it serves, should say that the company has overstepped its powers in subjecting itself to public regulation. It is generally the privilege of the dedicator of property or service to public use or regulation to determine, subject to the sanction of the unit of government under which it acts, the extent of that dedication. When such dedication has been made and has received official sanction, it is conclusive against an attack of this nature. The converse of this situation is presented in the decision rendered to-day in Clarksburg Light & Heat Co. v. Public Service Commission, — W. Va. —, P.U.R.1920A, 639, 100 S. E. 551, in which the question was squarely presented whether the service of natural gas, the supply of which is limited by nature, to industrial concerns, to be used by them for private profit, is or is not of such a public character as to subject such service to regulation by the Commission.

With respect to the second point raised by protestants, we concur in their conclusion that the business of the power company is interstate commerce, but cannot agree that the Public Service Commission, therefore, has no jurisdiction in the premises. No longer can there be any doubt that the transportation or transmission of electric current from state to state, through appropriate instrumentalities, is commerce between the states. West v. Kansas Natural Gas Co. 221 U. S. 229, 55 L. ed. 716, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1193, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564; Pipe Line Cases (United States v. Ohio Oil Co.) 234 U. S. 548, 58 L. ed. 1459, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 956; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Foster, 247 U. S. 105, 62 L. ed. 1006, 1 A.L.R. 1278, P.U.R.1918D, 865, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 438; Pennsylvania Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission, 225 N. Y. 397, P.U.R.1919C, 663, 122 N. E. 260. But the more difficult question arises when it becomes necessary to determine at what point the shipment loses its interstate character and becomes merged with the general property of the state, and fully subject to exclusive regulation by that state. In the present case the power used by West Virginia consumers is generated in Virginia, transmitted across the state line by high-tension wires to substations in this state, where the voltage is reduced to commercial form, and thence distributed to the various consumers using such power. There is no break in the essential unity of the transaction—the interposition of no intermediary which would change the essential character thereof. There is no cessation or break in the force of the current; merely a change in its form, that it may be available for use according to the needs of the consumers.

It is settled beyond all doubt by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that it is the essential character of the commerce which determines whether it is interstate or intrastate. Western Oil Ref. Co. v. Lipscomb, 244 U. S. 346, 61 L. ed. 1181, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 623. There an Indiana corporation, for the purpose of filling orders taken by its salesmen in Tennessee, shipped into that state a tank car of oil billed to the shipper to a point in Tennessee where part of the orders were filled, and thence rebilled to the shipper to another point in that state where the remaining orders were filled. It was held that the movement of the goods to the first point and its continuance thence to the second, the second shipment being between points within the state, were connected parts of a continuing interstate commerce movement, when considered in its entirety. The place of the rebilling was termed a "temporary step en route."

So it has been held that a telegram forwarded by the stock exchange in New York City to a telegraph company in Boston, with the intention that the latter should transmit it to selected brokers in that city, approved in advance by the exchange, does not lose its character as a subject of interstate commerce until it reaches the brokers' offices. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Foster, 247 U. S. 105, 62 L. ed. 1006, 1 A.L.R. 1278, P.U.R.1918D, 865, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 438. The continuity of the transaction was not broken by the translation of the code message into English, and its transmission, thus translated, to tickers in the offices of the approved brokers. As said by Justice Holmes in that case: "If the normal, contemplated, and followed course is a transmission as continuous and rapid as science can make it from exchange to broker's office, it does not matter what are the stages."

In this case the transmission from hydro-electric generators in Virginia to consumers in West Virginia was as expeditious and continuous as science could make it. So far as these appellant coal companies are concerned, this is not a case where the current transported into West Virginia is sold to independent distributing companies for resale to local consumers, as was the situation in Public Utilities Commission v. Landon, 249 U. S. 236, 63 L. ed. 577, P.U.R.1919C, 834, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 268, but a direct transmission from seller to buyer, with an incidental and temporary stop en route for the purpose of transformation into a commercial voltage. As held in the case last cited, the interposition of such independent local distributing companies breaks the chain of interstate commerce. Nor is there present any evidence indicating a storage of the current in this state for later distribution to consumers, which might, though we do not decide the question, require us to hold that the interstate commerce feature of the transmission terminated at the place of storage.

We are not unmindful that the court of appeals of Maryland, in a recent decision (West Virginia & M. Gas Co. v. Towers, — Md. —, P.U.R.1919D, 332, 106 Atl. 265), has held that where gas is transported from West Virginia to Maryland in high-pressure mains, and at various points in the latter state reduced to a lower pressure for local consumption, such reduction terminates the interstate commerce portion of the transportation. At the time that opinion was written the Supreme Court of the United States had not yet decided the case of Public Utilities Commission v. Landon, supra. We are, therefore, not disposed to adopt the conclusion reached in the Towers Case, but rather to follow what we understand to be the rule laid down in Public Utilities Commission v. Landon, supra, and Pennsylvania Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission, 225 N. Y. 397, 122 N. E. 260, affirming 184 App. Div. 556, P.U.R.1919A, 372, 171 N. Y. Supp. 1028, namely, that the transportation or transmission of such commodities as gas or electricity across state lines, direct from seller to consumer, for immediate or practically immediate use, remains interstate commerce until the commodity has reached its goal, unless theretofore sold to independent distributing companies for resale to local consumers, or, possibly, unless stored in the state of distribution for a period of such length that it can fairly be said to have lost its original character and to have become merged with the general property of the state.

But, though interstate commerce is involved, the state is not necessarily deprived of the right to regulate and supervise under its police power. That which is attempted here is the regulation of the rates at which electric power, produced in Virginia, shall be sold in West Virginia. It is settled law that the police power of the state embraces regulations designed to promote the public convenience or the general welfare or prosperity, as well as those in the interest of the public health, morals, and safety. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Ohio, 173 U. S. 285, 292, 43 L. ed. 702, 704, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 465; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Illinois, 200 U. S. 561, 592, 50 L. ed. 596, 609, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, 4 Ann. Cas. 1175; Bacon v. Walker, 204 U. S. 311, 317, 51 L. ed. 499, 502, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Transbarger, 238 U. S. 67, 77, 59 L. ed. 1204, 1211, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 678. the public convenience and general welfare, and hence a proper exercise of the police power of the state. Benwood v. Public Service Commission, 75 W. Va. 127, L.R.A.1915C, 261, 83 S. E. 295; Virginia-Western Power Co. v. Com. — Va. —, — A.L.R. —, P.U.R.1919E, 766, 99 S. E. 723. See also German Alliance Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 233 U. S. 389, 58 L. ed. 1011, L.R.A.1915C, 1189, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 612.

But not every exercise of the police power affecting interstate commerce is valid. No direct or undue burden may be imposed.

Since the clarifying opinion of the United States Supreme Court in the Minnesota Rate Cases (Simpson v. Shepard), 230 U. S. 352, 57 L. ed. 1511, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1151, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 18, much of the vagueness and ambiguity as to the respective powers of state and Federal governments over interstate commerce have been removed. At page 399 of the opinion in 230 U. S., the court says: "It has repeatedly been declared by this court that as to those subjects which require a general system or uniformity of regulation the power of Congress is exclusive. In other matters, admitting of diversity of treatment according to the special requirements of local conditions, the states may act within their respective jurisdictions until Congress sees fit to act; and, when Congress does act, the exercise of its authority overrides all conflicting state legislation."

Again at page 402 of 230 U. S., it is said: "But within these limitations there necessarily remains to the states, until Congress acts, a wide range for the permissible exercise of power appropriate to their territorial jurisdiction, although interstate commerce may be affected. It extends to those matters of a local nature as to which it is impossible to derive from the constitutional grant an intention that they should go uncontrolled pending Federal intervention. . . . Further, it is competent for a state to govern its internal commerce, to provide local improvements, to create and regulate local facilities, to adopt protective measures of a reasonable character in the interest of the health, safety, morals, and welfare of its people, although interstate commerce may incidentally or indirectly be involved. . . . Where the subject is peculiarly one of local concern, and from its nature belongs to the class with which the state appropriately deals in making reasonable provision for local needs, it cannot be regarded as left to the unrestrained will of individuals because Congress has not acted, although it may have such a relation to interstate commerce as to be within the reach of the Federal power."

Congress has never asserted its paramount power over interstate transmission of electric power; hence it only remains to consider whether the regulation of rates at which electric current shall be sold is essentially local, or of such national importance as to require a general system or uniformity of regulation. The vital distinction should be noted between regulation of rates of transportation, and of the rates at which a commodity shall be sold. Transportation across state lines, involving as it frequently does many or all states, is generally a matter of national importance, requiring uniformity of regulation respecting the rates thereof, and hence is usually beyond the regulatory power of the state. Because of the very nature of the subject-matter, conflicting state regulations respecting rates ordinarily would result in discord and chaos. There are instances, however, where even in such cases the regulatory power of the state has been sustained. Port Richmond & B. P. Ferry Co. v. Hudson County, 234 U. S. 317, 58 L. ed. 1330, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 821. See also Shrader v.

Steubenville, E. L. & B. Valley Trac-tion Co. — W. Va. —, P.U.R.1919D, 895, 99 S. E. 207.

In fixing the rates of sale, how-ever, as distinguished from rates of transportation, the duty regulated is of an entirely different nature. The duty of the power company to sell at reasonable rates was one owed both to citizens of Virginia and to the public in this state. But the two duties do not overlap, as they do where rates of transporta-tion are concerned. The price at which a commodity is sold is essen-tially local, affecting chiefly those in the community where it is made, and only incidentally, if at all, touching those outside of the community. So long as the rate fixed is not discriminatory or confiscatory, but yields a fair re-turn upon the valuation of the prop-erty, it throws no burden upon citizens of other communities or states. As said in Pennsylvania Gas Co. v. Public Service Commis-sion, 225 N. Y. 397, P.U.R.1919C, 663, 122 N. E. 260, respecting the regulation of the sale of gas im-ported from another state: "It is idle to speak of the need of uni-formity of action by states of equal competence when there is only one state whose action is involved. But even within the state, diversity rather than uniformity is exacted by the conditions of the business. Rates adequate in one city are in-adequate in another. The local needs are best known to local agen-cies of government. No central au-thority, acting for the nation as a whole, will readily discern them."

A similar conclusion was reached in Manufacturers' Light & Heat Co. v. Ott (D. C.) 215 Fed. 940. The local regulation stands until Con-gress occupies the field. But protestants further claim that their rates are fixed by con-tracts entered into prior to the pas-sage of the Public Service Commis-sion Act, and any interference with such contracts would impair the ob-ligations thereof and deprive petitioners of their property without due process of law. Even as to this point we are unable to concur in their contention. Pursuant to its police power, the state, through its legislature, bestowed upon the Pub-lic Service Commission in § 5, chap. 150, Code (§ 640), power to "change any intrastate rate, charge or toll which is unjust or unreason-able and may prescribe such rate, fare, charge or toll as would be just and reasonable, and change or pro-hibit any practice, device or method of service in order to prevent undue discrimination or favoritism as be-tween persons, localities or classes of freight."

In addition, § 22 (Code Supp. 1918, § 656a) empowers the Com-mission to "enforce, originate, es-tablish, modify, change, adjust and promulgate tariffs, rates, joint rates, tolls and schedules for all pub-lic service corporations, . . . and whenever the Commission shall, aft-er hearing, find any existing rates, tolls, . . . unjust, unreasonable, insufficient or unjustly discrimina-tory or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, the Commission shall by an order fix rea-sonable rates . . . to be followed in the future in lieu of those found to be unjust, unreasonable, insuf-ficient. . . ." (Italics ours.)

Clearly these sections bestow up-on the Commission authority to change rates that are unjust, unrea-sonable, or insufficient, as it has found these rates to be, unless bound by the contracts previously entered into between applicant and protestants.

If the point were not so seriously pressed, it would be thought un-necessary to enter into any extended discussion of the question. In Manigault v. Springs, 199 U.S. 478, 480, 50 L. ed. 274, 278, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 127, the court said: "It is the settled law of this court that the interdiction of statutes impairing the obligation of contracts does not prevent the state from exercising such powers as are vested in it for the promotion of the common weal, or are necessary for the general good of the public, though contracts previously entered into between individuals may thereby be affected. This power, which in its various ramifications is known as the police power, is an exercise of the sovereign right of the government to protect the lives, health, morals, comfort, and general welfare of the people, and is paramount to any rights under contracts between individuals."

In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Tranbarger, 238 U. S. 67, 76, 77, 59 L. ed. 1204, 1210, 1211, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 682, it is said: "It is established by repeated decisions of this court that neither of these provisions [the contract and due process clauses] of the Federal Constitution has the effect of overriding the power of the state to establish all regulations reasonably necessary to secure the health, safety, or general welfare of the community; that this power can neither be abdicated nor bargained away, and is inalienable even by express grant; and that all contract and property rights are held subject to its fair exercise. . . . And it is also settled that the police power embraces regulations designed to promote the public convenience or the general welfare and prosperity, as well as those in the interest of the public health, morals, or safety."

We have held in the case of Benwood v. Public Service Commission, 75 W. Va. 127, L.R.A.1915C, 261, 88 S. E. 295, that the rate-making power is an incident of the police power of the state, and may be exercised without impairing the obligation of contracts, or depriving of property without due process of law, within the meaning of the Federal and state Constitutions. Is it not proper that it be so? Surely it is in the interest of public convenience and of the general welfare that rates of public utilities be subject to regulation, both as a protection against extortionate charges and at the same time for the purpose of safeguarding to a utility so restricted a reasonable return upon its investment. It must, of course, be recognized that a peculiar sanctity inheres in contracts entered into between parties competent to contract, and that the obligations thereby imposed will not lightly be disturbed. But the same policy that forbids to a utility total freedom of action likewise limits the extent to which contracts with a utility will be recognized when the public need necessitates a partial or total annulment. The duty of the utility to subordinate its right of control over rates in the interest of the public welfare is balanced by a corresponding duty on the part of individuals contracting with such utility to subordinate their rights of contract to the same public welfare. The police power of the state is impartial between utility and contractors, requiring both to surrender rights for the general weal. The public need to preserve the utility in strong financial condition, in order that it may better serve, is frequently as important as the need to guard the public against extortion. The right of the utility to protection must not be permitted to grow dim, in the presence of that other and more popular right of exercising a control over its functions. Both subserve the same public purpose. From the findings of the Commission, showing the unfavorable financial condition of the power company, it is apparent that the public interest will be better served by permitting a fair return on the property valuation over and above ordinary expenses, than by requiring the company to serve without return, to the possible ruin of those who have invested therein, and to the discouragement of others from embarking upon similar enterprises.

A case quite analogous to this was recently decided in Union Dry Goods Co. v. Georgia Pub. Service Corp. 248 U. S. 372, 63 L. ed. 309, — A.L.R. —, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 117, affirming 145 Ga. 658, 89 S. E. 779. There the state of Georgia, through its Railroad Commission, fixed reasonable rates to be charged by a utility for supplying electricity to the inhabitants of a city, which superseded lower rates agreed upon in an existing time contract made previously between the company and a consumer. That result, however, was held to be a legitimate effect of a valid exercise of the police power, not impairing the obligation of contract or depriving the consumer of property without due process of law. See also Portland R. Light & P. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 229 U. S. 397, 412, 57 L. ed. 1248, 1258, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 820; United Fuel Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission, 73 W. Va. 571, 591, 80 S. E. 931; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, 81 W. Va. 457, L.R.A.1918D, 268, 94 S. E. 545; Raymond Lumber Co. v. Raymond Light & Water Co. 92 Wash. 330, L.R.A.1917C, 574, P.U.R.1916F, 437, 159 Pac. 133; note to Pinney & B. Co. v. Los Angeles Gas & E. Corp. L.R.A.1915C, 282.

But it is said the contracts in this case were entered into before the Public Service Commission Act was enacted, and, therefore, are on a different and higher plane than those of subsequent date. To adopt such a holding would be to permit private contracts to dispossess the state of a portion of its police power, where the statute enacted pursuant to that power was subsequent to such contracts. That would result in discrimination of the worst type, when the service rendered by a utility required law to be without discrimination. The Commission might authorize a rate which, according to its estimate, would yield a reasonable return, but those who were so fortunate as to possess contracts with the utility would be entirely without the scope of such order, and would pay for the service at a rate lower than is paid by those subject to the Commission's order. The resulting difference between the estimated and actual yield would necessarily be made up by a still higher rate to be paid by those not holding such contracts. In other words, the effect would be to recognize the contract action of individuals as of superior dignity to the police power of the state, a result tantamount to a denial of sovereignty in the state in the exercise of one of its most sacred and sovereign powers. Such an argument is untenable. Benwood v. Public Service Commission, supra, where the franchise agreement involved was entered into prior to the enactment of the Public Service Commission Act; Shrader v. Steubenville, E. L. & B. Valley Traction Co. — W. Va. —, P.U.R.1919D, 895, 99 S. E. 207; Yeatman v. Towers, 126 Md. 513, P.U.R.1915E, 811, 95 Atl. 158.

There is presented here no question involving the capacity of the state to contract away its right to the proper exercise of its police power, such as was presented in Interurban R. & Terminal Co. v. Public Utilities Commission, 98 Ohio St. 287, 120 N. E. 831, and Virginia-Western Power Co. v. Com. — Va. —, — A.L.R. —, P.U.R.1919E, 766, 99 S. E. 723. Nor is any such question raised as was before the Supreme Court of the United States in Columbus R. Power & Light Co. v. Columbus, 249 U. S. 399, 63 L. ed. 660, 6 A.L.R. 1648, P.U.R.1919D, 239, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 849, recently decided.

The last ground upon which protestants attack the order of the Commission is that the rates allowed are unreasonable. The Commission found as a fact that the fair value of the power company's investment as a rate base, upon which it was entitled to earn a reasonable return, as of September 30, 1918, was approximately $9,860,000. It further found that the company had not earned during any year of its history, a return sufficient to pay its fixed charges and to enable it to set aside a fund to cover accrued depreciation, and that the operations of the company since it commenced business had resulted, as of September 30, 1918, in a deficit something in excess of $1,000,000. Under the rates allowed by the Commission it is estimated that the company will be enabled "to pay its operating expenses, and in addition thereto earn a net return of approximately 8 per cent upon the value of its investment." There being evidence to support this finding, it will not be reviewed by this court. Norfolk &

For the reasons stated, we affirm the order of the Commission.

ANNOTATION.

State regulation of rates to consumers of gas or electricity transported across state lines for light or power purposes.

The present annotation is confined, in the main, to a treatment of the question of the right of a state to regulate the rates charged to consumers by companies transporting gas or electricity to or from such state, as distinguished from its right to exercise its police power or other sovereign rights over companies so engaged, with respect to the right so to import or export such commodities, and to regulate rates of transportation, etc. Illustration of the class of cases thus excluded is afforded by West v. Kansas Natural Gas Co. (1911) 221 U. S. 229, 55 L. ed. 716, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1193, 81 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564, which is cited in the reported case (MILL CREEK COAL & COKE Co. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION, ante, 1081), and which involved the question of the right of a state to forbid the exportation of natural gas.

It seems to be well settled that the transportation itself from one state to another of electricity (Washington Water Power Co. v. Montana Power Co. (Idaho) P.U.R.1916E, 144; Re Appalachian Power Co. (W. Va.) P.U.R.1916D, 286; MILL CREEK COAL & COKE Co. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 1081) and natural gas, when reduced to possession (Public Utilities Commission v. Landon (1919) 249 U. S. 236, 63 L. ed. 577, P.U.R.1919C, 834, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 268, decree modified on another point in (1919) 249 U. S. 590, 63 L. ed. 791, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 389; State ex rel. Casster v. Flannelly (1915) 96 Kan. 372, P.U.R.1916C, 810, 152 Pac. 22; West Virginia & M. Gas Co. v. Towers (1919) — Md. —, P.U.R.1919D, 332, 106 Atl. 265; Pennsylvania Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (1919) 225 N. Y. 397, P.U.R.1919C, 663, 122 N. E. 260 (judgment entered pursuant to mandate affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in [U. S. Adv. Ops. 1919-20, p. 306] — U. S. —, 64 L. ed. —, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. —); Traders & Labor Council v. Fayette County Gas Co. (Pa.) P.U.R.1918B, 165), is "commerce" between the states, within the meaning of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

And while a company transporting natural gas from one state to another may sell and deliver the gas so transported to local distributing companies, free from unreasonable interference by the state (Public Utilities Commission v. Landon (U. S.) supra), it has been held that the sale and delivery of gas to customers at burner tips, by local distributing companies operating under special franchises, and the payment of two thirds of the receipts to the gas company furnishing the same through interstate pipe lines, do not constitute any part of interstate commerce and the interstate operator cannot complain of state regulation of the local rates as confiscatory and unduly burdensome on interstate commerce, under the 14th Amendment, neither the operation of the local company under special franchise, nor the payment of a definite percentage of the product of their sales, being an integral part of the interstate business of the company furnishing the gas from another state (ibid., reversing on this point (1916) P.U.R.1917A, 120, 234 Fed. 152; (1917) P.U.R.1918A, 31, 242 Fed. 658; and (1917) 245 Fed. 950).

And it has been held that the fixing by the state where sold, of rates of sale for gas and electricity transported from another state, as distinguished from rates of transportation, is a matter which affects chiefly those in the community where it is sold, and that, so far as it is neither discriminatory nor confiscatory, it throws no burden upon the citizens of the producing state, and is not an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce. Washington Water Power Co. v. Montana Power Co. (Idaho) P.U.R.1916E, 144; Pennsylvania Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (1919) 225 N. Y. 397, P.U.R.1919C, 663, 122 N. E. 260; Traders & Labor Council v. Fayette County Gas Co. (Pa.) P.U.R.1918B, 165; MILL CREEK COAL & COKE CO. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 1081. In the Washington Water Power Co. Case, the Idaho Utilities Commission, in ruling that the interstate distribution of electricity transmitted from another state was not interstate commerce so that state regulation thereof was valid, at least in the absence of the actual taking of control by Congress, said: "The Commission assumes that such transmission of electrical energy is a transaction of interstate commerce, but it does not follow therefrom that the distribution of such energy within the state of Idaho is a transaction of interstate commerce, although the regulation of such distribution may affect interstate commerce. The electrical energy which, after having been delivered to the distributor, is being distributed in Idaho to the users, has ceased to be an article of trade between Montana and Idaho, regardless of whether the distributor is or is not the transmitter. The electrical energy purchased in Montana and transmitted in bulk into Idaho is a subject of interstate commerce while it retains that character. The act of breaking up this energy by its owner for the purpose of distribution is not commerce in and of itself, but the sale of the broken-up energy, or the resale of the energy in its original form, is commerce, and, if such sale or resale is wholly within the state of Idaho, it is not interstate commerce. In the absence of any discrimination against electrical energy generated in or transmitted from another state, and in the absence of any action by Congress indicating that Federal supervision has been assumed, this Commission cannot see how the impartial state regulation of the distribution of such energy within the state can be repugnant to the provisions of the Federal Constitution, as affecting interstate commerce in any essential or vital part, or as preventing or unreasonably burdening interstate commerce. The local distribution of electrical energy is peculiarly a subject of local concern, and is not a subject requiring uniformity of regulation as between states; and this Commission believes that the state has a right to enact reasonable laws governing such distribution within its borders, in the absence of Federal control. Whenever Congress shall act so as to place the matter under exclusive Federal control, the state, under the provisions of § 79 of the Public Utilities Act, at once surrenders its right to regulate. The Commission assumes that Congress has not so acted. To hold that electrical energy generated in Montana, or transmitted from Montana, can by reason of that fact be distributed in Idaho for compensation without regulation, while the local distribution of electrical energy generated in Idaho is subjected to regulation, would be contrary to public policy. . . . If a distributor of electrical energy could, by reason of having his generating station located without the state, without state regulation, enter a field located within the state of Idaho, adequately served by an electrical corporation having its entire plant located within the state of Idaho, and operating under a schedule of reasonable rates and under rules and regulations prescribed by the state, in competition with such electrical corporation, such unregulated distributor could, if possessed of sufficient financial resources, destroy the investment of the electrical corporation subject to state control, unless the state should give up the exercise of its right to regulate such electrical corporation, and thus open the field to unregulated and 'cutthroat' competition,—a condition which bitter experience has taught the people of Idaho is economically unsound, and not desired. If the state of Idaho cannot regulate the local distribution in Idaho carried on by the competitor, a portion of whose generating and transmission system happens to be located beyond the boundary line of the state, it would, in order to do justice to the competitor whose plant happens to be located wholly within the state, and in order not to hamper the development of the material resources of the state, be compelled to give up its right to regulate electrical corporations, which would operate to deprive the state of its right to so regulate under its police power in the interest of the welfare of its people." And in Pennsylvania Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (1919) 225 N. Y. 397, P.U.R.1919C, 663, 122 N. E. 260 (judgment entered pursuant to mandate affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in [U. S. Ads. Ops. 1919-20, p. 306] — U. S. —, 64 L. ed. —, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. —), the court of appeals affirmed (1918) 184 App. Div. 556, which held that, in the absence of congressional action, a state may regulate the price of natural gas imported from another state, and sold within its borders, and reversed (1918) 103 Misc. 37, P.U.R.1918D, 501, 169 N. Y. Supp. 820, where the court held that the state Commission had no power to regulate the rates in question because the sales made by the company constituted interstate commerce, in consequence of which regulation of the rates would be in the nature of a burden or restriction, even though no discrimination existed, and irrespective of whether or not Congress had legislated on the subject, and granted a writ of prohibition directed to the New York State Public Service Commission, second district, restraining the fixing of rates under a decision by it (Davis v. Pennsylvania Gas Co. (1917; N. Y. 2d Dist.) P.U.R.1917F, 611), to the effect that the fact that the natural gas in question was brought from Pennsylvania did not, in the absence of congressional action, deprive the Commission of jurisdiction to fix a proper rate to be charged therefor. The court of appeals again distinguished between state regulation of the price of gas transported from another state, and regulation of the rates of such transportation, saying: "We deal here with a different situation [from regulation of transportation rates]. There is here no regulation of transportation. . . . There is no regulation of a duty owing equally to two states. There is regulation of a duty owing to one of them alone. The seller of most things has the right to sell at whatever price he will. This petitioner has lost that right by the acceptance of a public franchise in consideration of a public service. . . . The service is due to the state from which the privilege proceeds. Until Congress shall intervene, it is, therefore, the police power of New York that controls the sale of gas to consumers in New York. There is no division of the power between New York and Pennsylvania. There is no more a division of power than when we regulate our fees for wharfage, or our tolls for artificial waterways. In these matters, protection of our own inhabitants is a duty that is ours and no one's else. The power may be displaced; but, until displaced, it is undivided. Here, then, is the decisive distinction between the regulation of the price of gas, and that of rates of transportation. There is no room for conflict of authority, for clashing regulations. The statute has a sphere of operation that is not national, but local. . . . It is idle to speak of the need of uniformity of action by states of equal competence when there is only one state whose action is involved. But even within the state, diversity rather than uniformity is exacted by the conditions of the business. Rates adequate in one city are inadequate in another. The local needs are best known to local agencies of government. No central authority, acting for the nation as a whole, will readily discern them. The case comes, then, to this: We have a sale of a single commodity. We have a pre-existing duty to sell it at fair rates. We have a transaction where conflicting regulations by the states are impossible, for the public duties regulated are fulfilled in one state only. We have a statute which declares a duty that would exist without it, and establishes a new agency of government to insure obedience. The silence of Congress cannot be interpreted as a declaration that public service corporations, serving the needs of the locality, may charge anything they please. . . . The local regulation stands until Congress occupies the field."

And the rule that the sale of imported natural gas is no part of interstate commerce, and, therefore, that such distribution is subject to state regulation, would seem to be especially applicable where the gas has lost its interstate character by being mingled with gas produced locally. For instance, in State ex rel. Caster v. Flannelly (1915) 96 Kan. 372, P.U.R. 1916C, 810, 152 Pac. 22, it was expressly held that it was no part of interstate commerce to sell natural gas to the consumers thereof in Kansas, where the gas sold was produced in both Kansas and Oklahoma, and that produced in Oklahoma, after being conveyed to Kansas, was so commingled in the pipe lines carrying the same, with the gas produced in Kansas, that it was impossible to separate or distinguish the two. In other words, the imported gas had become so mixed with the common mass of property in the state that it had, under the "original package" doctrine, become subject to state legislation. And a similar conclusion was reached in Manufacturers' Light & Heat Co. v. Ott (1914) 215 Fed. 940, where, in holding that a West Virginia regulation fixing a reasonable price to be charged by a gas company doing business in three states for the natural gas furnished by it to consumers in West Virginia, was not an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce, notwithstanding the fact that some of the gas came from other states, especially so long as Congress had not enacted any controlling legislation, Woods, Circuit Judge, said: "We are unable to agree that the fixing of the rates to be charged by complainants to their customers in West Virginia is an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce. The regulation of companies engaged in the transportation of gas is expressly excluded from the scope of the Interstate Commerce Statute. Neither the West Virginia statute, nor the orders of the Commission, purport to interfere in any manner with the transportation of natural gas from West Virginia to other states. Nothing is attempted except the regulation of the prices of natural gas to the citizens of West Virginia to be charged by corporations operating in West Virginia, under state authority. The action of these corporations in uniting their operations with those of like corporations of Ohio and Pennsylvania, in pumping gas into a common system of pipes supplying customers in the three states, may produce the result that some gas from Ohio and Pennsylvania comes into West Virginia, although it is undisputed that a much larger quantity of gas goes out of West Virginia into Ohio and Pennsylvania than can possibly come in from these states. But this interflow of gas from one state to another, according to the pressure from the main gas pipes as common reservoirs, cannot affect the power of the state of West Virginia to make reasonable regulations as to rates for gas furnished to its own citizens. . . . It is not necessary to decide whether the Congress may not regulate charges for natural gas under such conditions, and under the well-known rule the court should not anticipate that question. In the present state of the law, the Congress having taken no action, it was clearly within the power of the state legislature to provide for the protection of its own citizens against excessive charges. If it be assumed that interstate commerce will be incidentally affected, yet the regulation of the local charges of a natural gas company as a public service corporation is within the police power of the state until the Congress sees fit to act." And see to the same effect, Traders & Labor Council v. Fayette County Gas Co. (Pa.) P.U.R.1918B, 165, which involved the question of the right of a state to regulate the rates charged for gas, a part of which was imported from another state. However, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the interstate commerce, arising from the transporting of natural gas procured in one state, to another state for sale, is not affected by the fact that a small amount of domestic natural gas is inseparably mingled with it in the latter state, and, consequently, that the transporting company can complain of a confiscatory rate therefor fixed by a state Commission, as violative of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Landon v. Public Utilities Commission (1916) P.U.R.1917A, 120, 234 Fed. 152; Landon v. Public Utilities Commission (1917) P.U.R.1918A, 31, 242 Fed. 658, both of which were reversed on other grounds in (1919) 249 U. S. 236, 63 L. ed. 577, P.U.R. 1919C, 834, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 268, the decree in which was vacated and the judgment modified on another point in (1919) 249 U. S. 590, 63 L. ed. 791, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 389. Nor is the interstate character of the transportation affected by the fact that the gas is stored in the state to which it has been transported, where such storing is merely a necessary incident to its proper and efficient transportation. Landon v. Public Utilities Commission (1917) 245 Fed. 950, reversed on other grounds in (1919) 249 U. S. 236, 63 L. ed. 577, P.U.R.1919C, 834, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 268, the decree in which was vacated and the judgment modified on another point in (1919) 249 U. S. 590, 63 L. ed. 791, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 389. But the Maryland court of appeals, in applying the "original package" doctrine to the importing and selling of natural gas, has held that where the gas was transported under such pressure that it had to pass through regulators so as to reduce the pressure and permit domestic consumption, and pass through pipes in streets under permission from local authorities, as well as pipes owned by the ultimate consumer, such delivery constituted such a breaking of the original package as to make the service rates subject to state regulation. West Virginia & M. Gas Co. v. Towers (1919) — Md. —, P.U.R.1919D, 332, 106 Atl. 265. The court seems to have based its conclusion upon grounds somewhat at odds with the Landon Case. Among other things, it said: "In determining the question whether the gas here involved was sold by the defendant corporations in the original package or form in which it was transported into this state, we must consider the effect upon it when it leaves the main line of its travel and enters into the intermediate lines for sale and distribution, and whether, thereafter, it is national in its nature. It is admitted that at such time its pressure is reduced, and it is reduced because the pressure in the main pipe is too high for service to the consumers. At this point it is separated from the other gas in the main pipe and forced into the intermediate lines, from whence it cannot return to the main line, but remains in such intermediate pipe lines to be consumed when needed. Whether the gas is separated from the general bulk of gas and confined in the intermediate pipe lines, where it cannot return to the main pipe line, and where it must remain until consumed, or whether it is so separated and stored in tanks awaiting consumption, the effect is the same, in our opinion, in determining the question whether the original package has been broken and the gas mixed with the common mass of property in this state. There may be a constant movement of the molecules of the gas, but we do not see how this movement, because of the peculiar properties of the article, can affect the question to be determined. It also, before reaching the consumer, has to pass not only through pipes laid in the streets of the towns or villages, which is done under rights acquired from local authorities, but through pipes belonging to the owner of the premises upon which the gas is consumed. These facts all aid in characterizing the transaction as being of a local, and not of a national, nature. The gas when it leaves the main lines, where it is separated from the bulk of gas in such lines and forced into the intermediate lines and the pipes of the individual consumers, where it cannot return to the main line, and where it remains until used, is, we think, such a breaking of the original package as to remove it from interstate commerce and to make it subject to state legislation, and consequently a subject of regulation by the Public Service Commission of this state, in respect to the powers granted the Commission." It will also be remembered that this decision is criticized in the reported case (MILL CREEK COAL & COKE CO. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION, ante, 1081). And in Re Appalachian Power Co. (W. Va.) P.U.R.1919D, 286, the West Virginia Public Service Commission held that it had power—at least, in the absence of congressional action—to regulate the rates charged by an electric company for current generated outside of the state, brought into the state at a high voltage, and therein transformed to lower voltages and transmitted by local distributing lines to its several customers. It also appeared in this case that a relatively small part of the current was generated within the state, but this fact evidently did not in any way influence the decision.

And even assuming that the sale of imported electricity or natural gas is interstate commerce, it has been held that it is subject to reasonable state control until Congress acts. Manufacturers' Light & Heat Co. v. Ott (1914) 215 Fed. 940; Washington

Public Service Commission* (1919) 225 N. Y. 897, P.U.R.1919C, 663, 122 N. E. 260 (judgment entered pursuant to mandate affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in [U. S. Adv. Ops. 1919-20, p. 306] — U. S. —, 64 L. ed. —, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. —), affirming (1918) 184 App. Div. 556, P.U.R. 1919A, 372, 171 N. Y. Supp. 1028, which reversed (1918) 103 Misc. 37, P.U.R.1918D, 501, 169 N. Y. Supp. 820, as set out and quoted supra. See also Trades & Labor Council v. Fayette County Gas Commission (Pa.) P.U.R.1918B, 165. This is upon the theory that natural gas and electricity are characteristically and peculiarly local products, and that, being neither national in their nature nor admitting of one uniform system of regulation, they are not that kind of interstate commerce which requires exclusive legislation by Congress. See State ex rel. Caster v. Flannelly (1915) 96 Kan. 372, P.U.R.1916C, 810, 152 Pac. 22, supra.

In Washington Water Power Co. v. Montana Power Co. (Idaho) P.U.R. 1916E, 144, the Idaho Public Utilities Commission expressly ruled that the fact that the transmission into that state of electrical energy for distribution to the public, for compensation, is subject to regulation by it, does not impose a burden on interstate commerce, although, under the Idaho statutes, mining companies may import electricity for their own use without regulation by the Commission.

ERROR to the District Court for Lincoln County (Richardson, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in a suit to recover damages for alleged conspiracy to deprive plaintiffs of the benefit of a lease to them from defendants Harper. Affirmed.

Statement by Reynolds, J.:

This case arose out of the following facts: The defendants in the court below, Monroe Harper and Mary Harper, were the owners of 160 acres of land known as the Bar Circle Z ranch in Lincoln county. On September 13, 1913, said defendants executed a five-year lease to the plaintiffs, Thomas Keehn and William Keehn, and the plaintiffs went into possession thereunder and remained in possession until December 1, 1913, or April, 1914; the exact date not being material for the purposes of this case. Some time in February or March, 1914, the two defendants, the Harpers, sold the ranch in question to Harris, the plaintiff in error herein, and gave him a warranty deed dated April 9, 1914, under which he took possession about that time. On August 25, 1914, plaintiffs began suit against the three defendants, the two Harpers and Harris, alleging in their second amended complaint a conspiracy to deprive them of their possession and various acts of the defendants the Harpers, and further alleging that they were evicted by the defendants as the result of this conspiracy. The plaintiffs claimed damages from the said three defendants in the sum of $28,800.

The defendants the Harpers filed their answers; but, as neither of them joined in the writ of error sued out by the defendant Harris, it is not necessary to consider the case except as to the last-named defendant.

The demurrer of the defendant Harris to the second amended complaint was overruled, and the latter filed an amended answer which was in effect a general denial of the material allegations of the second amended complaint.

The case was tried without a jury, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs against the two defendants, Mary S. Harper and William Harris, for the sum of $2,000; the other defendant, Monroe Harper, having died prior to the rendition of the judgment.

At the request of the defendant Harris, the trial court found the facts as follows:

"(1) Said defendant requests the court to find as a matter of fact that the said defendant William R. Harris did not evict the plaintiffs from the premises covered by the lease involved.

"Answer: The court so finds in this case.

"(2) The defendant requests the court to find as a matter of fact that he, the said defendant, had no part and took no part in the acts of the defendants Harper, which the court has found amounted to an eviction of said plaintiffs.

"Answer: The court so finds in this case.

"(3) The said defendant requests the court to find as a matter of fact that, at the time this defendant took possession of said premises under the deed received by him of said Harpers, the plaintiffs had already abandoned said premises either by reason of the acts of said defendants Harper, or otherwise, and that this defendant took peaceable possession of said premises.

"Answer: The court so finds that the plaintiffs were not on the premises in question at the time the defendant Harris went into possession; that Harris took peaceable possession of the premises; and that the plaintiffs had not actually abandoned the premises, but were not thereon when the defendant Harris went into possession.

"(4) The said defendant requests the court to find as a matter of fact that at the time this defendant took possession of said premises he did not have actual notice of the lease existing between the plaintiffs and the defendants Harper, but had only such constructive notice of same as was imparted by the record of said lease in the office of the county clerk of Lincoln, New Mexico.

"Answer: The court finds that the defendant Harris had both actual and constructive notice of the lease in question in this case at the time he took possession of the premises in question; that the constructive notice was imparted by the record of said lease in the office of the county clerk at Carrizozo, Lincoln county, New Mexico."

From the judgment of the trial court the defendant, Harris, sued out a writ of error to this court and assigned six errors which may all be included in the general assignment, that the court erred in rendering judgment against the defendant, Harris, contrary to the findings of fact.

Mr. R. D. Bowers for plaintiff in error.

Mr. G. B. Barber, for defendants in error:

An averment that the acts were done in pursuance of a conspiracy does not change the nature of the action or add anything to its legal force and effect. If the plaintiff fail in the proof of a conspiracy or concerted design, he may yet recover damages against such of the defendants as are shown to be guilty of the tort without such agreement.

Raynolds, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As shown by the statement of facts, this is a suit to recover damages in tort against three defendants for conspiracy to deprive the plaintiffs of the benefit of a lease from the defendants Harper to the plaintiffs. The trial court found as a fact that the defendant Harris did not conspire with the other two defendants, nor did he take any part in what the court found to be an eviction of the plaintiffs by the Harpers. The court further found that the defendant Harris took possession of the premises, and that the plaintiffs were not on the premises when such possession was taken. Under this state of the findings by the court, the plaintiff in error, Harris, contends that the court below erred in finding against him. No specific findings of fact were asked by the defendants in error in the court below, and none were made by the court, except in a short written opinion in which the court "finds that the ranch property did not produce the income annually as claimed by the plaintiffs," and further he "finds the issues in favor of the plaintiffs and fixes the damages at $2,000, based upon the alfalfa crop, the apples, and the general crops grown on the place."

It will be noted that the court in the third finding found that the plaintiffs had not actually abandoned the premises, but were not thereon when the defendant went into possession, and in the fourth finding that the defendant Harris had actual and constructive notice of the lease from the Harpers to the plaintiffs at the time he took possession. It further appears from the transcript of the testimony that Harris admitted that the plaintiffs came upon the property and demanded possession from him on August 28, 1914, as is alleged in the plaintiffs' second amended complaint.

There also appears in plaintiffs' second amended complaint the allegation that the defendant Harris entered upon the plaintiffs' property without plaintiffs' consent. Counsel for defendants in error, plaintiffs below, argued in his brief that Harris became a joint tortfeasor together with the Harpers in evicting plaintiffs, and asks for an affirmance of the judgment below upon that ground. But the court specifically found that Harris did not conspire in the eviction of the plaintiffs by the Harpers, nor did he have anything to do with the acts which the court below held amounted to an eviction of the plaintiffs. The decision below cannot be sustained upon that ground. The action, as stated before, is an action in tort, and the decision below may be sustained upon the ground of the well-known principle of law that a tenant in possession has the right to such possession against the world during the continuance of his lease and may maintain an action for damages for the disturbance or deprivation of such possession. Jones, Land. & T. § 349; 24 Cyc. 1056; Decen. Dig. subject "Landlord and Tenant," § 132, and cases cited. That the defendants in error could have sued Harris in ejectment to regain possession and for damages does not deprive them of the right to sue in tort for interference with their possession. The plaintiffs below might have also waived the tort and sued the defendant Harris on the lease of his grantors, the Harpers, under the well-known principle that a covenant of quiet enjoyment runs with the land and binds the transferee of the reversion. Glidden v. Second Ave. Invest. Co. L.R.A.1915C, 220, and cases cited. The plaintiffs chose to sue in tort for the disturbance of their possession. The complaint contains allegations of entry by the defendant Harris without right and refusal to vacate. The trial court found that the plaintiffs had not abandoned the premises at the time Harris entered, and that Harris had actual and constructive notice of the outstanding lease, and awarded damages against Harris on the basis as stated in his written opinion of the value of the outstanding leasehold estate in the plaintiffs of which they were deprived. The proof in the case sustained these allegations in the complaint, and although the court found that the defendant Harris had no part in the conspiracy or wrongful acts of the defendants Harper, he nevertheless held the defendant Harris liable for his entry and retention of the plaintiffs' outstanding leasehold. The decision of the lower court is sustained by the evidence and the findings, and its decision is the correct legal conclusion from the facts so found.

The decision of the lower court is therefore affirmed and it is so ordered.

ANNOTATION.

Right of tenant to treat interference with his possession as an eviction and recover damages for loss of unexpired term.

I. Liability of third person, 1103.

II. Liability of landlord, 1104.

III. Measure of damage:

a. Actual damage:

1. In general, 1105.
2. Business property, 1106.
3. Tenancy at will, 1109.

b. Exemplary damages, 1106.

I. Liability of third person.

As a general rule, a third person who wrongfully interferes with or disturbs a tenant in the possession or enjoyment of leased premises is liable in tort, or in case action, for the injury resulting to the latter therefrom, and where such interference constitutes an eviction, actual or constructive, a tenant may abandon the premises and hold the wrongdoer for his damage, based upon his loss of the unexpired term.

In Daniel v. Perkins Logging Co. (Ga.) supra, the rule is stated that where an intruder illegally interferes with or evicts a tenant, the tenant can recover the rental value of the premises for the remainder of the term.

In Boston Elev. R. Co. v. Paul Boyton Co. (1914) 128 C. C. A. 338, 211 Fed. 812, certiorari denied in (1915) 238 U. S. 618, 59 L. ed. 1492, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418, after pointing out that a declaration in tort in an action against a third person to recover damage for the unlawful eviction of the plaintiff from leased premises is not to be regarded as based wholly on the injury to the plaintiff's possession involved in a direct, momentary, unlawful entry upon the premises, the court said: "Not merely the defendant's unlawful entry, but also its assumption and maintenance of possession, its eviction of the plaintiff thereby, and the subsequent continued exclusion of the plaintiff are complained of. For such an unlawful expulsion of the plaintiff from possession as tenant, followed by continued exclusion from such possession and resulting in consequential damage to the plaintiff, we see no reason to believe that an action on the case would not be a proper remedy; notwithstanding that on the same facts trespass q. c. f. might have been brought, or an action of contract upon the covenants in the lease. Instances are not wanting wherein such actions in tort for consequential damages, by tenant against landlord, and based upon unlawful eviction or exclusion during the term of the lease, have been sustained, without regard to the rules applying when the injury to be redressed is a mere momentary invasion of the plaintiff's possession and the action therefore strictly one of trespass q. c. f. . . . We find no controlling authority and no controlling reason in principle which obliges us to hold that unless it sues on the covenants in its lease, or first resorts to a real action for recovery of its possession, it is debarred from recovering indemnity for its loss of that right to use and occupy the premises during the remainder of the term, upon which it was entitled to rely. We find no conclusive reason why it may not treat the landlord's entry and subsequent occupation as having terminated the lease, and, if the termination was wrongful, obtain indemnity in an action of tort. We therefore overrule those exceptions which complain of refusals to instruct that the declaration stated no cause of action in case, that there could be no recovery in tort without proof of injury to the reversion and that there was no evidence of such injury. As will appear, other exceptions to instructions given or refused upon the subject of damages must be, for similar reasons, disposed of in the same manner."

In Catterlin v. Spinks (Ala.) supra, it is held that where a third person takes possession of the leased premises under circumstances that make him a trespasser, the lessee may elect to surrender the unexpired term to the trespasser and maintain assumpsit against him for the value of the use and occupation of the premises. In Bass v. West (Ga.) supra, an adjoining landowner was held liable to a tenant for loss to the latter, by being compelled to vacate the leased premises, due to excavations made by the former upon his land, which rendered unsafe the buildings occupied by the tenant. And in Snow v. Pulitzer (N.

Y.) supra, the facts were that a tenant of a suite of offices in a business block was compelled to vacate because of the act of the purchaser of the block in removing a stairway and an adjoining supporting wall. Under these circumstances the latter was held liable to the tenant for his eviction.

In Crane v. Patton (Ark.) supra, the lessee of land with the right to remove timber therefrom is held entitled to recover from a subsequent purchaser of the land his damage, where the latter prevented him from removing timber.

In American Ice Co. v. Pocono Spring Water Ice Co. (Fed.) supra, the action was against the lessor and third persons, and one of the items of damage it was sought to recover for was the loss of the value of the unexpired portion of the term. This claim was held to have been properly disallowed in the absence of any evidence of fraud on the part of the lessor. The court, however, pointed out that if any of the defendants were guilty of fraud the lessee had a remedy against them to recover damages based upon the fraud. In the instant case the action was to recover damages for breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment. Hence, the case as to the form of action is not within the scope of the note.

II. Liability of landlord.

It is to be observed that the question what amounts to a constructive eviction by the landlord is not within the scope of this note, except so far as it arises in connection with an attempt by the tenant to recover damages for loss of unexpired term.

It is also the rule that where a landlord interferes with the possession and enjoyment of the premises by his tenant, the latter may recover, in an action in tort or case, the loss resulting to him from such interference. And where the interference amounts to actual or constructive eviction of the tenant, he may abandon the premises and recover as his damage compensation for the loss resulting to him, based upon the unexpired term of the lease.

In Ashley v. Warner (Mass.) supra, it is held that where the landlord unlawfully evicts a tenant before the expiration of the latter's term, the tenant may recover, in a tort action, compensation for his loss, based upon the unexpired term.

In Elias v. Hammer (N. Y.) supra, it was held that the tenant may recover of the landlord damages based upon his eviction, on the ground that the landlord was a trespasser and a wrongdoer.

In New State Brewing Asso. v. Miller (Okla.) supra, the tenant was held entitled to recover damages from the landlord, based upon his constructive eviction from the leased premises.

In Brown v. Linn Woolen Co. (Me.) supra, the sublessee of premises was held entitled to recover damages from the landlord, in an action of trespass quare clausum based upon his unlawful eviction from the premises.

In Chapman v. Kirby (Ill.) supra, the landlord disconnected a steam pipe running from his boiler to premises of the tenant, which furnished power to the latter to conduct his business. And inasmuch as the operation of his business was dependent upon receiving this power, the tenant was held entitled to surrender the premises and recover damages as for an eviction.

In Allison v. Chandler (Mich.) supra, where the landlord tore the roof off of a store occupied by a tenant, the latter was held entitled to surrender the premises and recover damages based upon the unexpired term of the lease.

III. Measure of damage.

a. Actual damage.

1. In general.

In general the measure of damage recoverable by a tenant for his unlawful eviction from the leased premises is compensation for the loss resulting to him as a consequence thereof. The items to be taken into account in assessing the damage necessarily depend upon the character of the leasehold and the purpose for which it was used by the tenant. The object, however, is to compensate the tenant for his loss, without reference to the gain to the wrongdoer. Generally the loss to the tenant may be compensated for by basing the damage upon the rental value of the unexpired term. But this is not the limit of the recovery, for there may be included therein any special damage suffered by the tenant which is susceptible of proof and computation, and exemplary damages may also be assessed in proper cases. The cases hereinafter referred to illustrate the character of special damage which may be included.

In Zelig v. Blue Point Oyster Co. (1912) 61 Or. 541, 113 Pac. 852, 122 Pac. 756, the lessee was held entitled to recover damages for the unlawful use and occupation by the defendant of the leased premises, to be based upon the rental value of the property for the period it was occupied by the defendant, apparently the unexpired term.

In Behrens v. Mountz (1908) 37 Pa. Super. Ct. 326, where a third person evicted a tenant from leased premises, the court said that the damages were not to be measured "by the benefits accruing to the defendant, but by the injuries sustained by the plaintiffs. If there were upon the land from which the plaintiffs were evicted fruits and vegetables which were about to ripen, and crops which were matured or were about to mature, and which did ripen and mature prior to September 21, 1901, when the title passed to the defendant, and if the plaintiffs were by the eviction deprived of the opportunity to gather those fruits and crops, then they were in this action entitled to recover the value thereof. If there were sweet corn, beans, and other vegetables growing in the garden, which were ready for present use or which the evidence established would have been ready for use prior to the time defendant actually acquired title to the land, the plaintiffs were entitled to compensation for the loss of such vegetables. If the furniture of the plaintiffs were thrown out of the house while it was raining, or when the weather conditions were such that they ought to have foreseen that it was about to rain, and if it was actually injured by the rain, the defendant is just as responsible for that injury as if he had thrown the furniture into the water."

In Saine v. Hertzog (1916) 106 S. C. 501, 91 S. E. 859, no special damages were proven as a result of the plaintiff's eviction except that he was obliged to secure other quarters; nevertheless, on appeal the court sustained a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $1,000 actual damage, reduced by the trial court to $500.

In Crane v. Patton (1893) 57 Ark. 340, 21 S. W. 466, where the lessee of land, having the right to remove timber therefrom, was prevented by a third person from removing the timber, his damage was held to be what the timber would have been held to be worth less the expense of removing it.

While not strictly within the scope of the note, attention is called to Stebbins v. Demorest (1904) 138 Mich. 297, 101 N. W. 528, in which case a person who took possession of a portion of leased premises and sowed thereon a crop of grain and subsequently removed the crop was held liable in an action of tort by the tenant for the value of the grain he removed from the premises. And see Childers v. Verner (1879) 12 S. C. 1, in which it was held that the tenant was entitled to recover the value of a crop wrongfully removed from the leased premises by a third person. In Reeves v. Romines (1918) 182 Ark. 599, 201 S. W. 822, however, it was held that where the lessee of land for a share of the crop sued the landlord for damages for his unlawful eviction, the measure of recovery was the difference between the fair rental value of the leased premises for the unexpired term, and the amount the lessee was to pay, together with any special damage which might be alleged and proved, but not the loss of the profits which the tenant would have realized from the crop he would have raised. And where he based his sole right to recover on loss of profits, he was not entitled to recover even nominal damages.

In Hull v. Vaughan (1818) 6 Price, 157, 146 Eng. Reprint, 771, it is held that where the original vendor of an estate wrongfully evicted a subvendee from possession thereof, the latter was entitled to maintain an action for use and occupation, based upon the time during which the defendant held possession of the premises.

2. Business property.

As to the measure of damages for unlawful eviction from business property, it is said in Allison v. Chandler (1868) 11 Mich. 542, that "the evidence strongly tended to show an ouster of the plaintiff for the balance of the term by the defendant's act. This term was the property of the plaintiff; and, as proprietor, he was entitled to all the benefits he could derive from it. He could not by law be compelled to sell it for such sum as it might be worth to others; and, when tortiously taken from him against his will, he cannot justly be limited to such sum—or the difference between the rent he was paying and the fair rental value of the premises—if the premises were of much greater and peculiar value to him, on account of the business he had established in the store, and the resort of customers to that particular place, or the good will of the place, in his trade or business. His right to the full enjoyment of the use of the premises in any manner not forbidden by the lease was as clear as that to sell or dispose of it, and was as much his property as the term itself, and entitled to the same protection from the laws. He had used the premises as a jewelry store, and place of business for the repairing of watches, making gold pens, etc. This business must be broken up by the ouster, unless the plaintiff could obtain another fit place for it; and if the only place he could obtain was less fitted and less valuable to him for that purpose, then such business would be injured to the extent of this difference; and this would be the natural, direct, and immediate consequence of the injury. To confine the plaintiff to the difference between the rent paid and the fair rental value of the premises to others, for the balance of the term, would be but a mockery of justice. To test this, suppose the plaintiff is actually paying that full rental value, and has established a business upon the premises, the clear gains or profits of which have been an average of $1,000 per year; and he is ousted from the premises and this business entirely broken up for the balance of the time; can he be allowed to recover nothing but 6 cents damages for his loss? To ask such a question is to answer it. The rule which would confine the plaintiff to the difference between such rental value and the stipulated rent can rest only upon the assumption that the plaintiff might (as in case of personal property) go at once into the market and obtain another building equally well fitted for his business, and that for the same rent; and to justify such a rule of damages this assumption must be taken as a conclusive presumption of law. However such a presumption might be likely to accord with the fact in the city of New York, in most western cities and towns it would be so ob-

Upon this point, in Kostopelos v. Peszetti (1911) 207 Mass. 277, 98 N. E. 571, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 859, the court said that "the plaintiff's damages were not necessarily limited to the value of his leasehold interest. He had been ejected by force from premises of which he was rightfully in possession, and the business which he was there carrying on had been interrupted. He was entitled to such damages as directly resulted from the wrong done to him. He could show the nature and extent of his business and the extent to which it had necessarily been interrupted and the expense which he had been obliged to incur to re-establish his business in another shop; but he ought not to have been allowed to testify to the amount of his weekly profits for the time immediately preceding his eviction. Those profits may have been unusually large, or may have been affected by exceptional circumstances. There was nothing to indicate that they afforded a fair measure of the value of his business for the future."

In Chapman v. Kirby (1868) 49 Ill. 211, the landlord having committed acts which were held to entitle the tenant to regard the interference as an eviction, the court said that the "appellants, having committed a wrong, must be held liable for all losses that flow from it. And if the loss on these various articles was the necessary and proximate result of the act,—and of that the jury must judge from the evidence,—they must be held liable. It cannot be said that when the lease has been destroyed or rendered valueless, the buildings, machinery, and stock in trade have been depreciated, and a lucrative business destroyed by the wrongful act of another, the sufferer shall only receive nominal damages, or the mere damages equal only to the value of the lease over and above the rent. The person thus wronged is entitled to recover for all of the injury he has sustained.

"As to the estimate of losses sustained by the breaking up of his established business, there would seem to be no well-founded objection. We all know that in many, if not all, professions and callings, years of effort, skill, and toil are necessary to establish a profitable business, and that when established it is worth more than capital. Can it then be said that a party deprived of it has no remedy, and can recover nothing for its loss when produced by another? It has long been well-recognized law, that when deprived of such business by slander, compensation for its loss may be recovered in this form of action. And why not for its loss by this more direct means? And of what does this loss consist but the profits that would have been made had the act not been performed by appellants? And to measure such damages, the jury must have some basis for an estimate, and what more reasonable than to take the profits for a reasonable period next preceding the time when the injury was inflicted, leaving the other party to show that, by depression in trade or other causes, they would have been less? Nor can we expect that, in actions of this character, the precise extent of the damages can be shown by demonstration. But by this means they can be ascertained with a reasonable degree of certainty."

In Sanborn v. Marquette Bldg. Co. (1900) 86 Ill. App. 681, supra, a lessee of a portion of a block sued in case to recover damages of a third person for alleged interference with the plaintiff's possession of the leased premises, which amounted to an eviction. Among the items of damage it was sought to recover for was the loss occasioned by the expense of securing new stationery, of moving into new offices, a difference in rent he was compelled to pay between the two places, and also for a loss of profits to his business. It was held that the action should not be sustained upon the theory of a breach of covenant or upon any contractual ground whatever, but only upon the ground of an unwarranted interference with the possession of the plaintiff; and since there was no evidence of any act on the part of the lesser or a third person which could be construed as an interference with the possession of the plaintiff, it was proper for the trial court to direct a verdict in his favor. But such a direction was held to be error as to a subsequent lessee whose lease was made subsequent to the plaintiff's lease, and who so interfered with the plaintiff's possession as to constitute an eviction of the latter.

In Bass v. West (1900) 110 Ga. 698, 36 S. E. 244, the court said that "in case of a wrongful eviction of a lessee he can recover of the wrongdoer for the injury he has sustained. In such a case the general rule is that his measure of damages is the value of the premises for rent during the remainder of the term. If a person is wrongfully deprived of the use and occupancy of premises in which an established business is being carried on, he may recover damages for the injury done his business. He cannot, however, even in such a case, recover for loss of profits and the value of the good will of his business as such, but evidence as to these may be introduced to throw light on the value of his leasehold estate. Where the amount of the profits lost and the value of the good will of the business can be ascertained with a reasonable degree of certainty, they should be allowed in estimating the value of the lease for the purpose for which it was being used. In cases, however, where these elements are merely speculative and conjectural and cannot be ascertained with reasonable certainty, no allowance should be made therefor. This does not mean that the amounts of these elements of damage should necessarily be reduced to an exact calculation before a recovery could be had, but there must be sufficient data to enable a jury with a reasonable degree of certainty and exactness to ascertain the loss."

In Risdon v. Hotel Savoy Co. (1918) 99 Wash. 616, 170 Pac. 146, the measure of damages recoverable by a tenant was held to be the value of the use of the leased premises for the operation of his business for the unexpired term, including such items as property lost or destroyed, unearned rent, loss of customers and business profits, and loss of good will.

A tenant at sufferance merely, who is ejected from the leased premises, cannot recover for the loss of profits which would have accrued from continuance by him in possession of the premises. Clark v. Groger (1918) 102 Wash. 188, 172 Pac. 1164.

In New State Brewing Assn. v. Miller (1914) 43 Okla. 183, 141 Pac. 1175, where a tenant was constructively evicted by the landlord from leased premises upon which the tenant operated a business, it was held that in considering the damage of the latter, his loss of profits was to be taken into consideration.

In Snow v. Pulitzer (1894) 142 N. Y. 263, 36 N. E. 1059, where a tenant of a suite of offices in a business block was evicted by the act of the purchaser of the block in removing a stairway and an adjoining supporting wall, the tenant was held entitled to recover as his damage compensation for his loss, including the expenditures he made in fitting up the leased premises for his business, damage to and depreciation of the stock kept in the building, and loss of profits for the time intervening between the eviction and the termination of the lease.

3. Tenancy at will.

It has been held that ordinarily the measure of damage is based upon the difference in the market value of the term before and after the trespass, but where the tenancy is at will or for any other reason it has no market value, actual damages must be determined by the jury in the light of relevant facts and circumstances. Daniel v. Perkins Logging Co. (1911) 9 Ga. App. 842, 72 S. E. 438, supra. Where the tenancy is at will, the actual damages recoverable are merely nominal, although exemplary damages are also recoverable. Strauel v. Lubeley (1914) 186 Mo. App. 638, 172 S. W. 434.

b. Exemplary damages.

In Strauel v. Lubeley (1914) 186 Mo. App. 638, 172 S. W. 434, a landlord is held liable for actual or punitive damages for the unlawful eviction of a tenant; and where the tenancy was for no definite term, the measure of recovery for actual damages will be merely nominal.

In Walterscheid v. Crupper (1909) 79 Kan. 27, 100 Pac. 623, where a subsequent purchaser of the leased premises, in order to evict a tenant, unlawfully tore the roof off of the house occupied by the tenant, it was held that the damage recoverable by the tenant might include exemplary and also all actual damages suffered. The items of damage allowed do not appear other than that the tenant and his wife were exposed to the elements by the act of the defendant, and at the time the wife was confined to her bed; and it does not appear that any actual damage was based upon the loss of the balance of the term by the tenant.

In Williams v. Yoe (1900) 22 Tex. Civ. App. 446, 54 S. W. 614, the landlord was held liable for actual and exemplary damages for illegally and wrongfully fastening the doors of a building occupied by the tenant, thereby preventing the latter from entering the same. A. G. S.

v.
E. P. STRICKLAND.

Witness — extent of cross-examination — formal point.

1. Where a witness is voluntarily called by a party and examined, even though to a formal point only, the court cannot restrict the right of cross-examination of the witness to the formal point upon which the party has examined him; but the opposite party has the right to cross-examine the witness as to all points in the case.

(a) Nevertheless, where the trial judge requires a party to call a witness on whom the party has caused a subpoena duces tecum to be served, and at the time announces that the examination will be restricted to the sole question of the witness's ability to produce the original document called for by the subpoena, and the examination is limited to that question alone, it is not error to refuse to allow the opposite party to cross-examine the witness generally on the merits of the case.

(b) Nor is it error requiring a new trial to permit the witness to be examined, in the presence of the court, but in the absence of the jury, on the sole question of his ability to produce the original of the document described in the subpoena.

Ejectment — new trial for mesne profits.

2. Where, in an ejectment case, the plaintiff recovers a verdict for the premises, with mesne profits, the trial judge may grant a new trial on the issue of mesne profits alone for errors of law, or if he disapproves the verdict on that issue, and the judgment being divisible, refuse a new trial on the issue of title, if that issue was adjudicated without error of law, and if the trial judge approves the verdict.

Evidence — forgery — burden of proof.

3. Where, on the trial of an ejectment case, a deed is attacked as a forgery, the burden is on the party asserting the affirmative of the issue to establish his contention by a preponderance of the testimony. He is not required to prove the forgery of the deed beyond a reasonable doubt.

New trial — refusal to charge on circumstantial evidence.

4. In the absence of a request, the failure of the judge on the trial of an ejectment case to give in charge to the jury the rule of circumstantial evidence as applicable to civil cases is not cause for a new trial, even though the evidence upon a single and controlling issue is entirely circumstantial.

[See 9 R. C. L. 919; 14 R. C. L. 726.]

Evidence — sufficiency.

5. The evidence authorized the verdict, and none of the assignments of error show cause for reversal of the judgment to which exception is taken in the main bill of exceptions.

Appeal — disturbing grant of new trial.

6. The judgment granting a new trial on the issue of mesne profits alone, assigned as error in the cross bill of exceptions, is within the rule that the first grant of a new trial will not be disturbed, unless the evidence demands the verdict rendered.

CROSS WRITS of error to the Superior Court for Calhoun County (Harrell, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain land, and for mesne profits; defendant excepting to so much of the judgment as denied his motion for new trial as to the recovery of the land; and plaintiff excepting to so much as granted a new trial on the issue of mesne profits. Affirmed.

Statement by Fish, Ch. J.:

Miss Eunice Price (now Mrs. Eunice Price Strickland) brought an action of ejectment against J. S. Cowart for the recovery of two lots of land and for mesne profits. The plaintiff relied for recovery upon a demise from herself as the sole heir at law of her father, J. N. Price. She contended: (1) That her father died in possession of the land. (2) That the defendant claimed under a chain of title which originated in Margaret Williams, running (a) from Margaret Williams to J. C. Price; (b) from J. C. Price to J. N. Price; (c) from J. N. Price back to J. C. Price; (d) from J. C. Price to J. L. Boynton; (e) from J. L. Boynton to the defendant. The plaintiff attacked the alleged deed from J. N. Price to J. C. Price as a forgery. The trial of the case resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for the premises in dispute, and for $1,960 mesne profits. The defendant filed a motion for new trial, which was subsequently amended. The court denied the motion "in so far as the recovery of the land is concerned," but granted the defendant a new trial "on the issue as to mesne profits," and "as to the issue of mesne profits only," for the following reasons, as set out in the order: "This judgment of the court granting a new trial on the issue of mesne profits is based solely on the ground that the plaintiff could not recover mesne profits, except for such time as the plaintiff might by evidence show that the defendant was in possession of the premises in dispute; and plaintiff having failed to show that defendant was at any time in possession of the premises, the recovery for mesne profits was without any evidence to support it."

To this judgment the defendant excepted, assigning error thereon in the main bill of exceptions. The plaintiff filed a cross bill of exceptions, in which she complains that the court erred in granting to the defendant a new trial on the issue of mesne profits.

Messrs. Pope & Bennet and B. W. Fortson, for defendant:

The rule permitting reviewing courts to limit the issues in granting a new trial would seem to be inapplicable in an ejectment suit, where the issues as to the recovery of the land and the recovery of mesne profits are so interwoven and dependent one upon the other.

Irwin v. Riley, 68 Ga. 605; Vance v. Gamble, 95 Ga. 730, 22 S. E. 576; James v. Steele, 147 Ga. 598, 95 S. E. 11.

The evidence did not show that plaintiff's ancestor, J. N. Price, died in possession of the land.

There is not even a presumption that Cowart claimed under J. N. Price, and even if there were, the presumption is rebutted.

McConnell v. Cherokee Min. Co. 114 Ga. 84, 39 S. E. 941.

The deed having been introduced as a duly registered deed, the mere fact of its registry proved prima facie its genuineness, and therefore the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to produce sufficient evidence to authorize a finding to the contrary.

Evidence tending to show that plaintiff's ancestor died in possession of the land in controversy was wholly hearsay and should have been ruled out.

It is the absolute duty of the trial judge to instruct the jury on the rules governing their deliberations under circumstantial evidence, and as to how strong it must be in order to authorize a verdict.

Andrews v. State, 145 Ga. 14, 88 S. E. 194.

Even if an affidavit of forgery had been filed attacking said deed, the issue as to the factum of the deed would be the only one to be tried; and certainly the plaintiff had no greater right where she did not dare to file the affidavit of forgery, but sought to make a general charge of forgery, without filing such affidavit.

Stall v. Cincinnati, 16 Ohio St. 169.

The fact that separate suits cannot be maintained for land and for mesne profits in no wise prevents the court from closing one of the issues, and resubmitting the other, according to the court's opinion that one was adjudicated without error, and the other with error.

Chicago Bldg. & Mfg. Co. v. Butler 139 Ga. 819, 78 S. E. 244.

Fish, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The plaintiff in error contends that the court may only grant an entire new trial, either of the cause or of a collateral issue (Code of Practice, § 6079); that the court cannot separate the case into two distinct issues, to be tried separately by the jury, especially in an action of ejectment, with a prayer for recovery of mesne profits, since a separate action cannot be maintained for the recovery of mesne profits. It is therefore insisted that the legal effect of the judgment of the trial court on the motion for new trial is either (1) to grant a new trial of the entire cause, or (2) to deny the motion entirely, on condition that the recovery for mesne profits be written off. The case of McCarthy v. Lazarus, 137 Ga. 282, 73 S. E. 493, was an action of ejectment, with a prayer for mesne profits. The trial court directed a verdict in behalf of the plaintiff for the premises in dispute and for mesne profits. The judgment was affirmed "as to the direction of a verdict for the recovery of the premises," but a new trial was ordered "on the sole question as to mesne profits, with direction that the issue as to mesne profits alone be submitted to a jury on another trial." It is true that the power of the supreme court to give direction depends on special statute (Code of Practice, § 6205), but it is also true that "where a judgment appealed from can be segregated, so that the correct portions can be separated from the erroneous, the court will not set aside the entire judgment, but only that portion which is erroneous." Chicago Bldg. & Mfg. Co. v. Butler, 139 Ga. 816(1), 819, 78 S. E. 246.

It is not to be assumed that in an ejectment suit this court would order a new trial "on the sole question as to mesne profits, with direction that the issue as to mesne profits alone be submitted to a jury on another trial," unless it were in the first instance permissible, in a proper case, for the trial court itself to so direct. Where, in an ejectment case, the issue as to title is adjudicated in favor of the plaintiff, and the trial court is of the opinion that the adjudication was without error of law, and is satisfied with the verdict, a new trial may be denied as to the issue of title, and a new trial granted on the issue of mesne profits, if the trial court is of the opinion that errors of law were committed upon the latter issue, or if he disapproves the verdict. Brooke v. Lowry Nat. Bank, 141 Ga. 493, 81 S. E. 223(5). The fact that the case is one of ejectment, with a prayer for mesne profits, is immaterial. While § 5576 of the Code of Practice declares: "No plaintiff in ejectment shall have and maintain a separate action in his behalf for the recovery of mesne profits which may have accrued to him from the premises in dispute," it is sufficient to say that in such case the action is not a separate one. In the practical administration of the law, an issue once adjudicated without error may remain closed, where the judgment is divisible, while at the same time the trial court has it within his power to grant a new trial upon a separate, distinct, and independent issue involved in the same case.

Ejectment—
new trial for mesne profits.

2. The plaintiff in the court below desired to put in evidence a certified copy of a deed from J. C. Price to J. N. Price, conveying the lands in controversy. She had duly served the defendant with a notice to produce the original. During the progress of the trial the plaintiff testified that she did not have the deed in her possession, power, custody, or control, and that she had made diligent search for it and had failed to find it. She then exhibited to the court an affidavit of B. Isler, administrator of the estate of J. N. Price, filed by him in response to a subpoena duces tecum, calling upon him to produce the original of said deed. The administrator in his affidavit averred that he did not have and had never had the original of said deed in his power, custody, or control, and therefore could not produce it. The plaintiff insisted that she be allowed to introduce the certified copy of the deed in question upon the showing made, whereupon the court directed and required the plaintiff's counsel to put the administrator upon the stand, with the statement that the examination would be confined to the question of his ability to produce the original deed. The witness was then examined by the plaintiff's counsel touching his possession of the deed in question, and testified in substance that he did not have the deed and that the same had never been in his possession, power, custody, or control. He was then fully examined by the defendant's counsel upon the same point, and the court ruled that the witness could not be cross-examined by the defendant's counsel upon other and separate and distinct issues in the case. However, the defendant was given the privilege to swear the witness in chief; and the witness was sworn and examined in behalf of the defendant after the plaintiff had closed her case. In the motion for new trial error is assigned on the ruling of the court in refusing to permit the defendant to cross-examine the witness generally upon the merits of the case, and also because the court permitted the examination of the witness on the question of his ability to produce the deed out of the presence of the jury.

The rule in this state is that "when a witness is called and examined, even to only a formal point, by one party, the other party has the right to cross-examine him as to all points." Aiken v. Cato, 23 Ga. 154; News Pub. Co. v. Butler, 95 Ga. 559, 22 S. E. 282.

The rule undoubtedly applies when the witness is voluntarily called by the party. In that event the court cannot restrict the right of cross-examination to the points upon which the party has examined the witness in chief. If, however, in response to a subpoena duces tecum, the court is not satisfied with the affidavit of the witness, but is yet unwilling to exclude the secondary evidence offered, and directs and requires counsel for the party by whom the witness was subpoenaed to call the witness in person and examine him orally in the presence of the court, we are of the opinion that it is not reversible error to refuse the right of cross-examination to the opposite party generally on the merits of the case. The plaintiff may have preferred to insist upon the introduction of the secondary evidence upon the showing made; and in this case it appears that the plaintiff did insist upon the sufficiency of such showing. It would be manifestly unfair to compel counsel to call a witness, or to compel him to examine a witness called by the direction of the court, upon the sole question of the ability of the witness to produce an original document, with the right to the opposite party to cross-examine the witness on the merits of the case. If error at all, it was certainly not reversible error to permit the witness to be examined, out of the presence of the jury, on the sole question of his ability to produce the deed described in the subpoena duces tecum. See Code of Practice, § 5759; Powell, Actions for Land, 241, 242, § 198.

3. The vital issue in the case was whether the deed from J. N. Price to J. C. Price was a forgery. The plaintiff did not file an affidavit of forgery. She relied entirely upon circumstantial evidence to establish her contention that the deed was a forgery. The court in effect instructed the jury that the plaintiff had the burden of showing, by a preponderance of evidence, that the deed from J. N. Price to J. C. Price was a forgery. The plaintiff in error contends that the court should have charged that the forgery of the deed must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The case of Williams v. Gunnels, 66 Ga. 521, is cited in support of this contention. It was there said that to support a plea of justification, in a suit for slander on account of words imputing a crime, "the same degree of evidence is required as would be necessary to convict the plaintiff on a criminal prosecution for the offense." But see Atlanta Journal v. Mayson, 92 Ga. 640, 44 Am. St. Rep. 104, 18 S. E. 1010, where it was ruled that the question was neither directly made nor decided in Williams v. Gunnels, supra.

Evidence—
burden of proof.

Where, in an ejectment suit, a deed is attacked as a forgery, the burden is upon the party asserting the affirmative of the issue to establish his contention by a preponderance of the testimony. The case falls within the rule announced in § 5730 of the Code of Practice, as follows: "Moral and reasonable certainty is all that can be expected in legal investigation. In all civil cases the preponderance of testimony is considered sufficient to produce mental conviction."

4. It is also insisted that the court erred in failing to charge, without request, the rule of circumstantial evidence as applicable to a civil case. We cannot agree with this contention.

New trial—refusal to charge on circumstantial

out a request to so charge. The rule announced by this court in criminal cases has no application to the issue of forgery in a civil action. As a rule in criminal cases, it must have resulted, in part at least, from the positive requirement of § 1010 of the Penal Code, which is as follows: "To warrant a conviction on circumstantial evidence, the proved facts must not only be consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but must exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused."

5. In one ground of the motion for new trial error is assigned upon the following charge of the court to the jury: "Referring again to the question as to whether the deed referred to from J. N. Price to J. C. Price was a forgery, this involves a question of fraud; and I charge you in this connection that fraud may not be presumed, but, being subtle in its nature, slight circumstances may be sufficient to carry conviction of its existence."

It is insisted that this charge was inapplicable to the issues in the case, and misled and confused the jury. In Smith v. Stone, 127 Ga. 483, 56 S. E. 640 (3), it is held: "Upon the trial of the issue of forgery, . . . when a registered deed is offered in evidence, nothing is involved except the factum of the deed assailed; and when the uncontradicted evidence shows that the deed was executed, a finding that it was a forgery is unauthorized, notwithstanding there may be evidence tending to show that the grantee had, by his conduct and sayings, estopped himself from asserting title under the deed, as against certain persons."

We agree with counsel for the plaintiff in error that the charge was inapplicable to any issue in the case, but we cannot say that it either misled or confused the jury. The court clearly stated the issues to the jury, and instructed them that the burden was upon the plaintiff to show that the deed from J. N. Price to J. C. Price was in fact a forgery. In immediate connection with the excerpt to which exception is taken, the court charged as follows: "You would have no right to find for the plaintiff in this case unless you should, by the testimony or the circumstances, determine that the deed in question was never in fact executed by J. N. Price; but you may consider all the circumstances of the case in determining whether the deed was genuine or whether it was a forgery."

In view of the entire charge, considered in the light of the evidence in the record, we do not feel authorized to reverse the case upon this ground. The evidence authorized the jury to find that the plaintiff's intestate died in possession of the land in controversy, that the defendant claimed under the plaintiff's intestate, and that the deed from the plaintiff's intestate to J. C. Price was a forgery. None of the assignments of error upon the rulings of the court in admitting or rejecting evidence, in charging the jury, or in failing to charge, assigned as erroneous in the motion for new

6. The grant of the new trial on the issue of mesne profits, assigned as error in the cross bill of exceptions, is within the rule that the first grant of a new trial will not be disturbed, unless the evidence demands the verdict rendered, nor will the court undertake to make any ruling with respect to the reason assigned by the trial judge as the basis of his action, although the new trial be granted upon a special ground of the motion. Vam Giesen v. Queen Ins. Co. 182 Ga. 515, 64 S. E. 456, and cases cited; Ballenger v. Ballenger, 147 Ga. 351, 94 S. E. 237. It goes without saying that the verdict for $1,960 for mesne profits was not demanded, under the rule recognized in this state. See McCarthy v. Lazarus, 137 Ga. 282, 73 S. E. 498.

Judgment affirmed on both bills of exceptions.

I. Majority rule.

a. Rule stated.

Although there is a decided conflict of opinion, the great weight of authority is to the effect that where a witness is called to testify on a particular point, either by counsel or under order of court, the adverse party is restricted in the cross-examination of the witness to the point on which he testifies, and cannot question him in regard to other issues in the case.

"A party offering a witness stands sponsor for his credibility, and, stated generally, is bound by what he may say both on direct and cross examination. Being so bound, he has a right to call him for a particular purpose, and his adversary has no right to examine him generally, but is confined to the subject testified to by him in chief." Æolian Co. v. Standard Music Roll Co. (1910) 176 Fed. 311.

"When a witness is called to prove a single fact, the opposite party, under the guise of a cross-examination, cannot enter into a general examination of the witness, but the cross-examination must be confined to the examination in chief." Hurlbut v. Meeker (1882) 104 Ill. 541.

"When a witness is called for the special purpose of proving a signature, he cannot be cross-examined in regard to the case generally." Vanzant v. Bodcaw Lumber Co. (1911) 128 La. 923, 55 So. 577.

A party has no right to cross-examine a witness except as to facts and circumstances connected with the matters stated in his direct examination. If he wishes to examine him as to other matters, he must do so by making the witness his own, and calling him, as such, in the subsequent progress of the cause. Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson (1840) 14 Pet. (U. S.) 448, 10 L. ed. 585.

In Æolian Co. v. Standard Music Roll Co. (1910) 176 Fed. 811, a witness was called to prove the record of sales made by the complainant of an instrument called the Metrostyle, and a statement of the aggregate of sales tabulated therefrom. It was held that the scope of the cross-examination of the witness should be restricted to the particular subject of his examination in chief.

In Foster v. United States (1910) 101 C. C. A. 485, 178 Fed. 165, a prosecution for using the mails in furtherance of a scheme to defraud, an expert accountant was called by the government to testify as to the contents of certain books. On cross-examination, certain questions were put to the witness which were not related to the subject of the direct examination. It was held that the action of the trial court in excluding these questions was not erroneous.

In Ferry-Hallock Co. v. Orange Hat Box Co. (1910) 185 Fed. 816, reversed on other grounds in (1912) 115 C. C. A. 103, 195 Fed. 71, a suit for infringement of a patent, a witness was called as an expert for the complainant, and on his examination gave his opinion as to whether the complainant's exhibit embodied the invention referred to in the several claims of the patent in suit. It was held that although he might be fully cross-examined as to his fitness to testify as an expert, the cross-examination otherwise must be restricted to the particular purpose for which he was called.

In O'Connell v. Pennsylvania Co. (1902) 55 C. C. A. 488, 118 Fed. 991, an action was brought against the defendant company to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been received by the plaintiff through the negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff's counsel introduced a witness for the sole purpose of identifying the car from which the plaintiff fell. Upon cross-examination the defendant questioned the witness in regard to the condition of the car. In ruling on an assignment of error in the admission of this testimony, Lurton, Ch. J., said: "All this was objected to by the plaintiff in error as not legitimate cross-examination, but evidence in chief. It was, however, admitted, over objection, as proper cross-examination. This statement as to the condition of the step on the car examined by the witness was plainly evidence in chief. The witness should have been recalled if the defendant so desired, and thus made the witness of the defendant as to the condition of the step of the car he had identified by number and name as the car from which plaintiff fell."

In Mine & S. Supply Co. v. Parke & L. Co. (1901) 47 C. C. A. 84, 107 Fed. 881, a witness was called to prove that certain letters and statements constituting an account stated were in the handwriting of the defendant, and that the letters and statements offered in evidence were the originals. His examination in chief was confined strictly to these points. On cross-examination the defendant sought to examine the witness generally in reference to the business transactions between the parties. It was held on appeal that this evidence was properly excluded.

In Montgomery v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. (1899) 38 C. C. A. 557, 97 Fed. 913, a witness introduced to prove the mere formal parts of the plaintiff's case was cross-examined in respect to the subject-matter of defendant's set-off, touching which he had not been examined in chief. Holding this to be error, it was said: "The right of cross-examination in courts of the United States is limited to facts and circumstances connected with the matter testified to upon the original examination of the witness. If it is desired to examine the witness as to other matters, the proper practice is to call

In Seymour v. Malcolm McDonald Lumber Co. (1893) 7 C. C. A. 593, 16 U. S. App. 245, 58 Fed. 957, an action was brought against the defendant on an acceptance of a negotiable instrument. On the trial of the case the plaintiff called the defendant, who was examined as a witness merely to the fact that he signed the acceptance, and that certain notes, from the proceeds of which it was payable, were paid to him before suit was commenced. On cross-examination the defendant's counsel sought to elicit from this witness testimony to sustain his defense. It was held that this evidence was properly excluded.

Wills v. Russell (1879) 100 U. S. 621, 25 L. ed. 607, was an action brought against a former collector of customs to recover certain duties on importations, paid under protest. One of the plaintiffs was called to testify as to the payment of the duties, and the protest. The court then permitted this witness to be examined as to the contents of the protest, and on other matters entirely foreign to his examination in chief. It was held that the admission of this testimony was error.

In Duke v. Eminent Household, C. W. (1911) 97 Ark. 290, 133 S. W. 1023, the plaintiff, as beneficiary in a policy of life insurance issued by the defendant, brought suit to recover the amount of the policy. The defense was interposed that, at the time of the death of the insured, he was not in good standing, having failed to make payment of his dues as required by the contract. The plaintiff contended that the deceased was incapable, because of illness, of directing payment of a premium due March 10. Defendant called as a witness a physician, who testified that he attended the deceased in his last illness, and that his first visit was March 18th. The plaintiff then asked the witness what was the mental and physical condition of the deceased on that day. The court refused to allow the witness to answer. Wood, J., speaking for the supreme court, said: "The question was not responsive to the examination in chief. If appellant desired to show by Dr. Tapscott that the condition of R. T. Duke was such between the 1st and 10th of March as to render him mentally incapable of directing the payment of premiums, then she should have offered to make the doctor her witness, for that purpose. There was nothing in the question to indicate that the purpose of appellant was to show the mental incapacity of the assured between the 1st and 10th day of March to direct the payment of premiums."

In Yordi v. Yordi (1907) 6 Cal. App. 20, 91 Pac. 348, an action for specific conveyance, it was attempted to show that a deed executed by a wife to her husband was procured by undue influence. The notary who prepared the deed was called as a witness and testified simply to the fact that he was hired by the husband to prepare a deed similar to another deed shown him. Cross-examination by the defendants, seeking to bring out the conversation which occurred at the time between the husband and the notary, was held to be improper.

In the case of Goodno v. Hotchkiss (1914) 88 Conn. 655, 92 Atl. 419, a witness in a will contest was called merely to identify certain checks and receipts given for payment to herself and her brother of the amounts reserved to them in a mutual agreement. On cross-examination the witness was asked as to the intentions of the parties to the mutual agreement when they signed it. It was held that the action of the trial court in excluding the testimony was correct, since it was not germane to the examination in chief.

In Fred Miller Brewing Co. v. Jones (1914) 190 Ill. App. 169, it appeared that a witness's testimony on direct examination was limited solely to identification of signatures on a judgment note. It was held that cross-examination as to the duties of the witness was improper.

In Nagle v. Schnadt (1909) 239 Ill. 595, 88 N. E. 178, a claim was filed against an estate, based on a note alleged to have been signed by the deceased, and assigned by the payee to the plaintiff. The only question involved was the genuineness of the signature. The defendant introduced as a witness the testator's son, who testified that the signature was a forgery. It was held that he could not be cross-examined as to whether he was satisfied with his father's will, and whether he had previously had a dispute with the executor, since these questions were outside the scope of the direct examination, and were not proper to show interest or prejudice.

In Sheedy v. Chicago (1906) 221 Ill. 111, 77 N. E. 539, an appeal from a judgment confirming a sewer assessment, a witness was introduced by the defendant who testified solely to the value of plaintiff's property and the amount which the property would be benefited by the improvement. It was held that he could not be asked on cross-examination how much the city would be benefited by the improvement.

In East Dubuque v. Burhyte (1898) 173 Ill. 563, 50 N. E. 1077, an action against the defendant city to recover for an injury received, caused by the breaking of a board in a defective sidewalk, the plaintiff introduced a witness who testified solely to the fact that the walk was constructed of inferior material. It was held that the witness could not be cross-examined as to a point entirely outside of this issue.

In Stevens v. Brown (1883) 12 Ill. App. 619, an action for rent of certain premises, a defense was set up that the plaintiff erected a certain building on land adjacent to the building occupied by the defendant, and that the excavation made for the foundation of the building caused the wall of the building occupied by defendant to settle, thereby causing the plaster to fall and damage his goods; and that, by the erection of the building, light by which he was accustomed to do photographic printing was cut off. The defendant called a witness and proved by him merely that the lessor erected, or caused to be erected, the building. The plaintiff's counsel thereupon was allowed to cross-examine the witness on various points relating to the merits of the case. On appeal the court said: "The witness in this case, besides being asked some questions as to the execution of the lease, which are immaterial here, was examined in chief merely as to whether the defendant's lessor erected or caused to be erected the buildings of which the defendant complained. His cross-examination should, therefore, have been limited to that one fact. A conversation between the defendant and the lessor's agent, before the erection of one of said buildings, in which the defendant gave his consent to the erection of said building, was an entirely independent matter, and if the plaintiffs wished to examine the witness in relation to such conversation, they should have been compelled to recall him at a subsequent stage of the case, and make him their own witness."

In Hurlbut v. Meeker (1882) 104 Ill. 541, an action on a promissory note, a witness was produced simply to prove a handwriting, and the court confined the cross-examination to the examination in chief. It was held that this ruling was correct.

In Lloyd v. Thompson (1880) 5 Ill. App. 90, an action was brought for a balance due on an advertising contract. A witness was called to prove the fact that the defendant's card had been published in a newspaper according to agreement. The defendant was permitted to cross-examine the witness in regard to other facts connected with the merits of the case. It was held that this was error.

In Stafford v. Fargo (1864) 35 Ill. 481, an action on a promissory note, a witness was called by the defendant and examined solely as to when the note was indorsed by him, whether before or after suit was commenced thereon, and whether it was indorsed by him at the same time when another indorsed it. On cross-examination the witness was asked as to the payment of the note. To the contention that the cross-examination should be restricted to the particular point to which the witness testified, it was said: "It seems to be the well-recognized rule that when a witness is called by one party, the other has only the right to cross-examine upon the facts to which he testified in chief. If he can give evidence beneficial to the other party, he should call him at the proper time, and make him his own witness and examine him in chief, thereby giving the other party the benefit of a cross-examination on such evidence in chief. Otherwise, the party calling the witness would be deprived of a cross-examination as to evidence called out by the other side, and the party against whom the witness was first called would obtain the advantage of getting evidence under the latitude allowed in a cross-examination."

In Guilfoil Contracting Co. v. Clark (1912) — Ind. App. —, 99 N. E. 777, an action for wrongful death, a physician was called to testify as to the injuries of the plaintiff's intestate, as disclosed by his examination of her. It was held that he could not be asked on cross-examination as to statements made to him by plaintiff's intestate concerning the accident.

In Indianapolis & M. Rapid Transit Co. v. Walsh (1909) 45 Ind. App. 42, 90 N. E. 188, an action was instituted against the defendant company to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been received through the negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff introduced a witness, and in her examination in chief elicited from her only the fact that she observed the condition of the plaintiff's skirt immediately after the accident. It was held that as the witness's examination was confined strictly to this point, she could not be asked on cross-examination whether plaintiff then claimed she had been injured in the hip, and that she claimed this injury was due to the fact that she became tangled in her skirts, and fell.

In Collins v. Wells, F. & Co. Exp. (1908) 140 Iowa, 304, 118 N. W. 401, action was brought against the defendant to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, whose carriage collided with a wagon owned by the defendant and driven by its servant. The plaintiff introduced as a witness the defendant's driver, who testified only to the fact that the colliding wagon, which he drove, was owned by the defendant. It was held that the defendant's counsel should not have been permitted to cross-examine this witness on the merits of the case.

Wheeler v. Schilder (1918) 183 Iowa, 623, 167 N. W. 534, was a suit by a landlord against a tenant for violation of contract provisions in the lease, by which the tenant agreed to keep the land free from noxious weeds and grasses. A witness was called who testified solely as to the reduced value of the land after it became infected with cockleburrs. It was held that the witness could not be cross-examined as to whether the land was infected with cockleburrs.

In Re Barrett (1914) 167 Iowa, 218, 149 N. W. 247, a proceeding brought by an administrator for the discovery of assets, a witness who had made the affidavit of decess for the appointment of the administrator was called to testify merely to the fact that she had been unable to find certain drafts after the death of her father. It was held that she could not tell, on cross-examination, what she knew about her father's death.

In McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Jacobson (1889) 77 Iowa, 582, 42 N. W. 499, action was brought against the defendant on a promissory note. A witness for plaintiff, who signed the note as a witness to defendant's signature, was called simply to testify that he saw defendant sign the note. On cross-examination he was asked if he had, on the same day, any other transaction with the defendant. He replied to the question, relating a transaction which had occurred on that day. This evidence was held to have been properly stricken out.

In Pellersells v. Allen (1881) 56 Iowa, 717, 10 N. W. 261, an action was brought to recover specific personal property, which had been levied upon and taken into possession by a sheriff by virtue of an execution against the plaintiff, who claimed the property was exempt from execution. A witness was introduced by the plaintiff, who testified simply as to the value of the property. The defendant sought to prove on cross-examination that the plaintiff never claimed the property was exempt, but had waived the provision of the law in that respect. It was held that the ruling of the trial court in excluding this testimony was correct.

In Pratt v. Brockett (1878) 20 Kan. 201, an action was brought on a contract and guaranty, whereby it was agreed that the principal contractor should deliver to the plaintiff certain Texas cattle. The defendant contended that the plaintiff had agreed with the principal for an extension of the time for the delivery of the cattle, thereby releasing the surety from all obligation or liability. The plaintiff was introduced as a witness to testify solely to the fact that the cattle were never delivered, and to fix the value of the cattle. This was all of the evidence introduced in the case. It was held proper to refuse to permit defendant to prove by this witness, on cross-examination, that an agreement for extension of time had been made.

In Vanzant v. Bodcaw Lumber Co. (1911) 128 La. 923, 55 So. 577, a witness was introduced to prove the mark of an alleged grantor in a deed. The adverse party thereupon cross-examined the witness in regard to the whole case. The allowance of this cross-examination was held to be error.

In Consolidated Gas, E. L. & P. Co. v. State (1909) 109 Md. 186, 72 Atl. 651, an action to recover damages was brought by the state for the use of the widow and child of a deceased whose death was caused by coming in contact with an electric wire. A witness was called by the plaintiff and testified merely that, on hearing someone cry out, he ran to the place of the accident and saw the decedent fall. The defendant then attempted to prove by cross-examination of this witness that he saw that the insulation of the wires had been cut away. It was held that this was not proper cross-examination.

Borden v. Lynch (1906) 34 Mont. 503, 87 Pac. 609, was an action for damages for the conversion of certain personal property by the defendant, a constable. It appeared that the plaintiff held a note which was secured by a chattel mortgage on certain property, this mortgage being duly recorded. The defendant, under a writ of attachment in an action on another claim, seized the property and took it into his possession, neither paying nor tendering the amount of her note. The plaintiff was introduced as a witness, and was asked only as to whether she was the owner of the note and mortgage in question. It was held that she could not be asked on cross-examination for what consideration the note and mortgage had been given.

In Owens v. Omaha & C. B. Street R. Co. (1916) 99 Neb. 364, 156 N. W. 661, an action to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, it appeared that the plaintiff's intestate was struck and killed by the defendant's car, which, it was alleged, was negligently propelled backwards, striking the decedent, who was at the time crossing the street. A witness who was on the car at the time of the accident was introduced and testified merely to the movements of the car. It was held proper to refuse to allow the witness to be cross-examined generally as to the happening of the accident.

In Hurlbut v. Hall (1894) 39 Neb. 839, 58 N. W. 538, action was brought against the defendant on a promissory note. The plaintiff called the defendant as a witness, for the sole purpose of proving that the latter signed the note sued on. On cross-examination this witness was asked whether there had been any alteration made in the note since he signed it. Objection was taken to this question and on appeal the court said: "The plaintiff called the defendant to the stand for the single purpose of having him identify his signature to the note; and while the testimony sought to be elicited on cross-examination by the question objected to tended to establish the defendant's plea that the instrument had been materially altered after the execution thereof, the question was not proper to be put to the witness on his cross-examination,

In Brown v. Nevins (1913) 84 N. J. L. 215, 86 Atl. 988, an action was brought against the defendant for a breach of warranty of a roof, the plaintiff seeking to recover the outlays necessarily incurred by him in repairing the roof, and the damages sustained by him. Upon trial of the case a witness was introduced who testified merely as to the condition in which he found the roof. The defendant thereupon sought to cross-examine him as to whether he knew the usage in the roofing trade as to slag guaranties. It was held that the cross-examination was properly ruled out.

In Blumquist v. Snare & T. Co. (1909) 185 App. Div. 709, 119 N. Y. Supp. 728, affirmed in (1911) 200 N. Y. 595, 94 N. E. 1092, an action to recover for the death of an employee of the defendant, caused by the capsizing, because of alleged unseaworthiness, of a floating pile driver which was chartered by the defendant, a witness was called by the plaintiff solely to prove the hiring of the pile driver. It was held that, as the witness was sworn only to prove this one fact, it was improper for the defendant to cross-examine him as to the seaworthiness of the pile driver.

In Union Bank v. Mott (1863) 89 Barb. (N. Y.) 180, an action to recover the amount of alleged overdrafts, a witness was called to produce a written dissolution of partnership. He denied having it and denied its existence, and was then cross-examined as to the facts concerning the dissolution. It was held that it was error to permit this examination.

But in Varick v. Jackson (1828) 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 166, 19 Am. Dec. 571, a party directly interested as to the outcome of plaintiff's case was called by the defendant to testify to a particular fact. It was held that he might be examined generally by the plaintiff's counsel.

So, in Jackson ex dem. Lowell v. Parkhurst (1830) 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 360, a witness was examined with relation to the loss of a certain deed. It was held that since the witness was generally sworn, he might be cross-examined generally as to the other points in the case. The court held, however, that it would be otherwise if the loss or destruction of an instrument was sought to be proved by a party to the record, since such a witness is sworn specially, and his cross-examination must be limited to the particular point involved in the direct examination.

In Benson v. Johnson (1917) 85 Or. 677, 165 Pac. 1001, the plaintiff, a trustee in bankruptcy, brought an action in replevin to recover possession of certain personal property said to have been owned by the bankrupts prior to plaintiff's election as trustee. The defendant took the stand as a witness and testified only to a sale between himself and the bankrupts. The plaintiff then sought to cross-examine him as to his compliance with the Bulk Sales Law. It was held that this was not a proper subject of cross-examination. The court said: "Having testified only to a sale between himself and Smith, the witness could not be cross-examined as to all the elements going to make up such a transaction. The circumstances of the sale, the payment of consideration, the time when and the place where, might be developed on cross-examination, because these are essential elements of, and necessarily connected with, what the witness asserted was a sale. Whether or not the same was void as to other persons at their election is an entirely different matter and is not a subject of cross-examination."

In Brown v. Marmaduke (1915) 248 Pa. 247, 93 Atl. 1021, an action of assumpsit on a note under seal, witnesses were called simply to testify that the maker's signature was genuine. The defendant's counsel offered to show by these witnesses that the note bore evidence of an erasure. This testimony was excluded by the court, and the action of the court in so doing was sustained.

In Lesley v. Ewing (1914) 244 Pa. 480, 90 Atl. 797, an action was instituted by the maker of a check against a bank on whom the plaintiff drew the check to the order of a payee whose indorsement on the check had been forged. The payee was called as a witness for the plaintiff, and was asked the single question whether his indorsement was genuine. The court then permitted the defendant to ask this witness as to other irregularities by the forger, and also as to the forged indorsement of other checks which had passed through the hands of the forger. It was held on appeal that this testimony should have been excluded.

In Harter v. Whitebread (1909) 38 Pa. Super. Ct. 10, an action for slander, a witness was called for the sole purpose of contradicting a statement imputed to him by the plaintiff in her testimony. It was held that if the defendant desired to elicit from him his version of the entire conversation with the plaintiff, he should have been called in chief, testimony as to the entire conversation being without the scope of the question the witness was called to answer.

In Wolf v. Wolf (1893) 153 Pa. 621, 28 Atl. 164, an action of trespass quare clausum fregit for cutting timber, a witness was introduced to testify that he had made a draft of the land described in a certain deed. The adverse party then sought to cross-examine him as to whether the land in controversy was any part of the land described in the draft. The ruling of the trial court in refusing to allow the question was sustained.

In Re Sheriff's Election (1862) 1 Brewst. (Pa.) 67, a proceeding was instituted by electors, complaining of the undue election and false return of a candidate to the office of county sheriff. A witness was called simply to prove the hour in which he voted for the candidate. It was held that he could not be cross-examined as to his qualifications to vote.

In Tiley v. Moyers (1862) 43 Pa. 404, 4 Mor. Min. Rep. 320, an action to recover for coal, a commissioner was appointed by agreement between the parties, to report the quantity of coal mined by defendant. At the trial the commissioner was called as a witness for the sole purpose of identifying his report. It was held that he could not be cross-examined as to the basis on which the report was made.

In Mitchell v. Welch (1851) 17 Pa. 339, 55 Am. Dec. 557, an action by the indorsee of a bill of exchange against the acceptors, a witness was called by plaintiff to prove simply the fact that he indorsed the bill of exchange. It was held that the trial court did not err in refusing the defendants the liberty of cross-examining the witness as to matters which belonged entirely to a distinctive defense alleged by them in their special plea. See, to the same effect, Mitchell v. Cooper (1851) 17 Pa. 343.

In Buchanan v. Randall (1906) 21 S. D. 44, 109 N. W. 513, an action was instituted against a broker for conversion of a part of the purchase price paid to him for a piece of land. The question arose as to whether the sale was made to the purchasers by the broker's agent, or whether the broker sold to the agent, who, in turn, sold to the purchasers. One of the purchasers was introduced as a witness simply to testify as to what he paid for the property. On cross-examination the witness was asked if he purchased the property from the defendant. Objection to this question was sustained by the trial court, and this ruling was assigned as error. Haney, J., said: "It was not proper cross-examination, as the witness on his direct examination testified only concerning what he paid for the property."

In First Nat. Bank v. Smith (1895) 8 S. D. 101, 65 N. W. 439, an action on a promissory note, a witness was called simply to prove the signatures of the signers and indorsers of the note, no other questions having been propounded to him. It was held that the defendant's counsel was not entitled to cross-examine the witness as to the consideration received for the note.

In People v. Thiede (1895) 11 Utah, 241, 39 Pac. 837, affirmed in (1895) 159 U. S. 510, 40 L. ed. 237, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62, a prosecution for homicide, a witness for the prosecution testified that on the Sunday evening preceding the homicide the deceased came to her home, weeping. Cross-examination as to whether, on the following evening, defendant and his wife had not appeared friendly toward each other, was held to be improper.

In Seeley v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1914) 88 Vt. 178, 92 Atl. 28, an action for damages for personal injuries, a physician was called to testify to an examination which he made of the plaintiff shortly after the accident. The defendant then sought to cross-examine the physician in regard to a conversation which took place at the time of the examination, between the plaintiff and another physician who was present at the examination. It was held that the court properly excluded this question, as it was outside the direct examination.

In Taplin v. Marcy (1908) 81 Vt. 428, 71 Atl. 72, an action of assumpsit for logs sold and delivered, the plaintiff introduced in evidence the heading of a page in an account book, expressly limiting the evidence to a showing of the way the account was headed and the manner of making entries. It was held that the cross-examination should be confined to that issue, and questions could not be asked on cross-examination which called for an explanation of the items which appeared under the heading.

In Carpenter v. Willey (1893) 65 Vt. 168, 26 Atl. 488, an action for slander, a witness was introduced who testified merely to an attempt which was made by the adverse party to prevent the attendance of a witness. It was held that this witness could not be asked on cross-examination as to the plaintiff's reputation for chastity.

In Brace v. Northern P. R. Co. (1911) 63 Wash. 417, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1135, 115 Pac. 841, action was brought against the defendant for breach of contract, the plaintiff seeking to recover profits he would have realized in filling orders for menu card folders. The plaintiff called the defendant's superintendent as a witness, for the sole purpose of having him identify his signature to the order, and asked no further question. On cross-examination, the defendant, over plaintiff's objection, was permitted to show that a change had been made in the wording of the order. It was held, on appeal, that this was not proper cross-examination.

Richardson v. Spangle (1900) 22 Wash. 14, 60 Pac. 64, was an action for malicious prosecution. A justice of the peace was called as a witness by the plaintiff merely to identify certain papers and docket entries in a criminal proceeding instituted in his court. Testimony on cross-examination that the complaining witness therein asked for a writ of replevin, and instituted the criminal complaint on the suggestion of the justice, was held to have been improperly admitted.

But in Patchen v. Parke & L. Mach. Co. (1893) 6 Wash. 486, 33 Pac. 976, wherein it appeared that a witness was asked on direct examination only to identify a signature to a receipt, the receipt being offered for the purpose of showing payment in full of the plaintiffs' demand against the defendant, it was held that the trial court properly permitted the plaintiffs to cross-examine the witness as to the money he had received and paid out for and on their account.

II. Minority rule.

In a few jurisdictions it has been held that a witness called for the sole purpose of testifying to a particular or formal point becomes a witness as to all facts in issue, and may be fully cross-examined as to his knowledge of the merits of the entire case.

Canada. — Gilbert v. Campbell (1870) 13 N. B. 55.

If a witness is examined only on a single point, he may be cross-examined on every other point pertaining to the merits of the case. Dawson v. Callaway (1855) 18 Ga. 573.

In Aiken v. Cato (1857) 23 Ga. 154, it was held that if a witness is examined even to a formal point only, the other party has a right to cross-examine him as to all points.

In Ficken v. Atlanta (1902) 114 Ga. 970, 41 S. E. 58, an action against a city for injury to property, the plaintiff introduced a witness who was present under a subpoena duces tecum, and examined him only in reference to a deed in his possession. The court, over the objection of the plaintiff, then allowed the witness to testify, on cross-examination, as to the merits of the case. On the motion for a new trial this was complained of as error. The court, after citing Aiken v. Cato (Ga.) supra, held that there was no merit to this contention, and the witness could testify on cross-examination to the merits of the whole case.

In News Pub. Co. v. Butler (1894) 95 Ga. 559, 22 S. E. 282, a witness was sworn by both the plaintiff and the defendant, but neither party called him until rebuttal, when the plaintiff called him to rebut a certain point in the defendant's testimony, restricting him to that point only. It was held that the defendant might cross-examine the witness on every issue in the case.

In the reported case (COWART v. STRICKLAND, ante, 1110) the rule in Georgia is approved, but is held not to apply where a witness is called under order of court to testify to a formal point only, the reason for this exception being that it would be a manifest injustice to a party not wishing to call a witness, to have the witness submitted to a cross-examination on the entire case.

In O'Connell v. Dow (1903) 182 Mass. 541, 66 N. E. 788, an appeal from the probate of a will, it appeared that at the hearing before the probate court, a witness who was called to testify as an attesting witness to the will was allowed to be cross-examined on the entire case. To the contention that the ruling of the presiding judge was erroneous, Loring, J., said: "The general rule that a witness in this commonwealth can be cross-examined on the whole case is too well established to require discussion."

In Blackington v. Johnson (1878) 126 Mass. 21, the defendant introduced witnesses who testified as to one item in the declaration of set-off; the plaintiff was then allowed to cross-examine the witnesses as to all the items in the set-off. In sustaining the ruling it was said: "The admission of the questions put upon cross-examination was within the discretion of the presiding judge, and not a subject of exception. In the courts of this commonwealth, a witness, called by one party for any purpose, may be cross-examined by the other party upon the whole case."

In Beal v. Nichols (1854) 2 Gray (Mass.) 262, a witness was called solely to prove the execution of a written instrument. The court, commenting on the right to cross-examine, said: "It follows that the adverse party has the right to cross-examine the witness upon all matters material to the issue. Experience has shown that this rule is convenient and easy of application in practice, and works no disadvantage to the party who produces a witness. On the other hand, a different rule, by making it necessary for the court, during the examination of a witness, constantly to determine what is or is not new matter upon which the opposite party has the right to put leading questions, leads to confusion and delay in the progress of trials."

In Moody v. Rowell (1835) 17 Pick. (Mass.) 490, 28 Am. Dec. 317, a witness who was called for the defendant was examined as to the handwriting of a payee in a promissory note. On his cross-examination the plaintiff examined him as to the handwriting of defendant, and this was objected to by the defendant. It was held that where a witness is called to testify to a particular fact, he is a witness for all purposes, and may be fully cross-examined as to the whole case.

But in Swift v. Union Mut. Marine Ins. Co. (1877) 122 Mass. 577, an action on a policy of marine insurance, where the issue was as to whether the vessel insured was lost by a peril insured against or by inherent weakness, the plaintiff called a witness for the sole purpose of proving that the vessel was seaworthy when she left port, and waived the examination when the defendant admitted this fact. It was held that the defendant could not ask the witness, on cross-examination, how old the vessel was.

In Hemminger v. Western Assur. Co. (1893) 95 Mich. 355, 54 N. W. 949, it appeared that the plaintiff's assignors agreed to remove wreckage of certain boats which belonged to the defendant from Lake Huron, in consideration for which the defendant was to pay to plaintiff's assignors one half the amount realized from the sale of the wreckage. In a suit on the contract a witness was introduced who testified that he purchased the wreckage. It was held that the defendant's counsel should have been permitted to cross-examine the witness generally.

In Ireland v. Cincinnati, W. & M.

R. Co. (1890) 79 Mich. 163, 44 N. W. 426, an action against a railroad company for negligently burning plaintiffs' building, a witness was introduced to testify to a single point. Commenting on the right to cross-examine this witness, it was said: "The rule is well established that a witness may be cross-examined upon all points material to the issue, whether the party has called them out upon direct examination or not; and there was no error in permitting the facts to be elicited upon the cross-examination of plaintiffs' witnesses."

In People v. Barker (1896) 60 Mich. 277, 1 Am. St. Rep. 501, 27 N. W. 539, it was held that if a witness is sworn and gives some evidence, however formal the proof may be, he is to be considered a witness for all purposes, and may be fully cross-examined as to the merits of the entire case.

In Lichtenberg v. Mair (1880) 43 Mich. 387, 5 N. W. 455, an action on a negotiable instrument, the payee of the draft in suit testified as to certain conversation had with the drawee in which the latter stated that he had an unsettled account with the maker of the draft. It was held that he could be cross-examined as to the entire conversation.

Walter v. Hoeffner (1892) 51 Mo. App. 46, was an action for slander, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, upon trial of the case, introduced and questioned a witness only as to the matter of reputation. It was held error to refuse to allow the defendant to cross-examine the witness on other points in the case.

In Jones v. Roberts (1899) 37 Mo. App. 163, an attesting witness to a will was introduced by the proponents, for the purpose of proving the execution of the will and the sanity of the testatrix. Error was assigned on the ruling of the court in allowing this witness to be cross-examined on the issue of undue influence. In ruling on this question the court of appeals said: "We see no error in this ruling. Under our state practice, which, in this respect, follows the practice of the English courts, in contradistinction to the practice of the Federal courts, a witness who 'is sworn to give some evidence, however slight and unimportant, may be cross-examined in relation to all matters involved in the case."

Page v. Kankey (1840) 6 Mo. 433, was an action in assumpsit. At the trial of the case the plaintiff introduced a witness whom he examined as to the signature of certain letters which he wished to read to the jury. The defendant then proposed to cross-examine the witness in relation to other matters involved in the issue, but the court refused to permit the witness to be examined in relation to any point except the signature of the letters. On appeal it was held that this was error; that, however formal the proof may have been, the witness, on taking the stand, became a witness for all purposes connected with the trial of the issue. See, to the same effect, St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. v. Silver (1874) 56 Mo. 265.

In Brown v. Burrus (1848) 8 Mo. 26, it was held that if a witness is introduced to prove a single isolated fact, however formal or unimportant, he may be cross-examined in relation to all matters involved in the issue.

But in Posch v. Southern Electric R. Co. (1898) 76 Mo. App. 601, an action for personal injuries received by the plaintiff through the alleged negligence of the defendant, a witness was called who testified simply to the fact that he assisted the plaintiff to his feet after being thrown from the defendant's car. The trial court would not allow this witness to be cross-examined on any other fact in issue. The court held that this ruling was not erroneous.

In Hawkesworth v. Showler (1843) 12 Mees. & W. 45, 152 Eng. Reprint, 1105, Lord Abinger, C. B., said: "When once a witness is sworn, he is not sworn to answer particular questions, but to give evidence on all the matters in dispute between the parties."

In Rex v. Brooke (1819) 2 Starkie (Eng.) 472, 20 Revised Rep. 723, 11 Eng. Rul. Cas. 166, the attorney for the defendant, in the course of a prosecution for a misdemeanor, was called as a witness and sworn, and produced a copy of a declaration in an action brought by the defendant against the prosecutor, but he was not asked any questions by the party calling him. The adverse party insisted on his right to cross-examine him as a witness. The court was of opinion that the witness should be cross-examined, and the objection on the part of the attorney calling him was overruled.

In Morgan v. Bridges (1818) 2 Starkie, 314, 1 Barn. & Ald. 647, 106 Eng. Reprint, 298, it was held that if a party calls his adversary in the case, although for the purpose of formal proof only, he may be cross-examined as to the whole of the case.

But compare Ely v. Stewart (1740) 2 Atk. 44, 26 Eng. Reprint, 423, where the court said: "Where at law a witness is produced to a single point by the plaintiff or defendant, the adverse party may cross-examine, as to the same individual point, but not to any new matter; so in equity, if a great variety of facts and points arise, and a plaintiff examines only as to one, the defendant may cross-examine to the same point, but cannot make use of such witness to prove a different fact."

In Gilbert v. Campbell (1870) 13 N. B. 55, the attorney general was examined as a witness by consent, as to whether he had a certain deed in his possession. It was held that the defendant's counsel had a right to cross-examine him upon any fact in the cause, and not merely as to his possession of the deed,—the fact which he was called to prove. W. F. F.

OCEAN ACCIDENT & GUARANTEE CORPORATION, Limited, Respt.

(224 N. Y. 18, 120 N. E. 56.)

Insurance — accident — infected wound — voluntary act.

Death from inflammation of the brain caused by infection due to voluntarily puncturing a pimple on the lip is within a policy insuring against loss resulting from bodily injuries effected solely through accidental means.

(Crane, J., dissents.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for New York County, Part XIV., dismissing the complaint in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Harry B. Bradbury for appellant.

Mr. Frederick W. Catlin, with Mr. Robert H. Woody, for respondent:

The policy by its express terms does not insure against loss of life except when such loss results directly, independently, and exclusively of all other causes from bodily injury effected solely through accidental means.

Crandall v. Continental Casualty Co. 179 Ill. App. 330; Penn v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 158 N. C. 29, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 593, 73 S. E. 99, on rehearing in 160 N. C. 399, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 597, 76 S. E. 262; Laessig v. Travelers' Protective Assn. 169 Mo. 272, 69 S. W. 469; Keefer v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 201 Pa. 448, 88 Am. Y. 723, 53 N. E. 1123.

The spreading of the inflammation beyond the area of the lip appears to have taken place only after the incision made by Dr. Williamson, which was, of course, not an injury effected by accidental means.

Infection by a disease-producing germ that comes in contact with the body under such circumstances that it can and does develop a disease does not of itself constitute a bodily injury resulting from accidental means.

Bacon v. United States Mut. Acci. Assn. (Stedman v. United States Mut. Acci. Assn.) 123 N. Y. 304, 9 L.R.A. 617, 20 Am. St. Rep. 748, 25 N. E. 399.

Cardozo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's testator, John F. Bailey, held a policy of insurance issued by the defendant. It covered "loss or disability resulting directly, independently, and exclusively of all other causes from bodily injuries effected solely through accidental means." The question is whether injuries resulting in death were effected by accidental means within the meaning of the policy. The trial judge dismissed the complaint. The appellate division, two justices dissenting, affirmed.

On July 6, 1915, the insured had a pimple on his lip. A friend who lunched with him says that it looked like an ordinary pimple at that time. A day or so later it was larger and more inflamed. On July 10th the insured consulted a physician. The physician's testimony is that there was then a punctured wound in the lip, which had inflamed and infected the deep tissues. The lip was opened by the physician, and remedies were applied. They were of no avail. The infection spread through the cheek toward the eye. A week later, July 17th, the insured became paralyzed and blind. He died the next day. His death was due to inflammation of the brain produced by the germ known as the staphylococcus aureus. There is little doubt that the germ came from the infected pimple. If the infection was the result of accident, the defendant is liable.

We think there is testimony from which a jury might find that the pimple had been punctured by some instrument, and that the result of the puncture was an infection of the tissues. If that is what happened, there was an accident. We have held that infection resulting from the use of a hypodermic needle is caused by "accidental means." Bailey v. Interstate Casualty Co. 8 App. Div. 127, 40 N. Y. Supp. 513, id., 158 N. Y. 723, 53 N. E. 1123; Marchi v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 140 App. Div. 901, 125 N. Y. Supp. 1130, id., 205 N. Y. 606, 98 N. E. 1108. The same thing must be true of infection caused by the puncture of a pimple. Unexpected consequences have resulted from an act which seemed trivial and innocent in the doing. Of itself, the scratch or the puncture was harmless. Unexpectedly it drove destructive germs beneath the skin, and thereby became lethal. To the scientist who traces the origin of disease there may seem to be no accident in all this. "Probably it is true to say that in the strictest sense, and dealing with the region of physical nature, there is no such thing as an accident." Halsbury, Ltd. Ch., in Brintons v. Turvey [1905] A. C. 230, 233, 2 Ann. Cas. 137. But our point of view in fixing the meaning of this contract must not be that of the scientist. It must be that of the average man. Brintons v. Turvey, supra; Ismay v. Williamson [1908] A. C. 437, 440, 77 L. J. P. C. N. S. 107, 99 L. T. N. S. 595, 24 Times L. R. 881, 52 Sol. Jo. 713. Such a man would say that the dire result, so tragically out of proportion to its trivial cause, was something unforeseen, unexpected, extraordinary, an unlooked-for mishap, and so an accident. This test—the one that is applied in the common speech of men—is also the test to be applied by courts. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Barry, 131 U. S. 100, 33 L. ed. 60, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755; Lewis v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. (D. C.) 248 Fed. 602; Western Commercial Travelers Asso. v. Smith, 40 L.R.A. 653, 29 C. C. A. 223, 56 U. S. App. 393, 85 Fed. 401; Brintons v. Turvey and Ismay v. Williamson, supra; H. P. Hood & Sons v. Maryland Casualty Co. 206 Mass. 223, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1192, 138 Am. St. Rep. 379, 92 N. E. 329; Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. Portland Gas & Coke Co. L.R.A. 1916D, 1027, 144 C. C. A. 12, 229 Fed. 552; Omberg v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 101 Ky. 303, 72 Am. St. Rep. 413, 40 S. W. 909; Hiers v. Hull, 178 App. Div. 350, 352, 164 N. Y. Supp. 767; Bailey v. Interstate Casualty Co. supra.

The defendant argues that the puncture may not have caused the infection. But the plaintiff's experts say that in their opinion the entrance of the germs from the skin into the deeper tissues was the result of trauma. They say that trauma is almost invariably the cause of such infections. We find the signs of trauma here in the punctured wound which was visible when the physician was first consulted. The insured was an athlete in the prime of life and the fullness of health; the infection was not due, therefore, to lowered powers of resistance. The punctured wound is an adequate cause. The evidence suggests no other; at least, a jury might so find. Here, as elsewhere, the law contents itself with probabilities, and declines to wait for certainty before drawing its conclusions.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

ANNOTATION.

Insurance: death or injury resulting from insured's voluntary act as caused by accident or accidental means.

- I. Introductory, 1181.
- II. Losses arising from voluntarily puncturing skin, 1133.
- III. Losses resulting from exertion or exercise, 1136.
- IV. Losses resulting from taking poison, 1141.

I. Introductory.

It will be observed that this note deals only with the question whether death or injury resulting from the insured's voluntary act was caused by accident or accidental means, and it does not consider the effect of express provisions; such, for example, as those excluding liability in case of diseased condition, or liability in case of strain, etc.; nor does it go into the construction of the words "external" or "violent," as used in clauses providing for a recovery in case of death or injury resulting from "external, violent, and accidental means."

As to injury received by insured while assaulting another as an accident, see annotation to Meister v. General Acci. Fire & Life Assur. Corp. 4 A.L.R. 718.

It is generally held that death or injury does not result from accident or accidental means within the terms of an accident policy where it is the natural result of the insured's voluntary act, unaccompanied by anything unforeseen, except the death or injury.

A distinction is drawn in some cases between "accident" and "accidental means," on the theory that although the result of an intentional act may be an "accident," the act itself, that is the cause, where intended, is not an "accidental means." ## II. Losses arising from voluntarily puncturing skin.

It will be observed that in the reported case (LEWIS v. OCEAN ACCL. & GUARANTEE CORP. ante, 1129) it was decided that death resulting from infection due to the voluntary puncturing of a pimple was within the protection of a policy insuring against loss resulting from bodily injuries effected solely through accidental means.

Two other cases against different insurance companies grew out of the same state of facts and involved the same loss that was involved in the reported case. In Interstate Business Men's Acci. Asso. v. Lewis (1919) — C. C. A. —, 257 Fed. 241, the use by the deceased of his infected scarf pin to puncture a pimple, without knowledge that the pin was infected, was held an accidental means causing death within a provision insuring against death resulting directly and without intervening cause from injuries sustained solely by accidental means. The court here said: "Counsel for defendant further contends that, if the deceased selected a scarf pin in ignorance of its infected condition, to use in making a voluntary puncture of the skin, this fact would not make the means of death accidental. To sustain this proposition, a distinction is sought to be drawn between the intentional selection of an instrument in ignorance of some peculiar property which it possessed, and the inadvertent selection of an instrument known to be inappropriate. The last-named situation, it is admitted, might be an accidental means; but in inadvertently selecting an instrument known to be inappropriate there is no intention of selecting that instrument; neither was there, in the case at bar, any intention to select an infected instrument. Such refinement may be indulged in as a matter of intellectual pleasure, but in the practical adjustment of the rights of parties to an insurance contract it ought not to be given much weight. There is no evidence or finding that deceased knew as a fact that the scarf pin was infected, and we are not prepared to decide that the knowledge as to bacterial infection has been so widely diffused that the deceased was bound to know that fact. The stipulation of facts is silent upon the question; but as the trial court found in favor of the plaintiff it must have found that the deceased did not know, nor could he be presumed to know, of the presence of bacteria upon the pin. We are therefore of the opinion that the death of deceased was due to a bodily injury effected by external, violent, and accidental means."

The other case arising from this accident was Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. v. Lewis (1919) — C. C. A. —, 257 Fed. 552, where the court, relying on the conclusion in Interstate Business Men's Acci. Asso. v. Lewis (Fed.) supra, affirmed the district court's decision in (1918) 248 Fed. 602, that the insured died as a result of bodily injuries due to accidental means. The district court relative to the point under discussion said: "Were the 'means' in this case accidental? That is, 'unforeseen, involuntary, unexpected;' 'happening by chance; unexpectedly taking place; not according to the usual course of things.' If, 'in the act which precedes the injury, something unforeseen, unexpected, unusual, occurs, which produces the injury, then the injury has resulted through accidental means.' United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Barry (1889) 131 U. S. 100, 33 L. ed. 60, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755. Judge Sanborn well defines 'accidental means' in Western Commercial Travelers' Asso. v. Smith (1898) 40 L.R.A. 653, 29 C. C. A. 223, 85 Fed. 401, 56 U. S. App. 393, as follows: "The significance of this word 'accidental' is best perceived by a consideration of the relation of causes to their effects. The word is descriptive of means which produce effects which are not their natural and probable consequences. The natural consequence of means used is the consequence which ordinarily follows from their use,—the result which may be reasonably anticipated from their use, and which ought to be expected. The probable consequence of the use of given means is the consequence which is more likely to follow from their use than it is to fail to follow. An effect which is the natural and probable consequence of an act or course of action is not an accident nor is it produced by accidental means. It is either the result of actual design, or it falls under the maxim that every man must be held to intend the natural and probable consequence of his deeds. On the other hand, an effect which is not the natural or probable consequence of the means which produced it, an effect which does not ordinarily follow and cannot be reasonably anticipated from the use of these means, an effect which the actor did not intend to produce, and which he cannot be charged with the design of producing, under the maxim to which we have adverted, is produced by accidental means. It is produced by means which were neither designed nor calculated to cause it. Such an effect is not the result of design, cannot be reasonably anticipated, is unexpected, and is produced by an unusual combination of fortuitous circumstances; in other words, it is produced by accidental means.' In this case the facts are agreed upon. John F. Bailey, the insured, was a strong, vigorous man, in excellent health. He discovered a small pimple on the right side of his upper lip. He removed his gold scarf pin from his necktie and intentionally pricked the pimple with said scarf pin. His lip at said place became immediately infected with staphylococci infection from the scarf pin. The infection spread and caused his death in a few days. It is also agreed 'that the scarf pin used by insured in pricking his lip communicated or caused infection by being introduced into the tissues of the lip.' Therefore there can be no dispute in the case that the pin was infected; that it carried the cocci upon it. It is not a case of breaking the skin and having it afterwards infected, but it is specifically agreed 'that the infection was caused by, and came from, the scarf pin.' If it came from the scarf pin, it is apparent that the cocci were on the scarf pin. It cannot be assumed that the deceased knew that the cocci were upon the pin. There is no basis for the assumption that the deceased intentionally infected his lip. He did the act, which, as a matter of common knowledge, thousands do every year,—he used a pin which he had at hand to open a pimple. I suppose it would be safe to say, as a matter of common knowledge, that not once in a thousand times does such use of a pin, even when no effort to sterilize is made, result in infection. If the injury resulted from the pin alone, and there was no proof that the pin was infected, the accidental result would not be covered by this policy; but the deceased clearly used something which he did not intend to use. He used not only the pin, but he used an infected pin,—a poisoned pin. This infection was such that it could not, in the nature of things, be discovered by him without perhaps a microscopic investigation. To my mind the means were clearly accidental. A man who eats infected food, without knowledge of its infection, is doing something he did not intend to do. The eating of the food is voluntary, but the eating of the poison is not. The housewife goes to the flour bin, kneads her bread, bakes it, and serves it. Those who eat it die. It is found that the bin contains not only flour, but arsenic. The unfortunates voluntarily eat the bread, composed of flour and arsenic. The 'means,' causing death, are accidental. I see no distinction in principle between the case at bar and the numerous cases illustrated by ptomaine poisoning, and other cases of unintentional infection."

In Bailey v. Interstate Casualty Co. (1896) 8 App. Div. 127, 40 N. Y. Supp. 513, affirmed in (1899) 158 N. Y. 723, 53 N. E. 1123, it was held a question for the jury whether the insured's injuries were sustained through accidental means within a provision of an accident policy, there being evidence that the plaintiff, a physician, while on his way home in a road cart, to relieve exhaustion, injected morphia with a hypodermic needle, and that while he was so doing the horse started, and the needle might have gone deeper than was intended, and that the poisoning which followed was not due to the morphia injected but to the puncture by the needle or infection on the needle or skin. The court said: "The defendant says it was not an accident, because the plaintiff voluntarily inserted the needle. According to Webster an accident is an event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation; an event which proceeds from an unknown cause or is an unusual effect of a known cause, and therefore, not expected. In United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Barry (1889) 131 U. S. 100, 33 L. ed. 60, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755, the insured voluntarily jumped from a platform 4 or 5 feet high to the ground, and it was alleged that the jar from the jump produced a stricture of the duodenum, from the effects of which death ensued. The court, at page 121, says: 'It must be presumed, not only that the deceased intended to alight safely, but thought that he would. The jury were, on all the evidence, at liberty to say that it was an accident that he did not. The court properly instructed them that the jumping off the platform was the means by which the injury, if any was sustained, was caused; that the question was whether there was anything accidental, unforeseen, involuntary, unexpected, in the act of jumping from the time deceased left the platform until he alighted on the ground; that the term "accidental" was used in the policy in its ordinary, popular sense, as meaning "happening by chance; unexpectedly taking place; not according to the usual course of things, or not as expected;" that if a result is such as follows from ordinary means, voluntarily employed, in a not unusual or unexpected way, it cannot be called a result effected by accidental means, but that if, in the act which precedes the injury, something unforeseen, unexpected, unusual, occurs which produces the injury, then the injury has resulted through accidental means.' Within the rule laid down in the Barry Case, the jury might have found in this case that the injury resulted through accidental means." The Barry Case, above referred to, is set out in the subdivision following this.

In Townsend v. Commercial Travelers' Mut. Acci. Asso. (1919) 188 App. Div. 370, 177 N. Y. Supp. 68, however, a policy insuring against death from accidental means was held not to cover the insured's death, where it appeared that, being unable to sleep, he obtained a hypodermic needle which had been furnished by a doctor some years before to treat the insured's wife for cancer; that his daughter at his direction inserted the needle into his arm, resulting in blood poisoning, from which he died. The court stated that it would be an abuse of the word "accidental" to hold that it contemplated an act deliberately done by the insured, or at his direction, constituting a crime; that there was nothing accidental about the insured's having the needle in his possession in violation of statute, nor in the use which he directed to be made of it, and that the fact that he did not contemplate the result reached did not alter the character of the act; that the needle was unlawfully in his possession, was unlawfully used, and that there were no more of the elements of an accident in the transaction than in any crime. It does not appear from the opinion in this case whether or not the policy contained a provision commonly found in accident policies excluding liability for death or injury in consequence of violation of law. Apart from such a provision, it is not entirely clear how the fact that the insured was violating the law at the time he received the injury resulting in his death could affect the question whether his injury or death resulted from accidental means.

It has been held that death was not effected through accidental means within a provision of an accident policy where the insured died from erysipelas caused by germs which entered after the breaking of the scab on a boil by scratching it with unclean hands to allay itching. Maryland Casualty Co. v. Spitz (1917) L.R.A. 1918C, 1191, 159 C. C. A. 119, 246 Fed.

817. The court said: "The verdict has established, and we therefore assume the further fact to be, that the germs of erysipelas entered the wound after the scab had been rubbed or scratched off, and that the disease then introduced was the immediate cause of death; so that the only question now is whether the means that opened the way for the germs to enter, namely, the rubbing or scratching of the boil, was an accidental means. The court submitted this question to the jury, asking them to find whether the injury was inflicted accidentally, and in this submission we think there was error. As we read the testimony, nothing appears to show that the injury was inflicted by accidental means. The deceased rubbed or scratched his neck in the ordinary way; there is no evidence that he was disturbed or interfered with during the operation, and an ordinary and not unusual result followed; that is, he broke the scab. His hands were not clean, but he knew that fact and must be held to the risk of such harm as might follow therefrom. In a word, he seems to have done just what he intended to do, namely, rub or scratch his neck to relieve the itching, and in our opinion breaking the scab during the process was a probable result, one reasonably to be expected. We think the defendant was entitled to binding instructions."

And in Kendall v. Travelers' Protective Asso. (1918) 87 Or. 179, 169 Pac. 751, it was held that the injury did not result from accidental means, if it was impossible for a barber, requested by the insured to remove an ingrowing hair, to perform the operation without making some incision of the skin, and on that account the barber intentionally and with the implied consent of the insured made a cut which afterward became infected and resulted in blood poisoning.

III. Losses resulting from exertion or exercises.

In many of the cases involving losses resulting from exertion or exercise the distinction mentioned in the introductory, between an accident and an accidental means, has been recognized, and a recovery on account of death or injury resulting from the insured's voluntary act has been denied on the theory that it is not enough that the death or injury be unusual and unexpected, but that the cause must also be unexpected and unusual.

In Rock v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1916) 172 Cal. 462, L.R.A.1916E, 1197, 156 Pac. 1029, it was held that death from a dilatation of the heart, due to a voluntary attempt to carry a casket containing a corpse down a stairway, was not a death from "accidental means" within the meaning of an accident policy where nothing unusual or unexpected, such as slipping, occurred in the course of carrying the casket. The court said: "The policy, it will be observed, does not insure against accidental death or injuries, but against injuries effected by accidental means. A differentiation is made, therefore, between the result to the insured and the means which are the operative cause in producing this result. It is not enough that death or injury should be unexpected or unforeseen, but there must be some element of unexpectedness in the preceding act or occurrence which leads to the injury or death. Policies like the one before us have been before the courts in many cases, and the great weight of authority, we think, sustains the view which we have just expressed. Thus, in Clidero v. Scottish Acci. Ins. Co. (Scot.) supra, Lord Adam said: 'The question, in the sense of this policy, is not whether death was the result of accident in the sense that it was a death which was not foreseen or anticipated. That is not the question. The question is, in the words of this policy, whether the means by which the injury was caused were accidental means. The death being accidental in the sense in which I have mentioned, and the means which led to the death as accidental, are, to my mind, two quite different things. A person may do certain acts, the result of which acts may produce unforeseen consequences, and may produce what is commonly called accidental death, but the means are exactly what the man intended to use, and did use, and was prepared to use. The means were not accidental, but the result might be accidental.'"

The decision in Rock v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (Cal.) supra, was followed in Bennetts v. Occidental L. Ins. Co. (Cal.) supra, where it was held that no recovery could be had under a policy insuring against injuries effected through accidental means; it merely appearing that the insured was taken ill shortly after he had assisted another in pulling a pipe out of a sump hole, and there being nothing to show that the insured slipped, or that anything unforeseen occurred in lifting the pipe.

And it has been held that death from heart paralysis caused by exertions in a rarefied atmosphere in ascending a long flight of steps and carrying his baggage in going from the station to his hotel was not a death from accidental means, as it was the direct result of an intentional act. Schmid v. Indiana Travelers' Acci. Asso. (1908) 42 Ind. App. 483, 85 N. E. 1032.

So death from dilation of the heart occasioned by the insured's act in placing his hands on the arms of a chair and raising and lowering himself has been held not to have been caused by accidental means. Hastings v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1911) 190 Fed. 258.

And in Cobb v. Preferred Mut. Acci. Asso. (1895) 96 Ga. 818, where the insured while in a feeble condition alighted from a train and was injured in some way while carrying his baggage, weighing between 60 and 80 pounds, a distance of 50 yards, and as a result lost the sight of an eye, it was held that the injury was not effected by accidental means.

The decision in the Cobb Case was followed in Fulton v. Metropolitan Casualty Ins. Co. (1916) 19 Ga. App. 127, 91 S. E. 228, where the policy insured against injury sustained through accidental means, and the evidence merely tended to show an injury by straining in pulling and pushing a boat from dry land to the water, the court holding that under the facts a nonsuit was properly granted.

And appendicitis due to the irregular working of the muscles of the sides because of strain in bowling has been held not to be within the protection of a policy providing for indemnity for loss of time resulting from disability due to accidental means. Lehman v. Great Western Acci. Asso. (1911) 155 Iowa, 737, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 562, 133 N. W. 752.

in riding a bicycle has been held not produced by accidental means. Appel v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. (1903) 86 App. Div. 83, 83 N. Y. Supp. 238, affirmed without opinion in (1904) 180 N. Y. 514, 72 N. E. 1139.

And where one in getting out of bed and stooping over to put on his stockings displaced an intestine and died as a result, the injury was held not to have been caused by accidental means. Clidero v. Scottish Acci. Ins. Co. (1892) 29 Scot. L. R. 303, 19 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 355.

And in Scarr v. General Acci. Assur. Corp. [1905] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 387, 2 B. R. C. 358, 74 L. J. K. B. N. S. 237, 92 L. T. N. S. 128, 21 Times L. R. 173, 1 Ann. Cas. 787, death resulting from violent physical exertion, which was intended, was held not to have been caused by accidental means.

And it has been held that loss of sight because of a blood clot, due to a sudden intentional movement of the hand to reach a desired object when in a weakened condition, and under high blood pressure, is not within a policy insuring against injury through accidental means. Stone v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1916) 133 Tenn. 672, L.R.A. 1916D, 536, 182 S. W. 252, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 86.

And a like conclusion was reached in Salinger v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1917) 178 Ky. 369, L.R.A. 1918C, 101, 198 S. W. 1163, where there was a loss of the sight of an eye because of the lodgment in an artery of an embolus, due to a bodily condition, while insured was under strain in lifting.

And death caused by the rupture of an artery when the insured reached to close a window shutter has been held not a death "from accidental cause," since, except for the rupture, nothing unforeseen occurred. Feder v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. (1899) 107 Iowa, 538, 43 L.R.A. 693, 70 Am. St. Rep. 212, 78 N. W. 252.

And in McCarthy v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1878) 8 Biss. 362, Fed. Cas. No. 3,682, it was held that death from rupture of a blood vessel while exercising with Indian clubs did not result from accidental means if the insured voluntarily used the clubs in the ordinary way without the intervention of any unusual circumstances, but that if any unforeseen or involuntary movement of the body occurred, which, in connection with the use of the clubs, brought about the injury, or if any unforeseen or unexpected circumstance interfered with the usual course of the exercises, by which there was produced an involuntary strain or wrench which occasioned the injury, the means would be accidental.

And it has been held that a rupture of the heart, which was in a state of degeneration, by carrying a door, or filling the lungs with air in taking a long breath, was not within a policy insuring against injuries sustained through accidental means. Shanberg v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1907) 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1206, 85 C. C. A. 343, 158 Fed. 1.

And death did not result from accidental means where the insured, while performing an operation on an animal on his farm, ran up a small hillside to a fire, heated an iron, and ran back again without stumbling or falling and immediately sustained a stroke of apoplexy because of a diseased condition. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Selden (1897) 24 C. C. A. 92, 42 U. S. App. 253, 78 Fed. 285.

And where the insured, after going through a train standing at a station, jumped from the train and walked briskly for some distance, and the same day a partial rupture was discovered, it was held that the injury was not one effected through violent and accidental means. Southard v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. (1868) 34 Conn. 574, Fed. Cas. No. 13,182.

In Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. v. Patterson (1914) 130 C. C. A. 175, 213 Fed. 595, it was recognized that there could be no recovery under a policy insuring against injuries sustained by accidental means in case the insured sustained an injury from the ordinary strain in cranking his automobile, as the strain would be regarded as a result of what he intended to do. In that case, however, there was evidence that the insured slipped and fell while attempting to crank the machine, and a judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed.

In Smouse v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. (1902) 118 Iowa, 486, 92 N. W. 58, where one, just recovering from pneumonia, was suddenly aroused from sleep, arose in a confused condition of mind, and hurriedly attempted to remove his nightgown over his head, and while his arms were raised they became entangled in the garment, and putting forth a violent exertion in an endeavor to extricate himself he ruptured a blood vessel and died therefrom, it was held that the exertions were voluntary, and that his death could not be regarded as resulting from an accidental cause.

In Niskern v. United Brotherhood, C. J. 93 App. Div. 364, 87 N. Y. Supp. 640, the rupture of a blood vessel by lifting a heavy weight in pursuing his business was held not accidental where the insured was suffering from a disease of the arteries.

There is, however, some conflict among the cases, and in some, upon facts similar to those involved in some of the preceding cases, a different conclusion has been reached.

Thus, a policy insuring against the effect of bodily injuries caused solely by accidental means has been held to cover death resulting from a rupture of the heart where it appeared that the insured was a healthy man, never sick, and accustomed to easily lift from 100 to 250 pounds, and that the rupture resulted from his picking up one end of an iron bar weighing 350 to 400 pounds. Horsfall v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1903) 32 Wash. 132, 68 L.R.A. 425, 98 Am. St. Rep. 846, 72 Pac. 1023.

And the court in Rose v. Commercial Mut. Acci. Co. (1900) 12 Pa. Super. Ct. 394, was of the opinion that the insured's injury resulted from accidental means, where in the course of his employment he raised a heavy weight, and thereafter felt oppressed, and stopped work, and the next day, while helping move a heavy stone with a pick, collapsed and subsequently suffered hemorrhages. The policy involved in this case, however, excepted liability for injuries occasioned by lifting or overexertion and a nonsuit was held to have been properly entered.

And in Summers v. Fidelity Mut. Aid Asso. (1900) 84 Mo. App. 605, death was held to be due to an accident produced by accidental means where it appeared that the insured, an employee in a railway shop, while engaged in attempting to lift a heavy truck, suddenly said that he was hurt, and was taken home, and found to have a hernia, from which he died shortly after.

And in Atlanta Acci. Asso. v. Alexander (1898) 104 Ga. 709, 42 L.R.A. 188, 80 S. E. 939, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 616, where there was evidence that the insured, a healthy man, accustomed in his occupation as blacksmith to use a heavy sledge, while striking a slanting blow with the hammer, felt a severe pain in his abdomen, which resulted in a rupture and death, it was held that the jury were warranted in finding that death resulted from accidental means.

And the question whether the insured's injury was caused by accidental means was held for the jury in Young v. Railway Mail Asso. (1907) 126 Mo. App. 325, 108 S. W. 557, where it appeared that he was a railway mail clerk, and that while lifting a heavy mail sack he ruptured a blood vessel on his lung, and so strained and injured himself as to cause several hemorrhages, and there was evidence that such a rupture was not a natural or probable effect of lifting a mail sack.

And in Pervanger v. Union Casualty & Surety Co. (1904) 85 Miss. 31, 37 So. 461, where a declaration alleged that the insured's death was caused from bodily injuries to his lungs or stomach, or some part thereof, or some part of his body adjacent thereto and connected therewith, or the rupture of some blood vessel caused by being strained in lifting or handling some heavy machinery or substance, it was held that a cause of action was stated upon a policy insuring against injuries sustained through accidental means.

And in Standard Life & Acci. Ins.

Co. v. Schmaltz (1899) 66 Ark. 588, 74 Am. St. Rep. 112, 53 S. W. 49, it was held that the jury might have found that the insured's death resulted from accidental means, where there was evidence that he was a mechanic and that while engaged in his work he caught a cylinder head which was about to fall and suffered a rupture of a blood vessel which caused his death.

And the insured's injury has been held to have resulted from accidental means where he stooped forward to pick up a marble as it rolled from him, separated his knees, and leaned forward, and made a grab at the marble, in doing which he wrenched and injured his knee. Hamlyn v. Crown Acci. Ins. Co. [1893] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 750, 62 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 409, 57 J. P. 663, 4 Reports, 407, 68 L. T. N. S. 701, 41 Week. Rep. 531.

In United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Barry (1889) 131 U. S. 100, 33 L. ed. 60, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755, affirming a judgment, where death was due to an injury to the duodenum following a jump from a platform a few feet high, the charge which the court approved made the right of the jury to find "accidental means" dependent not upon the mere fact of an injury to the duodenum by the jar, but upon the occurrence of something unexpected or unforeseen, e. g., an "unforeseen or involuntary movement, turn, or strain of the body which brought about the alleged injury." And the jury were expressly instructed that if the insured "jumped from the platform and alighted on the ground in the way he intended to do, and nothing unforeseen, unexpected, or involuntary occurred changing or affecting the downward movement of his body as he expected or would naturally expect such a movement to be made, or causing him to strike the ground in any different way or position from that which he anticipated or would naturally anticipate, then any resulting injury was not effected through any accidental means." As the defendant's request for a special verdict was denied, it is of course impossible to determine whether the jury in returning a general verdict for the plaintiff did in fact find the facts or conditions which the charge hypothesized as essential to a verdict for plaintiff.

And death has been held to have resulted through accidental means where the insured, whose attention was fixed on a train, failed to notice when he had reached the end of the pavement, and, in stepping off of it, and down about 8 inches, received a jolt which caused intussusception and death. General Acci. & Life Assur. Corp. v. Meredith (1910) 141 Ky. 92, 132 S. W. 191.

In McGlinchey v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1888) 80 Me. 251, 6 Am. St. Rep. 190, 14 Atl. 13, death was held to have been caused by injuries effected by accidental means where it appeared that the insured was driving a carriage containing himself and his small boys, when the horse became frightened and ran away and nearly collided with other vehicles, but was brought under control without upsetting the carriage or throwing anyone out, and immediately after he gained control of his horse he was taken sick and died within an hour.

And death resulting from a strain of the heart has been held the result of accidental means, where it appeared that, with some exertion of strength, the insured was attempting to remove an automobile tire when it suddenly came off and caused him to fall backward, and suffer injuries from which he died. Lickleider v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. (1918) — Iowa, —, 3 A.L.R. 1295, 166 N. W. 363, 168 N. W. 884.

In Robison v. United States Health & Acci. Ins. Co. (1915) 192 Ill. App. 475, an injury from lifting a stove, which was claimed to have caused heart trouble, subsequently resulting in death, was held an accidental injury.

And a sprain of the back caused by heavy lifting in the course of business has been held within the protection of a policy providing against injury arising from accident if occasioned by any external or material cause. Martin v. Travellers' Ins. Co. (1859) 1 Fost. & F. (Eng.) 505.

And a strain by an osteopath in the ordinary course of treating a patient has been held an accident within a policy insuring against "accidental bodily injuries." Patterson v. Ocean Acci. & Guarantee Corp. (1905) 25 App. D. C. 46.

IV. Losses resulting from taking poison.

It is generally held that death or injury results from accidental means where it is caused by taking poison by mistake, or by taking an overdose by mistake. Healey v. Mutual Acci. Asso. (1890) 133 Ill. 556, 9 L.R.A. 371, 23 Am. St. Rep. 637, 25 N. E. 52; Mutual Acci. Asso. v. Tuggle (1890) 39 Ill. App. 509, reversed on other ground in (1891) 138 Ill. 423, 28 N. E. 1066; Travelers Ins. Co. v. Dunlap (1896) 160 Ill. 642, 52 Am. St. Rep. 355, 43 N. E. 765, affirmed in (1895) 59 Ill. App. 515; Metropolitan Acci. Asso. v. Froiland (1896) 161 Ill. 30, 52 Am. St. Rep. 359, 43 N. E. 766; Riley v. Interstate Business Men's Acci. Asso. (1915) — Iowa, —, 152 N. W. 617; Carnes v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. (1898) 106 Iowa, 281, 68 Am. St. Rep. 306, 76 N. W. 683; Dezell v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1903) 176 Mo. 253, 75 S. W. 1102.

And in Pollock v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. (1883) 102 Pa. 230, 48 Am. Rep. 204, and Kennedy v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. (1903) 31 Tex. Civ. App. 509, 72 S. W. 602, it was apparently assumed that death resulting from taking poison by mistake was accidental. The decisions in these cases, however, relate to certain exceptions contained in the policies.

It has been held that death by ptomaine poisoning due to eating tainted food through mistake is within the terms of a policy insuring against death by accident. Johnson v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1915) 184 Mich. 406, L.R.A. 1916A, 475, 151 N. W. 593.

And death from ptomaine poisoning contained in mushrooms supposed to be edible, and eaten by the insured without negligence, has been held within a policy insuring against death by accidental means not resulting from or contributed to, directly or indirectly, wholly or partially by disease. United States Casualty Co. v. Griffin

And death resulting from an overdose of morphine taken unintentionally is accidental. Pixley v. Illinois Commercial Men's Asso. (1915) 195 Ill. App. 133.

And death has been held to have resulted from accidental means where a physician mistook poison for water. Hill v. Hartford Acci. Ins. Co. (1880) 22 Hun (N. Y.) 187.

In Grosvenor v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1918) 102 Neb. 629, 168 N. W. 596, where the policy insured against death by accidental means, and the insured died from drinking carbolic acid, it was held that although death was due to the insured's voluntary act in drinking the acid a recovery might nevertheless be had, the court holding that any event which takes place without the expectation of the person acted upon is accidental, even though the accident would not have happened but for a voluntary act on the part of the person receiving it.

V. Miscellaneous.

It has been held that death from meningitis was not caused by accidental means where the disease resulted from a violent snuffing of a nasal douche, which caused infection to pass to the brain, it appearing that the snuffing was no harder than the insured intended. Smith v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1914) 219 Mass. 147, L.R.A. 1915B, 872, 106 N. E. 607.

And it has been held that where one holding a policy indemnifying him against bodily injuries which, independently of all other causes, are effected solely and exclusively by accidental means, suffers an injury due to the dilation of the heart, following the voluntary taking of a cold water bath, it was not the result of an accident, where there was no evidence that anything occurred which the insured had not anticipated except the dilation. New Amsterdam Casualty Co. v. Johnson (1914) 91 Ohio St. 155, L.R.A.1916B, 1018, 110 N. E. 475.

In Rody v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1886) 3 N. M. 543, 9 Pac. 843, it was held that a rupture of the ear caused by diving from a plank into 6 or 7 feet of water while bathing justified a recovery on a policy insuring against injuries resulting from accidental means.

And death from asphyxia, occasioned by deadly gas in a shallow well, into which the insured had voluntarily descended to fix a pump, has been held to have been caused by accidental means. Pickett v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1891) 144 Pa. 79, 13 L.R.A. 661, 27 Am. St. Rep. 618, 22 Atl. 871.

And death from blood poisoning resulting from a cut made by the insured while trimming a corn has been held accidental within the meaning of an accident policy. Nax v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1904) 130 Fed. 985.

In Rowden v. Travelers Protective Asso. (1916) 201 Ill. App. 295, where the insured was pulling on the limb of a tree to remove it when the limb broke and he fell backwards and suffered a hernia, resulting in his death, it was contended that under a policy which insured against death through accidental means it was not sufficient that death was an accidental result of an external cause, but that the cause thereof must have been accidental; that the insured did exactly what he intended to do and that nothing was accidental except the result. The court in denying the contention said: "In 4 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. 3156, it is said: 'An effect which does not ordinarily follow and cannot reasonably be anticipated from the use of such means, an effect which the actor did not intend to produce and which he cannot be charged with the design of producing, is produced by accidental means.' . . . This is the rule if the assured is within the terms of the contract, even though he be negligent, if he be not guilty of misconduct or fraud. While the insured desired to remove the limb of the tree, it is not pretended that there was any intention on his part of falling and injuring himself. The fall and the injury were clearly accidental."

In Rowe v. United Commercial Travelers (1919) — Iowa, —, 4 A.L.R. 1235, 172 N. W. 454, where the insured while driving an automobile at a rapid speed was killed, the court held that it was not the law, as stated in a requested instruction, that "if an injury or death is the result of a man's intentional act it is not an accident," stating that the fact that an intentional act, not per se dangerous, and not intended or expected to be attended with injurious results to the actor, may by some unforeseen, unexpected, or unusual contingency become the accidental means of injury to the actor, is too clearly demonstrated by common observation, common experience, and innumerable precedents to justify argument.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County (Kavanaugh, J.) vacating a default decree and an amendment of affidavit of mailing, in a suit for a divorce. Reversed.

On Motion to Dismiss.

Statement by McBride, Ch. J.:

This is a motion to dismiss an appeal and is based upon the following facts: On September 30, 1915, plaintiff filed in the circuit court for Multnomah county a complaint for divorce, and on the 24th day of November, upon an affidavit duly setting forth all the necessary jurisdictional facts, obtained an order authorizing service of publication of summons upon the defendant and directing that a copy of the complaint and published summons be forthwith deposited in the post-office at Portland, Oregon, directed to defendant at his last-known post-office address, the same being Boise, Idaho, which summons together with a copy of the complaint was duly mailed on November 29, 1915, but by inadvertence the affidavit of mailing was made to read "December 30" instead of November 29th. The summons was duly published as provided in the order, the day for answer being fixed for January 10, 1916. On June 23, 1917, the plaintiff obtained a default decree against defendant. On April 4, 1918, plaintiff, having discovered the mistake in the affidavit showing the mailing of the summons to defendant, asked leave to correct the affidavit nunc pro tunc in accordance with the facts, which motion was allowed, and the correction made by permitting the affidavit to be entered and filed as of June 15, 1917. On May 20, 1918, plaintiff applied for and obtained an order of the court vacating and setting aside the decree of divorce rendered on June 23, 1915, on the ground that it was void and of no effect, and setting aside the order allowing the amendment to the proof of mailing, and directing that an alias summons issue, as provided by law. From this order defendant appeals.

Plaintiff moves to dismiss the appeal, specifying four reasons for dismissal, as follows:

"First. That the order appealed from is not an appealable order, in that the order made by his Honor J. P. Kavanaugh on May 20, 1918, was an order to vacate a void decree.

"Second. For the reason that the order appealed from is not a decree within the purview of § 548, L. O. L., and by reason thereof is not appealable.

"Third. That the order vacating the void decree was not a final order, in that it permitted the filing of an amended complaint and directed alias summons to issue.

"Fourth. That, until after service was made on appellant under the alias summons provided in said order appealed from, defendant and appellant was in default and not entitled to an appeal from the orders or decrees of the court."

Messrs. Cochran & Eberhard, for appellant:

The court has a right to correct, modify, or vacate its judgments and decrees only in the term during which the judgment or decree was entered, and at the close of such term all final proceedings had therein become conclusive and the court loses jurisdiction of them.

Bronson v. Schulten, 104 U. S. 410, 26 L. ed. 797; Anderson v. Anderson, 89 Or. 654, 175 Pac. 287; William Deering & Co. v. Creighton, 26 Or. 556, 38 Pac. 710.

The only exception to this rule is in case the judgment, order, or decree made by the court is void, when the court has power at all times, whether at the same term or not, to vacate them.

Huffman v. Huffman, 47 Or. 610, 114 Am. St. Rep. 943, 86 Pac. 593; Multnomah County v. Portland Cracker Co. 49 Or. 345, 90 Pac. 155; Ladd v. Mason, 10 Or. 303.

By leave of court first had and obtained, an affidavit of mailing in the proof of service by publication may be amended so as to correct defects in the same manner and to the same extent as sheriff's returns on personal service.

Knapp v. Wallace, 50 Or. 348, 126 Am. St. Rep. 742, 92 Pac. 1054; Ranch v. Werley, 162 Fed. 509; Hass v. Sedlack, 9 Or. 462; Weaver v. Southern Oregon Co. 30 Or. 348, 48 Pac. 171; Hackett v. Crook, 19 Ariz. 448, 170 Pac. 280; 32 Cyc. 540, note 75; 21 R. C. L. 1331, notes 8-10; Palmer-Haworth Logging Co. v. Henderson, 90 Or. 192, 174 Pac. 631; Boehmer v. Silvestone, — Or. —, 174 Pac. 1176; Zahorka v. Geith, 129 Wis. 498, 109 N. W. 552; Spaulding & Co. v. Chapin, — Cal. App. —, 174 Pac. 334; Rickards v. Ladd, 6 Sawy. 40, Fed. Cas. No. 11,804.

When judgment is not void on its face, the court has no power to set it aside, but resort should be had to an action, and all parties interested should be notified and have an opportunity to be heard.

People ex rel. Schwartz v. Temple, 103 Cal. 453, 37 Pac. 414, 416; Zumbusch v. Superior Ct. 21 Cal. App. 76, 130 Pac. 1070.

An order for the publication of summons followed by the publication of summons for a legal length of time cannot be attacked and is sufficient.

32 Cyc. 483, note 73; 21 R. C. L. 1287, note 9; Blight v. Banks, 6 T. B. Mon. 192, 17 Am. Dec. 136; Bank of Colfax v. Richardson, 34 Or. 518, 75 Am. St. Rep. 664, 54 Pac. 359; Paulsen v. Portland, 149 U. S. 30, 37 L. ed. 637, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 750.

Bowan v. Holman, 48 Or. 351, 86 Pac. 792; Taylor v. Taylor, 61 Or. 257, 121 Pac. 431, 964; Hall v. McCan, 62 Or. 556, 126 Pac. 5.

The exception to this rule is when the order vacating the default judgment was made when the court had no jurisdiction, or is void; then it is appealable.

William Deering & Co. v. Creighton, 26 Or. 556, 38 Pac. 710; Trullenger v. Todd, 5 Or. 37; Hoover v. Hoover, 39 Or. 456, 65 Pac. 796; Hume v. Bowie, 148 U. S. 248, 37 L. ed. 439, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 582.

Mr. G. Evert Baker for respondent.

McBride, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court (November 26, 1918):

The situation disclosed by the record is somewhat out of the usual order, in that the respondent seeks to show and must show that the decree rendered in her favor on June 23, and the order of the court made May 20, 1917, were absolutely void, in order to sustain this motion.

Superior courts possess the undoubted authority to vacate void judgments at any time. Jones v. Jones, 59 Or. 308, 313, 117 Pac. 414; William Deering & Co. v. Creighton, 26 Or. 556, 38 Pac. 710. The decree entered on June 23, 1917, was, upon the face of the record, invalid and void because the record as it then stood did not show a compliance with the order directing a copy of the summons and complaint to be forthwith mailed to the defendant at his last-known place of residence, and unless the amendment to the return gave it validity it was still ineffectual for any purpose, and the court had the authority to set it aside, notwithstanding the fact that several terms had elapsed since its rendition. We are of the opinion the court had authority to allow the amendment to the return, and that upon the making of the order the decree became valid ab initio between the parties and all others having actual or constructive notice of the litigation. The general rule is thus stated by Mr. Freeman: "A very important part of the judgment roll is that containing evidence of the service of process, or the taking of such other steps as are necessary to give the court jurisdiction over the person of the defendant; and it may happen that this part has been omitted from the roll, or has never been filed in court at all, or, as filed and incorporated in the roll, is defective, and not sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction of the court, when attacked on appeal, or by motion to set it aside, or even when assailed in a collateral action or proceeding. Then the question arises whether the omission may be supplied, or the error corrected; and, if so, by what means. As a general rule, an officer who has made a return of process will be permitted to amend such return at any time. If the return upon the summons or other writ designed to give the court jurisdiction over the person of the defendant is omitted or incorrectly made, but the facts really existed which were required to give the court jurisdiction, the weight of authority at the present time permits the officer to correct or supply his return until it states the truth, though by such correction a judgment apparently void is made valid. Though the proof of the service of process does not consist of the return of an officer, the like rule prevails. Thus if a summons has been published in the manner required by law, but the proof of publication found in the files of the court is defective, the court may, on the fact of due publication being shown, permit an affidavit to be filed showing the facts, and when so filed it will support the judgment as if filed before its entry." 1 Freeman, Judgm. 4th ed. § 89b; Hefflin v. McMinn, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 492, 20 Am. Dec. 58; Kirkwood v. Reedy, 10 Kan. 453; Shenandoah Valley R. Co. v. Ashby, 86 Va. 232, 19 Am. St. Rep. 898, 9 S. E. 1003; Re Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146, 16 Pac. 887.

The reason why such an amendment relates back to the original service and validates the decree already rendered is that it is not the return, but the fact of actual service, that gives the court jurisdiction; the return being merely the evidence by which the court is informed that service has been made upon the defendant. 21 R. C. L. p. 1331, § 79, and cases there cited. While some courts hold that an amendment of process after judgment can only be made upon notice, we think the better reason and authority at least justify the contrary view. Woodward v. Brown, 119 Cal. 283, 63 Am. St. Rep. 108, 51 Pac. 2, 542; Kahn v. Mercantile Town Mut. Ins. Co. 228 Mo. 585, 137 Am. St. Rep. 665, 128 S. W. 995.

Mr. Freeman, in his work on Executions (3d ed. p. 358), criticizes the practice of the courts in allowing ex parte amendment of process, but concedes that such amendments are not void. This question was thoroughly considered in Rickards v. Ladd, 6 Sawy. 40, Fed. Cas. No. 11,804, a case arising in this state in the United States district court. The circumstances were not substantially different from the case at bar, and the opinion bears the mark of painstaking examination of the authorities, as do all the opinions rendered by Judge Deady. In discussing the question of the right of defendant to notice of the motion to amend, he says:

"And, first, this is not a jurisdictional matter. The jurisdiction of the court depends upon the service of the process. The proof of the fact, the return, is made by the officer making the service in obedience to the command of the writ, under such regulations as the law may prescribe. The court cannot say what return shall be made, but, when made, it becomes a part of the record of the court. The defendant is not a party to the proceeding, and it is made without his consent or notice to him.

"If afterwards it is discovered that a mistake has been made in the matter, the return, being now a record of the court, can only be amended by leave of the court. But still the court does not make the amendment. The authority to amend the return, as in the case of making it, is primarily in the officer, and not in the court; but, after making the return, the authority of the officer becomes qualified, so that it cannot be exercised without the consent of the court. Strictly speaking, then, the proceeding is one between the officer and the court. It is ex parte in its very nature, and no one has an absolute right to notice of it. In contemplation of law, the amended return is made under the same sanction and responsibility as the mistaken one. In effect, it becomes the return in the case, and cannot be questioned collaterally by the parties to the action or those claiming under them as privies."

The case last referred to presented features which might suggest a more rigid rule against upholding the validity of an amendment than the case at bar. In that case the amendment was procured by the plaintiff, and it was the defendant who called it in question. Here the plaintiff, pursuing a course that she then believed was in her own interest, asked and received permission to amend the return and thereafter applied to the court to set aside the order which she had so obtained. As between her and her husband the amendment was perfectly valid. As to other parties we are not called upon to express an opinion further than to say that any party dealing with the property involved in the divorce suit, and with that staring him in the face, would not appear to be in a very good position to plead that he was an innocent purchaser in good faith and without notice. It being settled that the amendment was valid, it requires no discussion to determine that the court had no power to vacate the decree in favor of plaintiff or to set aside the order permitting the amended proof of service after the expiration of the term at which such order was made. William Deering & Co. v. Creighton, supra.

The order appealed from is clearly appealable. It affected a substantial right and changed the status of the defendant from that of a single man to that of a married man. His case had been tried and passed to a final decree, and he was not required to go through the useless ceremony of retrying it upon an amended complaint, the filing of which the court had no jurisdiction to authorize, before he could appeal.

The other questions raised are merely variations of these already considered and need not be separately discussed.

The motion to dismiss is overruled.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following Per Curiam response was handed down February 25, 1919 (— Or. —, 178 Pac. 799):

In a petition for rehearing respondent calls attention to several defects in the proceeding to obtain service of summons by publication, in addition to those particularly pointed out in the brief heretofore presented, and insists that these defects rendered the original proceedings wholly void. The objections are serious and go to the vital merits of the appeal, and should not be decided without full oral argument.

We, therefore, adhere to our original decision, and deny the motion to dismiss, with permission to renew at the hearing, where all the questions raised can be more fully discussed.

On the Merits (— Or. —, 182 Pac. 136).

Per Curiam:

The material facts in this case are sufficiently stated in Wade v. Wade, — Or. —, 176 Pac. 192, which involved the determination of a motion to dismiss, which motion went practically to the whole merits of this appeal.

After that decision, learned counsel for the plaintiff suggested, upon petition for rehearing, that there were other defects in the original proceedings, which were so serious as to render the order permitting the amendment of proof of service absolutely void. Whereupon we granted permission to respondent to renew the motion to dismiss, upon the final hearing, — Or. —, 178 Pac. 799.

Since that hearing, we have carefully re-examined the record and are satisfied the circuit court had jurisdiction to permit the amendment nunc pro tunc of the original proof of service, and that the original decree of divorce rendered on June 23, 1917, was a valid decree. This being the case, the court was without power to vacate said decree on May 20, 1918. The order of May 20, 1918, is therefore reversed.

ANNOTATION.

In divorce actions the usual doctrine is followed that the court has power to amend nunc pro tunc the return of service of summons. Crook v. Crook (1918) 19 Ariz. 448, 170 Pac. 280; Re Newman (1888) 75 Cal. 213, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146, 16 Pac. 887; Hawes v. Hawes (1864) 33 Ill. 286; Fowler v. Cooper (1900) 81 Minn. 19, 83 N. W. 464; WADE v. WADE (reported herewith) ante, 1143; Zahorka v. Geith (1906) 129 Wis. 498, 109 N. W. 552.

In Crook v. Crook (Ariz.) supra, it was held that the trial court should have granted the right after judgment in divorce to amend the affidavit of constructive service of summons nunc pro tunc as of the date of the judgment, where date of the mailing was by clerical error wrongly stated. But the judgment was vacated on other grounds.

Where the court on September 6, 1890, at the close of the hearing in a divorce action, where there had been an order for service by publication, declared that "judgment is ordered for plaintiff and against defendant," and fourteen years later there was filed an affidavit of the mailing, shortly after the bringing of the divorce action, of a copy of the summons and complaint to the defendant, it was held that the court was justified in 1904 in ordering judgment nunc pro tunc as of September 6, 1890, and that such judgment was binding as effectual in dissolving the marriage as of September 6, 1890, and that the marriage of the wife to a third person between the two dates mentioned was a valid marriage. Zahorka v. Geith (1906) 129 Wis. 498, 109 N. W. 552, supra.

Where judgment of divorce was signed by the judge on the 19th of October, 1885, was filed with the clerk on the 22d of the same month, and was entered on the 5th of January, 1887, the judgment recited the default of the defendant in the action, and that he had been duly served with summons by publication. On the said 5th of January, 1887, an amended proof of publication of summons and of the mailing of the summons and complaint was filed nunc pro tunc as of the 19th of October, 1885, and an order was made in said action on said 5th of January, 1887, allowing the filing of the amended proofs of publication and deposit, and ordering the entry of judgment in said action nunc pro tunc as of the 19th of October, 1885. The court said: "The recital in the judgment that the defendant was duly served with process is consistent with the proof of service. It is the fact of service which gives the court jurisdiction, not the proof of service, and the court had authority to receive the amended affidavits of service after judgment and before the roll was made up." Re Newman (1888) 75 Cal. 213, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146, 16 Pac. 887, supra.

The defendant in divorce, having been defaulted, sued out a writ of error, assigning among other errors that the return of the summons did not show that it was served after its issue as it did show that it was served before its issue. Subsequently to the filing of the record in the appellate court the trial court permitted the sheriff to amend his return by showing that the date of service of the summons was after its issue, and the amendment was brought to the appellate court by supplemental record, and the decree was affirmed. Hawes v. Hawes (1864) 33 Ill. 286, supra.

In an action to annul a marriage on the ground that the defendant had obtained a decree of divorce from a prior husband which was not legal, it appeared that the affidavit or service of the summons and complaint in the divorce action was wholly insufficient, as it stated that the papers were left with another person than the defendant, but it also appeared that six years after the entry of judgment in the divorce action the court permitted the filing of an affidavit of the person with whom the papers had been left for the defendant, showing that he had delivered the summons and complaint to the defendant on the day on which the papers were left with him, and it also appeared that the court had permitted the filing of an affidavit by the defendant in the divorce action showing the receipt of the papers, etc. It was held that the action of the court in permitting the filing of the new affidavits was proper. The court said: "We are of the opinion that the statute allowing amendments of legal proceedings is broad enough in terms to authorize the court, upon proper cause shown, to supply an omission of actual facts in the proof of service of the summons and complaint to be added to the judgment roll. Such view is not only within the letter, but the spirit, of the statute. . . . It follows that the judgment upon the service as established was a perfect bar to this action at the time this suit was commenced. We think there is no reason to doubt that the court can supply that omission, under the amendment statute referred to, nunc pro tunc." Fowler v. Cooper (1900) 81 Minn. 19, 83 N. W. 464, supra.

The propriety of allowing the amendment of return of the service by notice and copy of the petition out of the state in a divorce case was recognized in Trevino v. Trevino (1881) 54 Tex. 261, where the amendment seems to have been before judgment; but the case was reversed on other grounds.

It may be noted that in Eyster v. Eyster (1853) 14 Ill. 369, on a writ of error by the defendant in divorce, the court said: "It appeared from the sheriff's return that the summons was served by reading. The parties stipulated that affidavits might be presented to show the real manner of service; and if it should appear that the sheriff could amend his return, so as to show that service was made by the delivery of a copy of the process, the return should be considered as amended accordingly. The sheriff swears positively that he delivered a copy of the summons to the party, and expressed his willingness so to amend the return. This clearly shows that he would so amend the return on leave; and regarding the amendment as made, as we are bound to do by the terms of the stipulation, there is no error in the record."

For effect of defects or informalities as to appearance or return day in summons or notice of commencement of action, see the annotation to Flanery v. Kusha, 6 A.L.R. 838. B. B. B.

ARIZONA EASTERN RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

J. A. MATTHEWS.

(— Ariz. —, 180 Pac. 159.)

Workmen's compensation — operation of railroad — who engaged in.

1. Persons engaged in the operation of a railroad within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act are those who have an actual physical connection with the handling, organizing, loading, unloading, and movement of trains and cars, extending sometimes to section men.

— who entitled to take benefit of.

2. One whose employment does not bring him within the operation of the Employers' Liability Act cannot elect to recover under that act for injuries received in the employment.

— billing clerk — mechanical or manual labor.

3. A billing clerk in a local freight office of a railroad company is not engaged in manual or mechanical labor within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act.

Definition — mechanical labor.

4. Mechanical labor is labor performed by a mechanic or one who practises any mechanical art, one skilled or employed in shaping or uniting materials into any kind of structure, machine, or other object, requiring the use of tools or other objects.

Workmen's compensation — manual labor — clerical work.

5. The term "manual labor," as used in the Employers' Liability Act, does not include clerical work in a railroad office.

Statute — interpretation — meaning of words.

6. Words used in a statute must be taken in their common and ordinary sense, unless from the context it is evident that other meaning was intended.

Workmen's compensation — condition of hazardous employment.

7. Before an employee can recover for injuries under an act passed under constitutional requirement of a law to make the employer liable for injuries due to accident, "due to a condition or conditions of such hazardous employment," the injury must have occurred while the employee was at work in his occupation, and it must have been occasioned by a risk or danger inherent in the occupation.

8. Injury to a billing clerk in a railroad freight office, by falling into an unguarded hole in a platform when returning from a restaurant where he had gone for lunch, is not due to a condition or conditions of his employment within the meaning of that provision in the Employers' Liability Act.

— hazard peculiar to employment.

9. Liability to injury by falling into a hole in a platform which is along the route usually taken by persons having business in a railroad freight office, and by employees in going to and from their work, is not a risk or hazard peculiar to the work of a billing clerk employed in the office so as entitle him to compensation under the Employers' Liability Act.

— constitutional or statutory provision.

10. The right of an employee to compensation depends upon the statute, and not upon the Constitution, where the Constitution directs the legislature to enact a law providing for such compensation.

Statute — construction — deleted section.

11. A section of a statute cannot be deleted by the courts if it is possible to construe the statute so as to harmonize such section with others.

— lack of comprehensiveness — effect.

12. A statute attempting to put into force a direction of the Constitution cannot be declared invalid because it is not as comprehensive as the Constitution intended.

13. That one called his physician as a witness at a former trial of the case does not prevent his objecting to his testimony at a second trial, under a statute making the physician competent only where the patient himself testified to the facts communicated by him to the physician.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Maricopa County (Stanford, J.) in favor of plaintiff, and from an order overruling a motion for new trial, in an action brought under the Employers' Liability Act to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. G. P. Bullard, for appellant:

Plaintiff is not such an employee as is designated in or entitled to the benefits of the state Employers' Liability Act.

Behringer v. Inspiration Consol. Copper Co. 17 Ariz. 234, 149 Pac. 1065;

Plaintiff was not injured while exposed to the peculiar hazards of operating a railway.

C. C. A. 153.

Ross, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee sued the appellant railroad company for damages for personal injury. Omitting formal parts, the complaint is as follows:

"III. That on or about April 5, 1916, defendant was, by its servants and employees, engaged in installing platform scales on a platform of defendant's freight depot, located in the city of Phoenix, Arizona; that the work was not finished on that day, but by night of said day the work had progressed to such an extent that about 8 square feet of said flooring of said depot platform had been removed, and that said platform floor was about 5 feet from the ground, and when said flooring had been removed a pit was formed about 8 feet wide, 8 feet long, and 5 feet deep.

"IV. Plaintiff says that defendant left said pit thus formed as above stated, during the night of April 5, 1916, unlighted, uncovered, unfenced, and otherwise unprotected at a place, vicinity, and time where and when its employees, and particularly this plaintiff, were required by defendant to work in and about said premises, and that the night of April 5, 1916, was quite dark.

"V. That on the night of April 5, 1916, plaintiff was, in the course of his employment, compelled to work all night for defendant at defendant's freight depot aforesaid, at manual labor as bill clerk, and that while so engaged at such manual labor between 4 and 5 o'clock A. M.

of April 6th . . . he became so fatigued and hungry that it was necessary for him to have something to eat, and some coffee, . . . and, in order to secure the same, he went to a near-by restaurant, and then and there procured such refreshment, and immediately started to return to such manual labor as such bill clerk for defendant, along the route usually traveled by plaintiff and others having business in and about defendant's freight depot, and that while so returning to his said work, and while at all times exercising due care and acting without negligence on his part, plaintiff stepped in said pit so left by defendant without any warning light or any kind of protection therefrom, and fell to the bottom of said pit, a distance of about 5 feet, . . . and was injured," etc.

Appellant demurred to the complaint on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; also, on the ground that the Employers' Liability Law (Civ. Code 1913, §§ 3098-3179) is unconstitutional in that it violates the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. It answered by general denial, pleaded contributory negligence and assumed risk, and also raised the question of the constitutionality of the Liability Law.

At the close of the appellee's case in chief, the appellant moved the court to require him to elect whether he would ask a recovery under the Employers' Liability Act, or under the common law. Whereupon, appellee announced (without any ruling of the court) his election to recover under the Employers' Act. Appellant then made the following motion: "We desire to make a formal motion to instruct for the defendant upon the ground that the state Employers' Liability Act applies to those engaged in the operation of a railroad, to those engaged in manual and mechanical labor, and that the uncontradicted evidence in this case shows that on the night in question, upon which it is claimed that plaintiff was injured, he was not engaged in any mechanical or manual labor, and was not engaged to any extent in the operation of a railroad."

The motion being denied, appellant introduced its evidence, and, the case being submitted to the jury, it returned a verdict in favor of appellee for the sum of $3,000. The appeal is prosecuted from the order overruling motion for a new trial and from the judgment. The assignments of error are numerous—twenty-eight in number—but it will not be necessary, from the view we take of the matter, to pass upon all of them.

The first assignment is based upon the ruling of the court in denying the motion for an instructed verdict. The evidence at the time of making the motion, and at the close of the entire case, was in confirmation of the allegations of the complaint that appellee was a bill clerk in the employ of appellant at its freight depot in the city of Phoenix. The appellee describes the nature and character of his work as follows:

"On or about April 5, 1916, I was employed as bill clerk for the Arizona Eastern Railroad Company, working at the local freight office situated between First avenue and Center street. My work was in the office, which is located in the west end of the building. My duties were billing freight, writing up the transfer book, making up tonnage reports, balancing the cashbooks, making an abstract, loading and unloading live stock, and sprinkling down hogs during warm weather. . . .

"We sometimes had loading and inspection of live stock at the freight-house platform, but the bulk of it was at the union stockyards, located about thirteen blocks west of the freight office, and in the yards of the Arizona Eastern, twelve blocks east of the freight office.

"I have been required to go out and inspect stock after it was loaded. I have used this platform at night in loading live stock, and in loading automobiles and all kinds of freight. . . . I never loaded any stock myself, but I had to make a live-stock report and an inspection of them. They were loaded by the shipper from this platform.

"I don't do manual labor. I don't do manual labor at all when I was working for the Arizona Eastern. I was doing clerical work.

"It was my duty to go out and check in the loading of the stock.

"Between the time I went to work at half past 5 on the evening of the 5th and the time when I was injured on the morning of the 6th, my duties were the regular duties of the office, billing and writing transfers and making abstracts, and that is all I now recall that I did between the hour I went to work and the hour I was injured. I was not handling any stock that night. The duties I refer to were clerical that night."

Keeping this evidence in mind, as also the allegations of the complaint as to the character of the work appellee was engaged in, we now turn to the Employers' Liability Act to see if he generally, or at the time of his injury, was embraced within its terms, so as to entitle him to maintain an action thereunder for damages or compensation. If the cause of action set out in his complaint and the evidence on the trial do not bring the appellee within the terms of the Employers' Liability Act, he ought not to be permitted to recover upon his election.

The constitutional mandate contained in § 7, art. 18, is that the legislature enact a law to make the employer liable for injuries to employees in hazardous occupations when the accident causing the injury is due to a condition or conditions of such hazardous occupation, and is not caused by the negligence of the employee; said law so to be enacted to apply to "all hazardous occupations in mining, smelting, manufacturing, railroad or street railway transportation, or any other industry." Chapter 6, title 14, being §§ 3153 to 3162, inclusive, Civil Code of 1913, is the legislative effort to comply with the mandate of the Constitution. Hereafter we will refer to it as the "Liability Act."

This Liability Act has declared and determined in § 3156 certain occupations in the named industries to be hazardous, and § 3155 extends the benefits of the act only to those employees engaged in manual and mechanical labor.

Among other things, it is contended by appellant that appellee was not (1) employed in an occupation declared and determined to be hazardous, nor (2) engaged in manual or mechanical labor. As to the first point made, if appellee is to receive the benefits of the act, his occupation must be one of those enumerated in subdivision 1 of § 3156, which reads as follows: "(1) The operation of steam railroads, electrical railroads, street railroads, by locomotives, engines, trains, motors, or cars of any kind propelled by steam, electricity, cable or other mechanical power, including the construction, use or repair of machinery, plants, tracks, switches, bridges, roadbeds, upon, over and by which such railway business is operated."

The arguments of both sides are directed to the 1st division of the subsection, it being the contention of appellant that appellee was not engaged in an occupation in "the operation of a railroad." Whereas appellee contends that a bill clerk's occupation is essential to the proper operation of a railroad, and is within the occupations declared to be hazardous in the operation of appellant's railroad. We will not go into this question further than to say that, as we understand the law, those persons engaged in "the operation of a railroad" are persons who have an actual physical connection with the handling, organizing, loading, unloading, and movement of trains, locomotives, engines, motors, and cars, extending sometimes to section men. Jemming v. Great Northern R. Co. 96 Minn. 302, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 696, 104 N. W.

1079; Callahan v. St. Louis Merchants' Bridge Terminal R. Co. 170 Mo. 473, 60 L.R.A. 249, 94 Am. St. Rep. 746, 71 S. W. 208; 26 Cyc. 1370. It includes those whose occupations subject them to hazards and dangers incident to and inherent in the physical part of the operation of the railroad, and not those who perform services essential to the railroad business, but not in its actual operation.

It may be that appellee's occupation falls within those named in subsection 1 as "including the construction, use or repair of machinery, plants, tracks, switches, bridges, roadbeds, upon, over and by which such railway business is operated." If the freight depot and platform, in which was the opening that appellee fell into, was a plant "by which the railway business" of appellant was in part operated, and the appellee was not without the line of his duty when using the platform as a way of returning to his work, we submit, without so deciding, that his occupation might be one of those intended to be declared and determined as hazardous by the statute. As this question was not presented to us in brief or argument, and as its decision is not necessary, as we view the case, we only suggest it, for if it be granted that he was in the use his occupation was hazardous, still he was not engaged in manual or mechanical labor.

Aside from the context, it is easy to determine that appellee, in the occupation of "billing freight, writing up the transfer book, making up tonnage reports, balancing the cashbooks, making an abstract, . . . " was not engaged in mechanical labor. The definition of "mechanical," as given by Webster, is: "(1) Of or pertaining to, or concerned with manual labor; engaged in manual labor; of the artisan class. (2) Of, pertaining to, or concerned with machinery or mechanism; made or performed by machinery or with tools."

"Mechanical labor" is labor performed by a mechanic or "one who practises any mechanical art; one skilled or employed in shaping or uniting materials, as wood materials, etc., into any kind of structure, machine, or other object requiring the use of tools or other objects, an artisan." Webster.

Taken in connection with the context, we think "mechanical labor" is such skilled labor as is necessarily employed by employers in making and repairing tools and instruments used in the operation of the business. It is manual labor, but of the skilled kind.

While the words "manual labor" might be construed to mean clerical work, we do not think any such meaning attaches to them as they are used in the context.

Workmen's
compensation—
manual labor—
clerical work.

In the first place, the hazardous occupations in mining, smelting, manufacturing, railroading, and other industries named as hazardous, exclude the idea of the office man's occupation. They are those occupations engaged: (1) In the operation of railroads, in the construction, use, and repair of machinery, etc., by which the business of railroading is carried on; (2) the use of gunpowder, etc.; (3) erection and demolition of buildings, etc.; (4) the operation of elevators, etc.; (5) work on ladders, etc.; (6) work in connection with electricity; (7) work on telegraph and telephone lines; (8) work in or about quarries, open pits, open cuts, mines, reduction works, and smelters; (9) tunnel work; and (10) work in mills, etc., operated by steam, electricity, or other mechanical power. ¶ 3156.

Labor in any of the named occupations must mean actual physical contact with the dangerous instruments and means used in carrying on the business. One of the canons of interpretation of words used in a statute is that they must be taken in their common and ordinary sense, unless, from the context, it is evident some other meaning was intended. When we speak of a person doing manual labor, the mind is instantly directed to some kind of toil in which the physical predominates over the mental. The words would never call to mind the office man engaged in keeping books, or making out bills or statements, or operating a typewriter. Even if appellee did occasionally, as an incident in his occupation as bill clerk, do manual labor in the loading and unloading of live stock and freight, it is enough to say he was not injured by any accident while so engaged. At the time of his injury, his sole occupation was that of a bill clerk. So we conclude appellee was not, at the time of the accident in which he was injured, engaged in manual or mechanical labor, and therefore is not entitled to the benefits of the Employers' Liability Act.

The meaning of the phrase, "caused by any accident due to a condition or conditions of such occupation," appearing first in the Constitution (§ 7, art. 18), and next in the Liability Act (§ 3154), as descriptive of the kind of accident intended to give rise to a right of action to an injured employee, has not as yet been construed by the court. The expression is original in our Constitution and laws. We have not been able to find it in any of the compensation or liability laws, or in any decision of a court, or in any textbook, and it, therefore, necessarily follows that it has not been defined or applied. It is evident that the accident must arise out of and also be inherent in the occupation itself; the condition or conditions that produce the accident must inhere in the occupation. If the occupation is nonhazardous, if the condition or conditions inherent therein are innocuous, the occupation and the employee therein are outside of the purview of the Constitution and likewise of the Liability Law. The legislature, in § 3155, has defined the kind of accident intended by it to be covered by the Employers' Liability Act in the following language: "By reason of the nature and conditions of, and the means used and provided for doing the work in, said occupations, such service is especially dangerous and hazardous to the workmen therein, because of risks and hazards which are inherent in such occupations and which are unavoidable by the workmen therein."

It will be noted that stress in this definition is placed upon "the means used and provided for doing the work in said occupation." In fact, the dangerous "nature and condition" of the occupation is not alone because of the work, but because of the lethal character of the means employed to do the work required of the employee. The nature and conditions of the occupation, and the means used and provided to do the work therein, are so dangerous, and the risks therefrom are so inherent, as that accident therefrom is "unavoidable by the workman therein." It would seem that, before an employee may recover for injury under this act, it must have occurred while he was at work in his occupation, and it must have been occasioned by a risk or danger inherent in the occupation.

Workmen's compensation—condition of hazardous employment.

Our statute (§ 3158) requires something more than that the "accident arise out of and in the course of the employment," an expression common to most of the liability and compensation laws, our statute being: "When in the course of work in any of the employments or occupations enumerated in the preceding section, personal injury or death by any accident arising out of and in the course of such labor, service and employment, and due to a condition or conditions of such occupation or employment."

These added words to the common expression must mean something.

The words, "arising out of," have been construed to refer to the origin or cause of the injury, and the words, "in the course of," to refer to the time, place, and circumstances under which it occurred. Workmen's Compensation Acts, p. 72, Corpus Juris. Superadded to these under our Liability Act is the requirement that the injury must have occurred in the "work," "labor, service, and employment," and be "due to a condition or conditions of such occupation." The act of appellee in going away from his work for refreshments was, it may be granted, proper and necessary; but it is also equally as apparent that during the time of his absence he was not rendering work, service, or labor for appellant, and therefore the injury he sustained while on such errand was not due to a condition or conditions of his occupation. Under our statute, the work must be hazardous, and the injury must have been incurred because of the hazard or danger in the work itself, and, because of said hazard, "unavoidable" on the part of the employee. Calumet & A. Min. Co. v. Chambers, 20 Ariz. —, 176 Pac. 839.

The danger of falling into the scale pit was not peculiar to appellee in his occupation of bill clerk. It was a danger to which persons not employees of appellant were exposed, as much as those engaged in the service of appellant. Appellee shows by his complaint, and by the testimony of himself and others, that the scale pit into which he fell was "along the route usually traveled by himself and others having business in and about defendant's freight depot." This being so, it was not a risk or hazard peculiar to his work, but one "common to the neighborhood." McNicol's Case, 215 Mass. 497, L.R.A. 1916A, 306, 102 N. E. 697, 4 N. C. C. A. 522.

If it be concluded that appellee received his injury in the course of his employment, and that it arose out of the employment, that is not enough to bring him within the statute, unless at the time of the injury he was engaged in one of the hazardous occupations named by the statute, the rule being, as laid down by the courts of New York, where the occupation, as here, must be hazardous, that "where . . . the employee's ordinary duties and accustomed scope of activities do not come exclusively or predominantly within the category of enumerated employments, and only casually and incidentally does he do work fairly falling within that category, his right to remuneration must hinge on a finding that he sustained injury while actually and momentarily doing work named in the statute. If the employer shows that the employee was not so employed when he met with injury, he is not entitled to reimbursement under the statute, even though he at times did work embraced within the statute." Gleisner v. Gross, 170 App. Div. 41, 155 N. Y. Supp. 946, 949; De Voe v. New York State R. Co. 169 App. Div. 472, 155 N. Y. Supp. 12.

Appellee contends we ought to ignore ¶ 3155 as though it were not written in our laws, and especially would he have us ignore the provision therein that limits the benefits of the act to employees doing manual and mechanical labor; for, he says, the constitutional direction to the legislature was to enact a law granting the right of action to every employee, without restriction, other than that his occupation be hazardous and in one of the industries mentioned. Without so deciding, we may suggest that the Constitution itself, in spirit and by implication, if not in terms, by providing that the benefits shall be made to extend only to those employees engaged in hazardous occupations in the businesses or industries mentioned, placed the limitation contained in the law and of which complaint is made. For is it not a fact that the hazardous occupations in the industries of mining, smelting, manufacturing, and railroad transportation are all of the kind requiring manual or mechanical labor? But, aside from this suggestion, it is the statute law, and not the Constitution, that gives the right of action. Section 7, art. 18, of the Constitution, is not self-executing, and the principle therein contained can be appropriated and applied only in so far as the legislature provides for it. Inspiration Consol. Copper Co. v. Mendez, 19 Ariz. 151, 166 Pac. 278, 1183; 12 C. J. 730, 739, 741.

The deletion of § 3155, or any part thereof, as appellee asks, would be to disregard one of the cardinal

~~Statute—construction—

rules of construction stated by Judge Cooley, as follows: "That effect is to be given, if possible, to the whole instrument and to every section and clause. If different portions seem to conflict, the courts must harmonize them, if practicable, and must lean in favor of a construction which will render every word operative, rather than one which may make some words idle and nugatory." Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. p. 70.

But it is said by appellee that this court, in Deyo v. Arizona Grading & Constr. Co. 18 Ariz. 149, L.R.A. 1916E, 1257, 157 Pac. 371, decided that the legislature, in limiting the benefits of the Employers' Liability Act to employees doing manual and mechanical labor, acted without power. What we said in that regard was not necessary to a decision of the case, and shows upon its face that it was not intended as a statement of the law. It was submitted more as a query. We said: "Whether the legislature exceeded its authority and power in restricting the beneficiaries of the law to those engaged in manual and mechanical labor only, we do not deem it necessary to determine under the facts of this case. That question was not presented in argument by counsel; but it appears to be within the reason of the rule laid down by this court in Behringer v. Inspiration Consol. Copper Co. 17 Ariz. 232, 149 Pac. 1065, in which we held that the legislature did not possess the power to enlarge the mandate of the Constitution as to the Workmen's Compulsory Compensation Law."

Anything said in that regard in the Deyo Case was tentative, and, upon reflection we conclude, unsupported by reason. If we had said, instead of what we did say, that it was the duty of the legislature to observe the mandate of the Constitution and make its legislation conform thereto, our statement would have been more in place and more correct in principle. While the legislature may not extend the constitutional provision so as to include subjects not within its purview, or that conflict with it (Behringer v. Inspiration Consol. Copper Co. supra), it is well settled that the lawmaking body may or may not, as it chooses, pass laws putting into effect a constitutional provision, and if, in its efforts to give effect to a constitutional provision, the statute is not broad and comprehensive enough to cover all subjects that it might, we know of ~~—lack of com-

as far as it goes. So it is that, if other employees than those doing manual and mechanical labor might, under the Constitution, be granted the benefits of the act, it is the duty of the legislature to so provide, and, until it does so, the beneficiaries are limited to those mentioned in the statute.

Inasmuch as the judgment will have to be reversed, and the case remanded to the trial court, there is a question involving the introduction of evidence that we feel should be settled at this time. Appellant offered as witnesses two physicians who rendered professional services to appellee, and wanted to prove by them what they discovered or learned of his condition, insisting that appellee had raised the ban of secrecy because in a previous trial he had examined one of the witnesses in regard to the same subject-matter, and had permitted the other to testify without objection. This offered testimony, upon objection that it was confidential, was rejected. This ruling is assigned as error. Our statute (Civ. Code, subd. 6, § 1677), in regard to the privileged character of information contained in his professional capacity by a physician or surgeon, from or of his patient, is peculiar, and, for that reason, the decisions of courts under statutes whose language is not the same, but widely different, would not greatly aid us in a construction of ours.

In Arizona & N. M. R. Co. v. Clark, 235 U. S. 669, 59 L. ed. 415, L.R.A.1915C, 834, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 210, it is said:

"The express object [of subdivision 6, supra] is to exclude the physician's testimony, at the patient's option, respecting knowledge gained at the bedside, in view of the very delicate and confidential nature of the relation between the parties."

And "it contemplates that the patient may testify with reference to what was communicated by him to the physician, and in that event only it permits the physician to testify without the patient's consent."

It is further said: "The act gives him [patient] the option of excluding the physician's evidence entirely by himself refraining from testifying voluntarily as to that respecting which, alone, their knowledge is equal, namely, what the patient told the physician with reference to the ailment."

If the record shows that appellee, in the former trial or in the present one, testified voluntarily as to what he "told the physician with reference to his ailment," it has not been pointed out to us. It seems, under the statute and the construction given it in the Clark Case, the patient can object to the physician testifying as to what he may have learned in his professional capacity, unless the patient has himself "testified to the communications he made to the physician." It not appearing that appellee testified to any communication made by him to the physicians, he did not waive his right to object to their testifying at the second trial, even though they did at some previous trial testify as to knowledge obtained by personal examination.

Evidence—

In Dahlquist v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. — Utah, —, 174 Pac. 833, reading at page 845, the supreme court of Utah, speaking of the Clark Case, said: "Just how the appellant in that case, under the plain words of the statute and the testimony of the plaintiff, could assume that the plaintiff, who had not testified to any communication made to his physician, had waived his privilege, is beyond our comprehension. The statute mentions one instance in which the patient's consent may be implied, namely, where he voluntarily testifies with reference to communications to his physician. By construction all others are excluded. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius."

Even if we questioned the correctness of the construction placed upon our statute, we would be inclined to defer our judgment to that of the highest Federal court, for the sake of uniformity in the administration of the law in this state.

"We think the sounder view is that the mere fact that testimony has been given at a former trial does not necessarily constitute a waiver which is irrevocable at a subsequent trial of the cause. In this view of the matter, we are influenced not only by what seems to us to be the better reason, but by the well-considered opinions of other courts. Briesenmeister v. Supreme Lodge, K. P. 81 Mich. 525, 45 N. W. 977; Burgess v. Sims Drug Co. 114 Iowa, 275, 54 L.R.A. 364, 89 Am. St. Rep. 359, 86 N. W. 307, 10 Am. Neg. Rep. 42.

"In the Iowa case cited above, Mr. Justice McClain, speaking for the court, said: 'As to the testimony at the former trial, it seems to us that the waiver resulting therefrom should be confined to the trial in which the waiver is made. Our statute relates to the giving of testimony, not to the publication in general of the privileged matter, and it seems to us clear that any waiver resulting from the giving or introduction of testimony on a trial should be limited to that trial.

"In the same case, the court, in declining to follow the New York cases, said: 'We do not agree to the reasoning in that case, which would seem to lead to the result that, if the privileged communication is in any way made public by the patient, the privilege is waived for all time; whereas, we understand it to be well settled that a communication to a third person by the patient or client will not be a waiver of the right to insist on the privilege when it is sought to have the disclosure made by the way of testimony in open court.'" Maryland Casualty Co. v. Maloney, 119 Ark. 434, L.R.A. 1916A, 519, 178 S. W. 389.

The instructions given to the jury are the ordinary instructions given in personal-injury cases arising under the common law,—as to negligence, contributory negligence, assumed risk, and safe place to work,—and we would feel constrained to affirm the judgment but for the fact that, commingled with those instructions, are others submitting the issues under the Employers' Liability Act. These last instructions, under the pleadings and the evidence, should not have been given.

There are other assignments of error; but, as they do not go to the merits of the case and are not likely to occur upon another trial, we will not notice them.

The judgment is reversed, and case remanded, with directions that further proceedings be had in accordance herewith.

ANNOTATION.

Workmen's compensation: employees within provision applicable to the "operation of railroads."

It will be observed that in the reported case (ARIZONA EASTERN R. CO. v. MATTHEWS, ante, 1149) it was held that a billing clerk was not engaged in an occupation in "the operation of a railroad" within the meaning of the Arizona Employers' Liability Act, the court stating that those persons engaged in "the operation of a railroad" are those having an actual physical connection with the handling, organizing, loading, unloading, and movements of trains, locomotives, and cars.

The test of the employee's right to the protection of the act there considered is the employee's occupation, or actual work, and not the employer's business. This is also true of the New York Workmen's Compensation Act, under which the only other cases disclosed, involving the question here considered, arose.

In Brown v. Richmond Light & R. Co. (1916) 173 App. Div. 492, 159 N. Y. Supp. 1047, a process server and claim adjuster employed by a railway company, who was injured by a passenger stepping on his foot while he was riding on one of his employer's cars, returning from serving process, was held not engaged in the operation of a railway within the meaning of the New York Workmen's Compensation Act, providing for compensation for injuries sustained by employees while engaged in certain hazardous occupations, including "the operation, including construction and repair, of railways operated by steam, electric, or other motive power." The court said: "The decedent was not in any manner employed upon, about, or in connection with the tracks or cars of the railroad, and had nothing to do at, about, or in connection with the electric light and power lines, dynamos, or appliances of the company. His employment was in the claim department of the company, which had nothing to do with the cars, the tracks, or the electric lines or appliances. His duties, and the hazards attending them, were in all respects the ordinary duties of an investigator, a process server, or claim adjuster, found in many of the large law offices. The fact that the decedent was employed by this corporation, rather than a corporation carrying on any other extensive business employing a like service, does not make his work more hazardous. The fact that he was riding upon the car of the defendant, rather than upon the car of another company, did not add to the hazards of the employment. In performing his duties it was necessary for him at times to go from one place to another. In doing so he might walk, or ride upon a bicycle, a public bus, the car of another company, an automobile, or other vehicle. At the time he was injured he was riding upon the car of his employer. If he had been riding upon the car of another company, or in a bus, and had received a similar injury, it would be a very strict rule which would hold that he was not within the law, but would have been if he had been riding upon defendant's car. In a sense the uptown ticket agent of a railroad company, at an office a mile or so from the railroad track, whose only duty is to sell tickets over the counter, is engaged in operating a railroad, for the sale of tickets is a necessary incident to carrying passengers; but if such an employee fell while passing from one room to another in his office, it could not fairly be said that his injury arose out of the hazardous business of operating a railroad. He was not engaged in that work or occupation, but was a mere clerk, selling tickets at a distance from the railroad, and having no physical connection with the railroad or its operation. If the decedent was operating a railroad, it is difficult to see why the stenographer in the office of the law department was not also operating a railroad. The statute is intended to protect employees engaged in hazardous works and occupations, and has defined the employments which the legislature deems hazardous. To be within the legislative intent, the work or occupation must subject the employee to the hazards contemplated by this law. The decedent was riding upon the car, not as an employee in the performance of a duty relating to the car, its operation, or its passengers, but was a passenger for his own personal convenience. He was subject to the same hazards as any other passenger in the car, and the hazard came, not because he was operating a railroad, but because he was riding in a car, and the hazards, so far as the accident is concerned, were no greater upon the car than they would have been upon a bus, or at any public place where people assemble. He was not necessary to or an incident to the operation of the car, and had no duty upon the car. The conductor, the engineer, the trainmen, possibly the stenographer, librarian, and barber employed by a company upon a limited car, may be considered as engaged in its operation, as, according to the rules of the company, their presence and the performance of their respective duties are necessary for the operation of the car. But the decedent had no such relation to this car, and was not in any way connected with its operation. The mere fact that an employee is in the service of a railroad company does not bring him within the act; he must be engaged in the hazardous work, or in some way be subject to the hazards arising from the nature of the work."

And it has been held that an employee was not engaged in "the operation . . . of railroads" within the New York statute defining hazardous employments, where a motorman, who had finished his day's work, signed his name to the register denoting this fact, and was run down by an automobile while he was going to have his watch tested, and was on the public highway. *De Voe v. — waiver of condition as to abstract.

5. Waiver of a provision in a contract to purchase real estate, requiring abstracts showing good title, and acceptance of deed tendered, are not shown by the fact that the deed was placed in the possession of the purchaser's attorney pending examination of the abstract and the purchaser's agent placed in charge of the property.

6. Simple notification that the abstract does not show good title is sufficient without pointing out the defects in case of a requirement of abstracts showing good title in a contract to sell real estate.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Gasconade County (Breuer, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce specific performance of a contract of sale. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Calfee & Westhues and Robert Walker, for appellant:

If defendant had accepted the warranty deed signed by plaintiff and had entered into possession of the property, such acts would not constitute any waiver by defendant of his objections to plaintiff's title and abstract of title, and defendant would not, by such acts, waive his right to insist that plaintiff comply with his contract by furnishing an abstract showing good title.

In order to constitute a waiver there must be a knowledge of the true situation.

Plaintiff cannot recover on the averments in his reply on an alleged waiver or estoppel, which constitute a departure and which are inconsistent with the allegations of his petition.

Under the facts in this case time was of the essence of the contract.

36 Cyc. 710; Ranck v. Wickwire, 255 Mo. 42, 164 S. W. 460.

Plaintiff's failure and refusal to furnish an abstract showing good title, at the time agreed upon, was a breach of the contract, and entitled defendant to rescind the contract.

The right of plaintiff to enforce specific performance and receive the purchase money is dependent upon the performance by him of the requirements of the contract on his part.

The mere fact that the title is, fairly and reasonably considered, a doubtful one, prevents the court from forcing its acceptance by an unwilling vendee. The vendee should not be compelled to accept a title which will expose him to litigation, or to bona fide adverse claims of third persons.

Pom. Spec. Perf. of Contr. 2d ed. pp. 63, 284, §§ 44, 203; 36 Cyc. 632.

A contract requiring the vendor to furnish an abstract showing a good title refers to the record title which might be epitomized on the abstract, and the purchaser will not be required to accept the title when there is a defect in the record title as shown by the abstract, which can be cured only by proving adverse possession, limitations, or estoppel, or by otherwise resorting to parol evidence.

Messrs. August Meyer, H. A. Krog, and Jesse H. Schaper, for respondent:

Under the defense set up in the answer pleading affirmatively the breach of contract by plaintiff, the reply of plaintiff pleading the waiver thereof by defendant was justified, and the same was not a departure.

Blair, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Gasconade circuit court enforcing specific performance of a contract for the purchase by appellant of certain realty in Hermann, Missouri, together with some "fixtures and personal property appertaining thereto." The property constitutes a brewery and ice plant. The contract, as a condition of the sale, required respondent to deliver to appellant "a warranty deed and an abstract showing good title" to the property involved. Appellant contends respondent did not comply, and therefore cannot recover. Respondent insists (1) he complied with the contract; and (2) appellant waived failure to comply, if failure there was.

I. The record shows, and respondent's brief concedes, that respondent's record title to a material and very substantial part of the property is bad. It may be granted that, in a suit for the specific performance of a contract for a marketable title, a title by adverse possession, if adequately proved, is sufficient to justify a judgment for the vendor. Scannell v. American Soda Fountain Co. 161 Mo. loc. cit. 618, 619, 61 S. W. 889. If one contracts merely for a marketable title, he cannot insist upon the delivery of something else. It is quite as true that, if the contract calls for something more or other than a "marketable" title, the courts cannot substitute a different contract therefor. Page v. Greeley, 75 Ill. loc. cit. 405, 406. The great weight of authority supports the rule that an abstract is an epitome of the record evidence of title; that a contract calling "for an abstract showing good title" calls for record evidence; that nothing less will "satisfy the condition no matter what the vendor's real title might be;" that "it is not sufficient that the title is good in fact,—that is, capable of being made good by the production of affidavits or other oral testimony; it must be good of record;"

that in such case title by adverse possession will not suffice. Thompson v. Dickerson, 68 Mo. App. loc. cit. 540 et seq.; Bruce v. Wolfe, 102 Mo. App. loc. cit. 389, 76 S. W. 723; Ives v. Kimlin, 140 Mo. App. loc. cit. 301, 124 S. W. 23; St. Clair v. Hellweg, 178 Mo. App. loc. cit. 666, 159 S. W. 17; Austin v. Shipman, 160 Mo. App. loc. cit. 215, 216, 141 S. W. 425; Howe v. son, Title to Real Prop. § 7, pp. 8, 9. We think the rule is sound. It follows that the title attempted to be shown by affidavits of possession was not in compliance with the contract. This view eliminates the question whether the affidavits offered constituted proof sufficient properly to show title by adverse possession.

II. Respondent urges that appellant waived the defects in the record title shown by the abstract. The question whether waiver was pleaded is presented, but we shall discuss the question on the evidence. The parties and their counsel met at Hermann on November 3d and agreed upon the terms of sale. Respondent and his wife executed a deed to appellant, and respondent signed a bill of sale for the personalty. A written contract (above referred to) was drawn and signed. It was very brief, but set out the price to be paid, the character of the deed to be executed, and that an abstract showing good title should be furnished appellant. The payment of the purchase price was conditioned upon respondent's furnishing an abstract showing good title. The strong preponderance of the evidence shows that on November 3, 1915, when the papers were drawn, the parties contemplated placing the deed and bill of sale in escrow at the Hermann Savings Bank, but that these instruments were not completed until after banking hours. The abstract, deed, and bill of sale were then turned over to appellant's attorney, who, with his client, was about to return to his home in another city. Before leaving, one Runte, who had associated or contemplated associating himself with appellant, was put in charge of the plant. The business was conducted during the ensuing week in the name of respondent, but under the supervision, if not the management, of Runte. Orders were taken and bills paid as before. These bills were paid out of receipts from the business. A small repair was made on the boiler. No notification was given the authorities of any change in ownership, though some preparation was made by respondent to do so. The parties decided to meet November 10, 1915, for the purpose of closing. Soon after November 3d, appellant's attorney notified respondent's attorney that the abstract did not show good title, and on November 10th notified respondent personally of the same fact. Further effort to complete the abstract was made. The agreement to furnish an abstract showing good title of itself ordinarily implies that time is to be allowed for its examination. No claim was made on November 3, 1915, that the purchase money was due on that day. Neither respondent nor his attorney, upon receipt of notice of the insufficiency of the abstract, contended the sale was closed, or that the fact that appellant's attorney took the deed with him on November 3d was a waiver of any part of the contract. Nor was it suggested on November 10, 1915, that possession of the deed or Runte's position in the plant constituted acceptance of title as it stood. Further effort to comply with the contract requirement concerning the abstract was the response to the notification of the defects in the title. It had been agreed on November 3d that the necessary stamps should be procured and affixed to the deed when the parties returned at a later date to close the contract. The petition itself alleges a refusal to accept the deed and bill of sale, and respondent testified flatly that it was agreed on November 3d that appellant's attorney should take the abstract to his home, "and later come back, and if it proved satisfactory to finish up the deal."

In view of all this it must be held that there was no acceptance by appellant of the deed as a conveyance. —waiver of condition as to abstract. Poplin v. Brown, 200 Mo. App. 255, 205 S. W. 411. Neither party so understood it, and respondent's testimony, corroborated by every fact proved, and his pleading, shows that the deed was not delivered or accepted in the sense that it was to convey title. Appellant himself did not have the deed in person and never agreed to its acceptance. Respondent never claimed a delivery (on November 3d) until he filed his reply in May, 1916. His petition expressly denies any acceptance by appellant. Possession, unexplained, would be a strong circumstance in respondent's favor. It is not, of itself, conclusive. In view of the evidence set out above, and of respondent's testimony in particular, it is clear that Runte's management of the plant from November 3d to November 10th was not an assertion of ownership, but was, as the direct evidence on the point also shows, taken subject to the final completion of the sale, for the purpose of familiarizing himself with the plant as quickly as possible, so that contemplated improvements and repairs might promptly be made when the sale was closed. There is no waiver and no estoppel.

III. It is suggested that appellant failed to point out the defects in the title.

(1) There is authority for the rule that under a contract like that in this case a simple notification of defects—sufficiency. abstract does not show good title is sufficient.

(2) The record shows conclusively that appellant's attorney notified respondent's attorney in writing of the particular defects and that he orally notified respondent in person thereof.

(3) The evidence shows that respondent's answer to the notification to him was that the Hermann Savings Bank, which had a deed of trust on the property, "was good enough for it." The point must be ruled against respondent.

The judgment is reversed.

Covenants and contracts for the sale of land by which the vendor agrees to furnish an abstract showing title in him to the land to which the contract relates are very generally construed to require an abstract showing title of the character contracted for as a condition precedent to the liability of the vendee to perform, unless the furnishing of such abstract is waived by the latter.

II. Necessity that abstract show record title.

a. In general.

Although, as is subsequently shown, the abstract may be explained, aided, or supplemented in certain respects, so as to show that the record is in truth in the vendor, the general rule is that a contract to furnish an abstract showing title to the land imposes the duty upon the vendor to furnish an abstract showing title of the character covenanted for; and it is very generally held that to comply with this requirement the vendor must exhibit an abstract which on its face or by reference to public records shows that he has record title to the land. A title resting in whole or in part upon parol proof is not sufficient if the purchaser is entitled to a title of record, such title being of a higher character and more desirable than one depending upon extrinsic circumstances to be established by parol evidence.

The abstract should show that the vendor owned and was able to convey the kind of title he had agreed to convey. Geithman v. Eichler (1914) 265 Ill. 579, 107 N. E. 180.

Under a contract to submit an abstract showing a perfect title, it is not enough that the title was in fact perfect, but it must appear to be such on the records of the county epitomized in the abstract. Lessenich v. Sellers (1903) 119 Iowa, 314, 93 N. W. 348.

The object of an abstract is to enable the vendee to pass on the validity of the title, and to enable him to do so it should contain everything material concerning its sources and condition. Fagan v. Hook (1905) 134 Iowa, 381, 105 N. W. 155, modified in other respects on rehearing in (1907) 134 Iowa, 390, 111 N. W. 981.

When the vendor contracts to furnish an abstract of title the agreement indicates that the vendee is to have a marketable title, and that such title is to be shown by the abstract. McCarty v. Helbling (1914) 73 Or. 356, 144 Pac. 499, supra. An agreement to give a good and sufficient warranty deed and abstract contemplates that the abstract shall present a merchantable title which is clear as shown by the record, and does not require litigation to complete. Raddatz v. Christner (1919) — Neb. —, 178 N. W. 677. A contract to furnish an abstract showing a perfectly clear title is not complied with unless the abstract itself proves a title of this character. Slade v. Crum (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 193 S. W. 723, supra.

In Smith v. Taylor (1890) 82 Cal. 583, 23 Pac. 217, an agreement to refund a deposit upon the purchase price if the abstract which the vendor agreed to furnish did not show a good title was held to require title of record, and hence the vendee was not bound to make any investigation outside of the abstract.

In Annand v. Austin (1917) 86 Or. 403, 167 Pac. 1017, 168 Pac. 725, the contract provided for the payment of a certain portion of the purchase price "when the title was found to be marketable by an abstract of title." It appeared that the title of the vendor according to the abstract furnished depended upon public records and evidence other than that disclosed by the abstract. Under these circumstances the abstract was held not sufficient. The court said that the question is not whether the title of vendor was actually marketable as disclosed by public records and by evidence other than that disclosed by the abstract. Compare with Welch v. Dutton (Ill.) infra, III. d.

In Buswell v. O. W. Kirk Co. (1910) 112 Minn. 388, 128 N. W. 459, 21 Ann. Cas. 837, it was held that a contract by the vendor to furnish an abstract of title, although expressed in meager terms, nevertheless contemplated that within a reasonable time after the execution of the contract and the making of the first payment by a note, the vendor was to furnish an abstract of title which upon its face should show that he possessed a good title of record to the land purchased. The court said there was nothing to suggest that the vendee was to acquire information as to the state of the title by any other means than the abstract.

53 Wash. 32, 101 Pac. 489, supra, an agreement to furnish an abstract showing a good and sufficient title was held to contemplate a record title. The court said that it is established beyond the necessity of citing authority that under a contract like this the vendee is entitled to a marketable title. He cannot be put to the trouble of hunting up testimony outside of the record or of ascertaining whether or not there are any minor heirs, but he has a right to a clear title as shown by the record.

In Austin v. Shipman (1911) 160 Mo. App. 206, 141 S. W. 425, the vendor contracted to convey to the vendee in fee simple, clear of all encumbrances whatever, by good and sufficient warranty deed and abstract of title. The court said that this contract evidently meant that the grantor will assure a fee-simple title—"a title clear of all encumbrances (excepting, of course, the deed of trust, which the grantee was to assume), and, having first furnished an abstract showing such a title, convey by a good and sufficient warranty deed. He could not convey by an abstract of title; nor could he assure a fee-simple title, clear of all encumbrances, by a good and sufficient warranty deed. Therefore, in order to give any meaning whatever to the words, 'and abstract of title,' it must be held that the intention was to assure a clear title by an abstract of the record transfers."

In Bowles v. Umberson (1907) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 101 S. W. 842, the contention was made by the vendor that he performed his agreement to furnish a complete abstract of title to the land by furnishing one which showed all the records disclosed of the title to the land, though it failed to show a perfect title. In denying this contention, the court said: "If this contention can be sustained, it would follow that it was not essential to the sale that the title to the land, upon examination of the abstract, should be found good; and, therefore, it was unnecessary for the plaintiffs to aver that the abstract of title furnished should show a good title in plaintiffs to the land. There must have been some purpose in requiring the plaintiffs to furnish the defendant 'a complete abstract of title to the said land.' We need not grope in the dark to discover it; for it is obvious from the very nature of the contract, as well as from the face of the written agreement, it was to enable the defendant to ascertain from an examination of it whether plaintiffs' title to the premises was good. 'Title' simply means 'ownership.' One who claims ownership in land and agrees to furnish another, contemplates buying from him, a complete abstract of title to it, does so for the purpose of showing thereby that he is the owner, and can confer, by sale, title or ownership in him who desires to buy. The very fact that the one who desires to sell agrees to furnish the one who wants to purchase an abstract of title indicates that the title under which he claims is of such character that a complete abstract can be made of it, and that it is not such that must appear outside of such records and instruments as abstracts of title are made from. Such, for instance, as title by limitation, of which there can be no record or paper. The contract itself stipulates that 'the parties of the first part agree to furnish a complete abstract of title . . . in ample time for the party of the second part to have same examined within thirty days from the date hereof, and if said title is found to be good then they agree,' etc. The obvious meaning of the agreement is that the title must be 'found good' before either of the parties is required to go a step farther in the transaction, or either can acquire any rights, or incur any liability under the agreement. By or through what means is the title to be 'found good?' Clearly, by means of the 'abstract of title to be furnished in ample time for the party of the second part to have the same examined within thirty days from the date of the agreement.'"

In Attebery v. Blair (1910) 244 Ill. 363, 135 Am. St. Rep. 342, 91 N. E. 475, it is said: "A purchaser may, of course, contract for a patent title or a perfect paper title, and may refuse to accept any other, but all the facts upon which title depends are not of record, and are not shown by abstracts, and one who gets a perfect paper title may, after all, acquire no real or beneficial title. In this case Blair was not bound to accept a title resting merely upon adverse possession under the Statute of Limitations, but the essence of the contracts was that he should have conveyances giving him a good title, free and clear from encumbrances, and that such a title should be shown by the abstracts. It was not implied that the abstracts should show matters not of record or all the facts and circumstances connected with the conveyances which might affect the title, such as possession, who were the legal heirs of a deceased owner where administration was not had within the jurisdiction, and matters of that kind. An abstract of title is, in a legal sense, a summary or epitome of the facts relied on as evidence of title, and it must contain a note of all conveyances, transfers, or other facts relied on as evidences of the claimant's title, together with all such facts appearing of record as may impair the title."

There is a distinction between actual and apparent breaks in the record chain of title in so far as concerns the question under consideration as to the right of the vendee to a record title where the vendor contracts to furnish an abstract showing his title. In this regard it may be said that the authorities are in substantial accord in holding that where there is an actual break in the chain of title, and to show title in himself the vendor must resort to evidence of extrinsic matters, he cannot in this way supplement the abstract and require the vendee to accept the title, even though, as a matter of fact, he establishes title to the land. Where, however, the break in the chain of title is apparent only, while the cases are not agreed in the matter, there is good authority for the statement that the abstract may be supplemented by explanatory affidavits or other instruments in writing or reference to public records (other than the ordinary real property records) which show that, as a matter of fact, the vendor has a record title to the property. That is to say, extrinsic instruments may be resorted to where the purpose is merely to show that in truth the title, as disclosed by the abstract, represents a complete and continuous chain of conveyances from the original owner to the vendor, and the instruments are not for the purpose of importing into the record a new title or instrument of conveyance.

But in Moser v. Tucker (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 195 S. W. 259, supra, it is held that where the vendee had stipulated that the abstract shall show a marketable title, the covenant will be construed to mean a good record title, and not such a title as may be shown to be good by oral proof or affidavits and other writings not subject to registration.

And in Howe v. Coates (1906) 97 Minn. 385, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1170, 114 Am. St. Rep. 723, 107 N. W. 397, supra, the rule is stated that under a contract to furnish an abstract showing a marketable title, the vendee is not required to resort to evidence dehors the record. It is not sufficient that the title is good in fact, that is capable of being made good by produc-

1. In general.

Affidavits of credible persons having personal knowledge of the facts may be resorted to to supplement abstracts, in order to explain apparent breaks or defects in the record chain of title by showing that, as a matter of fact, the record presents continuous transfers from the different title owners down to the present vendor. The affidavits, however, must disclose sufficient facts to show that the record title is in fact complete.

In this regard it is to be remembered that affidavits presented with an abstract are ex parte statements, and the affiants are not subjected to cross-examination, hence the statements contained in the affidavit should leave nothing to conjecture. Clark v. Jackson (1906) 222 Ill. 13, 78 N. E. 6.

In Clark v. Jackson (Ill.) supra, it is pointed out that where it is sought to cure an apparent break in a chain of title by affidavit showing that subsequent grantors were the sole heirs at law of the record holder of the title, such affidavits should not be based upon a conclusion of the affiants, but they should contain statements of the facts as to the family history of the deceased with reference to the heirship, and state in this regard whether or not the deceased was survived by children, and, if so, whether or not such children are still surviving, and if they have deceased, it should appear who their heirs are.

In Linscott v. Moseman (1911) 84 Kan. 541, 114 Pac. 1088, supra, the abstract showed an oil or gas lease upon the land the vendor had contracted to convey. This defect in the title was held not cured by an affidavit attached to the abstract reciting that the lease was void for noncompliance with its terms in that no work had been done under it, the affidavit failing to identify the affiant or to show his place of residence or that he would be available as a witness to the facts to which the affidavit related.

2. Heirship.

An apparent break in the record chain of title is caused by the death of the record owner of the land, and a subsequent conveyance thereof by his heirs. This apparent defect, by the weight of authority, may be cured by affidavits sufficiently identifying the heirs, and showing their right to convey the premises free and clear of any liability for the debts of the ancestor. (As to the sufficiency of the affidavit see supra, a, 1.)

Illinois.—Attebery v. Blair (1910) 244 Ill. 363, 135 Am. St. Rep. 342, 91 N. E. 475; Clark v. Jackson (1906) 222 Ill. 13, 78 N. E. 6.

Washington.—Crosby v. Wynkoop (1910) 56 Wash. 475, 106 Pac. 175. (As to the right to show heirship by a recital in the instrument of conveyance, see infra, III. b.)

In Attebery v. Blair (Ill.) supra, objections were made to the abstract that it did not show the issuance of patents, although showing purchase of the land from the government; nor did it show that certain deeds in the chain of title were under the seals of the grantors or seals of the officers taking the acknowledgments; that it did not appear whether or not certain grantors and mortgagors were married or single, and it was not shown of record who were the heirs of deceased owners. These defects or irregularities were held to be cured by affidavits attached to the abstract. The court said that "affidavits are as satisfactory evidence of such facts as a statement by the grantor himself in the instrument or the certificate of the officer taking the acknowledgment, which is nothing more than the statement of a matter which the officer is not required or authorized to certify to so as to make his certificate evidence of the fact. Either the certificate or the affidavit is accepted in real estate transactions as evidence of the fact."

In Prichard v. Mulhall (Iowa) supra, a contract to furnish an abstract showing a good and perfect title in the vendor was held to have been complied with although a break in the chain of title was shown by the abstract, the abstract being supplemented by affidavits in this regard showing that certain grantors in the deed in the chain of title were the sole heirs at law of the preceding record holder of the title. The affidavits also showed the payment of the debts of the deceased. The court said that the affidavit showing the payment and discharge of all the debts, especially in view of the fact that four years had elapsed after the death of the intestate, and the further fact that the vendee made no objection to the abstract after its correction and return after objections had been made thereto, was a sufficient answer to the statement that the abstract did not show title.

In Van Gundy v. Shewey (Kan.) supra, it appeared that a deed in the chain of title was executed by the reputed heirs of a deceased owner of the land. It was held that the abstract might be supplemented by attaching to it affidavits of creditable persons having knowledge of the facts and showing that the deceased owner died intestate, that all claims against his estate had been satisfied, and that the grantors were his sole heirs and, all of them had capacity to convey.

In Austin v. Shipman (Mo.) supra, it appeared that there was an apparent break in the chain of title and this the vendor undertook to cure by an affidavit attached to the abstract showing that this apparent break was due to the death of the owner of the land and the conveyance thereof by his heirs. It did not, however, appear that there had been any administration of the decedent's estate or the payment of his debts, and upon this ground the abstract was held defective, since if the decedent was indebted at the time of his death and these debts had not been paid, they remained upon his estate.

Upon this point, in Jaeger v. Harr (Or.) supra, the court said: "In addition to what may be acquired from the public records, further information may also be necessary and should be furnished by the vendor from other sources than the public records. In cases of descent, where there has been no administration or probate record, additional information of heirship or descent may be supplied by affidavits or other means. Also in regard to marriages, of which no record is ordinarily kept, 'yet, even where such registers are kept, the information they furnish must often be supplemented by evidence aliunde, in order to show identity of person. This evidence usually takes the form of an affidavit, reciting the facts. Such affidavits being only ex parte statements, and because, not being made under the sanction of a court, or in any legal proceeding, are not strictly evidence for any purpose, yet, being usually all that can be adduced, they are resorted to by counsel under a choice of difficulties, and have been, as it were, by common consent of the profession, adopted as competent proof in the examination of titles and the testimony taken as corroborative evidence of general reputation, etc. Again, such affidavits, though inadmissible under the rules of evidence, are valuable for the reason that they show that living persons can at the time establish the facts thereto recited.'"

In Crosby v. Wynkoop (Wash.) supra, a contract to convey a good title, as shown by an abstract, was held not complied with where it appeared that in the chain of title, as shown by the abstract, there was a conveyance by persons claiming to be the heirs of one of the grantors, and there was no evidence to show that such persons were the heirs except an ex parte affidavit filed for record in the office of the county auditor.

In Campbell v. Harsh (1912) 31 Okla. 436, 122 Pac. 127, however, it is held that neither recitals in deeds of conveyance nor affidavits showing that subsequent grantors in a chain of title are the sole heirs at law of the record title holder are sufficient to cure a defect in a record title as shown by the abstract, where, by the terms of the contract, the vendor agreed to exhibit an abstract showing a perfect title in him. The broad view is taken in this case that apparent breaks in the chain of title cannot be cured by recitals in deeds in the chain of title or by affidavits attached to the abstract.

3. Identity.

Where there is a question as to the identity of a grantor in one instrument in the chain of title with that of a grantee in a preceding instrument, due to a misspelling of the Christian name or to the use of the full surname in one instrument and only the initials in the other, and the like, such identification may be made by affidavit of some credible person having knowledge of the facts.

Texas.—Hollifield v. Landrum (1903) 31 Tex. Civ. App. 187, 71 S. W. 979; Sparkman v. Davenport (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 160 S. W. 410. (As to the right to identify grantor with grantee in preceding instrument in the chain of title, see infra, III. b.)

In Attebery v. Blair (Ill.) supra, it is pointed out that where the initials of a party are given, the identity may be shown by other evidence and by the fact that no adverse claim was ever set up to the property. In this case the name of the grantee was spelled Felker, when his name, in fact, was Felkel, and it was shown by affidavit that the name was so spelled through error; that no person by the name of Felker ever had or claimed any interest in the land.

In Hollifield v. Landrum (Tex.) supra, it appeared that the contract merely provided that if the title to the property was good and possession was not taken within a certain time after the delivery of the abstract, the vendee should forfeit the deposit money paid. This contract was held to require an abstract showing record title, and it was held that this abstract might be supplemented by an affidavit showing that an apparent break in the title was due to the fact that the grantee in one deed in the chain of title and the executing grantor in the next deed in the chain of title were one and the same person, although, in executing the deed as grantor, he did not use the same name as that used in the deed conveying title to him.

In Geithman v. Eichler (Ill.) supra, it appeared that the abstract showed a conveyance of the land to one Noah C. Anderson. The next conveyance was by Noah C. Amiston as grantor. It was conceded that the abstract might have been supplemented by evidence of facts and circumstances explanatory of the record, showing that the insertion in the deed of the name "Anderson" was a mistake and that the conveyance was actually to Amiston. The court said that in such case the requirement of the covenant to convey a marketable title to be shown by an abstract would have been complied with; but in the absence of any such parol evidence, the abstract was held to be insufficient.

4. In relation to limitations or adverse possession.

In Eberhardt v. Miller (1897) 71 Ill. App. 215, it was held that an abstract was sufficient in connection with affidavits making it appear that possession of the vendor was under a tax title and there were no persons interested in the title to the land who were under disability through infancy or coverture or any other cause, and that prescriptive title in the vendor by possession for twenty years matured within a short time after the vendee had purchased the land, and that the vendor also claimed title by reason of possession under his tax deeds and the payment of taxes for more than seven years, at the time he entered into the agreement to convey. The court said: "Very few titles are perfect in and of the record. Where there is a change of ownership by operation of law consequent upon the death of the owner intestate, it is necessary to prove by parol upon whom the title is cast, and where title is based in whole or in part upon the operation of the Statutes of Limitation, parol proof is necessary with reference to possession and the like. We suppose it is the usual practice in making abstracts of title to manifest such facts by the affidavits of persons cognizant thereof, and while such affidavits are not legal proof of the matters therein set forth, they are usually accepted as sufficient for the purpose." See infra, III. e.

However, in Adkins v. Gillespie (Tex.) infra, III. e, it is held that under a contract to furnish an abstract showing a marketable title, the showing of title by limitations based upon an ex parte affidavit attached to the abstract is wholly insufficient. The court said that the mere ex parte affidavit of the party as to limitations forming part of the abstract of the title, even when placed of record, is purely hearsay, and not admissible in evidence, and hence not record evidence of title. See infra.

In Singer v. Guy Invest. Co. (1910) 60 Wash. 674, 111 Pac. 886, it appeared that there was a defect in the abstract of title in that it did not show whether a certain grantor in an instrument in the chain of title was married or single when she acquired the property. This defect was held to be cured by an affidavit by this grantor to the effect that she was a widow at the time she acquired title to the property. The court said that such an affidavit was certainly as binding as a mere recital in a deed. And see to the same effect Jaeger v. Harr (Or.) supra, III. b, 3.

In Sparkman v. Davenport (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 160 S. W. 410, supra, one of the conveyances in the chain of title was by the executor and the widow and persons claiming to be the devisees under the will of the record owner of the title. It was held that in absence of any showing by affidavit that the grantors in the deed were the only parties entitled to the land under the devise, the mere declaration in the deed that the grantors were the only parties who by the will of the record owner had any title or interest in the land was not sufficient.

In Peckham v. Stewart (1893) 97 Cal. 147, 31 Pac. 928, a contract entitled the vendee to a perfect title of record. Such title was held not possessed by the vendor where, in the chain of title, there was a conveyance to a person by the name of K. F. Redmond and a subsequent conveyance in the name of K. F. Redman, although the instrument of conveyance contained a recital that the grantor derived title to the land under the name of K. F. Redmond, which name was erroneously written, but that the grantor was the identical person to whom such conveyance was in fact made.

Where the abstract shows a mortgage foreclosure under a power of sale contained in the mortgage, it is not sufficient if the foreclosure deed recites that the mortgage contained such a power of sale. Bryan v. Straus Bros. (1909) 157 Mich. 49, 121 N. W. 301.

In Campbell v. Harsh (1912) 31 Okla. 436, 122 Pac. 127, it is held that neither recitals in deeds nor affidavits are sufficient to cure a gap in the chain of title due to the death of the record owner and the subsequent conveyance of the land by his heirs.

However, in Singer v. Guy Invest. Co. (1910) 60 Wash. 674, 111 Pac. 886, supra, in holding an affidavit sufficient as to whether or not a certain grantor in an instrument in the chain of title was married or single when she acquired the title, the court remarked that such an affidavit was certainly as binding as a mere recital in a deed.

d. Letters.

In Welch v. Dutton (1875) 79 Ill. 465, a contract to furnish an abstract, with a provision that if the abstract showed a good title, the vendee was to pay a certain sum of money, was held not to require an abstract on its face showing a good title, where the abstract was supplemented by letters from the state auditor's office containing statements as to the records in that office which, together with the abstract, evidenced a good title in the vendor. But see upon the point of extrinsic records Annand v. Austin (Or.) supra, II. 1.

(As to the right to complete a record title by affidavits showing title by limitations or adverse possession see supra, b, 4.)

Where the vendor covenants to furnish an abstract showing his title to the land, it is not enough that as a matter of fact he has a good title to the land, but he must exhibit an abstract showing such title; in other words, a title of record is required. This is to be shown by the abstract, hence it is very generally held that since the title by adverse possession is not a title of record and is necessarily dependent upon evidence of facts extrinsic to the abstract, a title of this character does not comply with the contract.

It has been held that a break in the chain of title cannot be cured by adverse possession where the contract is to convey the land by warranty deed with abstract showing good title. The court said that "the title may be good; but one to whom an abstract showing good title has been promised as a condition precedent is not bound to accept any evidence thereof except that contained in the abstract. The vendee in such a case is not required to accept or rely on parol evidence of title, or information dehors the records, or the word of the vendor. That the title was not only to be good, but that the abstract was to so exhibit it, was a valuable consideration in entering into the agreement; for everyone recognizes the superior salability of land with good paper title." Fagan v. Hook (Iowa) supra.

In McLane v. Petty (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 159 S. W. 891, the court said that an agreement to furnish an abstract showing a good title was not complied with where the abstract indicated that the title to a portion of the land depended upon a limitation

In Ogooshevitz v. Arnold (1917) 197 Mich. 203, 163 N. W. 946, modified on rehearing in (1917) 197 Mich. 212, 165 N. W. 633, it was held that an agreement to furnish an abstract showing a clear title was not complied with by giving evidence of a clear title by prescription, such title not being established of record and resting upon parol testimony. The court said that "a clear title, as matter of record and as shown by abstract, is one thing; while a clear title by prescription, made good by the Statute of Limitations, and presumptions which may arise from undisputed possession, and shown by parol testimony, is another thing. They are by no means synonymous terms. We know, as matter of common knowledge, that, in buying and selling real estate, abstracts are usually desired by the purchaser, in order that they may be submitted to those skilled in the law for an opinion as to their validity. A clear title, as matter of record, is much more desirable, much more valuable, much more salable, than one depending for validity upon the testimony and memory of witnesses. A clear title, shown to be such by an abstract, and resting on the record, was one of the valuable considerations of this contract. It was what the parties contracted for, and the obligation to furnish it was not discharged by furnishing any other title."

In Wright v. Glass (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 174 S. W. 717, it appeared that the contract was for an abstract of title to be sent to a designated person for examination. The contract was held to require an abstract showing a record title. The court said that "contracting, as the parties did, for an abstract of the title to the land, and that it should be sent to an attorney of the purchaser for examination, comprehends the purpose of the parties that the abstract exhibited should be subject to reasonable examination and approval by the purchaser. A provision that the abstract should be first sent to an attorney 'for examination' would be meaningless unless construed as words intended to be appropriate to a condition that if after reasonable examination by the attorney the abstract exhibited failed to show a good title in the vendor, the purchaser was not then bound to consummate the purchase and should not forfeit his earnest money. There would be no necessity for an 'abstract to the land' unless it was for the purpose of exhibiting a record title. As ordinarily used and understood 'an abstract' is simply a compilation in abridged form of the record of the title. In this meaning of the term, as commonly understood, such construction of the contract should be adopted as would require an abstract showing a good record title. Anything less than this would not satisfy the term and carry out the implied intention of the parties. The terms used by the parties exclude, it is thought, any expectation on the part of the purchaser that there would be offered to him a title by limitation, depending, as it does, upon facts outside of and independent of the records. In the absence of adjudication in some way, a title by limitation is not settled."

In Stevenson v. Polk (1887) 71 Iowa, 278, 32 N. W. 840, it appeared that the vendor had agreed to furnish an abstract, but he did not trace his title back to the government by introducing in evidence deeds from the grantors. He simply showed the conveyance of the real estate to him, and that he had been in open, notorious, and undisturbed possession of the premises for more than ten years. This was held sufficient evidence of title. The court said: "The intestate agreed that he would furnish an 'abstract.' This we understand to mean that he would furnish an abstract of the records in the recorder's office, and of all the records showing title in himself. The object of this abstract was to enable the defendants to determine as to the sufficiency of the title, and facilitate their examination of the records. The abstract furnished showed to whom the land was conveyed by the government, and by and to whom it was afterwards conveyed. Such abstract was examined by the defendants or their attorneys, and certain objections made thereto. Certain defects were pointed out. It is not pleaded as a defense that the intestate did not have a title to any specific part of the land, but that such title was defective only. We therefore think the plaintiffs were not required to trace their title back to the government, by the introduction of deeds or other evidences of title. The title of the intestate was shown and exhibited by the abstract, and the defendants were required either to accept or reject it within a reasonable time. They were in no respect bound by it. But it amounted to an exhibition of title on the part of the intestate, and should have the same effect as if he had placed in the hands of the defendants all patents and deeds showing such a title as the defendants were entitled to under contract, which undoubtedly was a fee-simple title which would vest in them absolute ownership of the real estate free of encumbrances."

In Page v. Greeley (1874) 75 Ill. 400, supra, it is held that a title by adverse possession does not meet the requirements of a covenant to exhibit and convey a good title of record, since such title is based upon extrinsic facts in parol. The court said that where a purchaser has contracted for a good title of record, and, upon a bill filed by the vendor, it appeared that the latter had not such title as he covenanted to convey, for the court to permit the vendor to establish a title dependent upon adverse possession under a statute of limitations, and compel the vendee to take that as a substitute for what was contracted for, is, in effect, for the court to make a new contract for the parties, and then execute it. In the very nature of things, a good title of record in real estate must be more reliable, and consequently more valuable and desirable, than one dependent upon a variety of extrinsic circumstances to be established by parol evidence.

In McDennis v. Finch (1916) 197 Ala. 76, 72 So. 352, supra, the agreement was to furnish an abstract of title to be approved by the attorneys for the vendee. Title by adverse possession was held not sufficient, especially where the character and continuity of the possession involved matters of such uncertainty as could only be removed by judicial proceedings.

In Nicholson v. Lieber (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 153 S. W. 641, an agreement by the vendor to furnish an abstract of title brought down to date was held to require an abstract showing the record title, and was not complied with by an abstract which was incomplete without the aid of evidence establishing title by adverse possession.

In Hennig v. Smith (1915) 151 N. Y. Supp. 444, it appeared that the vendor contracted to furnish the vendee an abstract showing a good and marketable title. This contract was held to require a title which would appear to be marketable by the abstract, and not by way of adverse possession.

In Bruce v. Wolfe (1903) 102 Mo. App. 384, 76 S. W. 723, supra, an agreement to give a clear abstract of title showing title fully vested in the vendor was held not complied with by an abstract showing that an early deed in the chain of title misdescribed the land, and this defect is not cured by evidence showing such occupation of the land as would vest title in the vendor under the Statute of Limitations.

In Thompson v. Dickerson (1897) 68 Mo. App. 535, supra, a break in the chain of title was held not susceptible of being cured by proof of adverse possession, where the contract was to furnish an abstract showing a fee-simple title.

In Lake Erie Land Co. v. Chiliniski (1917) 197 Mich. 214, 163 N. W. 929, supra, it is held that where a contract for the sale of real estate provides for the delivery by the vendor of an abstract showing merchantable title, if the abstract does not on its face show a merchantable title and it requires parol proof to establish the fact that the title is merchantable, the contract is not complied with, hence, title by adverse possession is not sufficient.

206, 96 N. E. 997, supra, the rule is stated that where the language of the contract requires the vendor to furnish the vendee with a perfect record title and an abstract showing the same, the purchaser will not be required to accept a title dependent upon adverse possession.

In Attebery v. Blair (1910) 244 Ill. 363, 135 Am. St. Rep. 342, 91 N. E. 475, the rule is stated that where a purchaser has contracted for a good title of record, a court of equity will not compel him to take a title depending upon adverse possession under a statute of limitations.

In Kane v. Rippey (1893) 24 Or. 333, 33 Pac. 936, it is held that a good record title is required under a contract to furnish an abstract of title showing a good clear title free from defects. The court said that it may be true that the title, tested by the original record and conveyances and other facts not upon the face of the abstract, is good and free from defects. It may be true that the curative acts will obviate the objection suggested, and that the Statute of Limitations would bar the uncanceled encumbrance, but these are matters which may involve litigation or judicial inquiry to determine the validity of title. The title as disclosed by the abstract is not the good title the defendants agreed to convey.

In the reported case (DANZER v. MOERSCHER, ante, 1162) it is held that a title by adverse possession will not comply with a contract by the vendor to deliver to the vendee a warranty deed and an abstract showing good title, and it is pointed out that the great weight of authority supports the rule that an abstract is an epitome of the record evidence of title, and where the vendor contracts to furnish an abstract showing good title, nothing less will satisfy the condition for a record title, no matter what the vendor's real title may be.

In this connection attention is called to Jamison v. Van Auken (1919) — Mo. —, 210 S. W. 404, decided by the same court a few months prior to the decision in the DANZER CASE. The opinion is by Woodson, J., and is concurred in by Graves, J. In this case the vendor contracted to furnish an abstract showing good merchantable title. As to the effect of this contract, Woodson, J.,—while conceding that where the terms of the contract show that it was the intention of the parties that the vendor should furnish an abstract of title and show a perfect title in him to the real estate by the records, and the vendee was to purchase the land only upon such showing made by the abstract, he would be under no legal obligation to accept a title, though good and merchantable, if not shown by the abstract—declares that while such a contract might be drawn and executed, and if so drawn the courts would enforce it, points out, however, that when the subject and purpose of an abstract are considered “we seriously doubt that such a contract was ever intentionally drawn and executed. What we mean is that the purpose of an abstract of the record of the title to a piece of real estate is not simply to show that the paper title is perfect as it appears of record, but it is also to show in addition thereto that the vendor has the actual title thereto, the latter is of paramount importance while the former is duly incidental thereto, pointing out the evidences of the real title.” The title of the vendor involved in this case was sustained on two grounds, one that a title by adverse possession sufficiently complied with the contract and the other on the ground that the vendee, having gone into possession of the land and still retaining possession, he could not refuse to pay the purchase price. Upon this latter ground, Blair, P. J., and Bond, J., concur in the result, i. e., the specific performance of the contract in behalf of the vendor.

It would seem, however, that there may be circumstances disclosed by the abstract so clearly showing title by limitations or adverse possession, as to make the record title sufficient. (In this connection see supra, b, 4, as to the right by means of affidavits attached to the abstract to show title by limitations or adverse possession.)

299, 48 N. E. 527, it was apparently assumed that the vendee was entitled to a record title, and upon this assumption it was held that title by adverse possession was not sufficient, at least where, to sustain the vendor's title, the vendee would be required to resort to parol evidence, and the validity of the title might depend upon an issue of fact as to which some dispute might arise.

In Alling v. Vander Stucken (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 194 S. W. 443, the vendor contracted to furnish a complete abstract showing marketable title. It was held that unless the abstract exhibited showed facts upon which to base a title by limitations, such title cannot be relied upon as a compliance with the contract.

In St. Clair v. Hellweg (1918) 173 Mo. App. 660, 159 S. W. 17, it is held that where a contract calls for an abstract showing a good title, title by adverse possession is thereby eliminated, since title by adverse possession is not ordinarily evidenced by an abstract.

In Redman v. Adams (1901) 165 Mo. 60, 65 S. W. 300, the contract was to furnish an abstract showing title to be free and clear of all encumbrances, and showing title sufficiently good and satisfactory to vendee. The abstract tendered failed to show a record title in the vendor, and the latter depended upon the Statute of Limitations, based upon possession of the land, to establish his title. This was held not sufficient, at least without attempting to show the termination of outstanding rights of others by evidence that they were and are sui juris, and not under any disability.

In Beeler v. Sims (1914) 91 Kan. 757, 139 Pac. 371, supra, the court remarked that if the abstract showed title from the record alone, it would be sufficient, or if it showed title from the record aided by adverse possession, it might be sufficient. On rehearing of the case, however, in (1914) 93 Kan. 213, 144 Pac. 237, it is said that a contract to furnish an abstract showing a marketable title is not complied with by exhibiting one that purports to show by affidavit only that the fee title which appears by the abstract to be outstanding has been divested by limitation or adverse possession.

In Forsyth v. Leslie (1902) 74 App. Div. 517, 77 N. Y. Supp. 826, defects in the record abstract growing out of undischarged mortgages were held not to affect the marketable title of the land where these mortgages had reached maturity from seventy-five to eighty years prior to the time in question. On the same ground, the lapse of over eighty years was held to have cured and defect arising from the fact that the heirs of a record owner of the property had conveyed title to the land, a search in this connection being supplemented by an affidavit, the contents of which, however, were not disclosed in the opinion.

In Parr v. Lovegrove (1857) 4 Drew. 176, 62 Eng. Reprint, 68, the court said that "the first inquiry, whether a good title can be made, means, not only that the vendor shows on his abstract such documents and facts that if the documents are produced and the facts proved, he has a good title, but that the vendor has shown that he can produce the documents and prove the facts." Another branch of the inquiry is, When is a good title first shown in the abstract? And if, on the face of the abstract, "the vendor has shown, say a sixty years' title, and if, for the purpose of supporting that title, it is necessary to show that such a person died intestate or any other fact—if the facts are alleged with sufficient specification on the abstract then that abstract shows a good title, although the proof of the matters shown may be the subject of ulterior investigation." v.

INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION of the State of California et al.

(— Cal. —, 185 Pac. 179.)

Workmen's compensation — transfer of germs — chain of causation.

1. That germs from an infected wound on the foot reached the face of the injured person by external means rather than through the system does not break the chain of causation between the original injury and death resulting from the facial infection, and prevent an award of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

— source of infection — evidence.

2. The Industrial Accident Commission may award compensation for the death of an employee due to infection of his face after a foot injured in the course of his employment had become infected, on the testimony of medical witnesses that the foot was the most probable source of infection of the face.

— determination of question of fact — proximate cause.

3. Whether or not infection of the face from a wound of the foot received in the course of one's employment is the proximate result of the wound so as to require compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act is a question of fact for the Industrial Accident Commission to determine.

— negligence in attempting home treatment.

4. A workman with an injured foot is not, as matter of law, so negligent as to prevent an award of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

tion Act in attempting to treat the foot at home with witch-hazel and iodine, after it had been dressed at the hospital and he had been told to report again at the hospital, if the injury did not seem serious.

PETITION for a writ of certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to claimants in a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for the death of their decedent alleged to have been caused by an injury received in the course of his employment with petitioner. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Wilson & Wilson for petitioner.

Messrs. A. E. Graupner, Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., and F. A. Devlin, for respondents:

The Commission was justified in finding that the facial infection was caused by the transfer of infective material from the infected toe.

Lennon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Certiorari directed to the Industrial Accident Commission. The return of the respondent Commission reveals the following facts:

The proceeding was instituted by an application for benefits under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Stat. 1917, p. 831), presented by the guardian ad litem and trustee of the incompetent wife and minor child of John Caffrey, deceased, whose death was alleged to have been caused by an injury received in the course of his employment and arising out of the employment. It appears that on Friday, July 26, 1918, Caffrey sustained a contused wound on the great toe of his right foot while engaged in the service of the petitioner. He continued at his work on Saturday, and also on the following Monday. On Monday he had the toe dressed by Dr. Marvin at the emergency hospital of the Union Iron Works. On Tuesday, July 30th, the foot was so painful that after starting to work he returned home and undertook to treat the toe himself. He first complained of a swelling of the face on August 1st. On the following day, the symptoms of the face becoming alarming, Caffrey was removed to a hospital, where it was discovered that there was a streptococcic infection of the injured toe. The skin surrounding the toe was in an erysipelatos condition and there was a development of erysipelas on the face. The facial infection resulted in septicemia, from which Caffrey died on August 8, 1918.

The Commission found that the germs which caused the facial infection were carried from the toe to the face by external means, and that Caffrey's death was proximately caused by the original injury. It is contended on behalf of petitioner that these findings are not justified by the evidence.

The medical testimony upon which the Commission based its finding that the germs which caused the facial infection were carried from the toe to the face by external means was, in effect, that such a method of transfer was exceedingly common, the transmission of the germs being very readily accomplished, that there was no reason to suppose that the infection had come from another source than the toe, and that, while it was within the realm of possibility for the infection to have come from another source, such hypothesis was so very much the least probable that it seemed useless to theorize as to such possibility in the face of facts indicating that the germs "certainly must have been carried" from the foot.

It is contended on behalf of petitioner that this evidence shows that the opinion of the experts that the infection of the face was due to germs carried from the toe was pure "guesswork." The testimony shows, however, that the experts were not indulging in mere conjecture or speculation. They were giving what, on the facts before them, and in the light of medical science, appeared to be the most probable explanation of the event. The theory that germs were carried from the toe to the face was "guesswork" only in the sense that there was no direct evidence of the source of the facial infection. In the view of the experts, other admittedly possible causes were so far excluded by the conditions which were shown as to make the one which they advanced by far the more probable one. As stated in Santa v. Industrial Acci. Commission, 175 Cal. 235, 165 Pac. 689: "This was a sufficient basis for the action of the Commission. Absolute proof or mathematical demonstration is not required. Code Civ. Proc. § 1826. The Commission is the final judge of the facts, and its findings cannot be overturned where they have the support of evidence upon which a reasonable man could come to the conclusion which was reached."

Petitioner, however, insists that, even if it be assumed that the facial infection was caused by germs carried from the toe by external means, the chain of causation was so broken that the original injury of the toe could not reasonably be said to have been the proximate cause of Caffrey's death. The rule of law which must guide us in the determination of the question thus presented is stated in Head Drilling Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission, 177 Cal. 194, 170 Pac. 157, 16 N. C. C. A. 550. In that case it appeared that a workman sustained a fracture of the leg in the course of his employment. Three days after his discharge from the hospital, he sustained a second injury, causing a displacement of the bones by reason of accidentally striking the heel of the foot of the injured limb against a piece of furniture. The chief justice said: "We are of the opinion that a subsequent incident or accident aggravating the original injury may be of such a nature, and occur under such circumstances, as to make such aggravation the proximate and natural result of the original injury. Whether the subsequent incident or accident is such, or should be regarded as an independent,

intervening cause, is a question of fact for the Commission, to be decided in view of all the circumstances, and its conclusion must be sustained by the courts whenever there is any reasonable theory evidenced by the record on which the conclusion can be upheld. . . . Our conclusion is not at all opposed, in our opinion, to what is said in Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 319, 153 Pac. 24. The question there was whether the Commission is authorized by the act to award compensation to the employee 'for an additional injury sustained by him afterward, not in the course of his employment, by an accident or act which aggravates the first injury and prolongs the disability.' The answer was that it had no such authority if the subsequent injury 'is neither the natural nor the proximate result of the injury received in the course of the employment.' It was fully recognized in that case, we think, that the subsequent injury may be the proximate result of the injury received in the course of the employment, and compensable under the act, and the finding to that effect in this matter has sufficient support in the evidence."

In a concurring opinion in that case, Mr. Justice Shaw added that "the award for the further disability here under review can be sustained only upon the ground that the subsequent accident and resulting displacement of the fractured bone was not the result of a lack of ordinary care on the part of the injured employee. An injury so occurring subsequently may be regarded as a part of the proximate consequences of the original accident. The finding of the Commission is in effect a finding that at the time of the second accident Scott was not guilty of a lack of the ordinary care which reasonably prudent persons in his condition exercise for their own safety from injury. I think it cannot be said, as matter of law, that such finding is without any evidence to support it."

The rule announced in Head Drilling Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission, supra, is well established in all cases where it becomes necessary to determine whether or not there is evidence to justify a finding that a subsequent injury or disease is part of the proximate consequences of an injury for which the defendant is responsible. In Dickson v. Hollister, 123 Pa. 421, 10 Am. St. Rep. 533, 16 Atl. 484, erysipelas followed a flesh wound received in the course of a fall occasioned by the defendant's negligence. At the time of the decision, the causes of erysipelas were not understood, but the mere fact that it frequently developed from personal injuries was held to warrant an instruction that the disease might be regarded by the jury as part of the injury itself. To the same effect is Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Leslie, 57 Tex. 83, 85, 6 Am. Neg. Cas. 492. The reluctance of the courts to determine the question of proximate cause as a matter of law in cases similar to the instant case is illustrated by Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Kemp, 61

Md. 619, 48 Am. Rep. 134, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 667, wherein it was held that it was properly left to the jury to determine whether or not a supervening cancerous growth was caused by injuries sustained by plaintiff as a result of defendant's negligence. The evidence in this behalf was to the effect that the personal injury might have superinduced and contributed to the production and development of the cancer. The court quoted with approval from Beauchamp v. Saginaw Min. Co. 50 Mich. 163, 45 Am. Rep. 30, 15 N. W. 65, wherein it was held that it was for the jury to determine whether or not a blow on the head was a proximate cause of death from pneumonia, the evidence being to the effect that the personal injury had so reduced the vitality of the deceased as to render him more susceptible to disease and less able to resist it. See also Pyke v. Jamestown, 15 N. D. 157, 107 N. W. 359; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Buck, 96 Ind. 346, 49 Am. Rep. 168, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 148; Eichholz v. Niagara Falls Hydraulic Power & Mfg. Co. 68 App. Div. 441, 73 N. Y. Supp. 842, id., 174 N. Y. 519, 66 N. E. 1107; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Jones, 83 Ala. 376, 3 So. 902, 9 Am. Neg. Cas. 5.

It only remains to apply the above reasoning to the facts of the instant case. In the light of medical knowledge properly presented to the Commission that such a transfer of a streptococcic infection from a discharging wound as that found to have taken place in Caffrey's case is not only possible, but highly probable, we are of the opinion that the fact that the germs reached the face by external means, and not through the system, cannot, be said in itself to have broken the chain of causation. But petitioner contends that Caffrey's conduct was such as to require a finding of negligence on his part. Caffrey was, of course, under a duty to use reasonable care to restore himself to health. But if he conducted himself as would a reasonably prudent person in his situation and circumstances, and innocently enhanced the original injury, it was within the province of the Commission to find that the original cause continued to the end and accomplished the final result, and was therefore the proximate cause. Dunham v. Clare [1902] 2 K. B. 292, 71 L. J. K. B. N. S. 683, 66 J. P. 612, 50 Week. Rep. 596, 86 L. T. N. S. 751, 18 Times L. R. 645; Hodgson v. Robins, [1914] W. N. 47, 7 B. W. C. C. 232, 233; Bailey v. Industrial Commission, 286 Ill. 623, 122 N. E. 107; Hope v. Troy & L. R. Co. 40 Hun, 438, 440, 5 Am. Neg. Cas. 430; Batton v. Public Service Corp. 75 N. J. L. 857, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 640, 127 Am. St. Rep. 855, 69 Atl. 164. Under all of the circumstances, we are not prepared to say that the Commission was not justified in the instant case in finding that his original injury was the proximate cause of Caffrey's death.

It appears that when the toe first troubled him Caffrey had it dressed by Dr. Marvin at the emergency hospital at the shipbuilding plant. When called as a witness, the doctor did not recollect the case, but the hospital record, as explained by him, indicated that the toe was not in a very serious condition, that Caffrey was given no special warning, and that he was told to go to another hospital in a day or two when the dressing needed to be changed. The next day he started to work, but, on account of the pain in the foot, he returned home. He might have had free treatment at the hospital maintained by petitioner for its employees, but he chose instead to remain at home and treat the foot himself with witch-hazel and iodine. In the light of subsequent events, this was an unfortunate decision. We are, however, unable to say as a matter of law that the Commission was bound to find that, under all the circumstances appearing at the time, it was a decision so unreasonable and imprudent as to amount to a breach of his duty to use due care to restore himself to health. There is no further fact in the case upon which negligence can be predicated. It is not suggested that Caffrey failed to use due care in his own treatment of the foot. It was not until the third day of his absence from work that he first noted a swelling of the face, which he at that time attributed to a cold in the head. The toe, however, was improving, and he wrote to his foreman on that day that he was a little better, and that he would try to return to work as soon as possible. Serious symptoms first developed on the face on the following day and without further delay he was removed to a hospital for treatment.

The facts of the case are not such as to warrant the conclusion that the Commission was bound to find that the transfer of the germs from Caffrey's toe to his face was due to his own negligence. It follows that we cannot disturb the finding that his death was the natural consequence of the original injury.

The award is affirmed.

We concur: Angellotti, Ch. J.; Wilbur, J.; Melvin, J.; Lawlor, J.; Olney, J.

Shaw, J., dissenting:

I dissent. Caffrey, while at work for his employer, had an accident which abraded the skin of his toe. From that abrasion natural causes which he could not control brought on an infection in the toe. The infection and consequent diseased condition of the toe were the proximate results of the abrasion and of the accident. But the infection did not reach his face by the operation of natural causes. The Commission so found. It reached the face by being subsequently carried there, either from some other source, or by some agency entirely disconnected with the infected condition of the toe, or by his own act in carelessly or accidentally touching his face with something which had been in contact with the infection in the toe. Any one of these causes would be an independent intervening cause, and not a cause arising proximately from the injury.

It makes no difference, with respect to this question, whether the act of Caffrey which carried the infection to his face, if it was so carried, was negligent or merely accidental; in either event it was a cause independent of the original injury and intervening it and the deposit of the infection on the face. The opinion of the majority appears to assume that an act of the injured person cannot be an independent, intervening cause unless it is a negligent act. This, of course, cannot be correct. The question whether or not it is negligent has no place in an inquiry whether or not it is an independent, intervening cause.

The decision and the reasons therefor stated in Head Drilling Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission, 177 Cal. 194, 170 Pac. 157, 16 N. C. C. A. 550, are not applicable to the present case. The facts were materially different. There the injured person, Scott, had a fracture of the leg. He was put in the care of a physician engaged by the insurance carrier of the employer. He had been discharged from the hospital, but was still acting under the supervision of the physician, and had been directed by him to begin to use the fractured leg. It was while he was obeying these instructions and in his usual habits of going about in his home, as the directions contemplated he should do, that his foot slipped on a rug. The leg, owing to the injury, was not yet capable of free motion. This caused an involuntary outward motion of that foot, which struck a table or chair near by, and brought about the additional injury for which the second award was made. There was therefore an unbroken chain of causation from the original injury to the second injury. The original injury was one of the direct causes of the second injury. Scott was following the advice of the physician to accelerate recovery, and because of his doing so he received the second injury. In such cases it is always conceded that the second injury is not produced by an independent, intervening cause. It may be an intervening cause, but is not an independent cause. In the case at bar the original injury had no connection whatever, natural or artificial, with the transmission of the infection from the toe to the face. It was not directly or indirectly the result of treatment or advice of the physicians in charge of the case, nor the necessary or natural result of the infection in the toe. For these reasons I am of the opinion that the employer was not liable for the additional award.

ANNOTATION.

Workmen's compensation: compensation as affected by external infection from, or subsequent incident of, original injury.

This note does not include the question of the effect on the right to compensation of a workman's refusal to submit to an operation for medical treatment.

It is held that a subsequent incident, or injury, may be of such a character that its consequences are the natural result of the original injury and may thus warrant the granting of compensation therefor as a part of that injury, but that, on the other hand, the facts and circumstances may be such as to establish the second injury as an independent, intervening cause, the effects of which cannot be included in computing the compensation allowable for the original injury, the determination of the question in each case being one of fact to be decided on the evidence.

Scotland.—Borland v. Watson, G. & Co. (1911) 49 Scot. L. R. 10, 5 B. W. C. C. 514.

It will be observed that in the reported case (BETHLEHEM SHIPBUILDING CORP. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCI. COMMISSION, ante, 1180) where there was evidence that the workman sustained an injury to his toe while engaged in his work, which resulted in infection in the toe and was transferred to his face, resulting in septicemia and death, although there was no direct evidence of the source of the facial infection, the Commission's finding that the germs which caused the facial infection were carried from his toe to his face by external means was sustained, there being medical testimony that such a method of transfer was exceedingly common; and it was held that the fact that the germs reached the face by external means, and not through the system, could not, as a matter of law, be said to have broken the chain of causation, and that the Commission was not bound to find that the transfer of the germs was due to the workman's negligence, notwithstanding testimony that, although he might have had free treatment at the hospital, he chose to treat the toe at home.

In Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury (1915) 171 Cal. 69, L.R.A.1916A, 281, 151 Pac. 1136, 11 N. C. C. A. 493, blood poisoning from an abrasion of the skin received by an employee in the course of his employment was held the proximate result of the injury within the California Workmen's Compensation Act.

And in Dunham v. Clare [1902] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 292, 71 L. J. K. B. N. S. 683, 66 J. P. 612, 50 Week. Rep. 596, 86 L. T. N. S. 751, 18 Times L. R. 645, it was held that "death resulted from the injury" within the Workmen's Compensation Act where a workman while engaged in his employment accidentally suffered a wound on his toe and died from erysipelas, which set in some days after the injury, although in the interval he walked to and from the hospital and although there was medical evidence that erysipelas was a very unusual consequence of such a wound. The court here held that even if the erysipelas was not the probable consequence of the injury a recovery was allowable if death resulted from the injury.

And in Head Drilling Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1918) 177 Cal. 194, 170 Pac. 157, 16 N. C. C. A. 550, which is quoted in the BETH-LEHEM CASE, where a workman sustained a fracture of the leg in the course of his employment, and a few days after his discharge from the hospital, while getting up from the table, sustained an injury which caused a displacement of the bones of the fractured leg, the latter injury was held the proximate result of the original injury, and compensation was held allowable as a part of that injury for the extended disability.

And in Shell Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1918) 86 Cal. App. 488, 172 Pac. 611, the workman's second injury was held to have arisen from a condition produced by the original injury, so that compensation was allowable therefor as a part of it, where it appeared that he broke his femur while engaged in his work, and that some time after, while walking with a crutch in his yard at the direction of the surgeon, he slipped and refractured the bone.

And in Bailey v. Industrial Commission (1919) 286 Ill. 623, 122 N. E. 107, the finding of the Industrial Commission that the second injury was not an independent, intervening occurrence and the allowance of compensation therefor as a part of the first, was sustained, there being evidence that while engaged in his work the workman fell and fractured his leg; that when he had partially recovered, owing to his condition he fell again and broke the leg in the same place.

And in Cook v. Hoerts (1917) 198 Mich. 129, 164 N. W. 464, where an employee was injured so that he was obliged to go on crutches and fell a second time, injuring himself and prolonging his incapacity, it was held that the board was justified in continuing compensation, there being nothing wilful or intentional, or even negligent, in his action and conduct when he sustained the second injury.

And in Hodgson v. Robins [1914] W. N. (Eng.) 47, 7 B. W. C. C. 232, where there was evidence that a charwoman, while coming downstairs in the offices in which she worked, slipped on the stairs and twisted her leg, and that she did some further work at the office and the following day slipped on her own kitchen stairs and sustained an injury, it was held that the evidence supported a finding that the injury at home was the result of the accident at the office, and that allowance for the extended disability was proper.

And in Reiss v. Northway Motor & Mfg. Co. (1917) 201 Mich. 90, 166 N. W. 841, where a workman broke his leg, and, upon the advice of a physician, returned to work before it was entirely healed, and broke it a second time, it was held that it might be found that the second injury was the direct effect of the original injury.

And in G. H. Hammond Co. v. Industrial Commission (1919) 288 Ill. 262, 123 N. E. 384, death was held to have resulted from the original injury, where there was evidence that the workman was knocked down and his leg injured while at his work; that an abscess developed which attacked the bone and necessitated cutting away part of it; that this weakened the bone so that while the injured person was getting out of bed it broke, and he fell, and that he was subsequently operated on and died from the shock.

But in Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury (1915) 171 Cal. 319, 153 Pac. 24, where a workman broke his arm while engaged in his employment, and subsequently, after it had been set, the bone slipped, or was shifted in such a manner as to necessitate re-setting, and the only evidence as to the cause of the slipping was that of two doctors, one of whom testified that it might have been caused by the use of the arm too soon, and the other that it slipped from something other than natural causes,—the evidence was held insufficient to support a finding by the Commission that the second disability was the proximate result of the original accident, and the Commission was held not authorized to award compensation for the prolongation of the disability by the second injury.

And in Blackall v. Winchester Repeating Arms Co. (1915) 1 Conn. Comp. Dec. 183, where an employee suffering from an incurable disease fell while engaged in her employment and received an injury which would ordinarily have been trivial, and before she was able she left her bed and fell again on account of weakness, and sustained injuries which hastened her death by aggravating the disease, it was held that death was not due to the original injury and had no causal connection with it, but that compensation should be allowed only for the period of incapacity which would ordinarily result from the original injury.

And in Noden v. Galloways [1912] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 46, [1911] W. N. 192, 81 L. J. K. B. N. S. 28, 105 L. T. N. S. 567, 28 Times L. R. 5, 55 Sol. Jo. 838, 5 B. W. C. C. 7, where a riveter received an injury to a finger on his right hand and had the finger amputated, and it healed perfectly and he worked for seven years, although at lighter work, at the end of which time he started using a pneumatic hammer as a result of which his right hand was inflamed so that he was obliged to stop work, and it appeared that a piece of diseased bone was the cause of the trouble, it was held that he was not entitled to compensation for this incapacity on the theory that it was due to his first injury.

And the aggravation by a boxing match of a wound, received in the course of employment, which had practically healed and would have caused no further trouble had it been given a little more rest, so that blood poisoning and permanent injury to a hand resulted, is the proximate cause of such injury, and no recovery can be had under the Workmen's Compensation Act providing for compensation for injuries received in the course of employment. Kill v. Industrial Commission (1915) 160 Wis. 549, L.R.A. 1916A, 14, 152 N. W. 148.

In Borland v. Watson, G. & Co. (1911) 49 Scot. L. R. 10, 5 B. W. C. C. 514, where a workman wrenched his knee while engaged in his work and received compensation for some weeks and worked without difficulty for three years, when in arising from a kneeling position in his work for another employer he felt pain, and the cartilage of his knee was found to be ruptured, and it was not clear from the evidence that the cartilage had been ruptured by the first injury, it was held that he had suffered an injury by the second accident and was entitled to compensation therefor.

And in Martin v. Barnett (1910) 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 146, compensation was allowed for the second injury, and it was held that a cartman's incapacity was due to that injury, where he was struck by his horse's tail which resulted in inflammation and loss of his eye, although it appeared that ten years before he had received a blow in the temple which had rendered one of his eyes useless for many purposes.

Trial — jury — obstruction of highway — failure to maintain barrier.

3. Whether or not one contracting to make street improvements is negligent in failing to maintain barriers or watchmen to warn the public when he obstructs the traveled way is a question for the jury.

4. The court cannot say, as matter of law, that a pedestrian is negligent in attempting to pass along a traveled path past a machine engaged in making street improvements, in a snow-storm, where the machine had stood idle for several days, and he and others had passed along the adjacent walk without danger, and when the machine was put in operation just prior to his injury no barrier was erected or warning given that the machine was in operation so that the passageway was dangerous.

Appeal — instruction — stating issue — error.

5. It is not reversible error for the court, in its instruction to the jury, to state the issues as set out in the complaint on the theory that the jury is thereby instructed that defendant's duty is measured by such contentions, if the proper rule of duty and liability is subsequently given.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Webster County (Wright, J.) in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Plaintiff failed to show freedom from contributory negligence.

Messrs. Price & Joyce for appellee.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, as contractor, was engaged in laying a pavement on one of the streets of Fort Dodge. As a part of its equipment in the performance of the work, it made use of a machine or device known as a concrete mixer, which was operated by steam power. The machine was provided with a boom, or lifting beam, on the outer end of which was fitted a hopper or "skip." When lowered to the ground, the skip was filled with materials for the mixture, then lifted to a position from which the contents were discharged into the mixing drum. The engineer operating the machine stood in a position where he could see the operation of the lift. The outfit was mounted on a truck, by which it was moved from place to place, as might be needed in the prosecution of the work. The paving had been in the course of construction for a considerable period before the accident herein-after mentioned, but the mixing machine had recently been moved from another location and placed at the intersection of Second avenue North, and Seventh street. It was so placed that the lifting beam extended over and across the path or walk ordinarily used by pedestrians. When the lift was raised, the path, unless otherwise obstructed, was clear; when lowered, it was an obstruction to travel; and when in operation, was a source of danger to anyone passing under it. The street was a main thoroughfare leading into the business section of the city, and many pedestrians made use of it. The plaintiff, who was employed in a grocery in the business section of the city, used the street in question in passing between his home and place of employment, and had seen the mixing machine at other locations, but claims not to have been familiar with its method of operation. There is some conflict in the evidence as to how long the machine had been in this particular location before the accident, but the jury could properly have found that it had stood there some three or four days, but had not been in operation until the day when plaintiff was hurt. The jury could also have found that, while the machine was thus standing idle, no barricade was provided to divert the travel of pedestrians from the usual path at this point, and that in fact many people continued to pass back and forth, without any apparent effort by defendant to interfere with such passage until after the accident. The plaintiff, going to his work in the morning and returning to his home at noon of that day, used the path by the machine and saw no indication of its operation. During his noon hour, and before his return to work, it appears that the machine was set in motion. As he approached the place, a severe snow-storm had set in. He saw several men gathered in that vicinity, who did not appear to him to be engaged in work, and he drew the inference that work had been suspended on account of the storm. He saw nothing and heard nothing which suggested to him that the machine was in operation; there was no barrier on or across the walk; and he had no warning of any kind that the passage was dangerous, and proceeding, as he and others had done before, he was struck by the descending skip and severely injured. This statement is, of course, in many respects denied by the defendant and its witnesses; but there is evidence upon which, as we have already said, the jury could find it substantially true.

The charge of negligence made against the defendant is, in effect, that it failed to exercise due care to erect a barrier to turn pedestrians from the path of danger, or to give warning of such danger, or to discover the plaintiff's danger in time to prevent his injury by the falling skip.

I. The question first in order is whether there is any evidence for the jury upon the charge of negligence made against the defendant. Upon this, there is little room for argument. The defendant undoubtedly had the right, and the jury obstruction by contractor—

liability.

were so informed,
to occupy the streets with its machine, and the mere fact that it thereby obstructed the travel did not render the defendant a wrongdoer or make it liable in damages for the inconvenience thereby occasioned to the public or to individuals. It was bound, however, to exercise that right with reasonable care to avoid injury to persons attempting to make such use of the street as was practicable; and, if the machine was so located as to make passage along the walk

in failing to maintain barrier.

unsafe, it was open to the jury to find that reasonable care required the erection of suitable barriers to call the attention of travelers to the danger and divert them therefrom, or, in the absence of barriers, to keep a watchman on guard to turn people away while the machine was in operation. From what we have already said of the facts of which there was evidence, it is very clear that the question of defendant's negligence was not one upon which the court was authorized to pass as a matter of law, and there was no error in submitting it to the jury.

Trial—jury—obstruction of
failure to maintain barrier.

II. Was the plaintiff chargeable with contributory negligence as a matter of law? The affirmative of this question is vigorously argued for the defendant. Some of the proved or admitted facts have a legitimate tendency to sustain the conclusion that plaintiff did not manifest reasonable care for his own safety; but, on the other hand, the record is not without a showing of facts from which his exercise of reasonable care may be inferred. The machine had stood at this location idle for several days, and its presence during that time created no danger to persons using the path. The path had been left open and unobstructed, an invitation to its continued use. Plaintiff and others frequently passed that way without being advised or warned by the defendant of any danger. He had in fact used the path without objection or warning but an hour before his injury. When he came back, the machine had been in operation less than half an hour; he was facing a severe storm; and, his progress being uninterrupted by any barrier or warning, the court can hardly assume to say, as a matter of law, that the average man of ordinary intelligence and prudence would have done otherwise than he did under the circumstances.

—use of dangerous way—
negligence.

The case is not comparable, we think, with the railway cases cited by the appellant. It is only where there is no room for fair and reasonable minds to differ upon the conclusion to be reached that the court may direct a verdict, and the case before us is not of that conclusive character.

III. Error is assigned upon the instructions given the jury as follows. The court, in summarizing the issues, said to the jury: "The acts which the plaintiff says constitute the negligence on which he claims and upon which he predicates his right to recovery are that (1) The defendant was negligent in that it failed to erect an ample and sufficient barrier at said place in order that pedestrians might be turned from the path usually trod by them; (2) the defendant was negligent in that it failed by any device or method to warn the public generally and this plaintiff in particular of the danger incident to the operation of the said machine at said place; (3) the defendant was negligent in that it failed to erect and maintain a guard around the said place where the said machine was being operated sufficient to prevent the public in general or this plaintiff in particular from going into a place where he would be injured by the operation of the said machine; (4) the defendant was negligent in failing to warn the plaintiff of its purpose to lower the said lift or elevator as the plaintiff was passing in close proximity thereto."

This is said by counsel for appellant to be equivalent to instructing the jury that defendant was bound to put up a barrier which was impassable. It is further objected that the statements in the second, third, and fourth subdivisions of the paragraph are capable of being understood by the jury as charging the defendant with the duty not only to erect a suitable barrier, but also to warn the public generally and the plaintiff in particular of the danger there existing, as well as to give him notice when the elevator was to be lowered, and that such duties were incumbent upon defendant even though plaintiff knew, or as a reasonable man ought to have known, of the danger to be encountered in using the path.

Appeal—
stating issue—

These criticisms, we think, are not justified. The statement of the acts and omissions which plaintiff charges as negligence are quoted literally by the court from the plaintiff's petition. In so doing, we think that the court rightfully allowed the plaintiff to state in his own language the very grounds upon which he seeks to recover. The fact that, with the linguistic exuberance of the profession, counsel for plaintiff state and restate their alleged cause of action in varied forms, cannot serve to prejudice the defense where the court clearly states the pertinent rules of law and directs the attention of the jury to the essential issues, in which respect the defendant here has no just ground of complaint. The jury was told that defendant was rightfully in the street, that it was bound to no more than ordinary care in the conduct of its work therein. An "ample and sufficient barrier" could not mean more to any ordinarily intelligent juror than a barrier reasonably sufficient to indicate to the mind of the traveler passing that way that the path was closed to public use. Nor is there anything in the other specifications of negligence or in the instructions with reference thereto to suggest to the jury that, if defendant had performed its full duty with reference to a barrier, it could still be held negligent in not giving, in addition thereto, a public or an individual warning of the danger. It is probably true that no instruction or charge to a jury has ever been drawn with such perfect clearness and precision that an ingenious lawyer, in the seclusion and quiet of his office, with a dictionary at his elbow, cannot extract therefrom some legal heresy of more or less startling character. The real test of the meaning and effect of an instruction for the purpose of review by an appellate court ought to be, and we think is, the idea which the language objected to is fairly calculated to convey to the minds of jurors drawn from the ordinary walks of life; and the fact that, upon a minute, technical, or hypercritical analysis, some other interpretation can be placed thereon, may be disregarded. The charge in this case, taken as a whole, recognizes the right of the defendant, as well as of the plaintiff, in the street; the duty of each to use reasonable care to avoid injury to or interference with the other; the burden upon plaintiff to establish his allegation of negligence by defendant; and his own freedom from contributory negligence. All these matters bearing upon the relative rights and duties of the parties were treated with reasonable fullness.

The record impresses us with the thought that the case was fairly tried, and that there is no substantial reason for interfering with the result below. The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

NOTE.

The right and duty of a highway contractor as to barricading or obstructing the street, considered in the reported case (LAW v. BRYANT ASPHALT PAVING CO. ante, 1189), is the subject of an annotation beginning at page 1203, post.

JOHN B. DAVIS, Respt.,

v.

J. W. MELLEN, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(— Utah, —, 182 Pac. 920.)

Highway — right to obstruct — contractor for improvement.

1. One contracting to improve a public street has the right to obstruct public travel over the section of the street upon which he is at work.

— lights on barricade.

2. One contracting for the improvement of a public street must place lights at night upon the barriers placed to obstruct public travel over the section of the street upon which he is at work.

— absence of watchman — right to complain.

3. Travelers upon a public highway cannot complain of a breach by a contractor for its improvement, of his contract with the road commissioners to maintain a watchman to protect the work from injury by the traveling public.

— contract as to barricade — construction.

4. A provision in a contract for street improvements that all work shall be done in sections consisting of the space between the property line and the center of the street, so that the street shall at no time be entirely closed to traffic, does not forbid the extending of the barricade beyond the center line of the street.

Proximate cause — street improvement — injury in bypath.

5. The negligence of one leaving an obstruction in a bypath around a street improvement so that vehicles traveling in opposite directions cannot pass each other, combined with the negligence of the driver of an automobile in propelling it into the bypath at a reckless speed so that a traveler from the opposite direction is compelled to turn into the barricade to avoid a collision, and not the negligence of the street contractor in failing to light and guard the improvement, is the proximate cause of injury to the latter.

Highway — contractor for improvements — liability for injuries in bypaths.

6. A contractor for street improvements who fails to maintain proper lights on the barricade protecting his work, and also a watchman to protect the work, is not liable for injury to the driver of an automobile who is injured in attempting to pass around the barricade, by the act of a stranger in leaving an obstruction in the by-path so that vehicles traveling in opposite directions cannot pass each other, combined with the negligence of one who drives an automobile from the opposite direction at a reckless speed into the passageway.

7. A contractor for street improvements who leaves a passageway around his work sufficient for vehicles traveling in opposite directions to pass each other is not bound to anticipate that a stranger will leave an obstruction in the passageway in the night which will prevent such passing and cause injury.

APPEAL by defendant Mellen from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County (Porter, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries and injury to his automobile, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendants. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Stewart, Stewart, & Alexander, for appellant:

Where a contract is made by a public corporation for the construction of a public work, and incidentally contains stipulations intended for the safety of the public, an individual who sustains personal injuries by reason of the nonperformance of such stipulation does not bear such a relation to the contractor as will support an action of tort against the latter, based upon the mere violation of the contractual duty.

Plaintiff brought this action in the district court of Salt Lake county to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by him through the negligence of the defendants while he was driving his automobile on State street, a public highway leading from the south into Salt Lake City. At the trial plaintiff dismissed his action as to the defendants constituting the partnership Salt Lake Transfer Company, and then proceeded against Mellen alone, whom we shall hereinafter refer to as defendant.

Mellen was a contractor engaged by the State Road Commission, hereinafter referred to as the Commission, to lay cement pavement for the surfacing of certain portions of State street between Salt Lake City and Murray. He was required, under his contract with the Commission, to do the paving in sections. He had finished the pavement at or near the intersection of Twenty-first South street with State street, when it was found that a water pipe or conduit crossing State street at that point was of insufficient size, and that it would be necessary to take it up and replace it with a larger one in order to carry the water. He was requested by the Commission to make the change after the completion of the pavement, as before stated, and was engaged in so doing when the accident occurred of which plaintiff complains. While proceeding to the work of taking up the pipe and replacing it, certain barricades were placed by Mellen across State street, to warn the public of the excavations made in the street, and to prevent vehicle travel over the green cement used in repairing the pavement where the pipe was being replaced. Twenty-first South street is 66 feet wide. State street is 132 feet in width, and is traversed through or near the center by a double-track street railway line. The pavement had been laid on both sides of the street railway lines. To better illustrate the condition on State street at the time and at the place of the accident, we have drawn the accompanying sketch or plat.

The plat is not drawn to scale, nor is it intended to do more than represent the conditions in a general way.

The two sets of parallel lines represent the street car tracks near the center of State street. The space between tracks is 6 feet, 8½ inches wide. The heavily shaded spaces indicate paved portion of street, 16 feet in width on either side within 2 feet of street car line. The lines extending at right angles with the paved portions of the street represent wooden barriers approximately 8½ feet in height, entirely closing State street to the west of car tracks, and partially to the east, for a distance north and south between barriers. The two small circles represent telephone poles. Attached to the ends of the wooden barricades, and passing around and nailed to the poles, as indicated by irregular line, was a wire mesh 42 inches high, containing 12 longitudinal wires with numerous cross wires. The light dotted space indicates the passageway or detour around the barricaded section of the street taken by vehicles leaving and returning to the pavement, covering a distance of about 80 feet. The two parallelograms marked "W" indicate two wagons attached together and heavily loaded with flat steel, standing within the traveled detour. Both were platform wagons. The north wagon had an elevated seat. The effect of the barricades was to direct all travel from the west side to the east side of the street, and to pass vehicles over and through the open passageway or detour, about 81 feet in width. The heavy line marked "BB," to the east of property line, represents a billboard, while parallelogram "C" represents a cottage. There were telephone poles along the east side of State street not shown on the plat.

In preparing the foregoing plat we were unfortunately deprived of the benefit of the exhibits used at the trial of the case, which should have accompanied, but are missing from the files and record on appeal. It is not claimed to be a detailed representation of all the conditions surrounding the accident, and it may not be in all respects accurate. However, we think it fairly illustrates the conditions and reflects the testimony of witnesses who saw them at or about the date of the accident.

That the work was being done by the defendant J. W. Mellen under the authority, direction, and supervision of the State Road Commission of the State of Utah; that reasonable care and prudence were required of the defendant J. W. Mellen in doing said work, and the said Commission exacted from him in the performance thereof that he should erect good and sufficient guards, barricades, and signals and so perform the work as not to close the entire road, but should provide an open unobstructed passageway sufficient to accommodate and provide for the traffic and travel thereon in both directions, all of which the defendant Mellen failed to do; that the only means provided by the defendant J. W. Mellen, or otherwise, for the passage of vehicles traveling in both directions where the said state road was closed and barricaded as aforesaid, was a passageway from said Twenty-first South street, extending south a distance of about 100 feet in length, where it re-entered said state road; the said passageway was over premises immediately adjoining and adjacent to said state road on the east, and immediately east of the line of telephone poles aforesaid; that said passageway so provided was rough and uneven, and only of sufficient width for two vehicles to meet and pass thereon by the exercise of great care and caution; that to the east of said passageway, extending in close proximity to Twenty-first South street, there was a long and high billboard which prevented persons traveling north on state road, prior to and when entering into said passageway, from seeing vehicles traveling west on Twenty-first South street, intending to turn south on said state road, until such vehicles turned into and had entered upon said passageway, and likewise prevented persons traveling west on Twenty-first South street, intending to turn and go south on said state road, from seeing approaching vehicles traveling north on State street until said passageway was entered; that during the evening of the 12th of June, 1917, and about the hour of 9 o'clock, as plaintiff is informed and believes, the defendant Salt Lake Transfer Company wrongfully and negligently left two large transfer wagons attached together, and loaded with steel and machinery, stand in and occupy, unattended, unguarded, and unlighted, a portion of the east side of said passageway for a distance of about 50 feet in length; that said wagons so situated left the width of the remaining part of said passageway, which was between said wagons and said line of telephone poles, a distance of less than 11 feet in width, totally insufficient for vehicles to meet and pass; the said passageway of approximately 11 feet in width was the only passageway for vehicles in both directions; that said defendants and each of them wrongfully and unlawfully permitted said wagons to obstruct said passageway for at least twelve hours, as plaintiff is informed and believes, notwithstanding the heavy and congested traffic over and upon said state road; that about 3 o'clock in the morning of June 13, 1917, and while the plaintiff was returning home from Ophir, Utah, and driving his automobile north on the said state road, with due care and caution, when he approached said portion of said state road, barricaded as aforesaid, he turned into said passageway so provided as aforesaid, leading to Twenty-first South street; that at the time there was no approaching vehicle of any kind in sight; that while passing along the west side of said wagons, standing as aforesaid, an automobile traveling west on Twenty-first South street, which had been obstructed from plaintiff's view by said billboards and wagons, suddenly turned into said passageway from the north; that a head-on collision was imminent, and to prevent such collision and its consequences, plaintiff instantly accelerated the speed of his machine, and turned quickly into said state road, thereby avoiding a collision with said approaching automobile in said obstructed passageway; that in so doing plaintiff's automobile encountered and ran into a wire fence forming part of the barricade upon the state road, which said fence the plaintiff was unable to see or discover, owing to the absence of any light or other signal upon the same; that thereupon plaintiff's automobile was upturned, and the plaintiff and Mr. Kahn, who was traveling with him, were violently thrown and caught under said upturned automobile; that at the time of said accident said wagons had been wrongfully and negligently, by the said defendants, and each of them, permitted to stand, remain, and obstruct the said passageway and view for about six hours, as plaintiff is informed and believes, without any watchman or signal or warning or any other precaution whatsoever being taken to guard or protect travelers or traffic along said passageway; that said accident occurred without any fault on the part of the plaintiff or said Kahn; that it was caused wholly and solely by reason of the carelessness and negligence of the said defendants and each of them in permitting said wagons to obstruct and blockade said passageway, and remain for an unreasonable time; also in not providing a watchman or watchmen to warn approaching travelers from both directions of the conditions and danger aforesaid; and in failing to have danger lights and other signals to warn approaching travelers that said road was barricaded, and that said passageway was obstructed, and of the unusual and extraordinary conditions and dangers aforesaid, which the said defendants and each of them knew, or by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence ought to have known, in time to have averted and prevented said accident; also in failing to provide and maintain a safe detour or passageway for vehicles around the place where state road was barricaded; also by reason of the negligent, careless, and wrongful conduct of the said defendant J. W. Mellen in entirely closing said street to traffic."

The answer of the defendant J. W. Mellen admits the doing of the work under contract and by the direction of the State Road Commission, but denies that the work was being done in a negligent manner, or that he failed to maintain suitable barricades, notices, and warnings on the portion of the street being repaired, or that he left an unsafe passageway for travel; and affirmatively alleges that the accident to plaintiff was caused by his own negligence in fast driving, failure to observe the crossway, the lights, signs, and warnings placed there by defendant, failure to take heed of the approaching automobile, and negligence, without his knowledge, of the transfer company in leaving its wagons standing in and obstructing the passageway afforded for public travel.

Upon trial of the issues the jury found a verdict in plaintiff's favor, and a judgment was entered against the defendant.

On appeal the defendant assigns many errors, so many that it is impractical to set them all forth and discuss them here in detail. Summarizing, the defendant complains of the rulings of the trial court in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit at the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony, the refusal to instruct and direct a verdict in favor of defendant, permitting plaintiff's counsel in addressing the jury to argue immaterial and incompetent testimony over defendant's objection, and that the verdict and judgment are not sustained by the evidence and are contrary to law.

There is not a great deal of conflict in the testimony. The physical conditions at and near the place of the accident, as testified to by the witnesses, were in a general way the same as alleged in the complaint and as admitted by the answer. Plaintiff introduced testimony to show that there were no lights on the barricades. Defendant's witnesses testified that lights were placed on the barricades to warn travelers at night, and that lanterns were seen there the morning following the accident, one of them still burning. There was also some conflict in the testimony as to how extended a view could be had of Twenty-first South street, and also of State street, while approaching the barricaded section from the south.

Robert B. Mark, a witness for the plaintiff, who had viewed the scene of the accident the same morning, made the following observations concerning road conditions: "June 13, 1917, I made an examination at about 9:15 A. M. concerning physical conditions near the intersection of Twenty-first South and State street. State street on the south side of its intersection with Twenty-first South street, was partly barricaded with barricades about 3½ feet high. The barricade on the east side of the street extended to the first telegraph pole. There was another telegraph pole in the street on the east of the southeast telegraph pole. Between the two poles was 31 feet. . . . At a point 80 feet south of the intersection of Twelfth (Twenty-first) South and State, traffic had been diverted in a northwesterly direction. In this space, through which traffic was being directed, there had been left two vans of the Salt Lake Transfer Company. The van farther south was loaded with flat steel. The steel extended beyond the bed of the wagon to the south probably 5 or 6 feet. The wagon, or pole of that wagon, was extended underneath the wagon ahead of it, and the wagon ahead of it was loaded partly with flat steel and partly with some pieces of machinery. . . . Extending on northerly from the north wagon were two poles to accommodate a three-horse team. The length over all, from the north point of the north wagon—that is, the wagon bed—to the south point of the projecting load of the second wagon was 40 feet 8 inches. Each wagon was approximately 6 feet across. The available traveling space between these wagons and the barricade was 9 feet 10 inches. . . . A wire mesh ran between the north telegraph pole and the south telegraph pole, and thence near the east side of the railroad track, marking the boundary lines of the barricade on the east side of State street. The distance from the north telegraph pole to the south telegraph pole is 38 feet 4 inches. The distance from the south telegraph pole to the south edge of the load on the south wagon of the Transfer Company is 41 feet. The distance from the southeast pole to the barricade to the property line on the east is about 35 feet, so that there was left 35 feet of the street east of the barricade. . . . I noticed that the street had been traveled by wagons east of where the Salt Lake Transfer wagons were located, the width of another team or another wagon, which showed that the passageway extended east 8 or 10 feet, and that this had been used as a part of the passageway. I am speaking of the south wagon. The south wagon was 19 feet 11 inches east from the east rail. The south end of the south wagon bed was about 2 feet 5 inches east of the east line of the pavement. The steel projected about 5 feet over the hind end of the south wagon and about a foot and a half or 2 feet over onto the pavement. . . . I found that the wire barricade running from the south pole to the railroad track was not intact. All the wires were broken into from the machine coming in contact with and pulling the wire. . . . The wires on the east side of the barricade running between the two telephone poles were still intact."

The accident occurred about 2:30 A. M., June 13, 1917, while I was driving my car north on State street. Mr. Kahn, another traveling salesman, was with me. We were coming from Grantsville, Tooele county. I was traveling about 20 miles an hour when I was going around the end of the wagon, the large truck standing on the east side of State street. When I got around the end of the wagon and within a short distance from the telegraph pole another machine drove in from Twenty-first South street. I saw I was going to have a head-on collision, and I turned my car quickly, and used my accelerator, and gave her more gas, and turned back into State street, and I thought it was about the only course I could take at the time to save me having a head-on collision. As I made my turn I got in contact with the wire. I was watching the road as I came up

State street. I observed Twenty-first South street at the point that it could be observed; that would be back and east of the billboards there. That is the only place that I could observe Twenty-first South street with these wagons there where they were. The lights on the car coming towards me were dim. They had their dimmers on. I was about 4 feet in the cut-off or passageway from the south pole when I observed this car approaching. . . . There were no lanterns or other lights on the wire or wagons. I did not see or hear a watchman. The next thing I heard was the lights break, the glass in my lap, and I knew I was up against a wire fence. I saw the fence at the time. I went down over that little embankment south of the pole, and the car jarred and swerved. I do not remember very much more until I found myself under the car. . . . I was perfectly familiar with Twenty-first South at the time of the accident, and knew the billboards were in that locality. Every man that rides up and down State street and looks to the right or to the left of him with a view of seeing whether anyone is coming down at that intersection northeasterly sees those signboards. In approaching a street light at Twenty-first South, in order for a man to have any degree of security or safety, it is necessary for him to look both to the right and to the left of him and in front of him to see who is approaching from that point. That is true. Twenty-first South is a very much used street, and that intersection with State is a very busy intersection. I knew that this night. I knew there was an obstruction there Monday morning, and I thought there was an obstruction there the night of the accident. I presumed there was, and I was watching for it until I saw those wagons, then I made my turn. . . .

Q. Now you state here in your complaint that the reason why there wasn't enough room through that passageway for two vehicles to pass, or two machines to pass, was because of the two wagons that were left there by the Salt Lake Transfer Company. Is that true?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there ample room for two vehicles to pass each other there if these two wagons had been out of the way?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. If these two wagons hadn't been there when you saw this machine coming, if you did see one coming, you would have had ample room to have turned to the right, and the automobile coming towards you would have had ample room to have passed you. That is true, isn't it?

A. Yes, sir.

The contract between the State Road Commission and the defendant for the improvement of State street, among other things, provided: "All the work shall be done in sections consisting of the space between the property line and the center of the street, so that the street at no time shall be entirely closed to traffic. No deviation from this rule will be allowed, except upon written permission from the engineer. . . . The contractor shall erect and maintain good and sufficient guards, barricades, and signals at all unsafe places at or near the work, and shall in all cases maintain a safe passageway at all road crossings, crosswalks, and street intersections, and shall do all other things necessary to prevent accident or loss of any kind. The contractor shall provide necessary lights, barricades, fences, etc., and a competent watchman at all times, to protect the work from traffic or damages of any nature until traffic is admitted."

The testimony shows beyond any dispute that while the improvement was being made by defendant under direction and supervision of the State Road Commission the defendant had no authority to direct or control the traffic of the street, except incidentally to the work of making the improvement, by barricading the section where the work was being performed by him under the contract. The undisputed testimony also is that the defendant had no knowledge of the act of the Salt Lake Transfer Company leaving its wagons standing in the passageway (which wagons were placed there in the nighttime and in defendant's absence) left open by the defendant in the street for public travel around the closed and barricaded section.

In the presentation of the case to this court counsel have devoted in their briefs, needlessly we think, much space in citing cases, and in the discussion of the rights and liabilities of the defendant under his contract with the State Road Commission. As we view the case, and more especially in the light of the decisions of this court in Callahan v. Salt Lake City, 41 Utah, 300, 125 Pac. 863, and Dayton v. Free, 46 Utah, 277, 148 Pac. 408, and the authorities there cited, the defendant was an independent contractor, and the only questions to be determined here are, Was the defendant negligent? and, if so, Was his negligence the proximate cause of the injury of which the plaintiff complains? Having these questions in mind, we have quoted more extensively from both the pleadings and testimony than we otherwise would, in order that the assignments of error may be considered as a whole and as bearing on this one important matter for our determination. The contract between the State Road Commission and the defendant, in so far as the issues between the plaintiff and the defendant are involved, is of but little consequence, except for the purpose of showing that the defendant rightfully entered upon the highway for the purpose of improving the street. The right to obstruct—contractor for improvement.

obstruct the public travel over the section of the street being improved, upon principle and authority, was a paramount right. Phelan v. Granite Bituminous Paving Co. 227 Mo. 666, 137 Am. St. Rep. 603, 127 S. W.

318; 13 R. C. L. title "Highway," § 188. We find nothing in the record tending to show that the closed section of State street was not properly barricaded. That it was the duty of the defendant to place suitable lights in the nighttime on the barricades to warn the public of its presence, and that the portion of the street closed and barricaded was not open to travel, must be conceded, regardless of his contract with the State Road Commission that he must do so. The contract further provided that the defendant should provide "a competent watchman at all times to protect the work from traffic or damages of any nature until traffic is admitted." (Italics ours.) The testimony is in conflict as to whether or not lights were on the barricade on the night of the accident in question. That there was no watchman present is an admitted fact. We find no testimony in the record tending to show that it was necessary, usual, or customary to have a watchman there for safeguarding the public, or for any purpose other than "to protect the work," as is provided in the contract. His failure to do that was a matter, as we view —absence of watchman—right to complain.

it, wholly between himself and his employer, the State Road Commission, and not one of which the plaintiff in this action may complain.

Again, referring to the contract, some contention is made by respondent that under the contract defendant was not authorized to barricade the street to the extent it was closed to public travel. In other words, that after barricading the west side the entire east side should have been left open for travel.

We do not so construe the contract. It simply provides: "The street at no time shall be entirely closed to traffic." That a portion of the street was left open for travel by the passageway, over which hundreds of automobiles and other vehicles were daily passing, the testimony shows to be an absolute certainty.

But conceding that the defendant was negligent in all the particulars complained of, the question still remains, Was the defendant's negligence the proximate cause of the injuries? We think not. The plaintiff's own testimony conclusively establishes that immediately before the accident, when he was in the passageway, he appreciated and knew of the closed section of the street. He had driven his automobile over State street but a day or two before, and had passed through the passageway. He remembered it, and, as he was approaching the closed or barricaded section, he followed the traveled track of vehicles, fully conscious of the fact that he was entering it. Unobstructed, there was ample room for his automobile to pass in safety any approaching vehicle from the north or opposite direction. Left standing unattended in the passageway, without lights or other signals of warning upon them, were the two wagons of the Salt Lake Transfer Company, closing it so that vehicles moving in opposite directions could not pass. As plaintiff entered the passageway where the wagons stood, he saw an automobile with an unknown driver dashing through the passageway at a speed of not less than 30 miles an hour. Plaintiff was driving 20 miles an hour. A head-on collision was imminent, to avoid which he quickly turned his machine into the wire of the barricade, and was injured. Had the wagons not been left standing in the passageway plaintiff would have passed through in perfect safety. Had the approaching driver not been driving his machine at so reckless a speed no danger would have confronted plaintiff, and he would have had time to pass without accident. The plaintiff so testified.

The closing of the passageway by the wagons so that two vehicles could not pass, and leaving them there without signals and unattended through the night, and the reckless speed with which the automobile was driven through it by the unknown driver, were the two contributing and the proximate causes of the plaintiff's injuries, of neither of which did the defendant have any knowledge, nor was he, under the circumstances, in duty bound to anticipate.

Admitting that the barricades were insufficient about the closed section of the street, that they were left without lights or proper signals of warning, yet the fact remains beyond any dispute, Proximate cause—street improvement—injury in bypath.

had it not been for the wrongful acts of others in leaving the wagons standing in the detour or passageway, and the reckless manner in which the automobile driven from the north approached the plaintiff, which, as we have pointed out, were the sole proximate causes of the accident, the plaintiff would have passed by the closed section of the street without harm, regardless of any act of omission or commission charged against the defendant.

Highway—contractor for improvements—liability for injuries in bypaths.

We think the trial court erred in not granting the defendant a nonsuit, in refusing to direct a verdict in defendant's favor, and in denying him a new trial. The findings of the jury in plaintiff's favor were not supported by the evidence, and therefore the judgment entered against the defendant was contrary to law and should be reversed. It is so ordered. Defendant to recover costs.

Right and duty of highway contractor as to barricading or obstructing street.

1. Contractor held negligent, 1203.

II. Liability as for nuisance, 1212.

I. Liability as for negligence.

a. General rule.

A contractor engaged in constructing or improving a street in pursuance of a contract with the proper municipal authorities has a right to barricade the street and reasonably to obstruct the public travel over the section of the street being improved, but it must be exercised with due regard to the subservient right of the public to use the street. And, as a corollary to the duty to maintain barriers around portions of the street under improvement, it is the duty of the contractor to maintain lights in the nighttime on the barricades to warn the public of the dangerous condition of the street. A breach of the duty to erect barriers, or to place lights, or reasonably and carefully to maintain obstructions to public travel constitutes actionable negligence, for which the contractor is liable when it is the proximate cause of any injury to one lawfully using the street.

b. Application of rule.

1. Contractor held negligent.

In Barton v. McDonald (1889) 81 Cal. 265, 22 Pac. 855, it appeared that the defendant was a contractor to repair and replank a certain street. He left a hole in the street without any guard or other protection around it, and the plaintiff fell into it without any fault on his part. The court held the defendant liable for the plaintiff's injury, resulting from the fall.

In Stockton Automobile Co. v. Confer (1908) 154 Cal. 402, 97 Pac. 881, it appeared that a contractor, who had been employed by the board of public works to build crosswalks of bitumen at the intersection of two of its streets, had placed, in the performance of this work, a pile of bitumen upon the highway, and had failed to erect a suitable or sufficient light or warning about the obstruction. While being driven on the highway at night, an automobile struck the pile and was damaged. The contractor and the superintendent of streets, who had notice of the obstruction and lack of lights, were held liable.

In Martin v. Shea (1920) — Cal. —, 187 Pac. 23, a sewer contractor under contract with a city was held to have been negligent, and liable to an automobile passenger in leaving unguarded by lights or barriers a shaft or hole about 5 feet long, more than 3 feet wide, and 9 feet deep between street railway tracks.

In Weber v. Union Development & Constr. Co. (1907) 118 La. 77, 42 So. 652, 12 Ann. Cas. 1012, it appeared that a contractor, in repaving a street, placed on the crossing a barrier so weather stained as to be inconspicuous at night, and failed to provide a red lantern as required by a city ordinance. This barrier, either from its rickety condition or from being run against by passers-by, was frequently upset and lying flat on the pavement. It was in this position when the plaintiff, in running at night to take a car, was tripped by it and suffered serious injuries. The court held that the right of the contractor to place obstructions on the public street was negligently exercised, rendering him responsible to the plaintiff for injuries resulting therefrom.

So, where a suit was brought against the city for damages resulting to a citizen who was injured by falling over an obstruction left unguarded by a paving contractor, the court held the city liable, and said by way of dictum that perhaps the contractor was also liable. McCormack v. Robin (1910) 126 La. 594, 139 Am. St. Rep. 549, 52 So. 779.

In LAW v. BRYANT ASPHALT PAVING Co. (reported herewith) ante, 1189, it appeared that a paving contractor engaged in laying a pavement made use of a machine known as a concrete mixer. This machine was so placed that the lifting beam extended over and across the path or walk ordinarily used by pedestrians. When the lift was raised, the path was clear; when lowered, it was an obstruction to travel; and when in operation was a source of danger to anyone passing under it. No sufficient barrier was erected to indicate that the path was closed to public use; nor was there any warning of any kind that the passage was dangerous. The plaintiff in using the path was struck by the descending lift and severely injured. The defendant was held liable for damages for the personal injury to the plaintiff.

In Stewart v. Hugh Nawn Contracting Co. (1916) 223 Mass. 525, 112 N. E. 218, it appeared that an independent contractor, in pursuance of a contract with the proper municipal authorities, was engaged in the construction of a subway under a street, and in the course of its work had removed the surface paving and had replaced it with a plank-covered structure. One of the planks of the structure was in a defective condition, so that when the plaintiff stepped upon it it gave way, causing her to fall and sustain injuries. The court held the contractor liable.

In Williams v. Sager (1911) 165 Mich. 635, 181 N. W. 103, it appeared that a paving contractor, engaged in repaving a street, made an excavation at a street crossing and failed to light or protect the intersection, or in any way to warn pedestrians of the dangerous condition of the intersection. The plaintiff, in walking along the street on a dark night, and having no knowledge or warning of the excavation, stepped down at the intersection and was injured. The paving con-

In Phelan v. Granite Bituminous Paving Co. (1910) 227 Mo. 666, 187 Am. St. Rep. 582, 127 S. W. 818, it appeared that an independent contractor was engaged in improving a street under a contract with the city. In pursuance of the work the contractor was using a steam roller on a portion of the street that was barricaded to the public. The plaintiff, a driver of a laundry wagon, entered upon the portion of the street thus barricaded in pursuance of his ordinary business. The horse took fright at the negligent operation of the steam roller and ran away with the plaintiff, causing the latter to suffer severe injuries. The court held that, while the contractor had a right to obstruct the street with the roller in so far as was necessary in the performance of his work, he was liable for injuries resulting from the negligent operation of the machine.

In Hunt v. St. Louis (1911) — Mo. —, 211 S. W. 673, it appeared that a paving contractor engaged in repairing a street placed large piles of rock and sand therein, obstructing and narrowing the passageway. Plaintiff, while driving along the street ran against the pile of rock, overturning his wagon, and as a result was severely injured. The evidence tended to show that at the time of the casualty there was no light of any kind on the pile of rock, nor any other sign serving as a warning to travelers. The paving contractor was held liable.

In Johnson v. Friel (1872) 60 N. Y. 679, it appeared that the defendant, in pursuance of a contract with a city, had constructed a sewer, filled in and repaved the trench, and restored the surface of the street. During a rainfall, the water washed out a hole where the earth had been thus replaced, about 2 feet deep and some 6 or 7 feet long. The plaintiff's horse and carriage, in attempting to cross the street at this point, fell into the hole and were injured. There were no lights or guards about the place. The defendant had a watchman, but the evidence tended to show that at the time of the accident he was in a house two blocks off. The court, in holding the defendant liable, said: "It was not enough that defendant left the work in a proper and safe condition for the time, but it was his duty to anticipate and provide for the natural effect of rains upon earth excavated and replaced, to see that during and after the rain it was in proper and safe condition, or that safeguards were placed about it, or watchmen kept near it, or such measure of prudent forethought adopted to prevent damage to the traveling public."

In McMahon v. Second Ave. R. Co. (1878) 75 N. Y. 231, it appeared that defendant contracted with the city of New York to pave the streets wherein its tracks were laid; in and about the rails, and keep the same in repair. It appeared further that one Riss, under a permit from the city authorities, made an excavation under the defendant's tracks for the purpose of connecting his house with the sewer. The defendant took up the street pavement for 6 or 7 feet on each side of the trench from the space between its tracks, and laid down planks to bridge the excavation. The plaintiff was driving a truck along the street and across the bridge when the left-hand wheels of the truck broke through the bridge, which was concealed at the time by a covering of snow, and the plaintiff was thrown from the truck to the ground, sustaining injuries. There were no barriers around the excavation nor other sign of warning to the public. The defendant was held liable for the injuries resulting to the plaintiff through the negligence of the former in repairing the street.

In Steivermann v. White (1882) 16 Jones & S. (N. Y.) 523, it appeared that the defendants, as contractors with an elevated railroad company and with authority from the city, were engaged in digging pits and holes in the street for the columns required for the support of the road then about to be erected. They had dug two holes and the earth taken from them was thrown toward the westerly side of the street, rendering that side of the street impassable, so that the traffic was forced to the side of the street where the holes were dug. There was no railing or barrier of any kind about the holes. The plaintiff, while driving carefully along this street, and through no negligence on his part, collided with another wagon and was thrown into one of the holes and sustained severe injuries. In an action for damages, the defendants were held liable. The court said: "Inasmuch as the defendants failed to comply with a city ordinance requiring them to erect safeguards about holes of the character of those proved in this case, their failure to do so was alone sufficient evidence of their negligence, to demand the submission of this case to the jury, so far as that matter is concerned. But without the ordinance, the fact that they left such holes without barriers, in a crowded thoroughfare in constant use, under the circumstances proved in this case, was at least evidence to submit to the jury to say whether or not the defendants were negligent. That they were authorized to dig the holes by the charter of the elevated road, and by a permit from the city authorities, does not affect this question."

In Charlock v. Freel (1891) 125 N. Y. 360, 26 N. E. 262, it appeared that the defendant had a contract with the city which called for the construction of a sewer in certain streets. After the sewer was put in, but before the street had been repaved, the contractor was directed to raise the grade of the street at its intersection with another street. He undertook to do this, and, after raising the curbstones, left the adjoining portion of the sidewalk flagging disarranged and lower than the grade of the street. A storm occurred and water collected in the spot left open by the removal of the flagstones. The workmen dug away the earth, so as to admit the water through the curb into the sewer basin. This caused a hole, into which, being left unguarded, the plaintiff fell at night, a day or two afterwards. The court, in holding defendant liable for the injury sustained by plaintiff, laid down the controlling principles as follows: "The principle of liability for such an occurrence as we have in this case is that the defendant, and not the city, was the master of the workmen. He had the control of the execution of the work which he had been directed to perform. A duty rested upon him, therefore, to use such precautions in doing the work as to make it reasonably safe against the possibility of accidents to the traveling public. For the consequences of a neglect such as was testified to here he became responsible. Upon the evidence, we must accept the verdict as conclusively establishing the negligence of the defendant's workmen and the plaintiff's own freedom from fault, and as, for the reasons we have mentioned, the defendant was not devastated of liability for the carelessness of his men, the judgments below were right and should be affirmed, with costs."

In Reilly v. Sicilian Asphalt Paving Co. (1896) 16 Misc. 65, 87 N. Y. Supp. 638, it appeared that the defendant company, which was engaged in repairing sidewalks, left a pile of sand and gravel in the highway during darkness, without any signal of warning. The plaintiff, without any negligence on his part, drove against this pile of sand and gravel, and his carriage was thereby injured. In an action by plaintiff to recover damages, the court held defendant liable for the negligent manner of maintaining the locality, rendered dangerous by the work in progress.

In Tompert v. Hastings Pav. Co. (1898) 35 App. Div. 578, 55 N. Y. Supp. 177, it appeared that a paving company was engaged in repairing a portion of a street, and had removed the paving stones from the street at its intersection with an avenue. A wooden structure was stretched across the westerly curb, but a space was left to the east for the passage of vehicles. The plaintiff's intestate, who was driving a truck down the avenue, turned to the east of the wooden structure and drove across the street. When the wheels of the truck struck the ridge on the south side of the street, caused by the removal of the paving stones, the jar threw him from the truck, and he was killed as a result of the injuries sustained. It was proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the neighborhood of the accident was dark, and that it was difficult to make out surrounding objects. The court held that the paving company had failed to exercise reasonable care toward citizens using the streets, and was, therefore, liable for the death of the plaintiff's intestate. The court said: "It is urged that the appellant had the right to tear up the street, and thus make it more dangerous than it ordinarily was; and that the sole duty resting upon it was to notify passers-by of the changed condition, in order that they might take care to avoid injury. But the appellant, in the exercise of this right, was still bound to keep the place reasonably safe, regard being had to the nature of the work. Nolan v. King (1884) 97 N. Y. 565, 49 Am. Rep. 561. The right to make a place more unsafe than it is normally does not authorize the contractor to make it as hazardous as he may choose. The additional danger must be such as the nature of the repairs renders reasonably necessary."

Where it appeared that a railroad company engaged in fixing its tracks, due to the streets having been disturbed by reason of a sewer tunnel being built in the street, negligently left a large timber lying in the gutter alongside of the curb and extending above the sidewalk, it was held liable to plaintiff, who in crossing the street at that point stumbled over the timber and sustained injuries. The supreme court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff on other grounds, without denying the company's liability. Harrington v. New York R. Co. (1918) 170 N. Y. Supp. 32.

In Ya Deau v. Casparrini (1918) 170 N. Y. Supp. 1011, it appeared that a paving company under a contract with the city for the repaving of a street removed the paving blocks therefrom. When work on the street was suspended by order of the city, the blocks were replaced except at one point, where a depression resulted. This depression was left without any guards around it or other warning of the dangerous condition of the street, as was required by law and the contract with the city. The plaintiff's driver, through no fault of his own, drove his wagon into the depression, resulting in damage to the wagon and contents. The court held the paving company liable.

In an Indiana case it appeared that an independent contractor, under a contract with the city for the improvement of a public street and the sidewalks thereof, made a deep excavation extending across the sidewalk. There were no guards, lights, signals, or other warnings of danger to the public about or near said excavation. A person walking along the street at night, and without knowledge of the excavation, fell into same and sustained injuries. The injured party brought an action against the city for damages. The court quoted with approval from Dillon on Municipal Corporations, as follows: "Accordingly, the later and better-considered cases in this country, respecting streets, have firmly, and in our judgment reasonably, established the doctrine that, where the work contracted for necessarily constitutes an obstruction or defect in the street, of such a nature as to render it unsafe or dangerous for the purposes of public travel, unless properly guarded or protected, the employer (equally with the contractor), where the injury results directly from the acts which the contractor engaged to perform, is liable therefor to the injured party. But the employer is not liable where the obstruction or defect in the street causing the injury is wholly collateral to the contract work, and entirely the result of the negligence or wrongful acts of the contractor, subcontractor, or his servants. In such a case the immediate author of the injury is alone liable." Anderson v. Fleming (1902) 160 Ind. 597, 66 L.R.A. 119, 67 N. E. 448.

In Zehnder v. Miller (1868) 6 Phila. (Pa.) 556, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by the fall of a horse into an excavation made by the defendant, as contractor with the city. The accident occurred on a moonless night, and there was no light near the hole. It further appeared that when the employees of the defendant left off work for the day they left the hole unguarded except by placing a pole across the street by which plaintiff approached it, at an elevation of 2 or 3 feet at a distance of 20 to 30 feet from the excavation. The evidence adduced by the defendant was not sufficient to charge plaintiff with contributory negligence, though it was shown that he had stopped at several saloons and had drunk some other liquid than water at each, and was unusually heedless of warning intended to prevent his falling into the excavation. The court, in holding defendant liable for plaintiff's injuries, stated his duty in the premises as follows: "While, on the other hand, we think it is the plain duty,—and, as we suppose, has been the general practice, in work of a similar kind to that which was in course of execution by the defendant,—to bar up the entrance of the street in which the excavation is, at its intersection with the nearest rectangular street, or to place a light so as to discover the excavation to anyone near it. Neither of these precautions had been resorted to by the defendant."

In a case arising in Oklahoma, it appeared that a paving company, engaged in certain street improvements under contract with the city, made an excavation in the street, leaving a step-off in the sidewalk at a point almost perpendicular with the level of the ground, to a depth of about 4 feet, and in an attempt to make the street passable the paving company had thrown in loose dirt against the step-off. The plaintiff, in passing along said street, stepped on this loose dirt, which crumbled away and caused her to fall, receiving injuries. The court, in holding the paving company liable for plaintiff's injuries, stated the paving company's duty to the public as follows: "It was the duty of the company as contractor, agent, servant, or employee of the city, to construct the approach in accordance with the plan or method prescribed by the city, if any was prescribed, or, if no method or plan was prescribed by the city, but the company was required by the city to maintain temporary crossings of streets undergoing improvement, or acted upon its own initiative to then guard against the danger incident to said excavation, it was the duty of the company to so construct the approach as that it should be reasonably safe for public travel, and thereafter, before completion of the improvement of the street at such crossing, to exercise due care that the approach remain reasonably safe for public travel. The city and company owed these respective duties to the plaintiff; no more, no less." Cleveland Trinidad Paving Co. v. Mitchell (1914) 42 Okla. 49, 140 Pac. 416.

In Charles A. Cowen & Co. v. Price (1918) 121 C. C. A. 618, 208 Fed. 478, it appeared that a general contractor employed a subcontractor to build a temporary bridge over an excavation in a crowded thoroughfare, for use by the public. After the work was completed it was accepted by the general contractor. The plaintiff was using this bridge when a step gave way with her, causing her to fall and sustain injuries. In an action for damages the general contractor was held liable for the plaintiff's injuries.

So a contractor, engaged in paving a street under a contract with the city, is responsible for negligence in putting down a plank, rendering the street unsafe to one alighting from a street car at a regular stopping place, on what she was warranted in supposing to be a platform for passengers to alight on. Hoyt v. Independent Asphalt Paving Co. (1909) 52 Wash. 672, 101 Pac. 367.

In Jones v. Collins (1901) 177 Mass. 444, 59 N. E. 64, it appeared that a contractor, engaged in constructing a new street over an existing narrower street, gave reasonable notice to the public that the street was in progress of construction, and not open to use, by the placing of barriers and appropriate signs across each end of the new street and across the ends of each street leading into it. The obstructions did not extend across the whole of the space at the ends of the new street, nor across the whole width of the side streets. There was sufficient space at the sides so that persons on foot could get into the space included within the lines of the new street, without removing or climbing over any obstructions. The plaintiff, who did not know the street was in process of construction and closed for travel, made her way through one of these open spaces, and, in that part of the new street which was to be its sidewalk, ran into a shut-off pipe, which projected some inches above the surface and was not marked by a light, and sustained injuries. In an action by the plaintiff for damages, the court held that the giving of reasonable notice by the defendant to the public, by signs and barriers, that the street was closed for travel, suspended liability for injury resulting to one using the street, saying: "When, as in the present case, the order for laying out and construction includes what has been an existing way, the whole surface of which, as well as that of the other land included in the laying out, is to be torn up and wrought anew, if reasonable notice is given to the public by signs and barriers that there is no passing and that the way is not open to travel, this suspends the . . . liability. It also is sufficient to free the town or city and its contractor from all obligation to keep the way safe for the use of travelers until it has been completed in accordance with the order, or opened for use. In the meantime it is not negligence for the municipality or its agents to leave in the surface of the street such projections as that over which the plaintiff fell, and it is not an invitation to use the street, to leave at the entrances to it openings through which travelers can pass, if at the same time there are exposed to view such signs and barriers as are fitted to convey to the public notice that the street is, for the time being, closed for travel. It is not essential that such notice shall be brought to the actual knowledge of all persons; and it is immaterial to the duty of the defendants to the plaintiff in the present case, whether she had actual knowledge that the street had been closed for travel."

In Steinbrenner v. M. W. Forney Co. (1910) 143 App. Div. 73, 127 N. Y. Supp. 620, it appeared that a general contractor, engaged in widening a street, left an open manhole without a barricade around it or any signal of warning to the public. The street, however, was barricaded, and this, together with the presence of material and the implements of street construction, indicated that the street was under repair and not open to the public. There was light enough to disclose to everyone that the way was not open and was obstructed by the barriers and materials, and therefore dangerous for traveling on foot, when plaintiff, disregarding the barriers, made her way at night with great difficulty over this street until she fell into the open and unguarded manhole. In an action for damages for injuries thus sustained, the court held that the contractor was not negligent under the circumstances, in leaving the unguarded manhole, and that plaintiff was herself guilty of contributory negligence in using the highway when she was acquainted with its condition.

In Reilly v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. (1913) 155 App. Div. 108, 140 N. Y. Supp. 16, it appeared that defendant, under a contract with the city, was engaged in repairing the streets by putting down asphalt over spots or small places where it had been worn out. When the asphalt was put down, it was heated to a high temperature, then allowed to cool, and a roller of heavy weight run over it. At the time in question, the plaintiff, between two and three years of age, in the custody of his sister, about nine years of age, was on the sidewalk immediately adjoining the spot in the road that was being repaired, when he suddenly broke away from her and went to the edge of the sidewalk, and fell into the asphalt, sustaining burns about the hands and face. The evidence showed that this spot was not near a crosswalk, but in a part of the roadway where pedestrians did not ordinarily go, and that there was a barrier at each crosswalk to prevent people walking or driving on that portion of the street. In an action for damages by plaintiff, alleging negligence on the part of the defendant in not having a guard on the sidewalk to warn the plaintiff, or some barrier around the spot to prevent his falling into it, the court said that it would be unreasonable to hold defendant negligent in not anticipating that an accident of this kind was possible.

In Reck v. Uvalde Asphalt Co. (1913) 159 App. Div. 736, 144 N. Y. Supp. 917, it appeared that the defendant company was engaged in repairing the asphalt pavement of a street in the city of New York, cutting out holes in the pavement and filling them with fresh asphalt. To insure a good union between the new asphalt and the old pavement, the edge of the cut was washed with asphaltic cement, which must be used very hot. This cement was kept in a pail about the size of an ordinary water pail, which was moved from place to place as required. There was some dispute as to whether the street was barricaded, but it was clearly shown that there were a number of men at work on the job, and the usual machines and apparatus used in asphalt paving, so that everyone using the street had ample notice that repair work was going on. The plaintiff had been playing ball on the sidewalk with another boy. In running backwards with his hands aloft in an effort to catch a ball, he stepped off the sidewalk onto the roadway, and then into the pail of hot cement. The plaintiff brought an action for damages against defendant, charging negligence in leaving the pail of hot cement on the roadway and unguarded, at the time it was not actually in use in cementing the cuts in the asphalt. The court held that the charge of negligence on this ground was wholly unreasonable, and the defendant, therefore, not liable for damages to the plaintiff.

In another case in the same jurisdiction, it appeared that a contractor engaged in the construction of a railroad, a work of public necessity, under contract with the city, placed an obstruction on a sidewalk, but left a reasonably free passageway 8 feet wide between the obstruction and the coping at the house line, for the use of pedestrians, and maintained it with reasonable care. It appeared that there was an arc light at the corner of the street, lighting up the street at the point where the obstruction was maintained. The passageway was not dangerous except for the stone coping, which was neither erected nor maintained by the contractor. The coping did not extend into the 3-foot space, and pedestrians were not compelled to pass over the coping in using the passageway. The plaintiff in using the street stumbled over the coping at the point where the obstruction was maintained by the contractor, and sustained injuries. In an action for damages against the contractor, alleging negligence in obstructing the street, the court held the contractor not liable. Karlson v. Rapid Transit Subway Constr. Co. (1918) 170 N. Y. Supp. 949.

The right of the public to the use of the highway is subordinate to the right of the public authorities to make reasonable repairs for the public benefit. Hence in a case where it appeared that a steam roller, lawfully in use in the construction of a macadamized roadway of the width of 18 feet, in the middle of a highway 66 feet wide, was left standing over Sunday on the edge of the already macadamized part of the road, leaving a clear space of about 30 feet, the steam roller being covered with canvas tied at the sides or corners, it was held as matter of law that the defendants, the contractors, were not liable for an accident occurring in the daytime, through the fright of a horse at the sight of the machine. Keeley v. Shanley (1891) 140 Pa. 213, 21 Atl. 305, 306.

In Nicholas v. Keeling (1902) 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 181, it appeared that a contractor was engaged in the performance of work under a contract to macadamize and otherwise improve a certain highway. Among his employees was one M. R., whose duty it was to go along the road and remove slips, and cart the dirt over to the other side of the road. He was hired for no definite time. The relation of master and servant ended with the day's work. So far as his duty to his employers was concerned, he was then at liberty to go where he pleased. At the close of the day in question he started for the place where he usually kept his horses and cart, but after going about a mile, one of the horses becoming lame, he backed the cart behind a slip and left it, exposed in such a way as to scare almost any horse. There was no guard, barrier, or signal of any kind to warn the public of the presence of the obstruction. The plaintiff was driving along the road when his horse suddenly took fright and plunged over an embankment, resulting in injuries to the plaintiff. In an action for damages the court held the contractor not liable for negligence of the employee, at a time when he had no control over his actions.

See also DAVIS v. MELLEN (reported herewith) ante, 1193.

The general rule is that, after the contractor has turned the work over and it has been accepted by the municipality, the contractor incurs no further liability to third persons by reason of the condition of the work, but the responsibility, if any, for maintaining or using it in a defective condition, is shifted to the municipality. Memphis Asphalt & Paving Co. v. Fleming (1910) 96 Ark. 442, 182 S. W. 222, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 709; Handy v. Barber Asphalt Co. (1906) 117 La. 637, 42 So. 193; Kulwicki v. Munro (1893) 95 Mich. 28, 54 N. W. 703.

In Memphis Asphalt & Paving Co. v. Fleming (Ark.) supra, it appeared that appellee was injured by falling off the edge of a sidewalk which had been constructed by the appellant. There was no guard rail or barrier erected along the edge of the sidewalk, nor was any provided for in, or required by, the contract for the protection of persons using the walk; neither was there any light placed thereon to warn persons of the danger at the time of the injury. The proof showed that the street had been paved and the sidewalk constructed in accordance with the contract, and that it had been in fact and formally accepted by the engineer in charge of the district, and thrown open to the use of the public three days before the injury to the appellee occurred. The court held that after the work was completed and accepted by the municipality, the contractor incurred no further liability by reason of the condition of the work.

In Handy v. Barber Asphalt Co. (1906) 117 La. 637, 42 So. 193, it appeared that the defendant, under a contract with a city calling for different kinds of work in a public street, made excavations in the sidewalk and covered them with movable lids. After this work was completed, in performing the work of paving the street, the defendant's employees displaced one of the lids, and concealed the displacement with sand. Plaintiff trod on the lid thus displaced, which tilted with her, so that she fell through the opening, and was thereby seriously injured. The court held the defendant liable for the plaintiff's injury, but expressly declared that the liability did not rest on him because of any duty on his part to keep the lids on the excavations, which he had completed according to contract, but because of the negligence of his employees in displacing the lid so as to make it unsafe to walk on, and covering it over with sand so as to conceal the danger.

In Kulwicki v. Munro (1893) 95 Mich. 28, 54 N. W. 703, it appeared that a paving contractor, engaged in repairing a street, made an excavation at a crossing and erected a barrier around it in such a manner as to prevent accidents. It appeared further that a member of the board of public works, acting as inspector of the work under statutory authority, caused the excavation to be filled in with sand by the contractor's employees, and directed that the barrier be removed. While plaintiff was driving over the crossing at the point where the excavation was made, the wheels of his carriage sank into the sand, and, coming in contact with the street railway track, the carriage was damaged. In an action against the contractor it was held that he was relieved from liability by the action of the member of the board of public works.

In Shalata v. Rodgers (1919) 189 App. Div. 228, 178 N. Y. Supp. 494, where a child wandered upon the concrete extension of a sewer from the foot of the street into the river and thence upon a cofferdam from which he fell into the river and was drowned, it appearing that the work upon the sewer extension at that point had been completed except that the cofferdam had not been removed, the court, in repudiating the contention that the sewer contractor was negligent in failing to erect a fence or guard at the foot of the street to prevent children going upon the concrete work, observed: "As well might one who was employed to construct a wharf or dock at the foot of any street of the city be called upon to fence off the dock after his work was completed."

But where a contractor, engaged in constructing streets for a city, negligently left an unexploded blast beneath the surface of the street, he was held to be liable to one who, in lawful pursuit of his own business, was injured by a subsequent explosion of the blast, even though the city had accepted the street as a compliance with the contract. The court said: "The appellants, Forster & Hindle, make the contention that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict against them. They argue that when they completed the contract and turned the street over to the city, and the city accepted the work as a compliance with the contract, their liability to third persons for the negligent performance of the work ceased, and from henceforth the city alone was responsible for any such negligent performance. This argument is perhaps sound in so far as it relates to defects in the street arising from a mere negligent performance of the work, but we think it has no application to an act of the nature here charged against the contractors. The leaving of the unexploded charge of dynamite in the rock beneath the surface of the street was not a matter connected with the contract work. It was a matter wholly collateral thereto, and was, as we have said, of itself a negligent and wrongful act, rendering the persons wrongfully leaving it there liable to anyone who, in the lawful pursuit of his own business, should be injured thereby." Wilton v. Spokane (1913) 73 Wash. 619, L.R.A. 1917D, 234, 182 Pac. 404.

II. Liability as for nuisance.

A temporary obstruction of a street or highway by the contractor, when it appears that the act was done with the consent of the proper public authorities and in the course of the construction or improvement of the street or highway, is not a nuisance. Murphy v. Hugh Nawn Contracting Co. (1916) 223 Mass. 404, 111 N. E. 890; Malkan v. Carlin (1905) 93 N. Y. Supp. 378; Cunningham v. Wright (1882) 28 Hun (N. Y.) 178.

In Cunningham v. Wright (N. Y.) supra, it appeared that the defendant, in pursuance of a contract made with the city for the repaving and regrading of a street, removed a number of large stones from the street and piled them in a side street. The plaintiff, while playing on the pile of stones, was injured by the falling upon her of a large stone which had been negligently placed on end. The plaintiff brought suit for damages, alleging injuries resulting from illegal and unlawful acts of defendant in removing the stones from the street under repair, and placing them in the side street. The defendant offered to show that he acted under authority from the city, but the lower court refused to allow him to prove that fact as incompetent evidence, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. The supreme court held that the defendant should have been allowed to prove that he was acting under the authority of the city, and that he was not, therefore, liable for maintaining a nuisance, but that his liability to the plaintiff, if any, should be tested by the rules applicable to cases of the negligent performance of a lawful act.

In a Massachusetts case, it appeared that a contractor, engaged in constructing a tunnel under contract with the proper municipal authorities, negligently placed a plank on a street and left it there, without taking proper precautions by barriers, or signs, or other adequate means, to warn the public of its presence. The plaintiff fell over this plank and was injured. The court held that the contractor had a right to use the street in performance of necessary public work, and was, therefore, not liable for maintaining a nuisance, but was liable for negligence in thus obstructing the street without providing adequate warning to the public. Murphy v. Hugh Nawn Contracting Co. (1916) 223 Mass. 404, 111 N. E. 890.

In Malkan v. Carlin (1905) 93 N. Y. Supp. 378, it appeared that defendants, having obtained a contract from a city for laying a sidewalk around a building then in course of construction, during the progress of the work, piled a number of flagstones near the curb, leaving considerable space between the pile and the building or house line. The plaintiff stumbled over the pile of stones and sustained injuries. In an action by plaintiff to recover damages "for personal injuries resulting from a nuisance established or maintained by defendants," the court held that the temporary obstruction of the highway, when the act was done with the consent of the proper authorities and in the course of construction of a sidewalk, was not a nuisance, and that the defendants, therefore, were not liable.

PAULINE BRUNSWICK, Appt.,

V.

STANDARD ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY, Resp't.

(— Mo. —, 213 S. W. 45.)

Evidence — presumption against suicide — death from poison.

1. In an action upon an accident insurance policy where the death results from taking poison and the evidence is circumstantial, the presumption is against suicide if the known facts are consistent with the theory of accidental death.

Appeal — theory of case — reversal.

2. One cannot secure a reversal of a judgment for defendant in an action to recover on an insurance policy for accidental death because recovery was not permitted under a clause providing for recovery in case of suicide where suicide was not brought to the attention of the trial court as a ground of recovery.

[See 2 R. C. L. 183.]

Evidence — presumption of sanity.

3. The sanity of one dying as a result of taking poison must be presumed in the absence of evidence that he was non compos mentis.

[See 10 R. C. L. 879; 14 R. C. L. 628.]

Insurance — accident — death by poison.

4. Death from the effects of a poison intentionally swallowed is not due to accident within the meaning of an accident insurance policy.

— statutory provision — death by accident.

5. A statutory provision making void an exception of suicide in an insurance policy does not prevent the person from contracting for liability only in case of death by accident.

6. Death by suicide while insane is an accident within the meaning of an accident insurance policy.

[See 14 R. C. L. 1264.]

Evidence — burden of proof — death by accident.

7. One seeking recovery on an accident insurance policy for death has the burden of showing that the death resulted from accident.

Judgment — in other jurisdictions — binding effect.

8. A decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon a question of insurance law is not binding on a state court.

[See 7 R. C. L. 1013.]

Evidence — when presumption obtains.

9. If, in an action on an accident insurance policy, there is evidence both for and against suicide, which is not evenly balanced, the presumption against suicide is not to be considered, but the question must be resolved upon the evidence.

— presumption as.

10. The presumption against suicide is not evidence, but a mere term to designate the burden upon the side against which the presumption operates, of producing evidence to rebut the finality of the legal conclusion which might be drawn from it.

Appeal — erroneous instruction — right result — effect.

11. If the court should have sustained a demurrer to the evidence and the verdict attains the same result as the court would thereby have done, an erroneous instruction is not reversible error.

Evidence — to overcome presumption against suicide.

12. The fact that one in good health who dies from taking poison was seen a few minutes before his death to fold a handkerchief which contained poison similar to that which killed him, and which he knew to be poison, is not sufficient to exclude every reasonable hypothesis favoring accidental death, and the case is therefore, because of the presumption against suicide, to be left to the determination of the jury.

Trial — necessity of proper instructions.

13. A case which should go to the jury must go under proper instructions.

Appeal — erroneous instruction — reversible error.

14. An instruction in an action on an accident insurance policy, where insured died from taking poison, that there is no presumption that the taking of the poison was accidental and that the burden is upon plaintiff to show that death resulted from accident, is reversible error where the evidence does not establish suicide.

[See 14 R. C. L. 1235.]

CERTIFICATION by the St. Louis Court of Appeals for the determination by the Supreme Court of questions arising upon appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the City of St. Louis (Withrow, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Emerson E. Schnepf, Otto F. Karbe, and Taylor & Mayer, for appellant:

Defendant was Hable under the policy for the death of plaintiff's husband from the effect of taking a deadly poison.

Newland v. Modern Woodmen, 168 Mo. App. 319, 153 S. W. 1097; Wear v. Lee, 26 Mo. App. 107; Fitzjohn v. St. Louis Transit Co. 183 Mo. 79, 81 S. W. 907; State ex rel. Iba v. Ellison, 256 Mo. 661, 165 S. W. 369; Knisely v. Leathe, — Mo. —, 178 S. W. 461.

The evidence showed conclusively that Brunswick died from taking cyanide of potassium. Under the statute this constituted an accident within the meaning of the policy.

Fidelity & C. Co. 172 Mo. App. 250, 157 S. W. 1046; Whitfield v. Ætna L. Ins. Co. supra; Logan v. Fidelity & C. Co. 146 Mo. 114, 47 S. W. 948.

The presumption of law is against suicide, hence, that being the presumption, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the question of suicide being excluded, there is but one alternative left and that is that the taking of poison was accidental.

Richy v. Woodmen of the World, 163 Mo. App. 247, 146 S. W. 461; Newland v. Modern Woodmen, 168 Mo. App. 819, 153 S. W. 1097; Norman v. Order of United Commercial Travelers, 163 Mo. App. 175, 145 S. W. 853; Voelker v. Hill-O'Meara Constr. Co. 153 Mo. App. 1, 131 S. W. 907.

Even if it could be said that there was some evidence tending to show that Brunswick died because he intentionally took cyanide of potassium (suicide) yet, under the law, such intentional taking constituted an accident.

Messrs. Anderson, Gilbert, & Hayden and M. U. Hayden, for respondent:

If the record discloses that the evidence offered by plaintiff wholly failed to establish that she is entitled to recover or entitled to have her case submitted to the jury at all, then, the verdict of the jury having been in favor of defendant, there can be no error in any instructions given at the instance of the respondent which can be held to be reversible error.

Wagner v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 177 Mo. 60, 75 S. W. 966; Bradley v. James H. Forbes Tea & Coffee Co. 213 Mo. 320, 111 S. W. 919; Trainer v. Sphalerite Min. Co. 243 Mo. 371, 148 S. W. 70; Shinn v. United R. Co. 248 Mo. 181, 154 S. W. 103; Hurck v. Missouri P. R. Co. 252 Mo. 51, 153 S. W. 581; Shelton v. Kirksville Light, Power & Ice Co. 258 Mo. 541, 167 S. W. 544; Boesel v. Wells, F. & Co. 260 Mo. 479, 169 S. W. 110; Moore v. Lindell R. Co. 176 Mo. 545, 75 S. W. 672; Mockowik v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 196 Mo. 568, 94 S. W. 256; Schuepbach v. Lacleda Gaslight Co. 232 Mo. 611, 135 S. W. 29.

A judgment will not be reversed where the right result was reached, though the record may show that the proceedings were irregular, or perhaps erroneous.

Mockowik v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 196 Mo. 568, 94 S. W. 256; Petersen v. St. Louis Transit Co. 199 Mo. 344, 97 S. W. 860.

The burden is upon the plaintiff, in any lawsuit, to prove the allegations of his petition, and if he fails to prove those allegations, or if he prove another and different theory than that pleaded, he is not entitled to recover.

Reed v. Bott, 100 Mo. 62, 12 S. W. 347, 14 S. W. 1089; Schneider v. Patton, 175 Mo. 723, 75 S. W. 155; Roden v. Helm, 192 Mo. 94, 90 S. W. 798; Milliken v. Thyson Commission Co. 202 Mo. 654, 100 S. The burden was, therefore, imposed upon plaintiff to prove three facts: that Brunswick did, in fact, take cyanide of potassium; that he took it accidentally; and that it caused his death.

bility, and, on the trial, prove another and different theory, there can be no recovery.

Faris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by plaintiff as beneficiary on a policy of insurance issued by defendant, insuring one William Brunswick, the husband of plaintiff, against death by accident. Upon a trial by a jury, the verdict was for the defendant. From the resulting judgment plaintiff appealed to the St. Louis court of appeals, wherein, upon a hearing, the case was reversed for error and ordered remanded for a new trial. See Brunswick v. Standard Acci. Ins. Co. 195 Mo. App. 651, 187 S. W. 802. The court of appeals, however, being of the opinion that the views announced by them in this case were in conflict with the opinion of the Springfield court of appeals in the case of Scales v. National Life & Acci. Ins. Co. — Mo. App. —, 186 S. W. 948, made an order transferring the case to this court, pursuant to the mandate of the Constitution. Hence our jurisdiction.

The petition seems to be conventional. After averring formally the issuance of the policy, the petition sets out substantially the conditions of the policy under which the liability of defendant for accidental death of the assured shall accrue. These conditions, as the petition and the policy recite them, are that liability accrues in the event of the death of assured "resulting directly, exclusively, and independently of all other causes from accidental bodily injuries." The policy contains, following the above-quoted conditions as to the cause of death, an exception; to wit, "Except when self-inflicted while insane," which is not set out, or in any wise referred to, in the petition. Continuing, the petition avers that assured died on the 22d day of April, 1913, and that his death resulted "directly, exclusively, and independently of all other causes from accidental bodily injuries from and caused by the said William Brunswick taking on said day poison known as cyanide of potassium." Other allegations are made as to additional increments to the principal sum of $2,500, arising, it is averred, from annual renewals of the policy, and as to damages and attorneys' fees accruing from an alleged vexatious refusal to pay. But these have no pertinence to the points vexing us upon this appeal.

The answer of defendant, so far also as it is pertinent to the questions mooted here, was an admission of the issuance of the policy and of the several annual renewals thereof as pleaded, and a general denial of each and every allegation (sic) contained in the petition.

The facts immediately surrounding the death of assured are meager, but so far as these facts are shown, and so far as they are pertinent to elucidate the questions mooted on this appeal, run substantially thus: Assured on the morning of his death seemed to be in the best of health. He ate his breakfast just before 8 o'clock in the morning, and apparently was preparing to go to his work. After breakfast he went into the bedroom of plaintiff, who seems to have been ill, and the latter tied his necktie for him. He then went into a bedroom adjoining that of plaintiff. Some five minutes afterward, hearing an unusual noise from this room, plaintiff entered it and found assured lying on the bed in a dying condition. His necktie and collar had been removed. There were burns on his mouth and cheek and hand, the latter seemingly from having wiped his mouth with his hand. A glass and spoon were found on the floor near the bed on which assured was lying. While in this bedroom, and a few minutes before he was found dying, he was seen folding a handkerchief. In a handkerchief which was found in his pocket after his death were found some 2 or 3 ounces of cyanide of potassium. A can containing some  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a pound of cyanide of potassium was found in the bathroom.

The coroner, who was a physician, examined the body of assured some two hours after his death, and from the symptoms and the history of the case testified that assured came to his death from cyanide of potassium poisoning. The finding of the coroner's inquest that assured came to his death by suicide, caused by swallowing cyanide of potassium, was offered by plaintiff, but excluded by the trial court on defendant's objection.

It will be necessary to state other and omitted facts in the course of the discussion of the points made by plaintiff. These will be set out in connection with the point to which they are apposite.

I. Plaintiff insists that the verdict is against the evidence. This contention is bottomed on the fact that the contract of insurance contained a provision substantially to the effect that if assured came to his death by suicide, while either sane or insane, the company would pay the beneficiary one tenth of the principal sum; that is to say, $250. So, it is urged, since the death of the assured was unquestionably due either to accident or suicide, the verdict ought, in any event, to have been for at least the sum of $250.

It is enough to say upon this contention that the case was not tried below upon any such theory. Neither the pleadings upon either side, nor the instruction, nor the evidence, except the policy, contain the word "suicide," and the policy has it only in the clause whereon the alleged right is bottomed to recover the lesser sum above mentioned. Even in these days when the leaven of reform is working in all the law, and the strife is toward a legal millenium, whereat every man shall be his own lawyer, one may not yet sue and cause the jury to be instructed upon one cause of action, and then, when cast, urge error, for that he was not permitted to recover upon a wholly different theory, and upon a wholly different cause of action, which he did not see fit even to mention till he came up to the appellate court. The rule which forbids this practice is that which requires the appellant to try his case in the appellate forum on the same theory upon which he tried it below. Paramore v. Campbell, 245 Mo. 287, 149 S. W. 6; Linn County Bank v. Clifton, 268 Mo. 200, 172 S. W. 388.

II. Complaint is made by plaintiff of the following instruction given for the defendant; to wit, "You are instructed that, even though you may find from the evidence that William Brunswick took cyanide of potassium on the day of his death, and even though you may further find that his death was caused thereby, there is still no presumption in law that his act in taking said poison, if you find that he did take it, was accidental, or that his death resulted from accidental bodily injuries. On the contrary, the burden is upon plaintiff to prove that the death of said William Brunswick resulted, independently of all other causes, from accidental bodily injuries; and unless she has proved such fact she cannot recover, and your verdict must be for the defendant."

In condemnation of the above instruction plaintiff urges (a) that it substantially tells the jury that death by suicide is not an accident; (b) that the burden was upon plaintiff to prove that the death of assured was caused by an accident; and (c) that, if the jury should find that assured's death was caused by poison, no presumption exists that such poison was taken accidentally. Taking the converse of each of the above propositions, plaintiff strenuously urges that the above instruction was erroneous as to all of them.

In resolving these contentions it is necessary to re-examine the facts, cursorily at least. By these facts we think the cause of assured's death is fairly well settled; for, while the evidence is upon some vexing points utterly lacking, we are yet convinced that enough is shown to justify a finding by the triers of fact that assured came to his death from taking poison, whether accidentally or intentionally swallowed is another question and one presently reserved. For in addition to his sudden death and the burns upon his mouth, face, and hand, which some of the witnesses say are characteristic effects of cyanide of potassium, crystals of this drug were found in a handkerchief in his pocket, and a can containing a large quantity thereof was found upon the premises. A few minutes before the death of assured he was seen to fold up a handkerchief, and, as stated, in a handkerchief after his death some 2 or 3 ounces of cyanide of potassium were found. A glass and spoon were found upon the floor near his body, which lay upon the bed, but whether containing evidences of recent use does not appear. The coroner, who is a physician, saw and examined the body of assured some two hours after his death, and as a result of that examination and the history of the case swore unequivocally that death was caused by cyanide of potassium poisoning. So, we think the postulate of fact in the instruction was fully warranted by the evidence in the case, which clearly tended to prove that the death of deceased was caused by his swallowing cyanide of potassium.

The obvious inference arises, and in fact the testimony shows, that assured was fully cognizant of the deadly nature of cyanide of potassium; for the testimony is that only a few days before his death he had taken from his pocket crystals of some drug, and in exhibiting these crystals to his partner in business had stated in substance that it was cyanide of potassium and a deadly poison. No reason whatever for suicide is disclosed by the record; neither, on the other hand, are there any facts in evidence making for the theory of accidental taking of this poison. The assured is not shown to have been ill, or to have been intending to take medicine, or even to have been in the habit of taking medicine. There is, as forecast above, no hint in the record, in either pleadings or proof, that assured was insane, or non compos, to any degree. Therefore his sanity must be presumed.

Upon these meager facts how stands the case upon the question of the correctness of the above instruction, and incidentally upon the right of plaintiff to recover at all on a contract of insurance against death "resulting directly, exclusively, and independently of all other causes from accidental bodily injuries, except when self-inflicted while insane?"

In the light of the presumption in favor of sanity, and the utter lack of any proof of insanity in the record, we go afield, in preserving the thread of our argument, to say that if assured took cyanide of potassium while insane his death was caused by an accident within the purview of the policy herein. Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal, 120 U. S. loc. cit. 531, 30 L. ed. 742, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 685; Tuttle v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 132 Iowa, 652, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 223, 104 N. W. 1131; Grand Lodge, I. O. M. A. v. Wieting, 168 Ill. 408, 61 Am. St. Rep. 123, 48 N. E. 59; Blackstone v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 74 Mich. 592, 3 L.R.A. 486, 42 N. W. 156; Berger v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. (C. C.) 88 Fed. 241. And the above-quoted clause of that policy, which excepts liability for death self-inflicted while insane, is rendered void by the express provisions of § 6945, Rev. Stat. 1909, and ceteris paribus recovery could be had by the beneficiary. Logan v. Fidelity & C. Co. 146 Mo. 114, 47 S. W. 948; Whitfield v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 205 U. S. 489, 51 L. ed. 895, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 578.

If, on the other hand, assured intentionally swallowed cyanide of potassium—that is, if he committed suicide while sane—his death was not due to accident, and his beneficiary cannot recover under this policy, which bottoms the right to recover only for a death resulting from accidental injuries. Williams v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 138 N. Y. 866, 31 N. E. 222; Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. Vandecar, 30 C. O. A. 48, 57 U. S. App. 446, 86 Fed. 282; Tuttle v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 132 Iowa, loc. cit. 654, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 223, 104 N. W. 1131; Laessig v. Travelers' Protective Asso. 169 N. loc. cit. 280, 69 S. W. 469; Lamport v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. — Mo. —, 199 S. W. 1024.

For in such case neither sound sense nor logic will permit us to hold that an act intentionally done by a sane man is an accident. Such a view would stultify common sense. Neither does § 6945, supra, upon which plaintiff so confidently relies, aid at all or apply to the situation. The above section has nothing to do with the manner or cause of death. It leaves the parties perfectly free to contract in an accident policy touching the cause of death.

If they see fit to contract that there shall be no liability except for a death resulting from an accidental injury, then the proof must show such a cause of death, before any recovery can be had on the contract. In other words, if the proof, even where aided in a proper case by the presumption against suicide, yet shows suicide by assured while sane, the plaintiff has simply failed to meet the burden expressly assumed in the insurance contract of proving the death of assured by accident.

In case of insurance effected upon life by the usual life insurance policy, the fact of death, since such fact is the sole condition precedent to recovery, is alone pertinent, and § 6945, supra, applies automatically to all cases of death by suicide, regardless of whether the assured was sane or insane at the time he killed himself, barring, of course, the exception noted in the statute itself. But where the assured solemnly contracts in an accident policy that liability for his death accrues only when the cause of death shall be an accidental injury, nothing seems clearer than that § 6945, supra, has no application, unless, as already stated, assured shall commit suicide while insane. In the latter event the death, being unintentional, is held to be accidental, and, though suicide is expressly excepted by the policy, recovery can be had because of the saving provisions of said § 6945.

Upon this phase, therefore, we conclude that the burden was upon plaintiff to prove that the death of assured resulted from accidental injuries; that is, that it was due to an accident. That such burden may sometimes be aided by a presumption against suicide (which presumption we discuss below) does not, in our view, affect this phase of the situation. This is so for the reason, if for no other, so clearly set forth in the case of Laessig v. Travelers Protective Assn. supra, at page 280 of 169 Mo. where it was said: "In other words, the contract of accident insurance primarily casts the burden upon the plaintiff to show that the death was accidental. It must be so pleaded and proved. If the defendant wants to avoid liability for an accidental death, it must prove that the death was due to a cause excepted from the operation of the policy; that is, that it was a suicide. In such cases there is no presumption of law that because the death was not due to suicide it was accidental. For it might not be due either to suicide or accident. It might be natural. In such case the defendant would fail in its contention that it was suicide, and plaintiff would fail in his case because the death was not due to accident, and the contract only insured against accidental death. In fact, if there was no plea of suicide, the plaintiff would have to prove accidental death. There would be no presumption of accidental death. The jury must determine the facts as to what caused the death. There need not necessarily be direct proof or evidence of the cause. The cause may be found by the jury from facts and circumstances. But the cause of death is a fact for the jury. There is no presumption of law in such cases, further than the presumption against suicide; but even this presumption does not carry with it, in accident insurance cases, the further presumption that the death was accidental."

When examined in the light of the facts and the points mooted and respectively held in judgment therein, neither the case of Logan v. Fidelity & C. Co. supra, nor the case of Whitfield v. Aetna L. Ins. Co., supra, militates conclusively against this view. This is so because in the Logan Case the defense was "that the death of said assured was caused while either sane or insane, in either of which events defendant was not liable." The precise concrete question up for judgment under this defense, as that point was stated by the court in the Logan Case, was: "Is suicide in this state a valid defense to an action upon a policy of insurance issued by an accident insurance company, containing provisions such as the one in controversy, where it is not shown that the insured contemplated suicide at the time he made his application for the policy (and it being admitted that the assured afterwards came to his death from external, violent, and accidental means)?"

Under these defenses and the above admission it was competent for this court to find and conclude that assured was insane when he committed suicide. If he was insane his death, as we have already seen, was accidental, and the right to recover unquestionable. In fact, the above admission concedes that his death was caused by accidental means; so, if he died by suicide, such suicide, in order to be in harmony with this solemn admission, must have occurred while assured was insane. Therefore the Logan Case is in no respect out of harmony with our views herein.

In the Whitfield Case the question whether the death was accidental, and whether the burden of proving the cause of death to have been on this phase within the terms of the policy, was not discussed. The defendant in the Whitfield Case specifically pleaded suicide as a defense. The Supreme Court of the United States held that there could no longer be such a defense made, because forbidden by § 6945 of the Missouri Statutes. The burden resting upon the plaintiff to prove a cause of death falling within the contract of insurance, i. e., an accidental death, was not adverted to by the court. It seems to have been tacitly assumed by the court that the death was accidental, although the reply of plaintiff in effect admitted that the assured therein was sane when he killed himself. It is regrettable that it was not pointed out wherein the language of said § 6945 had the effect to create by its terms a cause of action, when none theretofore existed under the policy and upon the conceded facts. This section is short and fairly simple, and reads thus: "In all suits upon policies of insurance on life hereafter issued by any company doing business in this state, to a citizen of this state, it shall be no defense that the insured committed suicide, unless it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the court or jury trying the cause, that the insured contemplated suicide at the time he made his application for the policy, and any stipulation in the policy to the contrary shall be void." Rev. Stat. 1909, § 6945.

While the above section makes absolutely void all stipulations exempting liability on account of suicide and all defenses bottomed on the fact of suicide, yet it nowhere relieves the plaintiff, in an action upon a policy of accident insurance, from making proof that the death of the assured was caused by an accident. In short, as forecast above, the section does not write into an accident policy a cause of action where none existed upon the facts. Granting, for the sake of argument, that the section (the applicability of which to accident policies, though now fairly well settled, has been strenuously and ably combated and denied) could have gone further, and provided that "suicide by a sane person shall be deemed to be an accident," it is enough to say that it does not so provide. If the legislature desired to create a cause of action upon a policy of accident insurance where none existed within the obvious meaning of the plain language of such contracts, it would have been easy to say so. Therefore, unless the courts are able to say that a death by suicide of a sane person is a death by accident, further legislation would seem to be called for. There are no cases up to the present time so holding. Both the reason of the thing and the cases are the other way. Williams v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 133 N. Y. 306, 31 N. E. 222; Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. Vandecar, 30 C. C. A. 48, 57 U. S. App. 446, 86 Fed. 282; Tuttle v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 132 Iowa, loc. cit. 654, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 223, 104 N. W. 1131; *Laessig v. port v. Ætna L. Ins. Co. — Mo. —, 199 S. W. 1024.

Neither does the view we here announce conflict with the rule in Fetter v. Fidelity & C. Co. 174 Mo. loc. cit. 269, 61 L.R.A. 459, 97 Am. St. Rep. 560, 73 S. W. 592. The latter case at most merely deals with the burden of adducing evidence. When the plaintiff has shown that assured died from cyanide of potassium poisoning, self-administered, then the inevitable inference arose that death was caused by either accident or suicide, and plaintiff could not recover if the evidence (aided by the presumption against suicide) yet showed suicide, till there was further evidence adduced showing that such suicide was committed while assured was insane. We have here referred to, but left out of discussion or consideration, the effect and nature of the presumption against suicide, elsewhere fully discussed in the expression of our views. And so we conclude that under the rule defining and delimiting stare decisis, as that rule is announced in the case of State ex rel. Bixby v. St. Louis, 241 Mo. 231, 145 S. W. 801, the instant case may be, to the extent stated, distinguished from the Whitfield, Logan, and Fetter Cases, supra. If under this rule it be impossible to distinguish the Whitfield Case (there are no difficulties as to the others), then we may content ourselves with saying that it is not binding on us in any respect, but, at most, only persuasive as the utterance of a great court, unfamiliar, however, with many of the intricacies of our local statutes and rulings thereon.

But having shown that assured came to his death from swallowing cyanide of potassium, the inference, naught else appearing, that the act of swallowing this poison was either accidental or intentional, i. e., suicidal, inevitably arose. In such case, and after such a showing, was it proper to instruct the jury that "there is still no presumption in law that his [assured's] act in taking said poison was accidental?" It was clearly improper as an abstract proposition. Whether it was reversible error here, upon the concrete case made, depends upon whether there is upon the facts any room for the presumption; i. e., whether suicide was not so conclusively shown as to eliminate any presumption.

Discussing this presumption and its effect, a majority of this court in the late case of Reynolds v. Maryland Casualty Co. 274 Mo. loc. cit. 96, 201 S. W. 1131, said:

"No legal proposition is more firmly established than that where the act which caused the death may be either accidental or suicidal, the burden is upon the insurer to establish the fact of suicide by a preponderance of the evidence; for the presumption arising from the love of life, which is created for its preservation, is, like every natural law, always within the contemplation of the courts. It follows, as is stated by Mr. Bacon in his work on Life and Accident Insurance, 4th ed. § 488, that 'when circumstantial evidence only is relied on, the defense fails unless the circumstances exclude with reasonable certainty any hypothesis of death by accident or by the act of another.' Boynton v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 105 La. 202, 52 L.R.A. 687, 29 So. 490; Shotliff v. Modern Woodmen, 100 Mo. App. 138, 73 S. W. 326; Norman v. Order of United Commercial Travelers, 163 Mo. "These cases, and many others to which our attention has been directed, amply sustain the doctrine stated in the proposition we have quoted from Mr. Bacon's excellent book. In the Kornig Case, 102 Minn. 31, 112 N. W. 1039, the court states it more fully as follows: 'Where the defense of suicide is asserted against an action by a beneficiary on an insurance policy. (a) the burden of proving that the deceased committed suicide is upon the defendant; (b) the presumption is against suicide; (c) if the known facts are consistent with the theory of natural or accidental death, the presumption

raises from the ordinary motives and principles of human conduct requires a finding against suicide; (d) when circumstantial evidence is relied on, the defendant must establish facts which exclude any reasonable hypothesis of natural or accidental death.'

"It is a doctrine that appeals to every just and reasonable mind. It does not relieve the plaintiff from the burden of proving accidental death by a preponderance of evidence as a condition of recovery, but requires that when he has put in evidence circumstances which prove that the death was either accidental or suicidal, the unreasonableness of the theory of suicide must receive due consideration in weighing it against the more reasonable and natural theory of accident."

While the writer sharply disagreed with the judgment and with much that was said in the Reynolds Case, yet, since a majority of this court in banc ruled contrary to his views, he is constrained by the view which he entertains of his duty under the Constitution to adopt as the law and follow the opinion of the majority.

The presumption against suicide is a rule of law deduced from convenience and necessity; it is based on the well-nigh universal human characteristic of love of life and fear of death, and it arises in a case whenever the cause of death is in issue and the evidence discloses a state of facts consistent with either accident or suicide. While the doctrine is a veritable presumption of law, it is sometimes and in some of the cases loosely spoken of as a presumption or inference of fact, and is put in the category of evidence. While a few authorities assert the converse, by far the better view is that it is not evidentiary in character; yet when invoked in the trial of a case, in a way as a constituent of evidence, it undoubtedly accomplishes a function of evidence pro hac vice. It is to be invoked, or automatically rises, to be exact, when there is no convincing evidence for or against suicide, and in such case, perforce this presumption alone, a finding in favor of accidental death will be upheld. Fitzgerald v. Barker, 85 Mo. loc. cit. 22. The evidence for or against the fact may be either direct or circumstantial. If the evidence in favor of suicide is wholly circumstantial, then it ought to be such and of such weight as to negative every reasonable inference of death by accident. Prudential Ins. Co. v. Dolan, 46 Ind. App. 40, 91 N. E. 970; Agen v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 105 Wis. 218, 76 Am. St. Rep. 905, 80 N. W. 1020; Ritchey v. Woodmen of the World, 163 Mo. App. 235, 146 S. W. 461. In the case of Agen v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. supra, at page 218, in a syllabus by the writer of the opinion, the supreme court of Wisconsin sets out the converse of the rule we announce, and negatively indorses the correctness of that rule thus: "Where the reasonable probabilities from the evidence all point to suicide as the cause of death, so as to establish it, in the light of reason and common sense, with such certainty as to leave no room for reasonable controversy on the subject, a jury should not be permitted to find to the contrary and have such finding stand as a verity in the case, but the question should be decided by the trial court as one of law."

If there is evidence both for and against suicide, the presumption (unless, as some of the cases hold, and the reason of the thing makes plausible, the evidence be equally balanced) has no place in the reasoning, as its very nature indicates. If, therefore, invoked, or present, it vanishes, and the question is to be thereupon resolved upon the evidence. 9 Enc. Ev. 885, and cases cited. Obviously, the presumption against suicide cannot continue to exist in the face of evidence showing suicide, for such a view would be utterly subversive of the well-settled doctrine, figuratively but strikingly announced by Lamm, J., substantially, to wit, that presumptions are the bats of the law, which the light of evidence frightens and causes to fly away. Mockowik v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 196 Mo. loc. cit. 571, 94 S. W. 256. Not only do the cases and the textbooks sustain this view (Erhart v. Dietrich, 118 Mo. 418, 24 S. W. 188; State v. Swearengin, 269 Mo. 186, 190 S. W. 268; Mockowik v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. supra; Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 350, 21 L. ed. 959; Diefenthaler v. Hall, 96 Ill. App. 639; Largen v. P. 96 Mo. App. 1, 69 S. W. 662), but the very legal nature of the rule of law which we call a presumption demonstrates it. For in the very last analysis this rule of law which we call a presumption operates when it arises in the case, as the result of evidence adduced, only in two ways: (a) It either forecloses the question unless and until further evidence is offered by the other side; or (b) it shifts the burden of the evidence to the adverse side; that is all it does in the case. Banbury Peerage Case, 1 Sim. & Stu. 153, 57 Eng. Reprint, 62; Pickup v. Thames Marine Ins. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 594, 47 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 749, 39 L. T. N. S. 341, 26 Week. Rep. 689, 4 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 43; Davis v. United States, 160 U. Should this burden not be met, and should no other and countervailing evidence be adduced, the presumption will have the effect to conclude the question in favor of the side upon which the presumption operates. State v. Jones, 64 Iowa, 349, 17 N. W. 911, 20 N. W. 470; Lisbon v. Lyman, 49 N. H. 563; Tilghman's Succession, 7 Rob. (La.) 387; Kidder v. Stevens, 60 Cal. 414; Cunningham v. State, 56 Miss. 269, 31 Am. Rep. 360; Fitzgerald v. Barker, 85 Mo. 13; 2 Chamberlayne, Ev. 1085.

Therefore it obviously follows that such a presumption is not evidence, but that it is a mere term in legal nomenclature, employed to designate the imperative duty or burden, upon the side against which the presumption operates, of producing evidence to rebut the finality of the legal conclusion which arises, in the course of a trial of a case, from the proof of other facts therein. 9 Enc. State, 55 Fla. 125, 46 So. 721.

As stated above, if there is among the facts in evidence in this case any room or place for the presumption, the instruction above set out was on this phase erroneous. That is to say, if it cannot be said by us as a court that, as a matter of law, the facts and circumstances proved show suicide and exclude any reasonable hypothesis of accident (Prudential Ins. Co. v. Dolan, 46 Ind. App. 40, 91 N. E. 970; Agen v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 105 Wis. 217, 76 Am. St. Rep. 905, 80 N. W. 1020; Ritchey v. Woodmen of the World, 163 Mo. App. 235, 146 S. W. 461), then the instruction, which was, as we have already demonstrated, abstractly bad, was here also concretely bad. Defendant put in no evidence whatever. Save and except the proved facts that a few minutes before assured was found in a dying condition due to his taking cyanide of potassium he was seen to fold up a handkerchief; that after his death a large quantity of this poison was found in a handkerchief in his pocket; that he had had this poison in his pocket for several days, and knew what it was, and likewise knew its deadly nature, —there are no affirmative facts in the record to show suicide. Was this evidence sufficient to overcome, as a matter of law, the presumption against suicide, and enable the court to say as a matter of law that suicide, and not accident, was the cause of assured's death? If it was sufficient to overcome this presumption, then the court below ought to have sustained the defendant's demurrer to the evidence, and the bad instruction in such case would, of course, cut no figure, since in such event the only possible result, under the law and the evidence, was reached by the jury.

While the point is close and difficult, we are yet constrained to say, perforce the ruling in the Reynolds Case, 274 Mo. 96, 201 S. W. 1131, that the facts proven, and which tend to show suicide, are not sufficient to exclude every reasonable hypothesis favoring accident, and there is left, on account of the presumption against suicide, an inference of accident sufficient to take the case to the jury. If it ought, as a matter of law, to have gone to the jury at all, then it is elementary that it ought to have gone to the jury under proper instructions. It results that the

ANNOTATION.

Insurance: presumption and burden of proof as to accident in case of death from poison.

As to presumption against suicide in Workmen's Compensation cases, see annotation to Chandler v. Stearns & C. Lumber Co. 5 A.L.R. 1680.

The general rule that the burden of proving that death was the result of an accident rests upon plaintiff in an action on an accident policy applies where the insured died from taking poison. Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. v. Fielding (1905) 35 Colo. 19, 83 Pac. 1018, 9 Ann. Cas. 916; Carnes v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. (1898) 106 Iowa, 281, 68 Am. St. Rep. 306, 76 N. W. 683; BRUNSWICK v. STANDARD ACCI. INS. CO. (reported herewith) ante, 1213; Grosvenor v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1918) 102 Neb. 629, 168 N. W. 596; Hodgson v. Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. (1918) 182 App. Div. 381, 169 N. Y. Supp. 28. Where, however, the circumstances of the death are such as to reasonably negative every hypothesis except that of accident or suicide, the plaintiff may be aided by the presumption against suicide.

It will be observed that in the reported case (BRUNSWICK v. STANDARD ACCI. INS. CO. ante, 1213) it was held that the fact that one in good health was seen a few minutes before his death to fold a handkerchief which contained poison similar to that which killed him, and which he knew to be poison, was not sufficient to exclude every reasonable hypothesis favoring accidental death, and that the case therefore, because of the presumption against suicide, should be left to the jury, and an instruction that there was no presumption that the taking of the poison was accidental and that the burden was upon the plaintiff to show that death resulted from accident was held error where the evidence did not establish suicide.

In Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. v. Fielding (Colo.) supra, the evidence was held to support a finding that the insured's injuries resulted from an accident, there being testimony that he died from burns caused by acids on a hot object, but nothing showing how the burns occurred, and there also being evidence that the insured stated that the burns resulted from natural causes. The court said: "In actions on policies of insurance of this character the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show that the death of the assured was caused by external violence and by accidental means; but when is this burden discharged in making a prima facie case? When death by unexplained, violent, external means is established, the law does not presume suicide or murder; it does not presume that injuries are inflicted intentionally by the deceased or by some third person; and hence, with the proof indicated, by reason of the presumption which attaches against self-destruction or the violation of the law, prima facie proof is also made of the fact that the injuries were accidental without direct or positive testimony on that point. . . . But it is urged by counsel for defendant that from the testimony the inference might be drawn that the injuries were not the result of an accident. In support of this contention our attention is directed to the fact that the deceased claimed that he had not been injured, but that what was said to be burns upon his body resulted from natural causes; that in attempting to treat himself he may have applied lotions which caused what was afterwards denominated burns upon his body; and that the injuries may have been inflicted intentionally by someone in circumstances which the deceased did not care to disclose. If it be conceded that the statements of the deceased that he had not been injured are material (a question, however, which we do not determine), we are of the opinion that none of the inferences which counsel attempt to deduce from the testimony will justify the conclusion that the verdict of the jury to the effect that the injuries to deceased were accidentally received is not supported by the evidence. We think the testimony is conclusive that deceased had been burned or injured in one of the ways indicated by the physician. It must be inferred from the testimony that he received his injuries either between 6 and 10:30 P. M. April 10 or between 6:30 A. M. and 7:30 P. M. of the next day. A short time prior to the first date he was in good health. It is not rational to presume that he would intentionally cause the injuries inflicted, nor is there any testimony tending to prove that these injuries were inflicted by some third person. Giving the testimony and the inferences which might be drawn, the widest scope, the most that can be said is, that it is possible the injuries were not accidentally received; but it falls far short of establishing conclusively that they were intentionally inflicted by the deceased or some third person. On the contrary, under the rules which obtain in cases of this character it at least supports the presumption that the deceased was accidentally injured. In such circumstances it was, therefore, the province of the jury under the settled rules of evidence, from the testimony, the facts, and circumstances, to determine whether or not the injuries were accidental, when the testimony elicited on that subject was consistent with the theory of an accident."

In Carnes v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. (1898) 106 Iowa, 281, 68 Am. St. Rep. 306, 76 N. W. 688, however, where the policy insured against death by accidental means, and the insured died from the effects of opium, and there was no evidence as to whether he took more opium than he intended, or misjudged the effect, or that he intended to take it, it was held that the burden was on the plaintiff to show that death resulted from accidental means and that she had not sustained that burden. The court said: "Now, it is impossible to say, from the evidence, whether Carnes took more morphine tablets than he intended to take, or whether he took just what he did intend, and misjudged their effects. Death might have been occasioned in either way, and one is as likely as the other. Under such circumstances, can it be left to the jury to guess which? The burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that death resulted from an accidental cause, and, the evidence leaving this unestablished, she failed to make out a case. It is said, however, that death will be presumed to have resulted from accident, and that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show the contrary. But an examination of the case does not sustain this contention. They go no further than to hold that, where the insured has introduced evidence tending to show an injury to be the result of an accident, the burden of proof is on the insurer to establish as a defense that the insured was within some exceptions of the policy. . . . The plaintiff wholly failed to prove the cause to have been accidental, and this will not be presumed. It was nec-

In Grosvenor v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1918) 102 Neb. 629, 168 N. W. 596, where the plaintiff in an action on an accident policy alleged that the insured lost his life by accidental carbolic acid poisoning, and the defendant's answer contained a general denial and allegation that the insured took his own life by drinking a deadly poison, and the reply contained a denial and admission that the insured died by means of drinking a deadly poison, it was held that the burden was on the plaintiff to show that death was accidental, and that she must do so by evidence of the actual facts, or a situation from which accident is the reasonable inference, not a reasonable inference or possibility, and that the plaintiff having offered no evidence, a directed verdict in her favor was error. The court said: "Assuming that the burden is upon the plaintiff to prove death by accidental means, and that the mere fact of death raises a presumption or inference that the death was accidental, was the trial court right in its conclusion based upon the facts shown by the pleadings? Our opinion is to the contrary. Because men love life and fear death, they instinctively avoid obvious danger. This fact, drawn from experience, is the basis of a presumption, relied upon by plaintiff, that when the cause or manner of death is unknown we infer that it was not suicidal. The inference is not based upon a law of nature which is invariable. Men do frequently commit suicide. It is one of a multitude of legitimate inferences, in which we infer the unknown from the known, having greater or less degrees of probability, which we use in reasoning to arrive at the ultimate fact. Being a probability resting upon human experience, in its nature, it is controlling only in the absence of evidence of the actual. When, knowing only that one has died from drinking carbolic acid, you say you are in doubt as to cause, and then, bringing into service the presumption against suicidal intent, you finally conclude that the death was accidental, are you not guilty of that error known in logic as petitio principii? Had you not, in reaching your first conclusion, given the theory of accident the benefit of the truth upon which the presumption is founded? Had you assumed as a fact that the deceased contemplated suicide or was indifferent to life, you might not have entertained the doubt. Let us suppose experience has shown that of all the persons who have died from drinking carbolic acid three out of four were cases of suicide; then, would it not be palpably absurd to infer in the given case that the death was not intentional? The rule invoked arises when we are ignorant of the intent, and loses its force as a presumption in presence of actual facts bearing upon intent. The presumption then comes in conflict with other presumptions or facts which may overcome it. There is the almost conclusive presumption that when one drinks he drinks voluntarily; the presumption that when one drinks he knows what he is drinking, especially so if he is drinking carbolic acid; the presumption that when one drinks carbolic acid he knows the poisonous character of the liquid; and the presumption that one intends the natural consequences of his own act. These presumptions bear upon the question of intent, and the force of the original presumption must be lessened by the force given to them. While it may well be argued that we are still uncertain as to the actual intent, the presumption against intentional death can no longer prevail as prima facie proof. The burden was and remained upon plaintiff to prove his case. Clark v. Bankers Acci. Ins. Co. (1914) 96 Neb. 381, 147 N. W. 1118. Without evidence being produced by the plaintiff to show that the death was not intentional, the jury would be left to mere conjecture for determining the actual facts. It will not do to say that as long as there is room for doubt as to the intent the defendant must offer evidence. Rather the contrary. The burden is upon the plaintiff to show that the death was accidental; or, in other words, that it was not suicidal. This he must do by evidence of the actual facts or a situation from which accident is the reasonable inference, not a reasonable inference or possible one." J. T. W.

Hall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this cause was filed by the complainant against the defendant in the chancery court of Hamilton county to recover the sum of $224.50, the alleged value of a suit case and its contents, which the complainant deposited with the defendant at its parcel or check room in its station at Chattanooga, Tennessee, and which suit case and contents were not returned to the complainant.

Upon the hearing of the cause the chancellor rendered a decree in favor of the complainant, and against the defendant, for the amount sued for and costs. From this decree the defendant appealed to the court of civil appeals, and assigned a single error.

By that assignment it was insisted that the chancellor erred in decreeing that complainant was entitled to recover the sum of $224.50, because the uncontradicted proof showed that, upon depositing his suit case with the defendant at its check room, it issued to him a receipt which expressly limited defendant's liability, in the event of the loss of, or damage to, the property, to the sum of $10, and it was insisted by defendant that because of this limitation, which was a part of the contract with complainant, it was not liable to him in an amount exceeding $10.

This assignment of error was overruled by the court of civil appeals, and the decree of the chancellor was affirmed. The cause is now before this court upon the defendant's petition for writ of certiorari, which has heretofore been granted, and the cause has been duly and carefully considered upon the errors assigned in said petition, and brief accompanying the same, to the action of the court of civil appeals in affirming the decree of the chancellor.

The facts presented by the record are uncontroverted and are substantially as follows: On March 6, 1917, complainant and his wife were passing through the city of Chattanooga en route from Florida to their home in Cincinnati. They were compelled to lie over in Chattanooga for a few hours, waiting for the train which was to carry them to their destination. Complainant carried a suit case, the contents of which consisted of both ladies' and gentlemen's wearing apparel, a watch and chain, and several other small articles of jewelry. The undisputed value of the suit case was $6, and its contents $218.50. The defendant maintained in its station or depot, for the convenience of the public and for profit to itself, a parcel or check room at which persons were invited to deposit their baggage for safe-keeping; the defendant making the small charge of 10 cents for each twenty-four hours that the baggage remained on deposit in said check room. Upon receiving baggage from a person desiring to deposit same in its check room, defendant issued to such person a numbered check and placed a duplicate or correspondingly numbered check upon the piece of baggage so deposited, and upon the subsequent demand of the owner of the baggage and the presentation of the numbered check, which he held, his baggage was identified and delivered to him.

Upon arriving at Chattanooga, complainant presented his suit case at the window of the defendant's check room to be checked, paid the fee of 10 cents, and a numbered check was issued to him by the young lady in charge. A few hours after having left the suit case in the check room, the complainant returned, presented the numbered check which had been given him, and asked the young lady in charge for his suit case. Upon making an examination, the young lady, who, it is admitted, was the servant and agent of the defendant, discovered that she had previously surrendered the suit case to some other person for a check different in number from that held by the complainant, and different from the duplicate that was attached to the complainant's suit case. The number of complainant's check was 19,853. The evidence discloses that the young lady in charge of the check room surrendered the complainant's suit case to the holder of check number 19,658. On the face of the check issued to the complainant was printed the following in red letters: "Notice.—Not responsible for an amount to exceed $10 on any article covered by this check."

As before stated, it was the contention of the defendant in the court of civil appeals, and it is the sole contention made here, that the above-quoted provision became a part of the contract between complainant and defendant, and was a valid limitation of the defendant's liability for the loss of said suit case to the amount therein stipulated. So the question to be determined by this court is whether said limitation is valid and binding upon the complainant. If it is, then the complainant is only entitled to recover for his suit case and contents the sum of $10. Otherwise he is entitled to recover the full value of the property lost, which, the undisputed proof shows, was $224.50.

It is insisted by the defendant that its liability, under the contract of deposit, was that of a bailee or warehouseman only, and that it had the right to restrict its liability for the property so deposited, in case of loss or damage, to the amount stipulated on the face of the check.

This insistence is grounded upon the holding of the supreme court of South Carolina, reported in Terry v. Southern R. Co. 81 S. C. 279, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 295, 62 S. E. 249. It makes no question as to its liability for the stipulated $10.

That case involved the liability of the railroad company for the value of a suit case and its contents, which had been received by its servant at its station room in Spartanburg for safe-keeping, for which it issued to the plaintiff a numbered check or receipt, upon which was printed the following:

The party accepting this check hereby agrees, in consideration of the low rate at which it is issued, that no claim in excess of ten dollars ($10) shall be made against the railroad company for loss of, or injury to, any package, valise, or other article which may have been deposited with it, and for which this ticket has been issued.

W. H. Tayloe,

General Passenger Agent.

The printing on the check also provided that a charge of 10 cents should be paid by the person depositing his baggage with the defendant, for each twenty-four hours or fraction thereof that it should remain with the defendant. The plaintiff's suit case was lost while in the possession of the defendant under said deposit contract, and was never recovered by the plaintiff. In an action by the plaintiff to recover the value of said suit case and its contents, the supreme court of South Carolina had the following to say: "There can be no doubt of defendant's liability. . . . It is equally clear the liability was limited to $10 as stated in the receipt. We are not called on to decide whether a common carrier is bound to have a higher and lower freight rate, and express that a limitation of the amount of its liability for goods is in consideration of the lower rate, in order to make a contract for such limitation of liability valid. That point is not involved, for respondent's counsel well concedes the keeping of a room for the deposit of parcels is not a part of the business of a common carrier; and that the defendant, as to packages received therein, contracted as a warehouseman. As such warehouseman, in receiving the goods, it had a right to contract for the limitation of the amount of its liability in case of loss, and the receipt expressing such limitation was binding on the owner of the goods"—citing Piedmont Mfg. Co. v. Columbia & G. R. Co. 19 S. C. 353; Dunbar v. Port Royal & A. R. Co. 36 S. C. 110, 31 Am. St. Rep. 860, 15 S. E. 357; Hill v. Georgia, C. & N. R. Co. 43 S. C. 462, 21 S. E. 337.

The facts of that case do not show that the plaintiff did not have notice, either express or implied, of the limitation printed on the check at the time his suit case was left with the defendant for safe-keeping, and is not, therefore, decisive of the question presented in the instant case.

We think the question of notice is a very important one, and is controlling of the question presented for determination.

The complainant testified that nothing was said to him by the young lady in charge of the defendant's check room concerning the limited liability clause printed on the check given him, and that his attention was not called to said stipulation. While he does not expressly say so, we think it is inferable from the complainant's testimony that he did not read or know of the statement printed on the check until after the loss was discovered.

A bailee for hire is required to exercise only "ordinary care" in keeping and caring for property deposited with him—that care which a Bailment—care required of bailee for hire. capable and reasonably prudent person engaged in the same business is accustomed to exercise. Swift & Co. v. Memphis Cold Storage Warehouse Co. 128 Tenn. 82, 158 S. W. 480; Claypool v. Patrick, 6 Tenn. C. C. A. 457.

That the loss of the complainant's suit case and its contents was due to the negligence of the defendant's servant is conceded by its counsel.

In 6 C. J. 1112, the rule with respect to the right of the bailee to restrict or diminish his liability by special contract with the bailor is stated as follows: "The parties to a bailment may diminish the liability of the bailee by special contract, the principle being that the bailee may impose whatever terms he chooses, if he gives the bailor notice that there are special terms, and the means of knowing what they are; and if the bailor chooses to make the bailment, he is bound by them, provided the contract is not in violation of law or of public policy, and that it stops short of protection in case of fraud or negligence of the bailee; and provided, further, that the terms of the contract are clear, such stipulations being to be strictly construed."

To the same effect is the rule stated in 3 R. C. L. 301, and cases there cited.

In the case of Healy v. New York C. & H. R. Co. 153 App. Div. 516, 138 N. Y. Supp. 287, and affirmed in 210 N. Y. 646, 105 N. E. 1086, it was held that one checking a hand bag in a parcel room in a railroad station, and receiving a check on the back of which, in fine print, was a provision that the depositor, in accepting said check, agreed not to hold the railroad company liable for more than $10, to which his attention was not called, could recover the real value of the hand bag. The majority opinion in that case, upon the question of the plaintiff's right to recover, said: "The plaintiff having had no knowledge of the existence of the special contract limiting the liability of the defendant to an amount not exceeding $10, and not being chargeable with such knowledge, the minds of the parties never met thereon, and the plaintiff cannot be deemed to have assented thereto, and is not bound thereby."

majority, bases his conclusion of liability upon the ground that the numbered check received by the plaintiff from the railroad company was a mere token to enable him to identify his baggage when called for, and that in no sense did he have any reason to believe that it embodied a contract exempting the company from liability, or limiting the amount thereof. Upon this point his opinion states: "The business of checking hand baggage at railway stations has become a large and important one. It seems to me that anyone in the ordinary course of business, checking his baggage at such a place, would regard the check received as a mere token to enable him to identify his baggage when called for, and that in no sense would he have any reason to believe that it embodied a contract exempting the bailee from liability or limiting the amount thereof. If the plaintiff knew that the defendant had limited its liability to $10, either by his attention being called to it, or otherwise, then, of course, the law would deem him to have assented to it, so that a binding contract would be effected. If he did not know it, I think the law imposed no duty upon him to read his check to find whether or not there was a contract printed thereon, or that he was guilty of neglect in not so reading it, for he had no reason to apprehend that a contract was printed thereon."

We think this statement of the law is sound and should control the case at bar. In the absence of notice to the complainant of the stipulation printed upon the check, restricting the liability of the defendant, we do not think that he should be bound thereby. It is hardly probable that, if the complainant had known that the defendant was limiting its liability for his suit case and contents to $10, he would have deposited it with the defendant. The uncontradicted evidence is that the value of the suit case and contents were more than twenty-two times the amount for which the defendant would be liable if the limitation is held binding. We do not think that the complainant, by receiving the numbered check, was chargeable with notice of the printed stipulation thereon. We do not think that he was bound to regard it as a receipt containing a printed stipulation restricting the liability of the company, in the absence of his attention being called to such stipulation, but was warranted in regarding it as a mere check or token that would enable him and the agent of the defendant to identify his suit case upon his return and making demand therefor. We do not think that an ordinarily prudent man would have regarded it as more, and the complainant was not guilty of a breach of duty in failing to apprise himself of such limitation. It was not similar to the usual warehouseman's receipt, or the receipt of an express company or railway company, issued for goods received on deposit or for transportation containing various printed stipulations which the depositor or shipper, as the case may be, is supposed to read and acquaint himself with. It was simply a numbered check showing that the holder had deposited a parcel of some character with the defendant, which enabled the defendant to identify the parcel by comparing the number on the check with the number of the duplicate attached to the parcel.

—limitation of liability—

In receiving baggage for deposit at its check room the defendant held itself out as a bailee for hire, and said to the public: "I will receive your baggage for safe-keeping, giving you a numbered check, a duplicate of which will be attached to the baggage deposited that will enable identification and delivery upon your calling for same."

It was for safe-keeping that the complainant deposited his suit case with the defendant, for which he was given the check of identification by the young lady in charge. He had no reason to suspect that said check contained any statement restricting the liability of the company, in the absence of his attention being called thereto, and to hold the company liable for only $10, when the proof shows that the suit case and contents were worth more than twenty-two times that much, and were lost through the admitted negligence of the defendant's servant, would be to encourage the defendant in its failure to exercise proper care in the performance of its duties as such bailee.

ANNOTATION.

Carrier's liability in respect to baggage checked in parcel room.

- I. Introductory, 1234.
- II. Liability in absence of express limitation, 1234.
- III. Effect of clause or notice limiting liability, 1235.

I. Introductory.

The discussion in this note is confined to the liability of a carrier in respect to baggage checked in a parcel room or cloak room conducted on its premises for that purpose, and does not include the question of liability for baggage checked for the purposes of transportation, either before or after arrival at its destination, in a baggage room. The question seems to be one of rare impression in America, despite the fact that the checking of parcels and baggage in a depot parcel room is an established custom in the large cities of the United States.

II. Liability in absence of express limitation.

There seems to be no dissent from the rule that, in the absence of a printed condition on the duplicate parcel check limiting liability, a carrier accepting baggage checked in its parcel room, on payment of a nominal sum, becomes a bailee for hire, and as such is bound to exercise ordinary care in the keeping and safeguarding of the property confided to its care, and is liable for ordinary negligence resulting in damage to or the loss of the property. Fraam v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. (1910) 161 Mich. 556, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 834, 126 N. W. 851, 21 Ann. Cas. 76, 3 N. C. C. A. 211; Stallard v. Great Western R. Co. (1862) 2 Best & S. 419, 121 Eng. Reprint, 1129, 31 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 137, 8 Jur. N. S. 1076, 6 L. T. N. S. 217, 10 Week. Rep. 488; Roche v. Cork, B. & P. R. Co. (1889) Ir. L. R. 24 C. L. 250.

Thus, in Fraam v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. (Mich.) supra, it appeared that the plaintiff checked a case of goods in the defendant's parcel room, paying a small sum, and receiving as a receipt a parcel check. The case was lost while in the defendant's possession. It was held that the contract of bailment was one for the mutual benefit of the parties, and, therefore, that the defendant, as the bailee, was bound to exercise ordinary care with respect to the subject-matter of the bailment, and was liable for ordinary negligence, the question being for the jury. Among other things, the court said: "Railways commonly maintain parcel rooms at their depots in considerable cities, where passengers and others may, for a nominal charge, have their belongings cared for. This service is performed not only for the accommodation of the person using it, or the immediate profit arising therefrom, but may, and probably does, result in increased patronage of and profit to the road, because of the knowledge of the traveling public that such service is afforded. This service is not rendered by the railroad company in its capacity as a common carrier, for the articles are not checked for transportation, but for safe-keeping and redelivery at the place of deposit. In this phase of its activity, the company acts rather in the capacity of a warehouseman, who, for compensation, receives and stores the goods of another. . . . Ordinary care means such care as ordinarily prudent men, as a class, would exercise in caring for their own property under the like circumstances, and whether it is exercised or not is a question of fact for the determination of the jury, under proper instructions."

In Roche v. Cork, B. & P. R. Co. (Ir.) supra, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's bag, which had been checked in the defendants' parcel room, contained money which was stolen while the bag was in the bailee's possession, the court held that the loss of the property threw on the defendants the burden of proving that it was not lost through their negligence, and, no evidence to that effect having been given, the proper inference to be drawn was that the loss was the result of the defendants' negligence.

In Stallard v. Great Western R. Co. (1862) 2 Best & S. 419, 121 Eng. Reprint, 1129, 31 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 137, 8 Jur. N. S. 1076, 6 L. T. N. S. 217, 10 Week. Rep. 488, it was held that a railroad company was bound to deliver property checked in its parcel room within a reasonable time after demand was made therefor, and that what was a reasonable time was a question for the jury. In that case, it appearing that the plaintiff was delayed forty-eight minutes, causing him to miss his train, a verdict was returned holding the defendant liable.

III. Effect of clause or notice limiting liability.

The majority of cases hold that, while a carrier who accepts baggage in its parcel room on payment of a fee is liable for ordinary negligence, the bailor or depositor is presumed to have knowledge of a condition or stipulation printed on the duplicate parcel check, limiting the carrier's liability to a sum stated thereon, and is bound by the provisions printed on the check. Terry v. Southern R. Co. (1908) 81 S. C. 279, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 295, 62 S. E. 249; Van Toll v. South Eastern R. Co. (1862) 12 C. B. N. S. 75, 142 Eng. Reprint, 1071, 8 Jur. N. S. 1213, 31 L. J. C. P. N. In Terry v. Southern R. Co. (1908) 81 S. C. 279, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 295, 62 S. E. 249, it appeared that the plaintiff checked a suit case at the defendant's parcel room, receiving a receipt therefor, containing the following stipulation: "The party accepting this check hereby agrees, in consideration of the low rate at which it is issued, that no claim in excess of ten dollars ($10) shall be made against the railroad company for loss of or injury to any package, valise, or other article which may have been deposited with it, and for which this ticket has been issued." The suit case having been lost while in the possession of the bailee, the court held that the defendant was clearly liable for its negligence, but that its liability was limited to $10 as stated in the receipt, saying: "We are not called on to decide whether a common carrier is bound to have a higher and lower freight rate, and express that a limitation of the amount of its liability for goods is in consideration of the lower rate, in order to make a contract for such limitation of liability valid. That point is not involved, for respondent's counsel well concedes the keeping of a room for the deposit of parcels is not a part of the business of a common carrier; and that the defendant, as to packages received therein, contracted as a warehouseman. As such warehouseman, in receiving the goods, it had a right to contract for the limitation of the amount of its liability in case of loss, and the receipt expressing such limitation was binding on the owner of the goods." The question of knowledge or notice of the limitation on the part of the bailor was not discussed by the court in arriving at its decision.

In Dorion v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1917) Rap. Jud. Quebec 53, C. S. 106, the court held that a contract entered into between a railroad company and a person who checked a trunk in its "bureau de colis," and received in return a receipt therefor on the payment of 10 cents, was not a contract to carry, but a contract of bailment in which the bailee was liable for the loss of the article, and it was incumbent on the bailor to prove its loss. The court held further that a limitation of liability printed on the check bound the bailor, where it appeared that he was accustomed to traveling over the defendant's railroad and checking his baggage in the "bureau de colis," it being presumed that he had knowledge of the conditions printed in the French and English languages on the receipt.

In Van Toll v. South Eastern R. Co. (1862) 12 C. B. N. S. 45, 142 Eng. Reprint, 1071, 8 Jur. N. S. 1218, 31 L. J. C. P. N. S. 241, 6 L. T. N. S. 244, 10 Week. Rep. 578, it appeared that a passenger deposited a bag containing certain valuable articles in the defendant's cloak room, maintained for that purpose at its depot, and, on payment of a small charge, received in return a receipt which contained thereon a stipulation printed in large type, to the effect that the company would not be responsible for articles of value in excess of £10. The court held, it appearing that the bag and its contents amounted to more than the sum specified, that the defendant was not liable for the loss, as the plaintiff bailor was bound by the terms printed on the check, she being presumed to know the provisions thereof. See to the same effect Henderson v. North Eastern R. Co. (1861) 9 Week. Rep. (Eng.) 519, 4 L. T. N. S. 216.

In Harris v. Great Western R. Co.

(1876) 45 L. J. Q. B. N. S. (Eng.) 729, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 515, 34 L. T. N. S. 647, 25 Week. Rep. 63, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff deposited her luggage in the defendant's cloak room and received a check which stipulated that it was issued and received subject to certain limitations of liability printed thereon, the court held that, although the plaintiff had not read the conditions printed on the receipt, it must be presumed that she deposited her luggage subject thereto, and that, not having complied therewith, she could not recover the value of her baggage.

In Pratt v. South Eastern R. Co. [1897] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 718, 66 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 418, 76 L. T. N. S. 465, 45 Week. Rep. 503, the court held that a provision on a parcel check, to the effect that the company would not be responsible for an article above a certain designated value, meant that it would assume no liability for an article exceeding that value, and that the provision was a good defense to an action to recover damages for an injury to an article of greater value than that stipulated in the check. See to the same effect Skipwith v. Great Western R. Co. (1888) 59 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 520, wherein the article deposited was lost by misdelivery to another person.

In Lyons v. Caledonian R. Co. [1909] S. C. 1185, 46 Scot. L. R. 848, it appeared that a hamper was deposited in the defendant's luggage room, and the depositor received, as a means of identification, a check which contained a provision to the effect that the defendant would not be liable for an amount in excess of a specified sum unless the value of the luggage was declared an additional fee paid. The court held that the plaintiff was bound by the conditions printed on the check, and, not having complied therewith, the defendant was not liable for the loss of the hamper.

In Pepper v. South Eastern R. Co. (1868) 17 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 469, the court held that provisions limiting the liability of a railroad company to articles of a specified value checked in its parcel room were a good defense to an action for damages occasioned by delay in delivering the article on demand, where it appeared that the delay was not caused by the wilful act or default of the company.

But in Parker v. South Eastern R. Co. (1877) 46 L. J. C. P. N. S. (Eng.) 768, L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 416, 36 L. T. N. S. 540, 25 Week. Rep. 564, it appeared that the plaintiff deposited luggage in the defendant's cloak room and in return received, on the payment of a small sum, a receipt containing certain printed limitations of the company's liability. It appeared further that the depositor did not read these conditions. The court held, relative to the question of the bailor being bound by the stipulations on the receipt, that the proper direction to leave to the jury in such a case was that, if the person receiving the ticket did not see or know that there was any writing on the ticket, he was not bound by the conditions; that if he knew there was a writing, and knew or believed that the writing contained conditions, then he was bound by the conditions; that if he knew there was writing on the ticket, but did not know or believe that the writing contained conditions, nevertheless he would be bound, if the delivering of the ticket to him in such a manner that he could see there was writing on it was, in the opinion of the jury, reasonable notice that the writing contained conditions. Among other things, the court said: "Now the question we have to consider is whether the railway company were entitled to assume that a person depositing luggage, and receiving a ticket in such a way that he could see that some writing was printed on it, would understand that the writing contained the conditions of contract, and this seems to me to depend upon whether people in general would in fact, and naturally, draw that inference. The railway company, as it seems to me, must be entitled to make some assumptions respecting the person who deposits luggage with them; I think they are entitled to assume that he can read, and that he understands the English language, and that he pays such attention to what he is about as may be reasonably expected from a person in such a transaction as that of depositing luggage in a cloak room. The railway company must, however, take mankind as they find them, and if what they do is sufficient to inform people in general that the ticket contains conditions, I think that a particular plaintiff ought not to be in a better position than other persons on account of his exceptional ignorance or stupidity or carelessness. But if what the railway company does is not sufficient to convey to the minds of people in general that the ticket contains conditions, then they have received goods on deposit without obtaining the consent of the persons depositing them to the conditions limiting their liability."

In at least one case, however, in addition to the reported case (DODGE v. NASHVILLE, C. & ST. L. R. CO. ante, 1229) it has been held that, in the absence of proof of express knowledge on the part of the bailor of the provisions of a clause or notice limiting liability, printed on the duplicate parcel check, the liability of the carrier is not affected by such clause or notice. Thus, in Healy v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1912) 153 App. Div. 516, 138 N. Y. Supp. 287, affirmed in (1914) 210 N. Y. 646, 105 N. E. 1086, an action to recover the value of a handbag and contents, it appeared that the plaintiff checked the bag at a parcel room conducted by the defendant in one of its principal stations, and received in receipt thereof, and on payment of a nominal charge of 10 cents, a duplicate check, on which was printed, among other things, the following stipulation: "The depositor in accepting this duplicate coupon expressly agrees that the company shall not be liable to him or her for any loss or damage of any piece to an amount exceeding $10." This condition was in fine print with the exception of the last two words, and the plaintiff, on receiving the check, did not read it or otherwise receive notice of the provision, but placed the coupon in his pocket. Subsequently he returned and demanded his bag, but found that through the mistake of the person in charge of the parcel room the coupons had been mismatched and his bag had been delivered to another. The court held that the relation between the parties was that of bailor and bailee for a mutual benefit, and therefore that the defendant was obliged to exercise that degree of care in the safe-keeping of the goods intrusted to it that a reasonably careful man would exercise in regard to similar goods of his own, and that the condition printed on the receipt was illegal and void, as impairing this obligation imposed on the bailee. The court said: "I think that the decision of this appeal should be placed upon the broader ground that, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, the unreasonable condition printed upon the coupon attempting to limit the liability of the defendant to not exceeding $10 was void. Had notice been given by the bailee to the bailor of the condition limiting the liability of the former, and the latter then seen fit to enter into the bailment, a different question would be presented. But in the case at bar no notice whatever was given to the bailor of the existence of this condition, neither was there anything connected with the transaction, which was for the mutual benefit of both parties, which would tend in any way to suggest to a reasonably prudent man, or lead him to suspect, the existence of such a special contract, or tend to put him on guard or on inquiry relative thereto."

MAYOR AND COUNCIL OF HAGERSTOWN, Appt.,
v.
HAGERSTOWN RAILWAY COMPANY of Washington County, Maryland.

Estoppel — municipal corporation — removal of electric plant from street.

A municipal corporation which, under statutory authority, permits a street railway company, as assignee of rights granted an individual, to erect a plant to furnish light to it and its inhabitants and maintain the same for a number of years, is estopped to revoke the license and compel a removal of the poles from the street on the theory that its consent was invalid because the original grantee was not a corporation as required by statute, and the assignee did not secure municipal consent to operate the plant as required by statute after it secured charter authority to conduct such business.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Washington County (Henderson, J.) dismissing a bill filed to enjoin defendant from erecting or replacing poles in the city streets and stringing wires thereon for the purpose of conducting an electric light and power business. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. S. S. Field, for appellant:

Defendant could not plant poles in the streets without the consent of the municipal authorities.

Messrs. Carey, Piper, & Hall, for appellee:

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appeal in this case is from a decree of the circuit court for Washington county dismissing the bill of complaint of the mayor and council of Hagerstown to enjoin the Hagerstown Railway Company of Washington county, Maryland, from erecting or replacing poles in the streets, etc., of Hagerstown and stringing wires thereon for the purpose of supplying light and power to the citizens of that city, and from furnishing electric light and power therein. The case was heard upon bill, answer, and evidence, and while there is very little, if any, dispute as to the material facts, a statement of them is necessary for a clear and accurate presentation of the propositions involved.

The charter of Hagerstown (§§ 171 and 182 of article 22 of the Code of Public Local Laws of 1888) provided that the mayor and council should have power to pass all ordinances necessary for the good government of the town; to prevent, remove, and abate all nuisances or obstructions in or upon the streets, alleys, etc.; "to make and establish grades upon the streets and highways of the town;" to cause the sidewalks along the streets to be graded and paved and "curbs to be set and gutters laid;" to grant licenses to hawkers and peddlers, and regulate the sale of wares and merchandise on the streets; to regulate and tax carriages and other vehicles used in the town; and to provide for laying out, opening, closing, etc., any street, etc., in the town. Section 183 provides for the appointment of street commissioners, who are required to elect one of their number as president, to keep a full and accurate record of all their proceedings, and to report every three months to the mayor and council an itemized account of all money expended by them. The clerk of the mayor and council is required to serve as "clerk of the board of street commissioners" who have charge of the repairs and improvements of the streets, alleys, etc., and, by § 191 and the Act of 1892, chap. 65, are given control of the lighting of the town, with power to provide the material, employ the necessary labor, and make all needed provisions therefor, and the further power "to contract with any person, corporation, or association for such lighting," provided that the cost of lighting under any contract does not exceed $5,000 per year, and the contract is not made for a longer period than ten years.

In 1898, the board of street commissioners entered into a contract with the Schuyler Electric Company for the lighting of the streets of the city. On the 10th of May, 1895, the mayor and council passed an ordinance authorizing Powell Evans, his heirs and assigns, "for the purpose of supplying electric current for all purposes, to erect and maintain poles on all streets, alleys, and city properties within the city limits of Hagerstown, and to string and maintain electrical conductors and other wires, and to place and maintain all necessary apparatus on said poles for said purposes; . . . to make connections with all buildings in the city limits, and erect and maintain in the city limits power plants for providing for the distribution of electric current; to connect with any system or systems outside of the city limits for supplying electric current, and to sell, lease, or rent electric current and apparatus for making use of the same; "provided that electric current for motive power for machinery be supplied in the city of Hagerstown as a necessary condition of the use of the powers conferred in this ordinance." Section 2 of the ordinance provided that the location of the poles should be approved by a committee consisting of the mayor and two members of the city council, to be selected by the mayor, who were authorized to order the location of the poles to be changed. Section 8 required Evans, his heirs and assigns, to enter into a bond to remove the poles if they were not used "in one year after erection for supplying electric current," etc. By § 4 the mayor and city council reserved the right to string on said poles the wires connected with the fire alarm system of the city, and provided that the franchise granted by said ordinance was to be accepted upon that condition, and § 6 authorized Evans, his heirs and assigns, to purchase, etc., any system for supplying electric current then "constructed in the city limits," and authorizing the corporation owning any such system to sell the same to Evans, his heirs or assigns.

Powell Evans entered into a contract with the Schuyler Electric Company for the purchase of its plant, contracts, etc., and on the 11th day of November, 1895, the board of street commissioners passed an order in which, after referring to the contract made with the Schuyler company, and reciting that said company had contracted to sell its plant, franchises, contracts, etc., to Evans, it was ordered that the following contract "take the place" of the contract which the board had entered into with the Schuyler Company. The contract referred to in the order was executed on the 11th of November, 1895, by Evans and the street commissioners. It provided that Evans should "have the contract for lighting the streets . . . with the Schuyler or any other equally as good system" for the term of five years, beginning on or before January 1, 1896, as set out in said order, provided Evans, in the meantime, purchased, by deed duly recorded, the "present electric plant complete in this city," and "has given" a bond to the commissioners, in the penalty of $5,000, to secure the faithful performance of his contract. After specifying the kind of lights to be furnished, the amount to be paid by the city for each light, that the lights were to be located and maintained on good wooden poles, etc., satisfactory to the commissioners, at the points on the streets where they were then located, unless otherwise ordered by the commissioners, and that the commissioners should designate the places at which new lights were to be located, the contract further provided that Evans should also furnish and maintain in the city "an incandescent lighting system," satisfactory to the street commissioners, "of not less than 1,200 lights, for commercial and private purposes," and furnish lights to consumers in the city on terms not to exceed the rates therein stated, and that Evans should have the right to sell "his property and rights in Hagerstown," including his rights under that contract, and to have his bond released, provided his assignee gave a bond in the penalty of $5,000 for the faithful performance of said contract.

The appellee, the Hagerstown Railway Company, was incorporated under the General Incorporation Law in 1896 for the purpose of constructing and operating a passenger railway in Hagerstown and Washington county. Its charter was amended by the Act of 1896, chap. 419, which authorized the company to issue bonds and to acquire by purchase or condemnation land necessary for the construction of its railway. Section 111 of article 28 of the Code of 1888 was amended by the Act of 1894, chap. 308 (Code 1904, art. 23, § 143), so as to provide that any electric light company formed under that article should have the power to manufacture, furnish, and sell electric light and power in any city or town of Kent, Somerset, Carroll, Montgomery, or Washington counties for lighting the streets, roads, public or private buildings, or for motive power or other purposes, and authority to build its lines along and upon the streets, roads, etc., subject to such ordinances as might be passed by any city or town for filling up or restoring such streets or roads to their normal condition, provided that "in the construction, maintenance, removal and repair of all such lines and appliances in Washington county, the same shall be done under such regulations as the mayor and city council of Hagerstown, or the county commissioners of said county, having jurisdiction, shall prescribe." On the 28th of February, 1898, the certificate of incorporation of the appellee was amended under the provisions of the General Incorporation Law, and the new certificate declared that the corporation was formed for the purpose of constructing and operating a railway, etc., and also "for the purpose of manufacturing, generating, selling, and furnishing electricity for lighting, heating, power, and other purposes, and to buy, purchase, construct, build, equip, and operate such plants, works, and machinery as may be necessary for such purposes." The railway company then acquired by assignment the electric plant, contracts, and franchises of Powell Evans in Hagerstown, and on the 1st day of March, 1898, executed its bond to the mayor and council of Hagerstown, in the penalty of $5,000, for the faithful performance by it of the contract between Evans and the board of street commissioners. On the 29th of March, 1898, the board of street commissioners passed the following resolution: "Whereas, Powell Evans has sold to the Hagerstown Railway Company of Washington county, Maryland, the electric light plant in Hagerstown and has requested the board of street commissioners to accept the bond of the said railway company in the penalty of $5,000 in lieu of a bond filed by him, the said Powell Evans. Now, therefore, be it resolved, that the board of street commissioners of Hagerstown, Maryland, do hereby accept the bond of the Hagerstown Railway Company of Washington county, Maryland, principal, and the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Baltimore, Maryland, as surety, in the penalty of $5,000 in lieu of the bond heretofore accepted by the said board of street commissioners from Powell Evans and now on file in the office of the mayor and council of Hagerstown, and that the contractual obligations now existing by and between Powell Evans and the board of street commissioners are hereby accepted by the board of street commissioners, to be performed and carried out by and on the part of the Hagerstown Railway Company of Washington county, Maryland, in lieu of the said Powell Evans, and as referred to in the bond filed by the Hagerstown Railway Company of Washington county, Maryland, and being a part thereof."

By the Act of 1898, chap. 479, approved April 9th, entitled "An Act to Amend the Charter and to Extend the Powers of the Hagerstown Railway Company of Washington County, Maryland, so as to Confer upon Said Company," powers, "in addition to the powers heretofore granted," the charter of the appellee was again amended, and it was provided "that the said company shall have the right to carry over its railway or any of its connections, for hire, express matter, and merchandise, and shall also have power to manufacture, furnish, and sell to persons or corporations electric light, electric heat and power, and to contract for, and to furnish, electric light for lighting streets, roads, private or public buildings in said county, and to furnish electricity for motive power and other purposes, to any and all persons and corporations; . . . and by and with the consent of the municipal authorities or town officers, in any city or town in said county, to lay, purchase, construct, and build lines, conductors, and conduits under, along, upon, or over the streets or alleys in any town in said county, . . . and to connect said lines, conductors, and conduits with any

After the assignment by Powell Evans to the railway company of his plant, contracts, etc., the railway company operated that plant, lighting the streets and furnishing light and power to the citizens of Hagerstown, in accordance with the provisions of the ordinance and contract, until the fall of 1898, when it built a new and very much larger plant for that purpose. After the erection of the new plant the appellee continued to furnish electricity for lighting the streets of the city until the expiration of the contract referred to, and ever since it purchased the Evans plant it has been engaged in furnishing light and power to private consumers in the city and suburbs of Hagerstown. During that time, in addition to the establishment of the new plant, new poles have been erected, lines have been extended, and new contracts have been obtained for furnishing light and power to individuals and corporations. The poles erected or maintained by the railway company for supplying light and power were from time to time changed, replaced, and painted in accordance with resolutions passed by, and an agreement with, the mayor and council, and have been used by the city in connection with its fire alarm system.

By the Act of 1898, chap. 381, the mayor and council of Hagerstown were authorized "to issue bonds to raise a sum of money to erect a plant for the purpose of supplying the town with electric light and power, or either, in the discretion of the mayor and council," and by the Act of 1900, chap. 75, provision was made for the establishment by the city, with the approval of a majority of the voters of the city, of an electric light plant of sufficient capacity to light the streets and to supply the citizens with light. The plant was completed in 1902, and since then the mayor and council have been furnishing light to private consumers in the city. In 1910 and 1913, the mayor and council notified the railway company to cease furnishing light and power to the citizens of Hagerstown, and to remove all poles used by it for that purpose from the streets and alleys of the city, and upon the failure of the railway company to comply with said notices the mayor and council on the 17th of January, 1913, filed a bill of complaint in this case for an injunction as we have stated.

The contentions of the appellant are: (1) That the mayor and council had no power to pass the Powell Evans ordinance, and that the ordinance is void; (2) that the Act of 1894, chap. 308, did not confer upon the mayor and council of Hagerstown any power to grant a franchise for furnishing electric light and power in the city, did not give any right to Powell Evans because he was not an "electric light company," and did not confer any power upon the railway company because at the time that act was passed the railway company was not an "electric light company formed under" that article; (3) that after the railway company became, by an amendment of its certificate of incorporation, an electric light company, it did not apply to the mayor and council for an ordinance prescribing the regulations under which it could exercise the rights granted by the Act of 1894; (4) that after the passage of the Act of 1898, chap. 479, the railway company could no longer exercise the right to furnish electric light and power in the city without the consent of the mayor and council, which could only be given by an ordinance regularly passed for that purpose; and (5) that the use of the streets by the railway company for the purposes stated is a trespass and a nuisance.

Even if we assume, without so deciding, that the Powell Evans ordinance is void as a grant of a franchise to use the streets for the purpose of furnishing electric light and power to private consumers, that the appellee, after the amendment of its certificate of incorporation, failed to avail itself of the powers granted to electric light companies by the Act of 1894, and that after the amendment of its charter by the Act of 1898 the rights and powers thereby granted could only be exercised "with the consent of the municipal authorities or town officers" of Hagerstown, the question remains whether the consent referred to in that act must, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, be evidenced by an ordinance of the mayor and council.

It is not necessary to determine in this case whether an electric light company, with such authority as was granted the appellee by the Act of 1898, must secure from the mayor and council of Hagerstown an ordinance consenting to the exercise of its powers before attempting to do so, and the only question we need determine is whether, under all the circumstances, the city is estopped from denying that its consent was obtained by the appellee.

Learned counsel for the appellant insist that the erection and maintenance of the poles of the appellee in the streets of the city amount to a trespass and a nuisance which cannot ripen into a franchise, and they cite cases to the effect that an encroachment upon a highway cannot grow by prescription into a private right, that franchises must be obtained by legislative grants, and that a municipal corporation cannot be estopped from asserting that it had no power to grant the particular franchise. Baldwin v. Trimble, 85 Md. 396, 36 L.R.A. 489, 37 Atl. 176; Burnell v. McLane, 98 Md. 594, 56 Atl. 830; Baltimore County Water & Electric Co. v. Baltimore County, 105 Md. 159, 66 Atl. 34; Mealey v. Hagerstown, 92 Md. 753, 48 Atl. 746.

In the case of Mealey v. Hagerstown, supra, the court said: "A municipal corporation may set up a plea of ultra vires or its own want of power under its charter or constituent statute, to enter into a given contract or to do a given act in excess of its corporate powers and authority," and held that it could not be estopped from doing so because the other party to the contract expended money "on the faith of the agreement." The rule there stated has not been questioned and may be regarded as settled in this state. Here, however, there is no question as to the power and authority of the mayor and council of Hagerstown under the Act of 1898, chap. 479, to consent to the exercise by the railway company of the rights therein granted, and the application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel to the facts of this case does not operate to confer upon the mayor and council powers not vested in the municipality by its charter or the statute, or to exact from it rights and privileges it had no power to grant. The Act of 1898 expressly authorized the railway company to erect its poles and furnish light and power in the city with the consent of the "municipal authorities," and the authority of the mayor and council to give that consent cannot be, and is not, disputed.

The distinction between a case in which the municipality has the power to grant the franchise in question, and a case in which it has no such authority, is well recognized. It is said in 4 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 1687, "that a municipality cannot be estopped to question the use of its streets without a franchise, or the validity of a franchise, where it has no power to grant such a franchise. . . . On the other hand, if a municipality has the power to grant a franchise, and a public service company uses the streets with the knowledge of the municipality, the latter may be estopped to question the right to use the streets without a franchise, or the validity of the franchise granted where it does not violate statutory or charter requirements. For instance, a municipality, which has acquiesced for years in the use of its streets by a public service company, which has spent thousands of dollars in connection with such use, and which has received the benefits of such use of the streets and has regulated the use and levied licenses and granted permission as to certain uses, cannot contest the right of the company to use the streets. Likewise acquiescence by a municipality in the use of streets by a railroad company, pursuant to a grant of such right by the legislature, precludes the municipality from objecting thereto."

In 3 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 1242, Judge Dillon says: "And if the municipality has the power to grant such right or franchise, and a corporation, believing and assuming that it has the consent or grant of the municipality, has, with the knowledge of the proper municipal authorities, proceeded to exercise the right or franchise, and has constructed, maintained, and operated its works and appliances in the city streets, the municipality will, in a proper case, be estopped by the acts and conduct of its officers and representatives in knowingly permitting and acquiescing in the use and occupation of the streets, from asserting the invalidity of the grant of the franchise, so far, at least, as concerns its own failure to pass an ordinance or take steps necessary to effectuate the grant."

The same principle has been repeatedly recognized and applied by this court. Baldwin v. Trimble, supra; Arey v. Baer, 112 Md. 541, 76 Atl. 843; Cushwa v. Williamsport, 117 Md. 306, 83 Atl. 889; Whittington v. Crisfield, 121 Md. 387, 88 Atl. 282. In Baldwin's Case, Chief Judge McSherry, after stating that an encroachment upon a highway can never grow by prescription into a private right, said that that rule was in perfect harmony with the doctrine that an equitable estoppel may be asserted even against the public in favor of individuals, where justice requires it, and quoted the statement of Judge Dillon (2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 2d ed. § 433) that "there is no danger in recognizing the principle of an estoppel in pais as applicable to such cases, as this leaves the court to decide the question, not by the mere lapse of time, but by all the circumstances of the case, to hold the public estopped or not, as right and justice may require."

In Arey's Case, Judge Burke said: "The statute has long since become a complete bar to the assertion by anyone against the appellees of rights in the alley, and, if it be conceded that it were a public alley, under the circumstances of the case an equitable estoppel would be created against the public to assert a right to the use of the highway."

In Cushwa's Case, Chief Judge Boyd refers with approval to the statement of the court in Baldwin's Case, and in Whittington's Case the court adopts Judge Dillon's statement of the principle in the 4th edition of his work (§ 675). It is true that in Baldwin's Case there was evidence of an abandonment of the highway, but the principle announced is not founded upon an abandonment of a street or highway, and may be applied whenever, under all the circumstances, justice requires it. Nor does the doctrine conflict with the rule stated in Purnell v. McLane, 98 Md. 594, 56 Atl. 830, and Baltimore County Water & Electric Co. v. Baltimore Co. 105 Md. 159, 66 Atl. 34, that the assertion of the existence of a franchise must be supported by a grant from the municipality or legislature. It rests upon the principle that the municipality may, in obedience to the demands of justice, be estopped by its own conduct, or the conduct of its officers, from denying the existence or validity of such a grant.

Numerous cases from other jurisdictions support the rule, and many of them are cited in the briefs of counsel for the appellee; but the principle is so clearly approved in this state that only a few of them are referred to here. In the case of People ex rel. Beardsley v. Rock Island, 215 Ill. 488, 106 Am. St. Rep. 179, 74 N. E. 437, the supreme court of Illinois said: "It has frequently been decided that the doctrine of estoppel in pais is applicable to municipal corporations, but that they will be estopped or not, as justice and right may require. There may be cases where, under all the circumstances, to assert a public right would be to encourage and promote a fraud. Where a party, acting in good faith under affirmative acts of a city, has made such expensive and permanent improvements that it would be highly inequitable and unjust to destroy the rights acquired, the doctrine of equitable estoppel will be applied. The hardships that would result from a contrary holding, and the necessity of raising an estoppel in particular cases to prevent fraud and injustice, have induced the establishment of the rule, and it has been several times said that there is neither danger to the public nor injustice in the application of the doctrine."

In the case of Louisville v. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 224 U. S. 649, 56 L. ed. 934, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 572, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Lamar, said: "The company, in pursuance of the collateral contract contained in the ordinance, and of the requirements of the Consolidation Statute, carried the police and fire wires of the city free of charge. With the knowledge and acquiescence of the city, and in reliance on the statutory conveyance of the street rights, the Cumberland company, at an expense of more than a million dollars, erected many new poles, laid additional conduits, and strung miles of wire in extending and improving the telephone system. This action of the council could not enlarge the charter grant, but did operate to estop the city (Boone County v. Burlington & M. R. Co. 189 U. S. 684, 693, 35 L. ed. 319, 322, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 687) from claiming that the ordinance was inoperative, and it also prevented the council from denying that the Cumberland company had succeeded to every right and obligation of the Ohio Valley Company."

In Bradford v. New York & P. Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 206 Pa. 582, 56 Atl. 41, the case is stated in the syllabus as follows: "A city filed a bill to compel a telegraph and telephone company to remove its poles and wires from the streets which it had occupied for more than twenty-one years without objection, after an expenditure of about $100,000. Many resolutions of the city council had given permission for the erection and use of the poles and cross-arms on the streets. In consideration of the privileges, the city had obtained a right to the use of the poles for the carrying of the fire-alarm system, and had also levied licenses and pole taxes, and had used telephones furnished by the company down to the date of the hearing, and had regulated by ordinance the manner in which the poles should be erected under the direction of the street committee of council or the city engineer."

There the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in dismissing the bill, said: "In the present case, the acquiescence and the laches of the appellant are clearly in the way of any equitable relief to it."

In the case at bar the mayor and council passed the ordinance authorizing Powell Evans and his assigns to erect and maintain poles in the streets of the city for the purpose of "supplying electric current for all purposes," and providing that the city should have the right to string the wires of its fire-alarm system on the poles. The board of street commissioners entered into the contract with Evans for the lighting of the streets; requiring him to establish an "incandescent lighting system," and to furnish light to the citizens of Hagerstown at the rates therein mentioned, and authorizing him to assign said contract upon the conditions therein stated. The railway company, with the knowledge of the mayor and council and the street commissioners, became the assignee of the Evans Plant and his contract with the city, executed its bond to the mayor and council, as required by the contract, and, in order to provide for the existing and future needs of the city, erected a new and very much larger plant for the purposes stated in said agreement and ordinance. The appellee extended its lines, entered into new contracts for furnishing light and power to private consumers in the city and suburbs, and erected new poles with the knowledge of the mayor, and council and street commissioners. The poles were replaced, changed, and painted when and as directed by the mayor and council, and the city has used the poles in maintaining its fire-alarm system. After the appellee has used the streets of the city, under the circumstances and for the purposes stated, for more than fourteen years, it would be most inequitable to permit the city to assert that it did not give its consent to such use of the streets. To compel the appellee to remove its poles and to abandon the business which it has established at much cost, and which the city encouraged and regulated, would impose a great hardship upon the appellee. Such demands cannot appeal to a court of equity, and upon no principle of right and justice can the relief prayed in this case be granted.

While the Act of 1900, chap. 75, provided that, after the erection of the plant therein mentioned, there should be "no lighting," at the expense of the city, of the streets and alleys of the city, "except" by the plant "owned and maintained by the mayor and council," there is nothing in that act or the Act of 1898, chap. 381, to indicate any intention of the legislature to give the city the exclusive right to furnish electric light and power to private consumers in the city, or to abridge the right of the appellee to do so.

For the reasons stated, we must hold that the appellant is estopped from asserting that it did not give the consent referred to in the Act of 1898, chap. 479, and the decree of the court below, dismissing its bill, must therefore be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, with costs to the appellee.

ANNOTATION.

Estoppel of municipality to deny that it gave its consent to street franchise.*I. In general:

- a. Scope, 1248.
- b. Where franchise is not ultra vires, 1248.
- c. Where franchise is ultra vires, 1249.

II. Applications:

- a. Acquiescence of municipality, 1251.
- b. Grants and permits irregular or invalid, or not covering asserted rights, 1252.
- c. Effect of express statutory restriction on mode of consent by municipality, 1257.
- d. Effect of taxation or assessment of corporate property by municipality, 1258.
- e. Miscellaneous, 1258.

I. In general.*a. Scope.

The annotation does not include cases dealing with the question whether the state may be estopped to oust a corporation of its rights and franchises. See, for example, State ex rel. Caldwell v. Lincoln Street R. Co. (1907) 80 Neb. 333, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 336, 114 N. W. 422, 118 N. W. 326. Nor does it include, in general, cases decided on other grounds than that of estoppel, as laches, limitation of actions, presumption of consent, or ratification, unless it is clear that the court meant to apply the principles of estoppel and merely used another name. As an example of possibly other cases not included, but closely related to those in the annotation, see People ex rel. New York & R. Gas Co. v. Cromwell (1903) 89 App. Div. 291, 85 N. Y. Supp. 878, holding that where a gas company occupied the streets for distribution of gas for nearly fifty years, consent would be presumed under a statute authorizing it to do so with the consent of the municipal authorities.

The annotation does not include cases generally dealing with the question of estoppel of a city by a contract not granting a franchise. See, as an illustration of such cases, Des Moines

v. Welsbach Street Lighting Co. (1911) 110 C. C. A. 540, 188 Fed. 906, holding that a city was estopped to assert the invalidity of a contract for street lighting on the ground of irregularities in its inception, as the failure to advertise for bids. The court stated that the contract in question clearly was not the grant of a franchise.

It is well settled that while, generally speaking, a municipal corporation cannot be estopped to assert its governmental power as to acts within its governmental capacity, it may be estopped in the exercise of its contractual powers; and a distinction is recognized between acts of the municipality or governing body which are not within the scope of its general power, and such as may be open to the objection that they are lacking in some technical and formal regularity in their adoption, or that there has been a nonobservance of some collateral act or formality prescribed, not jurisdictional in character; while the former are clearly and always void, the latter, if they lead to a perpetration of a fraud upon contracting parties acting upon the faith of laws and ordinances apparently regular and valid, will be binding on the municipality, and it must be estopped to deny their validity (10 R. C. L. § 34).

Applying these principles to cases involving the grant by a municipality of a street franchise, it is well settled that a municipality may be estopped, as to matters within its power, to deny that it gave its consent to a street franchise claimed by a public service corporation occupying its streets or public grounds:

Where no particular mode of manifesting municipal consent to the use of streets by a public service corporation, such as a telephone company, is prescribed by the Constitution or statutes, such consent may be either express or implied; a municipal corporation having power to act may estop itself by its conduct, as well as a natural person; and a municipality may be estopped to deny the validity of an ordinance which it has led others to believe was legally adopted. Missouri River Teleph. Co. v. Mitchell (S. D.) supra.

The distinction above noted between acts of the municipality not within the scope of its general powers, and those within such powers, is made in a number of cases involving the application of the principles of estoppel to deny consent to the granting of a street franchise. The general rule is well settled that a municipality is not estopped from denying the validity of a contract made by its officers when there was no authority for making such a contract (19 R. C. L. § 350). The class of cases under consideration illustrates the application of this rule, the obvious reasons for which are that every person dealing with municipal corporations is bound to know the extent of their authority, and that the principle of estoppel should not be applied so as to permit the doing indirectly of that which could not be done directly. Without attempting to exhaust this class of cases, it seems sufficient for the purpose of the distinction above noted, to refer to the following decisions to the effect that if the franchise rights claimed are ultra vires the municipality, it cannot be estopped from denying that it consented thereto:

A city council having no power to grant a perpetual franchise to a street railway company, the doctrine of estoppel will not aid the company in its claim to a perpetual franchise. State ex rel. Fullerton v. Des Moines City R. Co. (Iowa) supra.

It was held in Smith v. Westerly (R. I.) supra, that a town which did not have the power to grant the exclusive right to lay water pipes in the streets could not be estopped to deny that it had granted such right.

Municipal authorities without power to grant an extension of a street railway franchise beyond the life of the corporation cannot be estopped to deny the validity of such grant; so that the facts that such extension ordinance was accepted and acquiesced in by both parties for a period of ten years, and that, on the faith thereof, the railroad company expended large sums of money in the improvement of its tracks on the streets, will not estop the municipality from asserting the invalidity of the extension ordinance. Detroit v. Detroit City R. Co. (1893) 56 Fed. 867, rehearing in (1894) 60 Fed. 161, which is reversed in (1894) 26 L.R.A. 667, 12 C. C. A. 365, 22 U. S. App. 570, 64 Fed. 628, on the question of ultra vires, it being held by the circuit court of appeals that the power of the city to grant the street railway franchise was not limited as above indicated.

Where a board of county commissioners had no power to grant a franchise purporting to permit a water company to lay pipes under or along a highway, it was held that the doctrine of estoppel could not be invoked to prevent assertion of the invalidity of the franchise. State ex rel. Spring Water Co. v. Monroe (Wash.) supra.

The principle that a municipality is not estopped to deny that it granted a street franchise, if the company claiming such franchise had no capacity to take and hold it, was applied in Holmes Electric Protective Co. v. Armstrong (1916) 97 Misc. 184, 162 N. Y. Supp. 770, where a company operating a burglary alarm system, incorporated under an act for the incorporation of telegraph companies, claimed the right to use the street for electrical conductors. It was held that as the company was not a telegraph company it had no capacity to take and hold the franchise rights claimed, and that therefore the city could not be estopped to deny such rights; also, that so far as concerned the use of the streets for a series of years by the company, the city authorities, who had no actual knowledge of the facts, were under no duty to make inquiry, or to assume that the company's business was without warrant of law and that its use of the streets was that of a trespasser, but that they might, without being subject to the principle of estoppel, accept the pretended rights of the company at their face value and impose upon it such taxes and other general obligations as were imposed on all corporations of that character.

II. Applications.

a. Acquiescence of municipality.

For cases of acquiescence after an attempt to grant franchise rights, see II. b, infra.

In Bangor Twp. v. Bay City Traction & Electric Co. (1907) 147 Mich. 165, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1187, 118 Am. St. Rep. 546, 110 N. W. 490, 11 Ann. Cas. 293, it was held that township officers were not estopped to require the removal from a highway of a street railway track, by the fact that they stood by and saw the rails laid in the highway without objection. In this case the township board, being informed that the railway was being constructed in the highway, held a meeting at which it decided to postpone action in view of the proposal of the railway company to secure additional lands for the highway adjacent thereto, the proposal, however, never being carried out. The court said: "If private persons can create easements by estoppel, under our Statute of Frauds and our decisions, or if a license may be implied from the acquiescence of a private person who stands by and sees, without protest, his land used for a railway, the same cannot be said of township officers, who have no authority except such as the statute gives; and if it could be, the testimony does not justify such a finding."

To a similar effect is Morris & E. R. Co. v. Newark (1855) 10 N. J. Eq. 352, where a railroad company, without any complaint on the part of a city, laid its tracks along certain streets therein. It was not claimed by the railroad company that it had either a parol or written consent from the municipality to the occupancy of the streets; but the company contended that, the public authorities having stood by and seen the company expend its money without objection, the city was estopped to deny the railway company's right to the easement which it claimed. This contention, however, was not sustained, it being held that such acquiescence did not amount to a license, and that fraud could not be inferred from the fact that the city did not interfere, but stood by in silence while the railroad company expended its money in the construction of its road in the public streets. It was held also that the railway company could not set up an estoppel on the part of a city, in that the company had always conformed to the requirements of the council in respect to the manner of keeping the tracks, had laid required street paving, and paid paving assessments amounting to several thousand dollars. These facts, the court said, so far from showing an acquiescence on the part of the city in the legal right of the railway company, as asserted, amounted to an assertion on the part of the city of its continued control of the streets, and to an admission by the railway company that it occupied the streets as a matter of indulgence, subject to the control and pleasure of the city.

In Morris & E. R. Co. v. Newark (N. J.) supra, the court stated that to ascertain how far the railway company could set up the silence or acquiescence of the city as a constructive fraud, so as to entitle the company to the application of the principle of estoppel, the court must look at the circumstances which induced such silence and acquiescence. And in this case it appeared that the city did not remonstrate because, at the time the railway was constructed, it was, owing to the small population of the city, of no serious detriment to the public. But this indulgence, it was held, should not be construed as operating as a fraud on the railway company, if the growing population and increased demands on the public thoroughfares demanded the removal of the railway tracks therefrom.

But the doctrine of estoppel to deny the grant of franchise rights has been applied as against a municipality, where there were positive acts or declarations on the part of the municipality recognizing or approving the use made of the streets, which coupled with the city's acquiescence and the expenditure of large sums in reliance on the implied consent of the city, made it inequitable for the latter to deny that it had given its consent.

Thus, it was held that a municipality could not raise the question of lack of consent by it to the crossing of its streets by a railroad company and compel removal of the track, the company having charter power to construct its road across the streets with the city's consent, where for more than twenty years it had acquiesced in the operation of the railroad across the streets, had passed many orders and regulations recognizing the railroad tracks as established, and the company, in obedience to the orders of the municipal authorities, had expended large sums of money in improvements at the street crossings, erecting and maintaining safety gates and lights, constructing sidewalks, and other improvements beneficial to the public as well as to the railroad company. Chicago v. Union Stock Yards & Transit Co. (1896) 164 Ill. 224, 35 L.R.A. 281, 45 N. E. 430.

And acquiescence by a municipality in the operation of a railroad in a street for four years, coupled with recognition by the city of the company's rights through the passage of a resolution, complied with by the company, requiring it to fill up the ditches on the sides of the track and construct crossings, was held in Pembroke v. Canada C. R. Co. (1883) 3 Ont. Rep. 503, to prevent the municipality from compelling the removal of the track from the streets on the ground that it had not consented to such use of the streets, under statutes providing that no railroad should be laid in a highway unless leave was obtained from the proper municipal or local authorities.

The doctrine of estoppel was held to apply, where a city stood by and saw a gas company make an outlay of $140,000 in the exercise of rights under a charter granted by the legislature to lay gas pipes in the streets of the city, without intimating to the company that objection would be made to its use of the streets for the purposes authorized, such use being essential to the undertaking, and a denial thereof involving the company inevitably in the loss of its entire outlay and financial ruin. Atlanta v. Gate City Gaslight Co. (1883) 71 Ga. 106.

In Bradford v. New York & P. Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1903) 206 Pa. 582, 56 Atl. 41, the decision that a municipality could not restrain the erection of poles and stringing of wires by a telephone company, and compel the removal of those already placed in the streets, is based on the laches of the municipality in permitting the company and its predecessors for more than twenty years to occupy the streets with poles and wires, and to make large improvements without objection by the city, and acts of recognition of the rights of the company during this period. See quotation from this case in the reported case (HAGERSTOWN v. HAGERSTOWN R. Co. ante, 1239.)

In numerous cases the question of estoppel of a municipality to deny that it consented to franchise rights has arisen where there was an attempt made to grant such rights, but the grant or permit, it was claimed, was invalid, or did not cover the rights asserted.

Thus, where township supervisors, without objection on their part or on the part of the general public, stood by and permitted a street railway company to expend large sums of money in the construction of its railway along a highway under a permit given by their predecessors in office who were de facto supervisors, it was held that they were estopped to deny the validity of the grant on the ground that those giving permission were not duly elected officers of the township. Jordan v. Washington & C. R. Co. (1904) 25 Pa. Super. Ct. 564.

Where a city, having power to grant a street railway franchise to a horse street railway or one propelled by dummy engines, passed an ordinance purporting to grant a street franchise to an electric street railway company, but, after a change in its charter powers giving it the right to grant a franchise to an electric railway, passed ordinances recognizing the validity of the former franchise, it was held that both on the ground of ratification and of estoppel, in view of the large expenditures made by the company in good faith, in reliance on the validity of the ordinance, the city could not assert its invalidity. Denver v. Mercantile Trust Co. (1912) 120 C. C. A. 100, 201 Fed. 790.

And where a municipality, in the exercise of power granted by the territorial legislature to allow railroad companies to lay tracks on a street, passed an ordinance purporting to grant to a railroad company the right to lay its track on a street on tideland, and the railroad was constructed, and the action of the municipality was confirmed by a provision of the state Constitution, authorizing the city to extend its streets over tidelands, it was held that the city could not set up the invalidity of the ordinance on the ground that the title to the tidelands was in the territory in trust for the future state, and that the city could not burden the same with an easement. Seattle v. Columbia & P. S. R. Co. (1893) 6 Wash. 379, 33 Pac. 1048.

It was held that a municipality was estopped from claiming that its consent to the use of the city streets by a telephone company was inoperative, or that the rights thereunder had passed to a consolidated company, in which, by statute, was vested all the property of the original company, where the municipality demanded and accepted from the consolidated company the bond previously required of the original company, and the consolidated company expended large sums of money in extending and improving the telephone system, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the city, and in reliance on the statutory conveyance of the street rights. Louisville v. Cumberland Teleph. &

And it was held in New Orleans, S. F. & L. R. Co. v. New Orleans (1902) 109 La. 194, 33 So. 192, that the doctrine of estoppel would prevent a municipality, after it had judicially enforced against a grantee of franchise rights the obligations which the grantee had undertaken in consideration of the grant made, from singling out and repudiating that part of the ordinance evidencing the grant which provided for an extension of the time limit of the franchise.

And where a village granted a franchise for street lighting for the term of five years, with the option on the part of the grantee to continue the same after the five-year period if the city did not purchase the plant, but, at the end of that period, although there was no formal renewal of the agreement, the grantee continued to operate the plant and transferred it to one who made substantial improvements in the erection of poles and the stringing of wires, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the village authorities, it was held that the latter could not object that the franchise had not been renewed and compel a removal of the poles, wires, etc., from the streets. Wakefield v. Theresa (1908) 125 App. Div. 38, 109 N. Y. Supp. 414.

It was held in City R. Co. v. Citizens' Street R. Co. (1896) 166 U. S. 557, 41 L. ed. 1114, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 653, that a city was estopped to assert that an ordinance extending the franchise of a street railway company was invalid for want of consideration, as against bondholders who in good faith had invested their money in the bonds of the company, relying on the validity of the ordinance.

A municipal corporation, which, under statutory authority, permits a street railway company as assignee of rights granted an individual, to erect a plant to furnish light to it and its inhabitants and maintain the same for a number of years, is estopped to revoke the license and compel a removal of the poles from the street on the theory that its consent was invalid because the original grantee was not a corporation, as required by statute, and the assignee did not secure municipal consent to operate the plant, as required by statute, after it secured charter authority to conduct such business. HAGERSTOWN v. HAGERSTOWN R. Co. (reported herewith) ante, 1239.

The doctrine of estoppel was held to apply also as against a municipality, so as to prevent it from compelling the removal of properties of public service corporations from the streets,— —where a village by resolution authorized a telephone company to establish its lines along its streets, and, after the company had acted on the resolution by erecting poles and stringing wires in the streets and alleys, the village board attempted to repeal the permit granted, the claim being that the right to use the streets for the purposes in question could be lawfully granted only by ordinance, London Mills v. White (1904) 208 Ill. 289, 70 N. E. 313 (see also Quincy v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (1879) 92 Ill. 21, where a similar question was involved in the case of a railroad company, but the principle of estoppel was not discussed);

—where a street railway company, which had been granted the right to construct and operate a street railroad on certain streets, laid down, under the direction of the superintendent of streets, a portion of its track on a street which was not included in the grant, and the track in such street was used as a part of its system for more than two years, and was assessed for municipal taxes, Spokane Street R. Co. v. Spokane Falls (1893) 6 Wash. 52, 33 Pac. 1072;

—where for nearly fifty years, under express grants from the city, a railroad company occupied a part of a street for railroad purposes, including depot uses, leaving sufficient room for public travel, and the company and its predecessors in title, in reliance on the grants, some of which were for a valuable consideration, had expended large sums in improvements on the property. People ex

rel. Beardsley v. Rock Island (1905) 215 Ill. 488, 106 Am. St. Rep. 179, 74 N. E. 437. See quotation from this case in the reported case (HAGERSTOWN v. HAGERSTOWN R. Co. ante, 1239).

It has been held that a municipality will be estopped to assert the invalidity of a street franchise which it had power to grant, on the ground of irregularities or informalities in attempting to exercise the power, where the grantee in good faith acted on the grant in the incurring of expenditures and it would be inequitable to compel removal of its properties from the streets. People ex rel. Rinne v. Blocki (1903) 203 Ill. 363, 67 N. E. 809; People ex rel. Fitz Henry v. Union Gas & E. Co. (1913) 260 Ill. 392, 103 N. E. 245; see also earlier appeal in (1912) 254 Ill. 395, 98 N. E. 768, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 201; Marion Water Co. v. Marion (1903) 121 Iowa, 306, 96 N. W. 883; Raynolds v. Cleveland (1906) 28 Ohio C. C. 463, affirmed in (1907) 76 Ohio St. 619, 81 N. E. 1182; Missouri River Teleph. Co. v. Mitchell (1908) 22 S. D. 191, 116 N. W. 67; Winnipeg Electric R. Co. v. Winnipeg (1912) — Can. —, 4 D. L. R. 116, reversing (1910) 20 Manitoba L. R. 337, 16 West L. R. 62.

Thus, where the board of trustees of a town granted a permit to lay a switch railroad track in the street, and the permit was acted on by the construction of the switch, the town, it was held in People ex rel. Rinne v. Blocki (Ill.) supra, was estopped to raise the question whether the petitions presented to the board for the permit were accompanied by maps showing the location of the proposed track.

And where a waterworks system had been installed and operated for twenty years in reliance on an ordinance giving the company the right to lay pipes in the streets and supply the city and its inhabitants with water, the city was held estopped to assert the invalidity of the ordinance on the ground that it contained matters not included in the title, in violation of statute. Marion Water Co. v. Marion (1903) 121 Iowa, 306, 96 N. W. 883. The court, after conceding the defectiveness of the ordinance in question, stated that the irregularity did not involve a want of power; that "had such been the case the other contracting party might well be held to have acted in the premises at his peril. But it cannot be true in reason or authority, that he may be despoiled of the fruits of the contract after the same has been fully performed on his part, simply because the city council is now able to point out that the draftsman employed by it had unintentionally and carelessly omitted to make reference in the title of the ordinance adopted by it to certain of the provisions contained therein. Every principle upon which the law of estoppel is based may be invoked to override a defense thus sought to be interposed."

It was held that a municipal corporation, having power to grant a street railway franchise, was estopped to assert the invalidity of such a franchise on the ground of failure to publish notice for three consecutive weeks as required by ordinance, where the ordinance granting the franchise recited such publication, and the company in good faith expended large sums of money in prosecution of the work in reliance on the grant. Raynolds v. Cleveland (1906) 28 Ohio C. C. 463, affirmed in (1907) 76 Ohio St. 619, 81 N. E. 1182.

Also where an ordinance granting permission to a telephone company to use the city streets was presented and read at a special meeting of the council at which six of the eight councilmen were present, was subsequently passed at a regular meeting at which all of the councilmen were present, was approved by the mayor, recorded and published, and acted on by the company, which expended a large sum of money in the construction of its lines, requesting and receiving directions from the city authorities as to the location of its poles, it was held that the city, having power to grant the permission which it attempted to grant by the ordinance, was estopped to assert the invalidity thereof on the ground of irregularities in passing the ordinance, in that notice of the special meeting was not given to the absent members, and that it was held pursuant to an ordinance, never legally adopted, relating to special meetings. Missouri River Teleph. Co. v. Mitchell (1908) 22 S. D. 191, 116 N. W. 67.

Where a city, with power to grant a gas and light company the use of its streets for the purposes for which the company was using them, not only failed to compel the cessation of such use by the company, but took affirmative action of recognition or approval which led the company to expend large sums of money in improvements on the faith that permission to use the streets had been granted it, the principle of equitable estoppel was held to apply, and the city could not claim that the right to use the streets had not been granted because there were no frontage petitions authorizing the grant of the privilege. People ex rel. Fitz Henry v. Union Gas & E. Co. (1913) 260 Ill. 392, 103 N. E. 245. See also earlier appeal in (1912) 254 Ill. 395, 98 N. E. 768, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 201, applying the principle of estoppel.

And the fact that the city did not know the extent of the liabilities incurred in reliance on its acts was held not to affect the question of estoppel. Ibid.

In Winnipeg Electric R. Co. v. Winnipeg (1912) — Can. —, 4 D. L. R. 116, reversing (1910) 20 Manitoba L. R. 337, 16 West. L. R. 62, it was held that a city could not challenge the validity of permits for the placing of poles of an electric company in a street on the ground that they should have been granted by a by-law in each instance, and not under general law, as in fact granted, where the permits had been acted on by the expenditure by the company of large sums of money in furtherance of the purposes thereof.

In some cases, however, it has been held that the doctrine of estoppel did not apply, the position being taken that the omissions in the attempted exercise of the powers of the city to grant a franchise were not mere irregularities, or that the circumstances were not such as required the application of the principle of estoppel.

Thus, it was held that a municipality was not estopped to deny the validity of the franchise, where, without complying with statutory requirements as to advertising and receiving bids, it granted a franchise to a telephone company which at once constructed its plant. Tri-State Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Thief River Falls (1911) 183 Fed. 854. The court took the view that the failure to comply with these requirements was not a mere irregularity, and that the city lacked the power to grant a franchise without compliance therewith. It was said that the purpose of the law was to correct the common corrupt practice of selling or giving away franchises without due consideration of the public interest, and that, in case the doctrine of estoppel were applied, it would be very easy for a city council and a corporation, desiring a franchise, entirely to nullify the law by the city granting a franchise without notice, without solicitation of proposals, and without advertising, and the corporation beginning at once the installation of its plant, thereby making the estoppel complete while the council granting the franchise was in office, and before the general public had an opportunity to know what had been done or to become aroused to the necessity of action.

And in Farmers' Teleph. Co. v. Washta (1911) 157 Iowa, 447, 183 N. W. 361, it was held that a town was not estopped to assert the invalidity, on account of failure to comply with statutory requirements as to the recording to the yea and nay votes of the council and the publication of notice submitting the question to the electors, of an ordinance purporting to grant a telephone company the right to establish its system in the streets of the town, where for ten days after the ordinance was passed the company did not establish a telephone system in the town, but merely extended a toll line into it from adjoining towns which formed a part of its system, and, under the protection of an injunction in the proceedings then pending, had set poles, strung wires, and established a local exchange.

And a city which, by contract, granted to a railway company the use of a street for railway purposes, was held in Cleveland v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. (1899) 93 Fed. 113, reversed on other grounds in (1906) 77 C. C. A. 467, 147 Fed. 171, not estopped to dispute a construction of the contract claimed by the railroad company which would give it an absolute title to the property, by the fact that for nearly forty-five years it permitted, without objection, the company to expend large sums, amounting to more than a million dollars, in tracks and terminal structures on the property, where the improvements were not of such a nature as to advise the city that the company claimed rights beyond those given by the contract, and, in an action by a third party against the company four years after the contract was made, the latter had set up claims showing that it regarded itself merely as a licensee, and no notice of a different claim than that asserted in such suit was given to the city.

A municipality which had granted permission to a corporation to use its streets for electric lighting purposes was held, in Omaha Electric Light & P. Co. v. Omaha (1909) 172 Fed. 494, not estopped to deny that it had granted the right to use the streets for purposes of transmission of heat and power also, by the facts that it had passed general ordinances regulating companies using electricity for light, power, and heat, and had accepted from the company in question, which had invested a large sum of money to produce electric current for power and heat, a tax on its gross income derived from the sale of electricity for power as well as lighting purposes. The decision was affirmed, without discussion of the above question, in (1910) 102 C. C. A. 601, 179 Fed. 455, and an appeal to the Federal Supreme Court dismissed in (1913) 230 U. S. 123, 57 L. ed. 1419, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 974, on the ground of want of jurisdiction; but on rehearing in (1914) 133 C. C. A. 52, 216 Fed. 848,

The view has been taken that consent of a municipality to the grant of a franchise cannot arise by estoppel, where the statute restricts the mode of giving consent to the passage of an ordinance duly enacted for that purpose. Taft, Ch. J., in Detroit v. Detroit City R. Co. (1894) 60 Fed. 161. In this case the city attempted to grant a street railway franchise for a period beyond the corporate life of the company. The grant was held void, and the municipality not estopped to deny that it had consented to the grant of the franchise, which had been acted upon by the company for a number of years. The statute provided that any street railway company organized under the provisions of the act might, "with the consent of the corporate authorities of any city or village given in and by an ordinance or ordinances duly enacted for that purpose," construct, maintain, and own a street railway, upon the lines designated in the ordinance granting such consent. The decision was reversed in (1894) 26 L.R.A. 667, 12 C. C. A. 365, 22 U. S. App. 570, 64 Fed. 628, on the ground that the franchise, which was to the company and its "successors or assigns," was not void.

And in Louisville Trust Co. v. Cincinnati (1896) 22 C. C. A. 334, 47 U. S. App. 36, 76 Fed. 296, where, under statute, no street franchise could be granted, renewed, or extended except by ordinance, it was held that a city was not estopped to deny the right of an inclined plane railroad company to occupy the streets after the expiration of its franchise, by the fact that, after the franchise had expired, it had expended a large sum of money in changing the motive power from horse to electricity, pursuant to a resolution of the board of public works authorizing such change, the consent of the board being granted under a statute providing that no other motive power than animals should be used by

It was held that a street railway company could not by estoppel acquire the right, as against a township, to maintain a switch in a public highway 1,700 feet from the point where it was authorized to maintain the switch, as shown on a map accompanying the ordinance giving it the right to construct the road, although the switch had been used by it without objection from the township authorities for twelve years, where the statute provided for the giving of consent in cases of original location of tracks, as in this instance, by ordinance, "and not otherwise." Trenton & M. County Traction Corp. v. Ewing Twp. (1919) — N. J. —, 107 Atl. 416, reversing (1917) 87 N. J. Eq. 397, 101 Atl. 1037. The court said: "The elements of an estoppel are not present, since there is no proof that the railway company was induced to place the switch where it did by anything said or done, even by individual members of the committee, although that would not raise an estoppel against the public. The municipality, in granting the consent originally, could act only by ordinance, 'and not otherwise,' as the statute is careful to say. 4 Comp. Stat. p. 5040. This clearly forbids action by way of estoppel, which, if permitted, would nullify the statutory prohibition."

In Brush Electric Light Co. v. Jones Bros. Electric Light Co. (1891) 5 Ohio C. C. 340, the court said that it was difficult to see how the alleged grant of the franchise to an electric light company was made valid and binding on the city by a mere acquiescence of the public authorities in its use for a time, when the statute expressly provided that it could be granted in but one mode. It was held, however, that there was no such proof of continued acquiescence on the part of the municipal authorities as justified the claim to the franchise in question. The statute provided that no grant of the use of a street should be made for any purpose, unless first recommended by the board of public works, and that no resolution or ordinance recommended to the council by such board, and there amended, should take effect until approved by the board, and that a franchise granted must be approved by four members of the board.

The assessment and payment of city taxes by a street car company may constitute a ground for an estoppel against the city to deny that it consented to the use of the streets by the company, even though such payment extends only over a period of several years. Spokane Street R. Co. v. Spokane Falls (1893) 6 Wash. 521, 33 Pac. 1072. In this case the assessments had been levied, it appears, only for two or three years, but the court said that the assessment of taxes was a deliberate and formal matter, and there was no reason why an estoppel should not grow as well out of one assessment as many.

So, where a right of way for a railroad was granted by the county supervisors over a public square of an unincorporated town, the railroad was constructed, the conditions of the grant as to improvements on the square were fulfilled by the company, and the city, after its incorporation, for nearly twenty years assessed and collected local taxes against the square as the property of the county, and recognized the rights of the railroad company by the vacation of streets and alleys, it was held that the city was estopped to deny that it had consented to the use of the land in question by the railroad. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Joliet (1875) 79 Ill. 25.

And it was held in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. People (1878) 91 Ill. 251, that a city was estopped from compelling the removal of a stone arch in a street, built by a railroad company as a part of its roadbed, where the same had been used by the company without objection for nineteen years, and the city had agreed that the arch should remain until such time as it should be rebuilt, and, in addition to these acts of recognition by the city to the company's use of the street in this manner, it had, from year to year, assessed for taxation the right of way of the company, including the property in controversy.

Omaha* (Fed.) under II. b, supra, where receipt of a tax by a municipality on the gross income of an electric company was held not to give rise to an estoppel to deny the grant of a franchise; and for a case where the municipality was held not estopped to deny consent to the grant of a franchise to a street railway company, by the fact that the company had paid street paving assessments, see *Morris & E. It was held in St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Belleville (1887) 122 Ill. 376, 12 N. E. 680, that acts of a committee of a city council, appointed to confer with a railroad company, but not clothed with authority to vacate streets, or the conduct of the city attorney, who was equally destitute of such authority, could not estop the municipality so as to enable the railway company, on the ground of estoppel, to defend an action for obstructing a street crossing under the claim that the street had been vacated and the city had consented to the use of the same for railroad yards.

THOMAS RAWLINGS, Appt.,

v.

EARL RAWLINGS et al.; by Next Friend.

(— Miss. —, 83 So. 146.)

Parent and child — right to sue for support.

1. An infant cannot maintain a bill in equity against his father to determine in advance the amount of support and maintenance to which he is entitled, and secure an order requiring the father to furnish it.

— duty to support.

2. A father is bound to support his infant child.

[See 20 R. C. L. 622.]

Lien — of child for support.

3. A child has no lien on his father's homestead or other land for support.

(Ethridge and Holden, JJ., dissent.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Adams County (Cutrer, Ch.) in favor of plaintiffs in a proceeding to have fixed in advance a monthly allowance for their support, to require the defendant to pay the sum fixed, and for a lien upon his estate for the amounts ordered to be paid. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Ernest E. Brown, for appellant:

A child cannot successfully maintain in Mississippi a suit in any court against his father for support.

East v. King, 77 Miss. 738, 27 So. 608; Hewlett v. George, 68 Miss. 703, 13 L.R.A. 682, 9 So. 885; Fortinberry v. Holmes, 89 Miss. 373, 42 So. 799.

Mr. L. T. Kennedy for appellees.

Stevens, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The six minor children of Thomas Rawlings, appellant, exhibited, by next friend, their bill of complaint against their father, alleging that the defendant had not lived with them or their mother for a number of years; that their father had not for a long period contributed anything to their support; that the mother was not able to care for them and that they were without means of support; that the defendant was the owner of a certain plantation, and that this plantation "is liable to them for a support." The prayer of the bill is that upon final hearing "the court will ascertain what amount is sufficient for the monthly support of said minor children, and order and decree that such amount be paid monthly by the defendant, and that the same be made a lien upon the property of the defendant," etc. The alleged plantation of the defendant is not described in the bill, but a lis pendens notice was filed, indicating in a general way the real estate upon which a lien is sought. The defendant demurred to the bill, the demurrer was overruled, and this appeal prosecuted.

This is not an action for board and lodging furnished the minors, either by the mother or a third person. This is a proceeding in equity to have the chancellor fix in advance a monthly allowance for the infant children of the defendant, to enter a decree requiring the defendant to pay the sum fixed, and to adjudge a lien upon the defendant's real estate for the sums so ordered to be paid. The law as known and expounded for centuries fails to sanction any such proceeding. We recognize to the fullest extent the obligation of a parent to support his infant child, and nothing said in this opinion would discount in the least this primary obligation, imposed by the law of nature. The question before us is one as to the remedy in the case made by the bill. Does the existence of the obligation on the part of the parent justify a court of equity in entertaining a bill or action by the child against its father to determine in advance the amount of support and maintenance, and compel obedience to its orders in the premises by imposing a lien upon property or otherwise? On this point the authorities are in accord. In 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1052, it is said: "The moral obligation of a parent to support his child is not directly enforceable, and a court of equity cannot compel the performance of this duty. The duty may be enforced, however, under statute, or indirectly, as where a stranger supplies an infant with necessities and recovers therefor against the parent."

Parent and child—duty to support.

In 20 R. C. L. ¶ 31, it is said that "the civil remedy is more commonly worked out by holding that, if the father leaves his children destitute, he confers on anyone who finds them in that condition an agency to supply them with necessities; the volunteer can therefore recover the cost of the supplies from the father in a civil action."

Practically the same declaration is made in the text of Cyc. (vol. 29, p. 1614), and on page 1663 it is pointed out that "actions by children against their parents are not to be encouraged, . . . and a minor child has no right of action against a parent for the tort of the latter." In the footnotes to the text last quoted is our own case of Hewlett v. George, 68 Miss. 703, 13 L.R.A. 682, 9 So. 885. In this case, our court, by Woods, J., in forcible language declared: "The peace of society, and of the families composing society, and a sound public policy, designed to subserve the repose of families and the best interests of society, forbid to the minor child a right to appear in court in the assertion of a claim to civil redress for personal injuries suffered at the hands of the parent. The state, through its criminal laws, will give the minor child protection from parental violence and wrongdoing, and this is all the child can be heard to demand."

This language was quoted with approval by the supreme court of Tennessee in McKelvey v. McKelvey, 111 Tenn. 388, 64 L.R.A. 991, 102 Am. St. Rep. 787, 77 S. W. 664, 1 Ann. Cas. 130. There has been brought to our attention no case which, based upon the common law or general equity jurisdiction, sanctions this proceeding. On the contrary, the exact question was elaborately considered, and the point ruled adversely to the contention of complainants, in the case of Huke v. Huke, 44 Mo. App. 308. In the Huke Case a daughter seventeen years of age, by next friend, filed her petition in equity against her father for support and maintenance. It was there, as here, contended that the chancellor has full jurisdiction over the persons and property of infants, but the court of appeals of Missouri observed: "This action proceeds in the face of elementary principles."

The court further said: "No instance is found in the books, where such an action as the present has been maintained, either at law or in equity. At one period in our English history a statute was enacted that, if any Popish parent should refuse to allow his Protestant child a fitting maintenance, with a view to compel him to change his religion, the Lord Chancellor should, by order of the court, constrain him to do what is just and reasonable. Stat. 11 & 12 Wm. III. chap. 4. The very enactment of this statute—the necessity in the state of the law for such a statute—shows that a father was under no compulsory obligation at common law, or by the principles of equity, to support his infant child. A case arose after the passing of this statute, making this conclusion still more clear. The daughter of a wealthy Jew had embraced Christianity, and he turned her out of doors. On the petition of the parish for relief against him, they were held entitled to none, because it was not alleged that she was poor or likely to become chargeable. St. Andrew's Undershaft v. Mendez de Breta, 1 Ed. Raym. 699, 91 Eng. Reprint, 1366. This gave occasion for another statute, which ordained that, if Jewish parents should refuse to allow their Protestant children a fitting maintenance, suitable to the fortune of the parents, the Lord Chancellor, on complaint, might make such order as he should see proper. Stat. 1 Anne, chap. 30; 1 Bl. Com. 449. . . . No court of chancery in England ever made an order requiring a father, however wealthy, to set apart out of his own estate a fund for the maintenance and education of his infant child, or even to provide sustenance for such child. The common law of England has, from the earliest times, left this duty to the natural feelings of the parents, and experience has shown that the confidence has not in general been misplaced."

And in Alling v. Alling, 52 N. J. Eq. 92, 27 Atl. 655, ¶ 1 of the headnotes reads: "1. A court of chancery has no jurisdiction to compel a parent to support an infant child."

In the opinion by Pitney, V. C., the following language by the supreme court of Connecticut in Finch v. Finch, 22 Conn. 411, is quoted with approval: "Connected with this obligation of maintenance there is a parental privilege. The parent is entitled to the custody and care of the child which he sustains, and to such service as it can render, and he has a right to exercise his own discretion in determining the fitness and necessity of the allowances to be made and of the support to be furnished to his children, for which he is to be made chargeable."

If the jurisdiction of equity has been enlarged in any of the states of the Union, it is certainly based upon some statute. We have in our state two statutes which indirectly bear upon the subject. Section 3571, Code of 1906 (§ 6188, Hemingway's Code), imposes a duty upon certain relatives to support pauper members of their family. By this statute the father of a pauper child is made liable to the county in the sum of $8 per month for each month the father has failed or refused to provide the necessary support and maintenance, and furthermore is made liable to any person in like sum who supplies such poor relatives with necessaries. By § 5055 (§ 3332) every person who abandons his wife or family without just cause, leaving her or them without support, or in danger of becoming a public charge, is declared a vagrant, and punishable as such. Statutes for the protection of the poor have been enacted in England, and in most, if not all, the states of the Union. The English Statute of 43 Eliz. chap. 2, provides: The father and mother, grandfather and grandmother, of poor, impotent persons, shall maintain them, if of sufficient ability, according as the quarter session shall direct.

In considering the Connecticut statute, declared to be "nearly a transcript of the English statute on this subject," the supreme court of Connecticut ruled that their statutory provisions "embrace as well minor as adult children." Finch v. Finch, supra, 22 Conn. 416. Poor infants cannot then be said to be without some remedy. If a father, though able, becomes so depraved as wilfully to abandon his offspring, he is answerable to the criminal laws of our commonwealth. But such cases must be few indeed. When they exist, they are generally the result of differences between husband and wife and a home broken up by domestic troubles. And in cases of divorce the chancery court is given jurisdiction by statute (Code 1906, § 1673; Hemingway's Code, § 1415) to "make all orders touching the case, custody, and maintenance of the children of the marriage" that "may seem equitable and just," and afterwards may "change the decree, and make from time to time such new decrees as the case may require."

We are not justified in enlarging the jurisdiction of chancery beyond that indicated by the statute, and in opening the door of the courts to any unruly or disobedient child who may complain at either the amount or kind of support and maintenance provided by the father. The same reasons that led the court to the conclusion reached in Hewlett v. George, 68 Miss. 703, 13 L.R.A. 682, 9 So. 885, are persuasive here. "The repose of families and best interests of society forbid" any such action. If the chancellor can fix in advance the amount of support each dissatisfied child must receive, then is parental authority superseded by judicial fiat, parental discipline swept away by self-assertion and disobedience on the part of children, and the integrity of the home, the corner stone of society, is undermined. The bill even prays that a lien be fixed upon the father's real estate. By no provision of law is the child given an interest, such as the wife has, in the homestead or other lands of the father.

Lien—of child for support.

For the reasons indicated, the decree of the learned Chancellor will be reversed, the demurrer sustained, and decree entered here in appellant's favor.

Ethridge, J., dissenting:

After profound consideration of the question presented by this record, I find myself unable to agree with my brethren. In my opinion their exegesis is erroneous, and fruitful of evil consequences to the helpless and unfortunate children of this state who have cruel, shiftless, heartless parents. The courts, and especially courts of equity, should be diligent to discover and swift to remedy the wrongs of helpless children. It is the function of government to protect the weak and helpless from the wrongs of the strong, the cunning, and the vicious; and the fact that the strong, cunning, and vicious may happen to be the parents of the weak and helpless, instead of removing the protection, should be an additional reason for the exercise of diligence and the extending of the remedial aid of the court of equity. In order that my position may be better understood, I shall state the facts, and then my view of the law applicable to them, and afterwards consider the views of the majority, and the authorities cited sustaining that opinion, hoping to point out the errors therein contained.

The petition in this case was filed by the mother of the children as their next friend, and alleged that the petitioners were the children of the defendant (appellant), and that they were without means of support, and unable to earn a support; that they lived with their mother, away from their father; that the mother was unable to support them, and that their father was able to support them, and that it was his duty to do so; that he had repeatedly promised to support them, but that for several years he had contributed nothing to their support; that he was the owner of a plantation in the county of their residence—and prayed that the court inquire into their complaint and fix a reasonable sum for their support, adjudge the same against defendant, and impress a lien upon his property for the security of their support and for general relief. The defendant demurred to the bill, thus confessing the truth of the allegations contained therein; the demurrer was overruled by the court below, and appeal granted to this court to settle the principles of the case. The majority of this court has decided that the suit is not maintainable, and that no relief can be granted by equity. The children have asked for bread, and the court has given them a stone. In my opinion the parental obligation to support children can be enforced in equity at the suit of the children, suing by next friend, and that this is the only effectual remedy to insure their support. Section 24 of the state Constitution reads as follows: "All courts shall be open; and every person for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation, shall have remedy by due course of law, and right and justice shall be administered without sale, denial, or delay."

Section 512, Hemingway's Code (§ 729, Code 1906), reads as follows: "The declaration shall contain a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action, in ordinary and concise language, without repetition; and if it contain sufficient matter of substance for the court to proceed upon the merits of the cause, it shall be sufficient; and it shall not be an objection to maintaining any action that the form thereof should have been different."

Under these two sections it was intended by the lawmaking power of this state to grant a judicial remedy for the enforcement of every legal right, and that all forms of actions should be abolished, to the end that the court should not be embarrassed in enforcing rights where it had the facts before it, and should grant justice according to law, and not according to forms. It does not mean that any particular court has jurisdiction of a particular controversy, but it does mean that some court must be able to grant relief, where a legal right involving person, property, or reputation is presented. The constitutional provision, § 24 above quoted, is followed by a partition of the judicial powers among different courts, and providing in § 147 of the state Constitution that this court should not reverse a cause solely on the ground that the action was brought in the wrong court, but that, if the correct result was reached, the judgment should be affirmed, and the relief granted. The trial court retained jurisdiction, and if there be any legal right our duty is to either remand to the chancery court from which the cause came, or to send it to the proper court for a trial on the merits. The jurisdiction of the chancery court is contained (so far as it affects this controversy) in § 159 of the Constitution of 1890, which reads as follows:

"The chancery court shall have full jurisdiction in the following matters and cases, viz.: . . .

"(a) All matters in equity;

"(b) Divorce and alimony;

"(c) Matters testamentary and of administration;

"(d) Minor's business;

"(e) Cases of idiocy, lunacy, and persons of unsound mind;

"(f) All cases of which the said court had jurisdiction under the laws in force when this Constitution is put in operation."

The Constitution grants jurisdiction to the circuit court in § 156, which reads as follows: "The circuit court shall have original jurisdiction in all matters, civil and criminal, in this state not vested by this Constitution in some other court, and such appellate jurisdiction as shall be prescribed by law."

It will be seen from the sections quoted that there is jurisdiction vested in these courts for the enforcement of all rights affecting person, property, or reputation. Does this suit lie? The majority opinion concedes that it is the legal duty of a parent to support the child. There can be no legal duty without a corresponding legal right. It would be idle, yea, impossible, to declare a duty without at the same time declaring a corresponding right in the person or persons to whom the duty was owed. The one necessarily implies the other. Section 1415, Hemingway's Code (§ 1673, Code 1906), provides: "When a divorce shall be decreed from the bonds of matrimony, the court may, in its discretion, having regard to the circumstances of the parties and the nature of the case, as may seem equitable and just, make all orders touching the care, custody, and maintenance of the children of the marriage, and also touching the maintenance and alimony of the wife, or any allowance to be made to her, and may, if need be, require sureties for the payment of the sum so allowed; and the court may afterward, on petition, change the decree, and make from time to time such new decrees as the case may require."

Is it reasonable to construe this section so as to make it inapplicable to other suits than divorce suits? I think not. The cases of Garland v. Garland, 50 Miss. 694, and Verner v. Verner, 62 Miss. 260, are persuasive for a different construction. There the law was as to alimony in a suit by the wife for her support, and the law, as it then existed, was that alimony was allowed as an incident of some other suit, like a divorce suit; but the court, in an opinion of great reason and strength, held that the suit would lie, even though no other suit was pending.

The most powerful and pressing considerations, it occurs to me, present themselves in favor of a like construction here. Why should the husband escape the duty to support his children in case no divorce is asked, and be compelled to do so where a divorce is asked? Would not such construction encourage, rather than discourage, divorce? And is it not the settled public policy to discourage divorce, and encourage the discharge of legal duty?

Section 6188, Hemingway's Code (§ 3571, Code 1906), reads as follows: "The father and grandfather, the mother and grandmother, and brothers and sisters, and the descendants of any pauper not able to work, as the board of supervisors shall direct, shall, at their own charge, relieve and maintain such pauper; and, in case of refusal, shall forfeit and pay the county the sum of $8 per month, for each month they may so refuse, to be recovered in the name of the county; and shall be liable to any person who supplies such poor relative, if abandoned, with necessaries, not exceeding said sum per month."

Does this section provide an exclusive remedy in case no divorce proceedings are pending? Clearly not. It will be noted that the legal duty is clearly fixed upon the father to support and maintain his children at his own expense. If he does not discharge this legal duty, the board of supervisors may, if the child is maintained by the county, sue him for as much as $8 per month, and no more. Any private person furnishing such child support cannot recover more than $8 per month. If this is the exclusive remedy, the child would starve, or its living expense would have to be made up by the public, even though the heartless father might have millions of dollars' worth of property. No person would, in this day of high cost of living, furnish a child enough to live on when he would be limited to $8 per month recovery against the father under this statute. The absurdity of so holding is evident. The lawmaking power never intended to so limit the amount that a parent should furnish, nor relieve him of any duty in the premises. What is the criminal law referred to in the majority opinion, by which this parental duty may be enforced and the child protected? Section 805, Hemingway's Code (§ 1078, Code 1906), provides: "If the father or mother of any child under the age of six years, or any other person having the lawful custody of such child, or to whom such child shall have been confided, shall expose such child in any highway, street, field, house, outhouse, or elsewhere, with intent wholly to abandon it, such person shall, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not more than seven years, or in the county jail not more than one year."

It will be seen that this section is very limited in its scope. It does not apply at all to children over six years of age, and is then limited to particular acts, and does not apply to mere neglect. If that is the remedy for helpless children, God have mercy on them!

What about vagrancy proceeding? Section 5055, Code of 1906 (§ 3332, Hemingway's Code), defines who are vagrants, and paragraph (k) of this section is the one that provides that "every person who shall abandon his wife or family, without just cause, leaving her or them without support, or in danger of becoming a public charge."

And paragraph (m) provides: "All persons who are able to work and do not work, but hire out their minor children or allow them to be hired out, and live upon their wages."

These are the only provisions pertinent to the suit before us. The proceedings for dealing with vagrants are contained in § 3335, Hemingway's Code (§ 5058, Code 1906) and § 3338, Hemingway's Code (§ 5061, Code 1906).

It was provided in § 3335, Hemingway's Code, that whenever any person is arrested on a charge of vagrancy he shall be carried before a justice of the peace, and on satisfactory evidence of being a vagrant that the justice of the peace shall commit such person to jail for not less than ten nor more than thirty days, and that such person so committed shall serve his sentence, unless he shall give bond with sufficient surety for future industry and good conduct for a period of one year, and that such bond, if given, may be put in suit, and that whenever the bond so taken be forfeited there shall be no recovery less than the face value of the bond, unless the vagrant shall be delivered up to the circuit court for future trial, in which case the court may limit the amount of recovery on the bond to the cost of suit and a penalty of $50. This bond nowhere provides for the recovery thereon by the infant or the wife. The suit must be in the name of the state, and it provides no support whatever for the dependents of the vagrant. If the alleged vagrant refuses to give bond, he may be imprisoned for thirty days, and no longer. Clearly this proceeding affords no certainty of relief for the dependents of the vagrant. Section 3338, Hemingway's Code (§ 5061, Code 1906), provides for a second conviction, and provides that in such case the vagrant shall be committed to jail for not less than ninety days nor more than six months, and shall serve such sentence, and not be liberated from such sentence by payment for the time required to be served by such sentence. This section clearly makes no provisions for the children and dependents of the vagrant.

So we say that these criminal and vagrant sections do not provide for their support. In 1 C. J. p. 985, § 93, it is said: "The violation of a right, as defined or recognized by the substantive law, constitutes a wrong, and it has long been a settled principle and maxim of the law that for every right, or as otherwise, and perhaps more accurately, stated, for every wrong, or for the vindication or violation of every right, there is a remedy, or, in other words, that wherever the law recognizes a right it gives a remedy to enforce it, or to redress its violation, and in the application of this principle it is immaterial whether the right is a common-law right or exists by virtue of statute. Right and remedy are reciprocal, and to deny the remedy is, in substance, to deny the right."

For essentials of an action, see 1 C. J. p. 927, and page 935, § 28. At page 986, same volume (§ 95), it is stated by this same authority, under heading "Statutory Rights:" "The rule that wherever the law recognizes a right it gives a remedy applies to statutory as well as to common-law rights; and so whenever a statute creates a new right or duty, and does not prescribe any particular remedy for its enforcement, the party entitled to the benefit of the statute may resort to any existing remedy which will afford adequate and proper redress, whether it be a common-law or a statutory remedy."

Section 96, under the same chapter, under heading "Framing New Remedies," says: "In order to afford a remedy for every wrong, it became necessary during the formative period of the common-law actions, as new cases arose under recognized principles, to frame new writs, where none appropriate to the case could be found. These writs were formerly issued out of chancery and directed to the common-law courts; but it is now well recognized that the court in which an action is brought may, in order to prevent a failure of justice, or to enforce a recognized principle of law, devise or adopt such new remedy or mode of procedure as the case may require, and that it is its duty to do so; but a new remedy or mode of procedure should not be resorted to, when there is an appropriate and adequate remedy already known to the law."

In § 99, p. 987, under heading "Nature and Form of Remedy," it is said: "The rule that there shall be a remedy for the enforcement of every right, although it be a new right created by statute, does not have reference to any one particular remedy, but to such form of remedy as is appropriate to the nature of the particular case; and in some cases there may be more than one appropriate remedy."

In § 100, p. 988, of the same authority, under heading "Statutory Remedies," it is said: "It is competent for the legislature to provide a remedy in cases where none existed at common law, or in creating a new right to prescribe the remedy by which it is to be enforced, and limit jurisdiction of it to a particular tribunal, or to provide new remedies for pre-existing rights, and make such new remedies exclusive. Where a statutory remedy is prescribed for a particular purpose, it will be limited accordingly and cannot be used for other purposes, and in pursuing a statutory remedy the proceedings must conform to the provisions of the statute."

In § 101, same authority, at pages 988, 989, under heading "Cumulative or Exclusive Remedies," it says: "Unless governed by some general statutory provisions, the question as to whether a statutory remedy is exclusive or merely cumulative depends primarily upon the intention of the legislature, as shown by a construction of the statute prescribing the remedy. The question is ordinarily determined according to whether the remedy is given for the enforcement of a new right created by the statute, or is merely a new remedy for a pre-existing right; but while, unless a contrary intention appears, the remedy will in the former case be construed as exclusive, and in the latter as merely cumulative, this distinction is not in all cases controlling."

In § 102, pp. 989, 990, same authority, under heading "New Right Created with Remedy," it says: "Where a statute creates a new right, and also provides a remedy for its enforcement, it is ordinarily held that such remedy is exclusive. This rule seems to have been first laid down with reference to remedies under criminal and penal statutes; but it applies equally to civil actions of a personal nature, and where the statute providing such a remedy confers jurisdiction thereof upon a particular court or tribunal, such jurisdiction, as well as the remedy, is exclusive. The rule is not, however, of universal application, particularly in the case of statutes which are not penal, for it is based merely upon a presumed prohibition of other remedies, and will yield where a contrary intention appears."

In § 103, p. 990, under heading "New Remedy for Pre-existing Right," this authority says: "Where a statute providing a remedy does not create a new right, but merely provides a new remedy for a pre-existing right, it is ordinarily held that such remedy is not exclusive, but merely cumulative, whether the right is one previously enforceable at common law, or by virtue of some other statute or constitutional provision, and whether it was previously enforceable at law or in equity, and notwithstanding the new remedy may be preferable to or more efficient than the old."

In § 105, p. 991, under heading "Adequacy of Statutory Remedy," this authority says: "The rule that a new remedy for a pre-existing right will not be regarded as exclusive is particularly applicable where such new remedy is not an adequate one."

Testing the present case by these rulings, we are bound to conclude, it seems to me, that these penal and criminal statutes do not provide an exclusive remedy for the enforcement of the rights of children to support by their parents. The obligation existed independent of the statute. In 20 R. C. L. p. 622, under heading "Liabilities of Father," it is said: "It has already been pointed out that correlative to the father's right to the custody, control, and earnings of his minor child is his duty to support such child. This duty is recognized and discharged, even by the higher orders of the animal world, and it would seem to be prescribed as to the human father by the most elementary principles of civilization as well as of law. And yet it was held in some early American cases, supported by eminent English authority, that 'there is no legal obligation on a parent to maintain his child' unless by force of some statute. But this doctrine, admitted to seem startling and opposed to the innate sense of justice by the court which gave to it its first American support, has been repudiated by the great majority of American courts. A father of sufficient ability is bound to support his minor child, though the latter has an estate of his own.

of support was only a moral duty is as to the method of enforcement. The very similar duty of the husband to support his wife is easily enforced by imputing to her an agency to procure necessities on his credit, if he leaves her destitute; but in the case of the infant he is legally incapable to contract, and in most cases actually unable to contract with wisdom and prudence."

While a person who furnishes an infant may recover from the father in this state to the extent of $8 a month, "and no more," he is under no obligation to do so, especially when he might have trouble in collecting from the father. At page 625, 20 R. C. L., it is said: "But if a father abandons his duty to his infant child, so that he is forced to leave his house, he is liable for a suitable maintenance. The principle of the distinction is that in one case the father is blameless and in the other blamable. Whether, from all the circumstances, authority from the father should be imputed to the child or to a third person to procure or furnish necessities on the father's credit is a question of fact for the jury. If a father permits his child to live with its mother, her adultery is no bar to an action by her to recover for support furnished to the child."

The majority opinion concedes that it is the legal as well as the moral duty of the father to support his minor children, but concludes that there is no remedy for the enforcement of this legal duty at the suit of the child. In Garland v. Garland, 50 Miss. 694, this court laid down the following general rule pertaining to equity jurisdiction and procedure: "Courts of equity in America will always interpose to redress wrongs when the complainant is without full, adequate, and complete remedy at law. Here there is no such process as supplicavit, nor a distinct proceeding for the restitution of the conjugal relations. If a wife is abandoned by her husband without means of support, a bill in equity will lie to compel the husband to support the wife without asking for a decree of divorce."

This rule has been cited with approval in the following cases: Deweese v. Deweese, 55 Miss. 319; Verner v. Verner, 62 Miss. 263; McFarland v. McFarland, 64 Miss.

449, 1 So. 508; Scott v. Scott, 73 Miss. 580, 19 So. 589; Moseley v. Larson, 86 Miss. 294, 38 So. 234; Ross v. Ross, 89 Miss. 66, 42 So. 383.

Prior to this decision the authorities had treated alimony for the wife as an incident to some suit, such as divorce, and it was earnestly contended that, as there was no statute granting the suit without the pendency of a divorce, the relief could not be granted. In Garland v. Garland, 50 Miss. 711, 712, the court quoted from Story's Equity Jurisprudence, § 1423a, with approval as follows:

"In America, a broader jurisdiction in cases of alimony has been asserted in some of our courts of equity; and it has been held that if a husband abandons his wife, and separates himself from her without any reasonable support, a court of equity may, in all cases, decree her a suitable maintenance and support out of his estate, upon the very ground that there is no adequate or sufficient remedy at law in such a case. And there is so much good sense and reason in this doctrine, that it might be wished it were generally adopted.' No sufficient reason can be offered in answer to the broad proposition of Mr. Story, and the objector must rely upon the technical fact that it has not obtained in England. Purcell v. Purcell, 4 Hen. & M. 507, presented three questions, marriage, desertion, and the right of the wife to a separate maintenance. The two first averments were established. As to the third the chancellor said: 'I hold that in every well-regulated government there must somewhere exist a power of affording a remedy when the law affords none, and this peculiarly belongs to a court of equity; and as husband and wife are considered as one person in law, it is evident that in this case the law can afford no remedy, which is universally admitted to be a sufficient ground to give this court jurisdiction, and therefore it must entertain the bill, if there be sufficient proof of the marriage.' In the opening of his opinion, the chancellor said: 'I shall leave the clashing of the English judges to be reconciled among themselves, and take up the question upon first principles.' The marriage was sustained and the prayer for a separate maintenance granted. The decree required an annual payment by the husband to the wife 'until he should restore her to the comforts of her bed and board, and give satisfactory assurances for her enjoyment thereof.' This decree was enforced by committing the husband to prison for neglecting compliance. He purged himself of the contempt by paying to his wife the amount due and in arrear, and giving security for his future performance of the decree.

"Precisely the same question under consideration was before the courts of South Carolina in the case of Prather v. Prather, 4 S. C. Eq. (4 Desauss.) 83. The opinion is a searching review of the English decisions, and a very emphatic assertion of the equity of the rule, which, Story says, 'it might be wished it were generally adopted.' The court in that case observe: 'It might be sufficient to say that, as there have been cases on both sides of the question, . . . I should feel myself at liberty to select those cases for my guide which applied to the circumstances of this country, and would best promote the purposes of justice. . . . The subject has been discussed, and the court has decreed that the wife should have a separate estate from her husband, in the case of ill usage, and a consequent separation or desertion by the husband, though no agreement for a separate maintenance and no divorce. . . . I allude to several cases which were decided in this court some years since, expressly on the ground that no other tribunal could give redress, and that it would be unseemly and highly mischievous if this court did not interfere.' See also Anonymous, 2 S. C. Eq. (2 Desauss.) 198, and cases in South Carolina therein referred to."

In 50 Miss. 713, the court also quote the supreme court of Alabama as follows: "The supreme court of Alabama, in Glover v. Glover, 16 Ala. 440, use this language: 'No one will deny but that the husband is bound by the strongest obligations, resulting not alone from the contract of marriage, but founded upon the highest moral consideration, to support his wife. And if it be true that the law, as well as enlightened conscience, creates this obligation, and no court can enforce its performance or compensate for its most cruel and flagitious violation, then indeed has one class of cases been found which falsifies the boasted maxim "that for every wrong there is a remedy, and for every injustice, an adequate and salutary relief."' And after advert- ing to the disagreements of the English chancellor, the court also say: 'So stands the law in England, and since her learned chancellors have not been able to reconcile their own decisions, we feel that we shall not be wanting in respect for them in adopting a rule of decision for ourselves, which we conceive to be more consonant with an enlightened equity, and with the fundamental principles and maxims upon which the jurisdiction of our courts of chancery is based.'"

In 50 Miss. 714, our court, quoting from the Kentucky court in Butler v. Butler, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 202: "'But in equity the wife can sue the husband, and it is the province of a court of equity to afford remedy, where the conscience and the law acknowledge a right, but know no remedy. Why, then, should the chancellor shrink at this case and refuse a remedy? It is evident that this arose in England for fear of intruding upon the ground occupied by the ecclesiastical courts.' And in this quotation the whole case at bar is embraced. With us, marriage rests in contract, and the obligation is both to the wife and to society. That the remedy at law, in case of a breach of this contract, is neither full, adequate, nor complete, is plain to ordinary experience. The law's delays are proverbial. The credit of a man, stubbornly determined not to support his wife, will not feed the hungry nor clothe the naked. A man might be worth a large fortune, yet so situated as to defy judgment and execution. The credit of one so disposed would avail nothing in the market in the way of procuring supplies, as merchants will not part with their goods upon such uncertain security."

In 50 Miss. 715, 716, the court said: "Support of the wife is the legal duty of the husband. The wife has a right to demand it; but, as her remedy, when this right is denied, is not full, adequate, and complete at law, equity ought to enforce it. In abandoning the wife without good cause, and refusing to support her, the husband violates a legal duty and commits a breach of contract, which entitles the wife to redress, either by divorce, or to the enforcement of the marriage contract by compelling restitution of conjugal rights to the extent of maintenance, at her option. If she chooses the latter, she ought not to be starved into the former, for that would force her to abandon the marriage contract against her will."

In the subsequent case of Verner v. Verner, 62 Miss. 263, the court again held that the wife could file suit for alimony without suit for divorce.

The case of Johns v. Williams, 66 Miss. 350, 6 So. 207, was a suit by complainants against their mother and Williams & Black. It was alleged that the complainants were minors, except one of them, and that they had not a guardian; and the land in controversy was conveyed in and for their use, and the suit was to enforce the trust against Williams & Black and their mother. Williams & Black demurred to the bill, and the chancellor sustained the demurrer and dismissed the bill. This court reversed, for proper relief to be granted.

In Williams v. Duncan, 44 Miss. 375, the court said: "If there were no other reason, the infancy of the complainants brings the case within the jurisdiction of a court of equity."

In Johns v. Smith, 56 Miss. 727, this court held that the chancery court had full jurisdiction over minors and their property, which must be exercised whenever non-action would result prejudicially to the minor, and if there is no guardian the court must act without one.

In Hurt v. Southern R. Co. 40 Miss. 391, it was held that an infant could sue in a court of law by next friend. See also 22 Cyc. 627, where it is said that infants may sue at law or in equity.

Minors are peculiarly wards of the chancery court, and it was held in Price v. Crone, 44 Miss. 571, that it is the duty of the chancellor to protect the interest of minors, whether the proper defense be made or not; and for this purpose they should look to the record in all its parts, and, of his own motion, give to the infant the benefit of all objections and exceptions as fully as if specially pleaded. The infant can waive none of its rights.

In Story's Equity Jurisprudence, 10th ed. § 1341, at page 595, it is said: "The jurisdiction of the court of chancery extends to the care of the person of the infant, so far as necessary for his protection and education; and to the care of the property of the infant, for its due management and preservation, and proper application for his maintenance. It is upon the former ground, principally, that is to say, for the due protection and education of the infant, that the court interferes with the ordinary rights of parents, as guardians by nature, or by nurture, in regard to the custody and care of their children. For although, in general, parents are intrusted with the custody of the persons, and the education of their children, yet this is done upon the natural presumption that the children will be properly taken care of, and will be brought up with a due education in literature, and morals, and religion, and that they will be treated with kindness and affection. But whenever this presumption is removed, whenever (for example) it is found that a father is guilty of gross ill treatment or cruelty towards his infant children, or that he is in constant habits of drunkenness and blasphemy, or low and gross debauchery, . . . the court of chancery will interfere, and deprive him of the custody of his children, and appoint a suitable person to act as guardian, and to take care of them, and to superintend their education."

In Leibold v. Leibold, 158 Ind. 60, 62 N. E. 627, it was held that suit would lie in equity against the father for the support of his minor children, independent of any statute. In that case the suit was filed by the wife for the support and custody of their minor children; the only distinction between that and this being that this suit is merely for the support without any suit as to custody. The proceeding did not conform to a statutory proceeding in Indiana. At page 61 of 158 Ind., the court said: "This proceeding, however, was not brought under the Act of 1881, nor does the sufficiency of said second paragraph depend upon that act. The power of a court of chancery to control not only the estate, but the person and custody, of infants, is well settled,"—citing 2 Story's Eq. 13th ed. §§ 1341, 1341a, 1345, 1346; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 2d ed. § 1807; Cowls v. Cowls, 8 Ill. 435, 44 Am. Dec. 708.

In 3 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, 2d ed. § 1307, it is said: "In addition to its power to appoint guardians, the court of equity will also exercise its jurisdiction, in a proper case, and to promote the highest welfare of the infant, where there is already a guardian, natural or legal, by controlling the person of the infant, and by removing it personally from the custody of its natural or legal guardian, even from the custody of its own parents. By the common law, as well as by the law of nature, the father is the natural guardian of his infant children. It is not only the father's right, but his imperative duty, to have custody of the persons of his infant children, and to educate and train them so as to promote their future well-being as members of society. The equitable jurisdiction over the persons of infants is based upon this parental duty, and is an indirect means of enforcing it by furnishing a remedy for its violation. The jurisdiction is a delicate one; it rests in the highest degree upon the enlightened discretion of the court, and will only be exercised when plainly demanded as the means of securing the infant's present and future well-being. It is well settled, therefore, that a court of equity may interfere on behalf of infants, and remove them from the custody and control of their father or mother, whenever the habits, practices, instruction, or example of the parent, exerting a personal influence on the infants, tend to corrupt their morals and undermine their principles, or when the parent is neglecting their education suitable for their condition in life, or is endangering their property, or is guilty of ill treatment or cruelty towards them."

In discussing the jurisdiction of the chancery court pertaining to its control over minors, Lord Eldon, in English chancery, in the case of Wellesley v. Beaufort, 2 Russ. Ch. 23, 38 Eng. Reprint, 244, says: "Wherever the power of the law rests with respect to the protection of children, it is clear that it ought to exist somewhere; if it be not in this court, where does it exist? Is it an eligible thing that children of all ranks should be placed in this situation—that they shall be in the custody of the father, although, looking at the quantum of allowance which the law can compel the father to provide for them, they may be regarded as in a state little better than that of starvation? The courts of law can enforce the rights of the father, but they are not equal to the office of enforcing the duties of the father. Those duties have been acknowledged in this his Majesty's court for centuries past. Having thus shortly alluded to some of the cases, and referring to the cases themselves for a more large exposition of the grounds upon which this jurisdiction stands, I repeat that I find myself in this seat humbly representing his Majesty, and bound by the settled law of the land. I cannot now retire from the discharge of this duty—I dare not violate the principles which grow out of the practice of the court. My duty is to apply those principles honestly, to look diligently to all the circumstances of the case, and, with judicial integrity (by which must be always meant an integrity of the purest nature), to determine manfully, and manfully to declare what my opinion is."

Again, at page 28 it is said: "I was anxious upon that point for another reason, namely, because, reflecting upon the nature of the jurisdiction as connected with property, it appears to me that whilst the court looks at the duties of the father, it considers those duties as duties that impose upon him thus much,—that if he be himself of ability to maintain the children (be their fortunes what they may), and to provide for them according to their expectations, it says, 'You shall provide for them out of your own means, and not encroach upon the property of the children.' What does the court do further with respect to the maintenance of children in a certain class of society? Can any court of law do that which this court is in the constant habit of doing, and of doing most usefully for families and the public? In many great families, the eldest infant is in the possession of a large property; the younger infants have some little property; and in such a case the court does not measure the duty of maintaining the eldest child by looking at him only, but it considers that it is for his interest that his brothers and sisters should be brought up in respectable stations; and it says, 'We will go the length of giving them maintenance, or a part of maintenance, out of his provision, as a part of the maintenance made for him, though to be applied to them,'—and upon this ground, that it is for his benefit, not that this portion of his fortune should be saved, but that it should be applied to bringing up his brothers and sisters to such situations as to reflect honor upon him."

In the case of Prather v. Prather, 4 S. C. Eq. (4 Desauss.) 33, the South Carolina court was called upon to deal with a situation analogous to the present case. Bill was filed in this case by a wife who lived separate from her husband, to recover alimony on the ground of ill usage and being turned away by her husband. The defendant demurred to the bill, and the court held that it had jurisdiction and made allowance in proportion to the husband's fortune. At page 35 it is said, after setting out the allegations of the bill: "This bill makes a very shocking case, outrageous to humanity, and disgraceful to civil society. The question then arises: Is there no remedy for such enormous evils? and if there is, where is it to be had? The ecclesiastical courts are the tribunals to whom this delicate trust is committed, in the country from whence we have borrowed our jurisprudence, though in particular cases the court of equity has interposed to give relief, as shall be more particularly noticed hereafter. But there are no ecclesiastical courts in this country which can give relief. It is equally clear that the courts of law cannot give any relief. The nature and constitution of those courts, and their forms of proceeding, render it impossible for them to interfere in such cases. We are brought, then, to this conclusion,—either that these gross injuries must pass without redress, or this court must interpose and give relief. It is shocking to think that such conduct, so inhuman in itself, so injurious to innocent and helpless women, and so mischievous to society, should pass unheeded and unchecked in a civilized country. It is the boast of our jurisprudence that for every wrong there is a remedy, and for every injustice an adequate and salutary redress. But this would be a vain and empty boast, if for such a case as this there was no remedy."

And at page 38, discussing the wife's right, the court said: "She acquires by her marriage, in return for the comfort she brings, the right to maintenance and support, and to a participation in the enjoyment of her husband's property, according to his degree and situation in life, while she demeans herself correctly; and this right she may exercise in an irregular, unsettled, vexatious manner, by running in debt for necessities, upon his deserting her, which he would be compelled to pay. But this is a very uncertain method, and full of inconvenience and productive of constant litigation. Few will trust a woman under such circumstances, when they are sure of not being paid without suits, and the measure is entirely uncertain."

The same may be said with increased emphasis of the condition of the helpless children in the present case. Few would be willing to trust them with a sufficiency for their comfort, if they must depend upon the result of the suit and the consequent uncertainty of the amount to be received, or of receiving anything at all. At page 39 of the case of Prather v. Prather, in 4 S. C. Eq. (4 Desauss.) supra, the court said: "The want of a more specific remedy than can be obtained in the courts of law gives a concurrent jurisdiction to a court of equity in a great variety of cases, as in executory agreements. A court of equity will compel them to be carried into strict execution (unless where it is improper or impossible), instead of giving damages for non-performance. So, too, in questions that may be tried at law in a great multiplicity of actions. A court of equity assumes a jurisdiction to prevent the expense and vexation of endless litigation and suits. Now, if the court of equity has concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of law, merely because it can give more ample or complete relief with less litigation, surely it follows that it will be justifiable to interfere where the courts of law can give no relief at all, as is acknowledged in the case under consideration."

In most of the cases dealing with this subject the suit has been brought by the wife, and generally for moneys or credits expended by her for the support of the children. But manifestly the right of action, whoever may bring it, is rooted in the legal obligation of the father for their support, and it is not a right of the wife as such, but it is the right of the children, and the judgment is made to her as the trustee for their benefit. Many of the cases already cited furnish ample authority for the procedure, and the authorities in this state, which I have already cited, show that children may sue for any right which they have, at least in the equity court.

I proceed now to a consideration of the authorities cited in the majority opinion, the principal of which is Huke v. Huke, 44 Mo. App. 308. The basis of this decision, and the only theory upon which it can be upheld on legal reasoning, is that the duty of the father to support his child is a mere moral obligation, as distinguished from a legal obligation. The court said (44 Mo. App. 312): "By the common law of England a father is not bound to support his infant child, in the sense that the obligation has any legal sanction; no action can be maintained against him, without the aid of statute, to compel him to discharge this natural duty. By that law a father is not liable, as upon an implied contract, to a stranger who furnishes necessities for the support of his infant child."

If this statement were true, and if there were no legal obligation on the part of the father to support the child, then the conclusion of the majority would be sound. As is shown above, the overwhelming weight of authority is against this announcement, and as the majority opinion confesses that there is a legal obligation on the part of the father to support the child, this authority does not sustain the reasoning of that opinion. At pages 313, 314, of 44 Mo. App. the Missouri court of appeals said: "But it is suggested, in argument, that this petition is addressed to the chancery powers of the circuit court, and that the Chancellor of England had, in virtue of a delegated authority from the King as parens patriæ, or, as was sometimes said, the father of the fatherless, a power to require a father, having the means, to set apart a fund for the support of his indigent minor child. That court has again and again asserted a species of vice-regal power over the custody and education of children, in virtue of a delegated authority from the King as parens patriæ."

It is settled that a court of equity of this country and of this state has the power that a court of chancery in England had, and represents the state as parens patriæ, exercising the same jurisdiction that the English chancery courts exercise. The judge delivering the opinion in Huke v. Huke, 44 Mo. App. at page 314, after the above recital, said: "In the exercise of that jurisdiction it will appear that the English Court of Chancery went so far as to level orders and decrees against parents and guardians residing in foreign countries,—in France and America,—and that it stood ready to enforce those decrees by imprisoning the defendants in the Fleet, whenever they should set their feet upon the soil in England."

It will be seen from a careful reading of this opinion that the decision would have been otherwise, had the court recognized the duty of a father as a legal duty, instead of a moral duty. There are only a few states in America that agree that a duty is not a legal duty, and Mississippi is not one of those that consider it a mere moral duty. Legal and moral obligations frequently coexist. In such cases the courts will enforce the obligation, and it is a legal duty to enforce them, but the courts will not enforce a mere moral duty. This case of Huke v. Huke has been cited by many textbooks for the proposition that a child cannot sue a parent, and the text-writers in some of the courts have cited it without referring to the reason underlying the decision, and without pointing out the different results which will flow from a recognition of the duty as a legal one. This is the only case which I have found directly holding that proposition. It ought not to prevail in any jurisdiction recognizing the legal obligation of the parent to support the child. The other cases referred to in the majority opinion are not applicable to this suit.

The case of Alling v. Alling, 52 N. J. Eq. 92 et seq., 27 Atl. 655, cited in the majority opinion, in which it was said that a court of chancery has no jurisdiction to compel a parent to support an infant child, was a suit brought by the mother against her only child and daughter, alleging that the mother has been a widow since 1876, and that the daughter was born in 1874. The claim was for support, maintenance, and education furnished by complainant from the time of the death of her husband and until date, and for an order for allowance of support during the minority of the daughter out of the fortune of the infant. The daughter had recently come into a small fortune from two sources, namely, a part of her father's estate, which is in her mother's hands as administratrix, and a part from an uncle, in the hands of her guardian. The funds coming from her father were vested in him before his death under the will of his father, the grandfather of defendant, but were subject to a life estate in the widow of the testator, who died in 1889. Under the will the executor paid the complainant as administratrix about $11,500. Of this sum the complainant is entitled to one third, leaving her daughter, the defendant, less than $8,000. The other fund from her uncle amounted to $6,850. At page 99 of 52 N. J. Eq. of the opinion, it is said in reference to the obligation of parents to support their children: "By begetting them, therefore, they have entered into a voluntary obligation to endeavor, as far as in them lies, that the life which they have bestowed shall be supported and preserved; and thus the children will have a perfect right of receiving maintenance from their parents." This duty and this obligation have been variously modified by the positive laws of civilized countries, but fully recognized by all. Connected with this obligation of maintenance there is a parental privilege. The parent is entitled to the custody and care of the child which he sustains, and to such service as it can render, and he has a right to exercise his own discretion in determining the fitness and necessity of the allowances to be made, and of the support to be furnished to his children, for which he is to be made chargeable."

At page 110, 52 N. J. Eq., it is said: "In looking over the account, I find that the child was maintained in a style which, in my judgment, was quite beyond her pecuniary expectations, and I cannot approve its payment out of her fortune. If the mother chose to support her in such style, I think she must pay a part of the expense from her own income, which was nearly three times that of the child."

The case of Finch v. Finch, 22 Conn. 411, referred to in the majority opinion, is a suit by a wife against her husband on a book debt, after divorce, in which she had been awarded the custody of the children. The suit was for the entire support and education of such children after such decree had been granted. The court held that the entire account could not be recovered. The majority opinion, at page

421, said: "It seems to a majority of the court that the sole obligation of supporting the children, which was thrown upon the husband and father by the state of coverture, is essentially changed, or modified, by the dissolution of the marriage; and now their pecuniary condition and ability may be equal or otherwise. The mother may have ample means, and the father none; and in such case, surely, it would be inequitable to charge the father with the entire maintenance of the children, while they remain in their mother's service, and under her exclusive control; and we do not believe the common law imposes any such obligation."

Two of the judges dissented. It is clear from this case that it is not in point here, and does not sustain the holding of the majority.

In the case of Hewlett v. George, 68 Miss. 703, 13 L.R.A. 682, 9 So. 885, Judge Woods, of this court, said: "The peace of society, and of the families composing society, and a sound public policy, designed to subserve the repose of families and the best interests of society, forbid to the minor child a right to appear in court in the assertion of a claim to civil redress for personal injuries suffered at the hands of the parent. The state, through its criminal laws, will give the minor child protection from parental violence and wrongdoing, and this is all the child can be heard to demand."

This utterance, as applied to the facts of that case, is a correct pronouncement. The facts show a condition that was very grave facing the parents to control their minor daughter, who was guilty of practices that would bring irreparable wrong and shame to her family. She was committed to an insane asylum, and most people would sympathize with the family in the step taken. I apprehend that this court would never hold that a suit by a child against a parent for a permanent injury, wilfully and maliciously inflicted, would not lie.

tinguished judge who wrote the opinion in Hewlett v. George, and I cannot bring my mind to believe that he and his distinguished associates would have held that in no condition could a minor child sue a parent. I think that the true rule is that the parent has a right to exercise reasonable restraint and inflict chastisement for the purpose of correcting a child; and, in the discharge of his duties, while acting within the limits of reason, he has the discretion as to what chastisement and the kind of support he will furnish, and is not to be required to maintain his children in luxury and ease, even though he may have ample means to do so; and that the parent is the judge, within reasonable limits, as to the amount of chastisement that he will inflict, and is not responsible for an error in judgment so long as the facts bring the case within the limits within which reasonable men may differ. The court is not, in such case, to substitute its judgment for that of the parent; but when the father refuses to perform his duties, and makes no effort to supply the needs of his children, then the court, acting as the parens patriæ for the state, looking out for the child's welfare, will, and of right ought to, compel him to do so. The language in Hewlett v. George went beyond the calls of the case.

The state will not rely entirely upon criminal law for the protection of children from neglect and maltreatment by parents for several reasons: First, it is wholly inadequate for that purpose. The children are under the control and restraint of the parents, and have not sufficient intelligence and opportunity to set the criminal law in motion or to attend and prosecute. It is contrary to human nature for them to want to prosecute. It accomplishes nothing for the child, as the placing of parents in jail does not clothe the body, nor satiate the pangs of hunger, nor nourish the body. It does not protect the body from the bleak bites of the wintry winds, nor stay the pangs of starvation. If the parent has to pay a fine, his ability is diminished to that extent. If he is placed in jail, he is not able personally to look after his children, and in either event his resentment is aroused and his anger is enkindled, and the child will suffer more, instead of less, by trying such remedies. If the remedy at law is inadequate, equity ought to take jurisdiction, and it is one of the maxims, both of the common law and of the equity court, that no wrong will be allowed without a remedy. See Broom, Legal Maxims, pp. 191-195; 16 Cyc. 30, 133.

The majority quotes from 29 Cyc. 1614, and on page 1663 says: "It is pointed out that 'actions by children against their parents are not to be encouraged, . . . and a minor child has no right of action against a parent for the tort of the latter.'"

The majority fails to quote that part of Cyc. which quotes from the case of Bird v. Black, 5 La. Ann. 189, where the court said: "Suits of children against parents are not to be encouraged, unless to redress clear and palpable injustice."

I heartily concur in the opinion from Louisiana on the facts there presented.

I cannot concur in the holding that the repose of society would be adversely affected by maintaining the suit in the present case. Any society that can consent to see children neglected by able parents, and whose repose would not be more disturbed by seeing children starved, maimed, and brutally handled, than it would be by seeing the law make the parent fulfil his duties and obligations to his child, at the suit of the child, ought not to be tolerated at all. What philosophy is this, now promulgated, which says that suits in chancery will disturb society when criminal prosecutions of parents by children will not disturb it? What kind of society is it that will be more disturbed by a suit in equity than it will be when the helpless children are allowed to go hungry and unclothed, their vitality so lowered by starvation and exposure as to make them invalids, unable to perform the functions of citizenship, but, on the contrary, make them a burden, and perhaps a menace, to society? If there be such society in existence, it ought to be kicked off the earth, and forced to do its reposing in the abysmal pits of Gehenna, where children do not go.

Bill by or in behalf of child against parent for support.

RAWLINGS v. RAWLINGS (reported herewith) ante, 1259, holding that a child cannot maintain a bill against a parent for the purpose of obtaining a decree for future support, presents a question that has seldom arisen in the courts, the usual form of action being for a judgment for necessities furnished the child, or for a decree for support of the children in a divorce suit, or by criminal proceedings.

The case of Huke v. Huke (1891) 44 Mo. App. 308, holding that a child cannot maintain an action against its father for support and maintenance, is set out in the reported case (RAWLINGS v. RAWLINGS, ante, 1259). It will be observed, as is pointed out in the dissenting opinion in the RAWLINGS CASE, that this decision is based apparently on the theory that the obligation of the parent to support the child is a merely moral one. And there seems to be much force in the view taken in the dissenting opinion referred to that, where a legal right on the part of the child to support by its parents is recognized, the child should not be left without remedy in a court of equity to enforce this obligation.

The view that a child cannot maintain a bill against its parents for support is sustained also by statements of the court in several cases, which were, however, not strictly necessary to the decisions.

Thus, it was said, arguendo, in Alling v. Alling (1893) 52 N. J. Eq. 92, 27 Atl. 655, that "the question of the extent of the duty of a parent to support and maintain an infant child can be raised in this court only when the child has a fortune of its own. This court has no jurisdiction to compel a parent to support an infant child." The suit, however, was by a mother against her daughter, who had recently come into a small fortune, for compensation for maintenance in the past and for an allowance for future support during minority.

And it was said, arguendo, in Footo v. De Poy (1905) 126 Iowa, 366, 68 L.R.A. 302, 106 Am. St. Rep. 365, 102 N. W. 112, that "certainly the law recognizes no right in the child or in the divorced wife to compel him [the father] to set aside the greater part, or indeed, any part, of his estate to provide against such child's future needs. It was to be presumed that if, during his lifetime, his young daughter should present any just claim upon him for her maintenance or education, he would respond thereto in proportion to his ability and her needs; and until he refused to do so, neither she, nor anyone for her, had any right of action against him." The suit, however, was between the children, after the father's death, to set aside a trust agreement made by him in favor of one of the children, on the ground that it was obtained by fraud and duress.

Where a child sought to obtain from a court of equity an order directing the trustee of his mother's estate to pay to him, from time to time, such sums as should be necessary for his support out of the income of an estate devised to her for life, the court in Re Ryder (1844) 11 Paige (N. Y.) 185, 42 Am. Dec. 109, in holding that the child had not such interest either in the income or the principal of the estate as warranted the relief sought, stated that the remedy to compel a parent to furnish necessities for infant children was not by a petition to that court, but that the performance of the duty must be enforced by a proceeding under the statute by an application to the general sessions for an order upon the parent for the support of his child; or, a stranger might, under certain circumstances, furnish necessities for the child and recover compensation therefor from the parent.

On the other hand, adult, dependent children were held in Paxton v. Paxton (1907) 150 Cal. 667, 89 Pac. 1083, entitled to enforce in equity the obligation imposed by statute on the parents of any poor person unable to maintain themselves by work, to maintain such persons to the extent of their ability. In this case a son who had attained his majority brought an action against his parents for support, on the ground that he was an invalid, totally blind, was a poor person and unable to maintain himself by work. The statute provided: "It is the duty of the father, the mother, and the children of any poor person who is unable to maintain himself by work to maintain such person to the extent of their ability." It was held that a court of equity had jurisdiction to enforce this statute, no other remedy being provided by statute, and that the court had power to make orders necessary for maintenance of the action, including orders for suit money, counsel fees, and maintenance pendente lite. The court said: "It will be observed that § 206 of the Civil Code does not provide any procedure or machinery for enforcing its provisions, and no special procedure is prescribed elsewhere. On account of this absence of procedure appellant contends that there is no method by which § 206 can be judicially enforced. According to this contention said section is merely an ornamental enunciation of a moral principle which ought to be observed by good people under the circumstances referred to in the section, but is not a law in the sense of a rule of action which such people are legally bound to obey. We do not think that this conclusion is maintainable." And the court referred to the principle that where a right exists, and there is no adequate legal remedy, equity will take jurisdiction. It was further said: "It is true that courts have not generally undertaken to enforce the obligations of parents to maintain their infant children. Indeed, in England, under the common law, the maintenance of minor children was considered merely a moral obligation not enforceable at law. It was generally there held that an action against the parent for necessities furnished the child could not be maintained. This view has also been taken in some American decisions; although in others the other, and we think the better, rule has been declared that an action for necessities against a parent is maintainable. . . . It is probable that these later decisions rest on the proposition that the obligation is only a moral one, but that this moral obligation is a good consideration for the furnishing of necessities, and a sufficient foundation for an action to recover for necessities which have been actually furnished, although no sufficient foundation for a decree for future maintenance. But in the case at bar we are not concerned with moral obligations. Statutory law does not deal with mere moral obligations. When it declares a duty or a right it means a legal duty or right. Section 206 of the Civil Code is a part of the substantive law of the land, and establishes and declares a legal duty of the parent to maintain their children who are within its provisions, and establishes the right in such children to have such maintenance. As the duty runs to the children, the latter are the persons to whom the right imposed by the duty accrues; and they are the proper parties to an action to enforce such right and compel the performance of such duty."

It was held also in Paxton v. Paxton (Cal.) supra, that a court of equity, in a suit by a child against its parents to enforce the statutory obligation above referred to, might reserve in the judgment the power to modify it in the event that changed conditions in the future demanded a modification, so as to meet the objection that, because of a change of circumstances, the child might become financially able to care for himself or the parents become financially unable to comply with the judgment. v.
STATE OF WISCONSIN.

(— Wis. —, 174 N. W. 913.)

Perjury — verification of pleading.

1. The verification of a pleading is within the operation of a statute providing punishment for anyone who, being lawfully required to depose the truth on his oath, shall wilfully and corruptly swear falsely to any matter or thing respecting which such oath is by law authorized or required.

Evidence — pleading — use in criminal cases.

2. A statutory provision that no pleading can be used in a criminal prosecution against the party as evidence of a fact admitted or alleged in such pleading does not prevent the admission in evidence in a prosecution for perjury of a pleading having a wilfully false verification on which the prosecution is founded.

— handwriting — copies made at instance of court commissioner.

3. Upon prosecution for perjury in verifying a petition to set aside a mortgage foreclosure, based on payment as evidenced by an alleged forged receipt, evidence is admissible of copies of the receipt made by petitioner upon direction of a court commissioner, as a basis for comparison by handwriting experts.

Perjury — trial — instruction — assumption of proof.

4. An instruction in a prosecution for perjury in verifying a false petition in a law action that there is no question but that the oath was administered legally in the legal proceedings, and that all the elements of perjury, so far as the court and officers administering the oath are concerned, are proven, does not convey the idea that all the facts necessary to prove the crime of perjury are proven.

ERROR to the Municipal Court for Milwaukee County (Clementson, J.) to review a judgment convicting defendant of perjury. Affirmed.

Statement by Siebecker, J.:

Plaintiff in error (defendant) was tried and convicted of perjury, and brings error to reverse this judgment.

On December 30, 1892, defendant and his wife, Wilhelmina Lappley, borrowed from George Hook, the complainant and plaintiff in the mortgage foreclosure proceeding out of which this action arose, the sum of $800, giving their note for that amount. At the same time a real estate mortgage securing the payment of the note was given to George Hook and signed by Charles Lappley and Wilhelmina Lappley, dated December 30, 1892. The complainant George Hook testifies that the note was never paid; that no claim was ever made by the defendant that the note was paid until some time in July, 1914, after foreclosure proceedings had been commenced and when the defendant asked for an extension of time from the complainant's attorney. The defendant admits paying interest on the note up to the year 1914, but claims that he discovered in July of that year that the note had been paid on June 30, 1900, by his wife. The wife became insane shortly after that date, and was committed to an insane asylum in October, 1900. He admits that she experienced lucid periods up to the time of her death in 1918, and that he conversed with her in regard to business matters a number of times, but claims that she never told him of having paid the note in 1900, and that he knew nothing of the matter until he found a receipt bearing the date June 30, 1900, signed by George H. Hook. Mr. Hook denied that the receipt, either signature or body, is in his handwriting, or that he had written it, or that it was in the handwriting of his wife or his children or anyone employed as his agent.

On January 30, 1915, the plaintiff, Mr. Hook, was awarded judgment in the foreclosure proceeding against the defendant, which judgment was entered on the same day. On January 16, 1916, defendant instituted a proceeding in connection with the foreclosure action, by verified petition, setting up the alleged receipt and payment of the note, and praying that the foreclosure judgment be vacated and set aside. By stipulation this motion was dismissed upon its merits, and on September 26, 1918, the defendant commenced a civil action by swearing to a complaint which is the basis for this prosecution for perjury. This civil action is based upon the same alleged receipt from George Hook. On October 5, 1918, this criminal action of perjury against Charles Lapple was commenced.

The case was tried before the court and a jury, and the defendant was found guilty. He was sentenced to serve a term of three years in the house of correction of Milwaukee county, which judgment he now seeks to reverse.

Messrs. Gugel & Kline, for plaintiff in error:

The action is not one in which the crime of perjury can be committed by the verification of a pleading, and a verdict should have been directed for the defendant.

A charge directing a conviction is not proper, where the evidence upon any material question of fact is conflicting or doubtful, where the incriminating evidence is wholly circumstan-

Lam Yee v. State, 132 Wis. 527, 112 N. W. 425; Van Haltren v. State, 142 Wis. 143, 124 N. W. 1039.

Siebecker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended that the perjury charged in the information does not constitute a crime within the provisions of § 4471, Stat., upon the ground that perjury cannot be committed in verifying a pleading. The statutes provide: "Any person, being lawfully required to depose the truth, on his oath, . . . legally administered, who shall wilfully and corruptly swear, . . . to any matter or thing, respecting which such oath . . . is by law authorized or required . . . shall be deemed guilty of the crime of perjury. . . ."

No claim is made that the oath was not administered by an officer, as charged. But it is argued that the verification by defendant of his complaint as a pleading in the civil action on which the charge is predicated was a wholly immaterial oath within the contemplation of the Perjury Statute, because under § 2665 pleadings may or may not be verified, and, whether verified or not, the facts therein stated to which defendant swore do not, by operation of law, make such oath a material matter or thing in such action. This claim wholly disregards the terms and significance of § 4471. A complaint in a civil verification of pleading.

action pending in a court having jurisdiction to hear the cause is a material matter in the proceeding, and an oath verifying it is one in regard to a matter before a court, and is authorized by law. The facts of this case show that the verification by defendant of this complaint in question will, in law, sustain a prosecution for perjury under our statute, if the defendant wilfully and falsely and corruptly swore to the material facts stated therein. Com. v. Kimball, 108 Mass. 473; Jones v. Ludlum, 74 N. Y. 61; McClain, Crim. Law, § 859; People v. Christopher, 4 Hun, 805; Taylor v. Robinson, 26 Wis. 545.

It is claimed that the court erred in admitting the complaint and the verification thereof, on which the charge of perjury is predicated, as evidence in this criminal prosecution. The point is made that the provision of § 2665, Stat., makes it incompetent. The provision relied on reads: "And no pleading can be used in a criminal prosecution against the party, as evidence of a fact admitted or alleged in such pleading."

The complaint was not received as "evidence of a fact admitted or alleged," but was received to show that it was a verified pleading and that defendant swore that the facts stated therein were true. Proof of the truth or the falsity of the facts thus sworn to in the complaint was required to be made by evidence other than by the contents of the complaint. Such use of the complaint is using it as evidence to show that the defendant did depose to the truth, on his oath, of the material matters therein stated in a proceeding before a court. An exception is urged to the reception in evidence of the alleged forged receipt in connection with copies thereof that the defendant had made at the direction of the court commissioner in an adverse examination of him under § 4096, Stat., in a proceeding to vacate the judgment of foreclosure in the action of Hook v. Lapple. The defendant was there required to produce the alleged forged receipt showing payment of the mortgage, and upon its production he was directed by the commissioner to make copies of the receipt in the presence of the commissioner and counsel. These copies were offered in evidence, and used as the genuine handwriting of the defendant in the trial of this criminal action, and were so used and submitted to the witness called as an expert on handwriting, and were submitted to the jury. We discover no error in so receiving and using these copies, nor was it error for the court to receive the expert's opinion as to the similarity of the handwriting of these copies and the alleged forged receipt. We think the expert was properly held by the court to be qualified to give his opinion in the matters elicited from him.

An objection is urged to the following instruction given the jury: "There is no question but what the oath was administered properly in a legal proceeding by an officer authorized to administer it, and that all the elements of perjury, so far as the court and officer administering the oath and the character of the proceeding in which it was administered is required—every such requirement is indisputably proved by the evidence of the case."

It is averred that this instruction conveyed the idea to the jury that all the facts necessary to prove the crime of perjury charged were undisputed. We cannot so regard the instruction. It is plainly limited to refer to certain material facts as undisputed in the case, and the record sustains the court in this assumption.

Perjury—trial—
assumption of proof.

It is, therefore, not an objectionable instruction in view of the evidence in the case. Furthermore, the court fully brought to the attention of the jury, in clear and explicit terms, the other issues of fact which were required to determine upon the evidence in the case and to justify them in finding the defendant guilty of the crime charged.

Appeal—statement that facts are proven.

It is not error to state to the jury that certain material facts are proven beyond controversy, when they are established by the undisputed evidence. Cupps v. State, 120 Wis. 504, 102 Am. St. Rep. 996, 97 N. W. 210, 98 N. W. 546.

We have examined the exceptions called to our attention, and find no reversible error in the record. The defendant had a fair and legal trial, and the conviction must stand.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Perjury in verifying pleadings.

It seemingly is well settled that one who wilfully swears to a pleading in chancery, knowing it to contain false statements as to material facts, thereby commits perjury, provided the pleading was one which he was legally bound to verify by oath. The following authorities support this rule: Com. v. Warden (1846) 11 Met. (Mass.) 406; Com. v. Kimball (1871) 108 Mass. 473; People v. McCaffrey (1889) 75 Mich. 115, 42 N. W. 681; State v. Luper (1908) — Or. —, 95 Pac. 811; Rex v. Morris (1761) 2 Burr. 1189, 97 Eng. Reprint, 781; Rex v. Morris (1761) 1 Leach, C. L. (Eng.) 50; Rex v. Benson (1810) 2 Campb. (Eng.) 508; Reg. v. Yates (1841) Car. & M. (Eng.) 132, 5 Jur. 636. And see the dictum in Jones v. Ludlum (1878) 74 N. Y. 61, to the effect that a party can be held responsible for a general denial in an answer made under oath in a proceeding in equity upon an indictment for perjury, in case of its falsehood.

This rule has been applied to an oath to a false answer to a bill of discovery (Com. v. Warden (Mass.) supra); a petition for a supersedeas of an execution, sought to be annulled by a writ of audita querela (Com. v. Kimball (1871) 108 Mass. 473); a wilfully false answer to a bill seeking to enjoin the suing out of an execution on a judgment (Reg. v. Yates (Eng.) supra); to a bill for divorce to which the statute required that an oath be taken (People v. McCaffrey (1889) 75 Mich. 115, 42 N. W. 681; State v. Luper (1908) — Or. —, 95 Pac. 811); to an answer to a bill in chancery, seeking to establish an equity in the property of a bankrupt (Rex v. Benson (1810) 2 Campb. (Eng.) 508; and to an answer to a bill in chancery, the nature of which was not reported

And a similar rule to that supported by the preceding cases has been laid down with respect to cases on the law side of the court. This was the effect of the decision in the reported case (LAPPLEY v. STATE, ante, 1279). And in People v. Christopher (1875) 4 Hun (N. Y.) 805, it was held that perjury could be predicated on a verification of an answer to a complaint upon a promissory note, where such answer contained positive, but false, assertions of facts which, if true, would have constituted a defense to the note, and which, therefore, were material. And again in State v. Roberts (1851) 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 589, it was held that perjury could be assigned upon a false oath on a plea of non est factum to a suit on a note, the oath to the plea having been required by statute.

And falsely swearing to a complaint charging a crime, before a magistrate having jurisdiction of such a crime, has been held to constitute perjury, since such complaint inaugurated the prosecution. People v. John (1902) 137 Cal. 220, 69 Pac. 1063.

And in Alabama it has been held that a false oath given in swearing to a petition for letters of administration before the probate court constitutes perjury. Cowan v. State (1916) 15 Ala. 87, 72 So. 578.

And that a false oath as to matters contained in a petition in insolvency may constitute perjury, see People v. Maxwell (1897) 118 Cal. 50, 50 Pac. 18.

And see dictum in Taylor v. Robinson (1870) 26 Wis. 545, to the effect that an attorney falsely verifying a complaint, in an action brought to recover a balance due on an account for goods and merchandise sold, may be convicted of perjury.

On the other hand, however, it is well established that where the pleading is of a character which the law does not require shall be verified by oath, perjury cannot be assigned upon a false oath made in verifying such a pleading. People v. Gaige (1872) 26 Mich. 30; Beecher v. Anderson (1881) 45 Mich. 543, 8 N. W. 539; Silver v. State (1848) 17 Ohio, 365.

Nor can a charge of perjury be based on a false oath relating to matters which are irrelevant or immaterial. Rex v. Benesech (1796) Peake, N. P. Add. Cas. (Eng.) 93; Rex v. Dunstan (1824) Ryan & M. (Eng.) 109. And see People v. Christopher (1875) 4 Hun (N. Y.) 805, wherein it was held that no perjury was committed in the verification of an answer interposed in an action brought upon a promissory note, which answer contained no direct and positive denial, or matter material to the issue to be tried.

In case the matter to which the oath relates is immaterial or irrelevant, or the law does not require verification by oath, an oath is wholly immaterial and extrajudicial, and serves no purpose whatever. People v. Gaige (Mich.) supra. In fact, it does not change the rule that the falsity of the oath was wilful, even though it related to material facts, the test being whether the oath itself was material. Beecher v. Anderson (1881) 45 Mich. 543, 8 N. W. 539, supra. In this case, the court, in construing the common-law rule that perjury is committed "when a lawful oath is administered in some judicial proceeding, to a person who swears wilfully, absolutely, and falsely, in a matter material to the issue or point in question," said: "By this is meant that the oath must be material. The facts sworn to may be material, and yet the false swearing be no perjury because the oath performed no office in the case, and was wholly unimportant and immaterial. . . . It does not appear from the complaint [habeas corpus proceedings] that the answer was to be used for any purpose for which an oath to it could be of any importance. So far as appears, therefore, the oath of W. [the accused] to the answer was wholly an idle ceremony. The answer was no better with it than without it; it affected the issue in no manner whatever; it strengthened no statement made by the answer, and it made no statement evidence that would not have been evidence without it, and gave no statement weight or force that it would not otherwise have possessed. As an information the complaint would, therefore, have been fatally defective." And in Silver v. State (Ohio) supra, in holding that an affidavit of the truth of an answer in equity did not constitute ground for a charge of perjury where the bill did not call for an answer under oath, the court said: "To constitute perjury, the oath or affirmation must be material or be required by, or have some effect in, law. Under the late act, an affidavit of the truth of an answer in chancery has no legal effect unless the bill expressly calls for such answer on oath. Unless called for on oath, the affidavit of the truth of the answer is wholly immaterial; it neither benefits the respondent nor injures the complainant. The answer has the same effect, and nothing more, that it would have had, had it not been sworn to. Hence to assign perjury upon an answer in chancery, the indictment should aver that the bill called for an answer under oath."

In People v. Gaige (1872) 26 Mich. 30, it was held that an information for perjury, alleged to have been committed in swearing to a bill in equity, was insufficient both at common law and under a statute which required verification by oath only when the bill was one which did not ask that any preliminary injunction or other order be based on the verification, the information not showing in any way that the bill was of a character required by law to be verified by oath. It was further held in this case that an allegation in the information that the defendant was "lawfully required to declare and depose the truth" in the proceeding in equity was insufficient, at least, when the oath was not taken upon the trial to show that a verification by oath was either "required or authorized by law." And in Beecher v. Anderson (1881) 45 Mich. 543, 8

N. W. 539, where the court arrived at a similar conclusion, the accused, the general manager of a corporation, swore to the answer of the corporation to a bill in equity, instead of attesting it by the corporate seal. G. J. C.

1. Upon the question whether or not a hand on a corn shredder is engaged in farm labor within the exception of the Workmen's Compensation Act, the further question, whether or not, as between his employer and the one for whom the work was being done, the employer was an independent contractor, is immaterial.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court of Grinnell (Norris, J.) sustaining a motion to strike certain parts of the amended petition and a motion for a more specific statement, in a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while in the employ of defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Ross R. Mowry, Harold L. Beyer, and M. R. Hammer, Jr., for appellant.

Mr. J. H. Patton for appellee.

Preston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There was a motion to strike parts of the original petition and for more specific statement, which was sustained in part and overruled in part, and thereafter an amendment to petition was filed, and defendant filed a demurrer to the petition as amended, setting up twenty grounds or more, and the demurrer was sustained. Thereafter, a substituted petition was filed, and it is conceded by both sides that the only questions presented on this appeal are in regard to the rulings of the trial court on defendant's motion to strike certain parts of the substituted petition, and on the motion for more specific statement.

The substance of the allegations in the substituted petition is that, about November 13, 1914, defendant was the owner of a certain corn shredder and other appurtenances thereto belonging, and was engaged as an independent contractor in the business of operating said corn-shredding machine for profit; that, while the defendant was engaged in operating said corn shredder for one Swaney on said Swaney's farm in Poweshiek county, Iowa, the plaintiff, while in the employ of the defendant and engaged in operating said shredder, was injured by his hand being caught therein, and the thumb of his right hand was cut and his hand was otherwise injured; that the plaintiff, at the time he received the injury, was operating said shredder under the immediate direction of the defendant, and in the presence of the defendant; that, as a result of said injury, plaintiff's right hand was seriously and permanently injured, and he has suffered intense pain and anguish, both physical and mental, and has been, and will be, partially incapacitated for work; that he has incurred expense for medicine, nursing, and for physician; that at the time of the injury he was an able-bodied man, engaged in the occupation of an engineer and general laborer, receiving, on an average, $18 per week as compensation for his labor; that said injury was not intentional on the part of plaintiff, or the result of intoxication on his part. The damages claimed are particularly set out. It is then alleged "that the defendant, at the time of the accident to the plaintiff resulting in the injury of the plaintiff, had not insured his liability, under chap. 147 of the laws of the thirty-fifth general assembly of the state of Iowa, in any corporation, association, or organization approved by the state department to such insurance department, satisfactory to the insurance department and Iowa industrial commissioner of his solvency and financial ability to pay the compensation and benefits as by such act provided, and to make such payments to the parties entitled thereto; nor had the defendant deposited with such insurance department and the Iowa industrial commissioner security satisfactory to such insurance department and the Iowa industrial commissioner as would secure the payment of such compensation."

He asks damages in the sum of $10,000.

Defendant moved to strike that part of the petition in which it was alleged that defendant was an independent contractor, and for profit, but this was overruled. The defendant also moved to strike that part of the petition alleging that defendant had not insured his liability under chap. 147 of the acts of the thirty-fifth general assembly, and that he had not deposited security with the insurance department, for the reason that the same is immaterial and redundant matter and surplusage, it appearing on the face of the substituted petition that plaintiff, at the time the alleged injuries were sustained, was a laborer engaged in an agricultural pursuit, and within the exception of § 1, chap. 147, Acts Thirty-fifth General Assembly (Code Supp. 1913, § 2477—

m). This ground of the motion was sustained.

As a part of the motion, appellee moved for a more specific statement, upon the following grounds, among others: (3) Let him be required to state whether or not negligence in the premises by the defendant was the proximate cause of the alleged injury to plaintiff, and, if he alleges that it was, let him be required to state in what respect or particular, and in what manner, the defendant was negligent in the premises. (4) Let him be required to state whether or not the plaintiff was free from contributory negligence. These two grounds of the motion were sustained. It will be observed that it is not alleged in the petition that defendant was guilty of negligence, nor that plaintiff was free from contributory negligence. It is not claimed by appellant that the allegations of his petition would entitle him to recover as for negligence at common law. But he does claim that he has brought himself within the Workmen's Compensation Act, while defendant's contention is that plaintiff is within the exception contained in the act, which provides: ". . . But this act shall not apply to any household or domestic servant, farm or other laborer engaged in agricultural pursuits," etc.

It does not appear from the record, but seems to be conceded in argument, that neither the employer nor the employee had given notice of an election to accept or reject the terms of the Compensation Act; that appellee, as an employer of labor, did not give notice in writing to his employees of an election not to provide, secure, and pay compensation under said act to employees for injuries sustained, arising out of and in course of the employment, by posting said notice or by filing same with the industrial commissioner.

Incidentally, the issue is raised, and there is some argument upon the point, as to whether or not appellee rejected the Workmen's Compensation Act by failing to insure his liability thereunder or by failing to deposit security, and thus brought himself within the provisions of said Workmen's Compensation Act. Appellant contends that appellee, not having insured his liability as required by the provisions of the Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Act, as contained in § 2477-m41, Code Supp. 1913, was liable in the instant case for the injury of appellant, under part 1 of the act, to the same extent as though he had rejected the provisions of the act. And the inquiry, as appellee puts it, is whether, by such failure or omission, he rejected the act, and whether he is, by reason thereof, deprived of the common-law defenses of assumption of risk, contributory negligence, etc. It is said in argument that, if this question has not already been raised and decided, the opinion of this court upon this phase of the matter will doubtless be helpful to the profession as a whole, in dealing with the Workmen's Compensation Act in the future. But, as we shall see in a moment, we think the question is not in the case, and it will be time enough to decide the point when it is properly raised, and we have argument upon that point. It is doubtful whether the question is raised by the pleadings, but if it is, the argument is limited to two questions, and they are: Whether the rights of the parties are affected by the claim that defendant was an independent contractor, and whether or not plaintiff was engaged in agricultural pursuits, and thus comes within the exception to the statute. If the fact that defendant, as between himself and Swaney, was an independent contractor, is not material, then the question presented is narrowed still further to the one question as to whether or not plaintiff was engaged in agricultural pursuits.

One of the assignments of error is that the lower court erred in striking from appellant's substituted petition the paragraph averring that the appellee had not insured his liability under the Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Act, for the reason that the appellee, in operating the corn shredder as an independent contractor for profit, was not engaged in agricultural pursuits. In support of this, they cite §§ 2477-m and 2477-m41, Code Supp. 1913; Hunter v. Colfax Consol. Coal Co. 175 Iowa, 245, L.R.A.1917D, 15, 154 N. W. 1037, 157 N. W. 145, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 803, 11 N. C. C. A. 886. They put it another way, and they concede in argument that "if the appellee, in operating said corn shredder, was engaged in agricultural pursuits, and the appellant was employed by appellee as a farm or other laborer engaged in agricultural pursuits, then the trial court was right in sustaining appellee's motion to strike and for more specific statement. If not, the lower court was in error."

Appellee makes substantially the same concession. He contends that appellant, at the time his alleged injuries were sustained, was a laborer engaged in an agricultural pursuit, and he sustained said injuries while engaged in an agricultural pursuit as a farm laborer, and that the other points must stand or fall with this, and that, if this point is sustained, then the rulings of the lower court as to the other points are correct.

Before taking up these two points, it should be said that in the assignment of errors appellant complains that the court erred in sustaining the motion for more specific statement, requiring plaintiff to state whether defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, and to state the manner in which appellee was negligent, and in requiring plaintiff to state whether he was free from contributory negligence. He calls attention again to § 2477-m, which provides, among other things: "In actions by an employee against an employer for personal injury sustained arising out of and in the course of the employment where the employer has elected to reject the provisions of this act, it shall be presumed that the injury to the employee was the direct result and growing out of the negligence of the employer; and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury; and in such cases the burden of proof shall rest upon the employer to rebut the presumption of negligence."

We do not quite understand the theory of the trial court as to the rulings on the motion for more specific statement. It may be that the parties were themselves in doubt as to how to proceed under this new law. But if the ruling of the court on the motion for more specific statement is erroneous, it is without prejudice to plaintiff, if the holding here is against his contention on the two points relied upon, which have been before stated. If the trial court was of opinion that defendant was within the exception to the statute, because a farm laborer, it would have been proper for the court to require plaintiff to allege negligence of the defendant and that plaintiff was free from contributory negligence, if plaintiff was seeking to recover at common law, independently of the statute; but such was not the case. If, as we hold, plaintiff comes within the exception to the statute, no prejudice could result to him from the ruling sustaining the motion to make the petition more specific, because plaintiff could not recover under the Compensation Act; and this is so, whether defendant had rejected the provisions of the act or not. If plaintiff should now seek to recover independently of the act, it would be necessary that he allege negligence of the defendant and his own freedom from contributory negligence; so that, in either event, the ruling at this point is without prejudice. We shall now take up the two points relied upon. No authorities are cited by either side on these points, except the statutes before set out and the Hunter Case.

1. As to plaintiff's claim that the defendant was an independent con-

Pleading—requiring more specific allegation—absence

tractor, we think the petition pleads only a conclusion that defendant was an independent contractor. An independent contractor has been defined or described as one who, exercising an independent employment, contracts to do work according to his own method, without being subject to the control of his employer except as to the result of the work. Bodwell v. Webster, 98 Neb. 664, 154 N. W. 229, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 624.

The facts as stated in the petition do not show that the defendant was an independent contractor within this definition, but, as said, it is stated as a general conclusion that he was such. But this point is not made by appellee, so that we should not, perhaps, consider the question. We think that, under the circumstances of this case, it is not material that, as between the defendant and Swaney, defendant was an independent contractor.

If defendant was seeking to recover from Swaney, then the question might be material as bearing on the question as to whether, being an independent contractor, he was a laborer or employee. Or, if plaintiff was seeking to recover from Swaney, the question as to whether defendant Horn was an independent contractor might be material on the question as to whether plaintiff was an employee of Swaney's. Even though defendant Horn was an independent contractor as between himself and Swaney, defendant Horn could be engaged in an agricultural pursuit, and if so, plaintiff, Horn's employee, could be so engaged. It appears to us that it is not so much a question as to the relations between defendant Horn and Swaney, as it is between plaintiff and the defendant; that is, whether the relation of master and servant, or employer and employee, existed. As stated, plaintiff alleges that he was in the employ of defendant. If he was an independent contractor, such relation would, of course, not exist. There is no claim, as between plaintiff and defendant, that plaintiff is an independent contractor. It is alleged in the petition, and admitted by the demurrer, that at the time of the injury complained of plaintiff was in the employ of defendant, engaged in the occupation of an engineer and general laborer, receiving, on an average, $18 per week as compensation for his labor. The question is whether plaintiff, the injured party, was an independent contractor. It has been held that the term "workman" does not include an independent contractor for work wherever done, and that the injured party was not an independent contractor, in a case where many of the elements of the relation appeared, but the employers specially agreed to compensate such person in case of injury by accident. Boyd, Workmen's Comp. § 444.

contractor.

Without further discussion of this question, the following cases may be cited as having a bearing upon the question in regard to independent contractors: See note to Rayner v. Sligh Furniture Co. L.R.A.1916A, 22, at page 118; Thompson v. Twiss, 90 Conn. 444, L.R.A.1916E, 506, 97 Atl. 328; Tuttle v. Embury-Martin Lumber Co. 192 Mich. 885, 158 N. W. 875, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 664.

2. This brings us to the other question relied upon,—and really the only question in the case,—and that is, whether plaintiff was a "farm or other laborer engaged in agricultural pursuits." If so, he is within the exception contained in § 2477-m, Code Supp. 1913, and not within the Compensation Act. It seems to us it is hardly a debatable question. No authorities are cited by either party on this point. The petition alleges that, at the time of his injury, he was engaged as an engineer and laborer in defendant's employ, operating a piece of farm machinery, a corn shredder. In 2 C. J.

982, and Century Dictionary, we find this definition of agricultural: "Pertaining to, connected with, or engaged in agriculture." We also find, at page 988, 2 C. J., that agricultural.

"the term 'agriculture' has been defined to be the 'art or science of cultivating the ground, especially in fields or large quantities, including the preparation of the soil, the planting of seeds, the raising and harvesting of crops, and the rearing, feeding, and management of live stock; tillage, husbandry, and farming.'"

In the last citation, the note cites Dillard v. Webb, 55 Ala. 468, 474, where it is held, as to the comprehensiveness of the term "agriculture:" "The variety of products of the earth, of agricultural implements, and of domestic animals, invited and put on exhibition at agricultural fairs, attests the comprehensiveness of the term 'agriculture.' It refers to the field, or farm, with all its wants, appointments, and products, as horticulture refers to the garden, with its less important, though varied, products."

The note also cites Simons v. Lovell, 7 Heisk. 510, 516, as holding: "It is equivalent to husbandry, and husbandry Webster defines to be the business of a farmer, comprehending agriculture or tillage of the ground, the raising, managing, and fattening of cattle and other domestic animals, the management of the dairy and whatever the land produces."

In Shafer v. Parke, D. & Co. 192 Mich. 577, 159 N. W. 304, it was held that the employee of a company manufacturing drugs, serums, and other pharmaceutical preparations, and maintaining a farm and stock in the preparation of serums, but from which it sold surplus grains, etc., who was employed on the farm to perform ordinary farm labor, and was injured by being kicked by a horse, was a farm laborer, within the Workmen's Compensation Act.

There can be no doubt that shredding corn is a part of carrying on a farm. Swaney could have employed defendant to plow a 40-acre field, and defendant could have employed plaintiff to assist him. The fact that defendant may have agreed to plow the entire field by contract would not change the character of the work, and both he and his assistant would still be engaged in farming operations.

It is our conclusion that, under the allegations of the petition as it now stands, plaintiff has not brought himself within the Compensation Act, but that he is a farm laborer, or other laborer engaged in agricultural pursuits, and within the exception of § 2477-m. This being so, it is not material to his rights that defendant failed to insure his liability or deposit security, and the trial court properly sustained defendant's motion to strike that part of the petition. Since plaintiff does not come within the Compensation Act, he may wish to amend and seek to recover as for negligence at common law, and in that case it will be necessary that he allege the matters which the trial court required him to allege as to defendant's negligence and plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence.

It is our conclusion that the case ought to be, and it is, affirmed.

NOTE.

The application of Workmen's Compensation Acts to employees engaged in farming is considered in the note following MILLER & LUX v. INDUSTRIAL ACCL. COMMISSION, post, 1296.

MILLER & LUX INCORPORATED, Plff. in Certiorari,
v.
INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

(— Cal. —, 178 Pac. 960.)

Workmen's compensation — classified work on farm.

1. The mere fact that because of the great extent and complexity of farming operations on a given ranch, the work of the farmers is classified and each is given a limited rather than a diversified duty, does not make some of them artisans rather than agriculturists within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

— review of finding of Commission.

2. Where the ultimate finding of the Industrial Accident Commission that an injured employee was within the operation of the statute allowing compensation is based on probative facts found by it which fail to establish the ultimate facts found, the court may annul the finding.

— constitutionality of act.

3. The Workmen's Compensation Act is constitutional only because it imposes a charge, not upon the individual employer, but upon the branch of the industry in which he is engaged, and gives the employer opportunity of protecting himself by proper insurance.

— farming — repair of implements.

4. One employed by a farmer to devote his entire time to the repair of farming implements in a shop devoted to such repairs is engaged in farming within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, excluding farming from the operation of the act.

Melvin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of W. V. Fish and against petitioner Miller & Lux Incorporated.

The findings of the Industrial Accident Commission upon which the attack of petitioner's counsel is directed, are as follows:

"(1) That W. V. Fish, hereinafter called the employee, the applicant herein, was injured on the 15th day of December, 1917, at Buttonwillow, Kern county, California, while in the employment of defendant, Miller & Lux Incorporated, hereinafter called the employer, as a wagon maker in a shop operated by the employer for the sole purpose of repairing vehicles and implements used by the employer in its farming operations, the whole time of the employee being given to said occupation.

"(2) That said injury arose out of and in the course of said employment, was proximately caused thereby, and occurred while the employee was performing service growing out of and incidental to the same, as follows: His right hand was caught in a moving planer, the wound becoming infected.

"(3) That at the time of said injury the employee was not engaged in any of the occupations or employments excluded by § 14 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1913 from the provisions of said act, and that said injury was not caused by wilful misconduct or intoxication of the employee."

It is argued by the counsel for respondent that the third finding is conclusive,—that in such cases we cannot go behind the determination of the commissioners upon matters of fact. In this behalf he cites Smith v. Coles [1905] 2 K. B. 827, 93 L. T. N. S. 754, 54 Week. Rep. 81, 22 Times L. R. 5, 75 L. J. K. B. N. S. 16, 8 W. C. C. 116. It is true that in that case, in which the county court judge had found that a carpenter employed about a farm as a handy man was a workman in agriculture, certain of the justices held that, there being evidence to support the finding, they might not upset it, but in the matter at bar the learned commissioners found as a probative fact that the applicant was employed "as a wagon maker in a shop operated by the employer for the sole purpose of repairing vehicles and implements used by the employer in its farming operations, the whole time of the employee being given to said occupation." It is clear, therefore, that the ultimate finding is really based upon the probative facts found, and if they fail to establish the jurisdiction of the Commission, petitioner must succeed. Findings of fact by which the Industrial Accident Commission determines itself clothed with jurisdiction are reviewable by this court. Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35, 9 N. C. C. A. 466. The sole question, therefore, is whether or not a workman whose sole duty is to repair wagons in a shop operated on a farm for the purpose of keeping the agricultural implements and vehicles used on the farm in order is engaged in farm or agricultural labor within the meaning of § 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Stat. 1913, p. 284.

At the threshold of the inquiry we should keep in mind the fact that the Compensation Act is held constitutional only because it imposes a charge, not upon the individual employer, but upon the branch of industry in which he is engaged, and gives the employer opportunity of protecting himself by proper insurance. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 151 Pac. 398, 10 N. C. C. A. 1. The law of California has exempted the farming industry from the operation of this statute, and if a worker upon a farm may be reasonably classified as one engaged in agriculture, his employer is clearly entitled to the benefit of this exemption. While it is true that an employer may be engaged in several sorts of industry, some of them within and some of them without the purview of the Compensation Act, and that an employee may at different times do work of one kind or the other, it is equally a fact that where, from the great extent and complexity of farming operations on a given rancho, the work of the farmers is classified, and each —classified work is given a limited, on farm.

rather than a diversified, duty, that circumstance alone will not make some of them artisans rather than agriculturists. Numerous illustrations suggest themselves. If the mower who stops to use a whetstone on his scythe remains a farmer, is the boy who is set to work sharpening all the farming tools used on the place engaged in an occupation entirely outside of farming? Clearly not. So it has been held that a woodchopper or one removing stumps or brush from a farm is not an artisan within the contemplation of the act. Miller v. Algar, 2 Cal. Industrial Acci. Dec. 558; Martin v. Russian River Fruit & Land Co. 1 Cal. Industrial Acci. Dec. (part 2) p. 18; Whitney v. Peterson, 1 Cal. Industrial Acci. Dec. 306. Commenting upon two of the authorities last cited, this court (all the justices participating) has used the following language: "The Accident Commission has held that a woodchopper engaged in cutting and burning trees in clearing land for farming purposes is engaged in farm labor. Whitney v. Peterson, 1 Cal. Industrial Acci. Dec. 306. It has also been held that when land has been cleared for agriculture, one who operates a saw to cut the wood on the cleared land into suitable lengths for sale is engaged in farm labor. Miller v. Algar, 2 Cal. Industrial Acci. Dec. 584. If Snow had been found to be an employee on the farm who, as part of his duties, was required to repair the tractor, we could not see how he could be adjudged not a farm laborer under those decisions." Maryland Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 748, at page 750, 158 Pac. 1032.

This aspect of the matter has been aptly discussed by the supreme court of New York in the case of Coleman v. Bartholomew, 175 App. Div. 122, 124, 161 N. Y. Supp. 560, 561, as follows: "It was the clear intent of the legislature to exclude farm laborers from the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Law, and it only remains for us to define 'farm laborers.' . . . The common hired man on a farm is required to perform a great variety of work. His duties are not confined to plowing, planting, and harvesting. Tilling the soil and garnering the crops may be the principal work of the farm laborer, but they are by no means his exclusive work. All the multifarious work of operating a farm must be done by somebody; and who is to do it except the farm laborer? It is, of course, necessary to keep the farm machinery in repair,—the reapers, mowers, corn harvesters, sulky plows, wagons, harnesses, etc. It is just as necessary to keep the farm buildings in repair, and occasionally to make small additions to them. This is a part of the routine work of the farm laborer; just as much so as milking the cows, cleaning off the horses, building fences, putting a new point on a plow, doctoring a sick horse, butchering the hogs, greasing the wagons, assisting the threshers, driving the team to market, and innumerable other familiar duties."

In that case the farm laborer was engaged, when injured, in repairing the roof of a barn.

But, at the outset of the argument in his brief, counsel for the Industrial Accident Commission insists that the question before us has been settled in California adversely to petitioner's contention, and cites in that behalf George v. Industrial Acci. Commission, 178 Cal. 733, 174 Pac. 653, and Miller & Lux v. Industrial Accident Commission, 32

Cal. App. 250, 162 Pac. 651. We cannot agree with that view. In the George Case the claimant was found to be engaged in two occupations for the same employee, and his duty at the time of the accident was found to be that of a gardener. This court sustained the Industrial Accident Commission upon the finding that in his capacity as a gardener the applicant might not recover,—a conclusion which supports rather than opposes the argument of petitioner in the matter now before us. The other proceeding dealt with a case in which a man was and had been for many months engaged in the building of a house and was injured while so occupied. The Industrial Accident Commission found that petitioner was engaged in the business of wholesale and retail butcher, wholesale and retail merchandising, farming, horticulture, and real estate dealing. It did not appear that the house which the injured man was helping to build was to be used for any particular sort of fellow workmen. In this state of the record the learned district court of appeal used the following language in the opinion: "We are unable to follow the refinement of the petitioner's reasoning so far as to hold that because the operations of the petitioner are so diversified and extensive as to require regular employment of carpenters in the construction, improvement, and repair of buildings upon the ranch properties, that such artisans when so employed are to be regarded as engaged in farm labor."

In the matter now under discussion there was an entirely different record involving the employment of the workman upon repair of vehicles used in the farming operations of his employer alone.

While the authorities on this branch of the compensation statutes of the various jurisdictions are somewhat in conflict, the weight and the better reasoning support the contention of petitioner that the repairing of farming machinery on the farm, in a shop devoted to such repairs, is an agricultural pursuit, and is one of the employments excluded by provisions similar to § 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance & Safety Act.

In Shafer v. Parke, D. & Co. 192 Mich. 577, 159 N. W. 304, the workman was injured while engaged in caring for horses on a farm. While the farm was one owned by a manufacturer of chemicals and was conducted principally for the production of serums for the laboratory, the supreme court of Michigan held that the injured man was a farm laborer. Respondent's counsel insists that this case supports his contention that the statute does not classify the employee by the ordinary business of his employer, but by the kind of work he, himself, is employed to do. This is only partly true because in determining the class of labor in which an employee is engaged, it is often necessary to take into consideration the work ordinarily done by persons in the kind of business which the employer is conducting. A man repairing broken harness for use on a farm is, in a sense, doing the same sort of work to which he might be assigned in a saddler's shop in town, but that mere fact does not classify him as a person engaged in manufacturing because the custom of farmers, from time immemorial, has been to make minor repairs of that sort. There are good examples of the rule that laborers may be classified as farm workers, although not actually tilling the soil. Such illustrations are to be found in those decisions upon statutes giving to agriculturists liens for their work. A cook for a threshing crew, who asserted a lien as a farm laborer, was held to be entitled to it, as her work contributed directly to the garnering of the crops. Stevenson v. Magill, 35 N. D. 576, L.R.A.1917D, 377, 160 N. W. 700. In Winslow v. Urquhart, 39 Wis. 260, a cook for a logging crew was held to be performing labor in cutting and moving logs; and in Breault v. Archambault, 64 Minn. 420, 58 Am. St. Rep. 545, 67 N. W. 348, a cook for the men in a logging camp and a blacksmith employed to mend the tools and sleds and to shoe the horses used in the logging business were both held to be entitled to liens under a like statute. Our own Industrial Accident Commission of California has decided that a cook employed on a cattle ranch to prepare meals for the workmen was engaged in farm labor and stock raising, and was excluded from the provisions of the Compensation Act. Olsen v. Rogers Development Co. 2 Cal. Industrial Acci. Dec. 560.

In Sylcord v. Horn, 179 Iowa, 936, ante, 1285, 162 N. W. 249, 16 N. C. C. A. 592, it was decided that one assisting in the operation of a corn shredder on a farm is a "laborer engaged in agricultural pursuits."

In State ex rel. Bykle v. District Ct. 140 Minn. 398, L.R.A.1918F, 198, 168 N. W. 130, a man who fell from a harvester upon which he had been making repairs was held to be a "farm laborer," the court following Sylcord v. Horn, supra, and citing without approval White v. Loades, 178 App. Div. 236, 164 N. Y. Supp. 1023, which was a case of a man injured while putting a threshing machine in a barn. While it is declared in the opinion in the case last cited that "a man who is traveling through the country with a machine, and stopping from place to place to thresh out the grain and beans of the farmers for a compensation, is not engaged in farming, and his employees are not farm laborers," compensation seems to have been awarded upon the theory that at the time of the accident the employee was engaged in the "operation of a vehicle," and was thus brought within the scope of the Compensation Statute of New York.

In Vincent v. Taylor Bros. 180 App. Div. 818, 168 N. Y. Supp. 287, a workman connected with a traveling thresher was injured while feeding bundles into that machine on a farm on which his employer had undertaken to do the threshing. The work was found not to be "milling," as the Commission had declared it to be, and the award was therefore set aside. The court held that the facts did not bring the accident under the rule of White v. Loades as to vehicles, but followed that case upon the dictum that the employee was not a farm laborer. However, the case was sent back for further hearing, Mr. Justice Lyon, who prepared the opinion, using the following language: "Whether facts may have been disclosed by the investigation of the Commission which do not appear in the record, but which influenced the deputy commissioner, before whom the proofs were heard, to make the award—for instance, that the employers were in fact engaged in the milling business, and that the threshing was incidental to their acquiring the grain for such business—does not appear, nor has the Commission so found."

Re Boyer, — Ind. App. —, 117 N. E. 507, holds squarely, however, that a man is not a farm laborer who works on a separator that goes from farm to farm, and is operated as an independent business, although the injury was received while the claimant was threshing wheat. The decision really rests upon an analogy between the threshing by an independent contractor and the work of a miller. The following sentence in the opinion illustrates well the fact that the "threshing machine cases" are of small value in deciding the question now before this court: "If farmers generally owned threshing outfits, and were in the habit of threshing their own grain, and the claimant had been employed by the farmer to assist in the work of threshing, and had been injured while doing such work, a more serious question would be presented."

That a farm laborer who assists his employer during the winter in getting out logs cut on the farm is nevertheless a farm laborer when so doing was held in Brockett v.

Mietz, 184 App. Div. 342, 171 N. Y. Supp. 412.

It was held, however, that a country club which cut and sold lumber regularly from a large tract of land owned by it was engaged in logging for pecuniary gain, although the work was incidental to the main business of operating a country club. Uhl v. Hartwood Club, 221 N. Y. 588, 116 N. E. 1000.

From the foregoing it appears, we think, that the great weight of authority, as well as the better reasoning, brings the claimant who was repairing vehicles and implements on the farm within the class of persons excluded from the operation of the Compensation Act because engaged in "farm labor."

The award is annulled.

ANNOTATION.

Workmen's compensation: application to employees engaged in farming.

Farm laborers do not fall within the operation of the great majority of the compensation statutes. In many of these, farm laborers, together with domestic employees and persons engaged in a few other designated employments, are expressly excluded from the act, while other acts are made applicable only to designated employments, which do not ordinarily include farm labor. The present English statute, however, includes farm laborers the same as workmen in other occupations, and in a few of the elective statutes adopted by different states, the farmer and his employees may come within the operation of the act if they so elect.

The exclusion of farm laborers from the operation of the statutes does not render them unconstitutional as class legislation. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury (1915) 170 Cal. 686, 151 Pac. 398; Hunter v. Colfax Consol. Coal Co. (1915) 175 Iowa, 245, L.R.A.1917D, 15, 154 N. W. 1087, 157 N. W. 145, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 808, 11 N. C. C. A. 886; Opinion of Justices (1911) 209 Mass. 607, 96 N. E. 308, 1 N. C. C. A. 557; Mackin v. Detroit-Timkin Axle Co. (1915) 187 Mich. 8, 153 N. W. 49; Mathison v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. (1914) 126 Minn. 286, L.R.A.1916D, 412, 148 N. W. 71, 5 N. C. C. A. 871; Sayles v. Foley (1916) 38 R. I. 484, 96 Atl. 340, 12 N. C. C. A. 949; Middleton v. Texas Power & Light Co. (1916) 108 Tex. 96, 185 S. W. 556, 11 N. C. C. A. 873, affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in (1919) 249 U. S.

The exclusion of farm laborers, together with certain other classes of workmen, from the operation of the Texas act, does not render that act unconstitutional as in violation of the equal protection clause of the Federal Constitution. Middleton v. Texas Power & Light Co. (1919) 249 U. S. 152, 63 L. ed. 527, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 227, affirming the decision of the state supreme court (1916) 108 Tex. 110, 185 S. W. 556, 11 N. C. C. A. 873.

In Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury (Cal.) supra, the court said: "That casual employees form a special class which might fairly be regarded as not requiring the protection of the new law is obvious enough, and is indeed not questioned by the petitioner. A more serious question is presented by the exclusion of employees in the various branches of agricultural pursuits and in domestic service. But here, too, in view of the very liberal rules established by our decisions on the legislative power of classification, it must be held that the lawmaking body might reasonably have found that the conditions of agricultural and of domestic employment were so far different from those surrounding other employments as to justify the limiting of the new compensation law to these other employments."

So, in Mackin v. Detroit-Timkin Axle Co. (1915) 187 Mich. 8, 153 N. W. 49, the court said: "The law is unquestionable that it is within the power of the legislature to classify both employers and employees, if the classification is not fanciful or arbitrary, and for reasons of public policy is based upon substantial distinctions, is germane to the object sought to be accomplished by the act, not limited to existing conditions only, and applies impartially and equally to each member of the class."

In view of the exclusion of farm laborers from the statutes, the question frequently arises as to whether the injured employee was a farm laborer, so as to be outside the protection of the statute.

A man employed on a farm who does all kinds of farm work is a "farm laborer," within the meaning of the Massachusetts statute, and is not within its protection, although the farmer who employs him carries on other business which may be within the statute. Keaney's Case (1914) 217 Mass. 5, 104 N. E. 438, 4 N. C. C. A. 556.

So, a farm laborer who, while in the performance of his duties, was injured in filling an ice house with ice for use on the farm, is a farm laborer, where the ice was being stored for use on the farm and only as incidental to farm purposes. Mullen v. Little (1919) 186 App. Div. 169, 178 N. Y. Supp. 578.

So, too, the work of getting out logs on a farm in the winter time is farm work, and the mere fact that the farmer is going to sell the lumber is immaterial; so that a farm hand injured while engaged in drawing logs for the farmer is excluded from the operation of the New York statute, although lumbering and logging are especially designated as hazardous employments in the statute. Brockett v. Mietz (1918) 184 App. Div. 342, 171 N. Y. Supp. 412.

And the work of spreading manure as fertilizer over farm lands is farming, and consequently is not one of the occupations classified as hazardous within the meaning of the Illinois act, providing that the act shall apply to hazardous employment unless the employer gives notice to the contrary. Seggebruch v. Industrial Commission (1919) 288 Ill. 168, 123 N. E. 276.

But one employed as the keeper of hunting preserves, whose duty it is to apprehend trespassers and to protect wild game from poachers, is not engaged in "farm, dairy, agricultural, viticultural, or horticultural labor, in stock or poultry raising," although the acts of the poachers in hunting, if permitted, would expose domestic animals to the danger of being accidentally shot. O. L. Shafter Estate Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 175 Cal. 522, 166 Pac. 24.

In Maryland Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1918) 178 Cal. 491, 178 Pac. 993, it was held that an employee who stood at night holding a lantern at one end of the field to guide the engineer of a caterpillar engine used to draw a harrow was not engaged in the "operation of farm machinery, nor was he when, the engine having returned, he was placing his lantern on the tool box of the harrow.

In Hackelberry v. Sherwood Land & Cattle Co. (1919) — Cal. App. —, 180 Pac. 37, it was held that the doctrine of assumed risk was abolished by the so-called Roseberry Act of 1911, and that that provision of the act was not repealed by the present act so far as it related to agricultural employees, since this class of employees was expressly excluded from the operation of the present act.

The question has arisen in several cases whether an employee who was engaged in farm work or other excluded employment, and also in another employment, which was within the statute, was entitled to compensation for injuries received while doing agricultural or other excluded work.

Thus, in George v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1918) 178 Cal. 733, 174 Pac. 653, it was held that one employed as a janitor in a school cannot recover compensation for injuries received while he was trimming a tree near the schoolhouse, since such work was "horticultural work" and excluded from the operation of the statute, where the purpose of the trimming was to improve the appearance of the tree, although its unsightly appearance had been caused by a former trimming done for the purpose of increasing the light in the school building.

So, a man employed in two capacities, one that of janitor, which falls within the terms of the California act, and the other as a house and garden laborer, which employment is excluded from the act, cannot recover compensation for an injury received while acting as a gardener in pruning trees, where such pruning has no connection in any way with his work. Kramer v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1916) 31 Cal. App. 673, 161 Pac. 278. The court said: "The New York Compensation Act does not apply to all employees, but to those only engaged in certain occupations there designated as extrahazardous, while the California act applies to all except those designated as being excluded when engaged in certain work."

A man employed on a farm to do the general farm work, including care for horses, who was injured by the kick of a horse while so engaged, is not entitled to compensation under the Michigan act, merely because his employer was engaged in another business as to which he had elected to come in under the act, where he had taken no steps to come within the act so far as the farm operations were concerned. Shafer v. Parke, D. & Co. (1916) 192 Mich. 577, 159 N. W. 304.

So, an employee on a farm who is injured by the kick of a horse is not entitled to compensation, where the employer had not elected to come in under the act, although he might have been engaged elsewhere in another occupation pronounced hazardous by the Illinois act, and as to which occupation he would be presumed to have elected in the absence of affirmative action upon his part. Vaughan's Feed Store v. Simonini (1916) 275 Ill. 477, 114 N. E. 163, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 713, 14 N. C. C. A. 1075.

And see Kaney's Case (1914) 217 Mass. 5, 104 N. E. 438, 4 N. C. C. A. 556, supra.

Whether or not an employee at the time of his injury was engaged in horticultural work or other employment excluded from the operation of the statute is a question of fact to be determined by the Commission, and if supported by any rational view of the evidence, is beyond review by the courts. George v. Industrial Acci. Commission (Cal.) supra.

The repair of farm buildings is part of the routine work of a farm laborer, and such a laborer injured while at work is excluded by the express provisions of the New York act. Thus, a farmer is not liable in compensation for injuries to a workman employed by him to make repairs on his barn, since the farmer was not engaged in structural carpentry or the construction and repair of buildings for pecuniary gain. Coleman v. Bartholomew (1916) 175 App. Div. 122, 161 N. Y. Supp. 560.

So, a workman employed by a farmer to help build a corn crib is not employed in extrahazardous work within the meaning of the Illinois statute, although the statute includes the building of structures, since the legislature could never have intended to call working on every farm structure, no matter how small, extrahazardous employment. Uphoff v. Industrial Bd. (1915) 271 Ill. 312, L.R.A.1916E, 329, 111 N. E. 128, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1, 13 N. C. C. A. 80.

So, in Maryland Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury (1916) 172 Cal. 748, 158 Pac. 1030, in holding that a workman employed to repair a tractor on a farm was not within the provision of the California statute, since he was but a casual employee, the court said: "The Accident Commission has held that a woodchopper engaged in cutting and burning trees in clearing land for farming purposes is engaged in farm labor. Whitney v. Peterson, 1 Cal. Industrial Acci. Dec. 306. It has also been held that, when land has been cleared for agriculture, one who operates a saw to cut the wood on the cleared land into suitable lengths for sale is engaged in farm labor. Miller v. Algar, 2 Cal. Industrial Acci. Dec. 584. If Snow had been found to be an employee on the farm who, as part of his duties, was required to repair the tractor, we could not see how he could be adjudged not a farm laborer under those decisions. But the Industrial Accident Commission has determined that he was engaged for the single purpose of repairing the tractor, and there is basis in the evidence for that decision."

The building of a corn crib cannot be properly classed as the business or occupation of a farmer. Uphoff v. Industrial Bd. (Ill.) supra.

There is a decided conflict of authority as to whether an employee who goes from farm to farm with some portable machinery, such as a threshing machine or ensilage cutter, is, while engaged in that work, within the operation of the statutes.

The New York and Indiana courts have held that an employee of the owner of a threshing outfit, who goes from farm to farm threshing wheat, oats, and other grain for the various farmers, is not a farm or agricultural laborer, outside of the application of the Compensation Acts. White v. Loades (1917) 178 App. Div. 286, 164 N. Y. Supp. 1028; Vincent v. Taylor Bros. (1917) 180 App. Div. 818, 168 N. Y. Supp. 287; Re Boyer (1917), — Ind. App. —, 117 N. E. 507.

Farm laborers are expressly excluded from the New York statute, and the business of threshing grain was not included in the hazardous employments enumerated in that statute when the decisions of the New York courts were handed down. A recovery was allowed, however, in the White Case, because the injury was received while the employee was engaged in operating a vehicle, that is, while putting the threshing machine, which was mounted on wheels, into the barn; in the Vincent Case the employee was injured while feeding bundles of grain into the threshing machine, and the award of compensation was reversed, as not being within the operation of the statute, the court rejecting the contention of the applicant that the operation of a threshing machine was "milling business." In the Boyer Case, the employee was held entitled to an award under the Indiana statute, since that statute applies to occupations generally, not being restricted to specified hazardous occupations, but excluding merely a few designated cases, including "farm or agricultural laborers."

And an ensilage cutter, used to cut feed to fill a silo, to furnish food for cattle kept for dairy purposes, is a feed mill within the express provisions of the Oregon statute, and the operation of such machinery is a hazardous occupation within the meaning of the Oregon statute, although merely incidental to farming. Raney v. State Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 85 Or. 199, 166 Pac. 523. The court said: "Where, however, a person engaged in farming operates for himself and others any machine or agency that the statute has declared brings such employer automatically within the hazardous occupations, unless he has given, in the manner prescribed, notice that he will not be governed by the provisions of the act, he is not immune from making to the State Industrial Accident Commission the small contributions which the law exacts from the product of business of that kind, in order to create a fund, as a partial compensation to the laborers who have been injured by such means."

On the other hand, the Iowa court has held that an applicant must be found to be a "farm or other laborer engaged in agricultural pursuits," expressly excluded from the operation of the Iowa statute, where he was the employee of the owner of a corn shredder, who was engaged in the business of operating the said machine for profit, going from farm to farm. SLYCORD v. HORN (reported herewith) ante, 1285. The court said that no authorities were cited by either party on this point; the decisions of the Indiana and New York cases are subsequent in point of time. The Indiana court in the Boyer Case cites both the

New York and Iowa cases, and expressly adopts the position taken by the New York court.

The Minnesota court has also held that an employee of one who owns a steam thresher, and threshes grain for farmers under contract, is, while employed about the threshing machine, in the course of threshing grain upon a farm, a "farm laborer," and is exempted from the operation of the Compensation Act. State ex rel. Bykle v. District Ct. (1918) 140 Minn. 398, L.R.A.1918F, 198, 168 N. W. 180. The court cites both the New York and Iowa cases, and adopts the position taken by the Iowa court. The court said: "The important question is: What is the nature of the work? The work is done upon a farm. It is done upon farm crops. The purpose of growing the crops is to provide food for consumption or market. Threshing is as necessary in order that the farmer may consume or market the crop as is sowing or harvest. Surely, the man who, years ago, threshed grain with a flail, was doing farm labor, as much as the man who cradled the grain. So is the man who, now, threshes beans with a flail. The fact that more complicated mechanical devices are used in this case does not change the character of the work. Much farm work is done by the use of complicated machinery. There are tractor plows, self-binders, and even combination harvester-threshers by means of which harvesting and threshing are done as one operation. These and other operations may be done for others by one who is able to own the more complicated and expensive machinery. But it is all, nevertheless, farm work, and the employee who does such work is a 'farm laborer' within the meaning of the Compensation Act."

In Jones v. Industrial Commission (1920) — Utah, —, 187 Pac. 833, an employee was held an "agricultural laborer" within the exclusion of the Utah Workmen's Compensation Act where he was employed in connection with a threshing machine bought by several farmers primarily for threshing their own grain, although some custom work was done for other persons during the season.

The original English Act did not apply to agricultural laborers, but was made to apply to such workmen by the Act of 1900. This latter statute is supplanted by the general Act of 1906. There are but few decisions under the Act of 1900 before it was repealed.

Threshing was held to be agricultural work within the meaning of this act. Proctor v. Cumisky (1904) 6 Sc. Sess. Cas. 5th series, 832, 41 Scot. L. R. 636, 12 Scot. L. T. 172.

So, a workman, although a portion of his time was spent in acting as a gamekeeper, might be found to be engaged in agricultural employment within the meaning of the act, where he lent a hand to other duties of a strictly agricultural character. Smith v. Coles [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 327, 54 Week. Rep. 81, 22 Times L. R. 5, 75 L. J. K. B. N. S. 16, 93 L. T. N. S. 754, 8 W. C. C. 116.

But the mere keeping of horses and cutting up hay for them by a hotel proprietor was not agricultural work. Bolt v. Haywood (1903) 114 L. T. Jo. (Eng.) 294, 5 W. C. C. 151.

So, the work of a man hired by a sawmiller to cut down trees and cart them to a sawmill was not forestry. Meally v. McGowan (1902) 4 Sc. Sess. Cas. 5th series, 883, 39 Scot. L. R. 662, 10 Scot. L. T. 145.

A groom looking after horses kept in stables in an inclosed yard was not within the act, since the "land," as used in the act, means open land. Grant v. Ward (1904) 7 W. C. C. (Eng.) 128.

Under the provisions of this act the workman need not be on the premises owned by the employer to be within its protection. Smithers v. Wallis [1903] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 200, 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 57, 67 J. P. 381, 51 Week. Rep. 261, 87 L. T. N. S. 556, 19 Times L. R. 111.

In Krobitzsch v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1919) — Cal. —, 185 Pac. 396, one employed to look after the propagation of the trout for domestic purposes was held not within the provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act "excluding any employee engaged in . . . farm, dairy, agricultural, viticultural, or horticultural labor, in stock or poultry raising," since by the language used the legislature showed an intention to restrict the exclusion to the particular lines specified.

In C. C. Slaughter Cattle Co. v. Pastana (1919) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 217 S. W. 749, it was held that if at the time of the injury an employee of a company engaged in cattle raising, to which farming was incidental, was performing labor for the company in its farming operations, or in furtherance thereof, he would be a farm laborer, and the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act would not apply, but the injured employee in this case was held not engaged in farm labor at the time of his injury, where there was evidence that he was employed to poison ground squirrels, and was going after grain for this purpose.

Lumbering carried on solely to secure a supply of lumber is not forestry or agricultural work within the meaning of the Quebec statute. Pelletier v. Pronovost (1916) Rap. Jud. Quebec 51 C. S. 97; Larocque v. James MacLaren Co. (1916) Rap. Jud. Quebec 51 C. S. 285; Baie St. Paul Lumber Co. v. Tremblay (1914) Rap. Jud. Quebec 25 B. R. 1; Provost v. Tremblay (1915) Rap. Jud. Quebec 48 C. S. 289.

A creamery is not an agricultural industry within the meaning of the Quebec act. Laperreire v. Paquet (1916) Rap. Jud. Quebec 51 C. S. 99.

Workmen's compensation — injury due to curiosity.

1. An injury to one employed to transport articles by boat through the explosion of refuse, which, while awaiting a chance to unload at a wharf, he goes out of mere curiosity to see unloaded by a public scavenger at an adjoining wharf not under his master's control, does not arise out of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

— injury must arise out of employment.

2. To entitle an employee to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, his injury must arise out of the employment as well as in the course of the employment.

3. An injury arises out of the employment, within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, when there is apparent to the rational mind, upon consideration of all the circumstances, a causal connection between the conditions under which the work is required to be performed and the resulting injury.

4. Employees injured by the explosion of refuse which is being dumped by a public scavenger, to the risk of every member of the general public within the zone of the blast, are not entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act if their employment was in no way connected with the handling of the refuse.

CERTIORARI to the Industrial Accident Board to review its decision affirming a decision of the committee of arbitration in favor of claimants in proceedings brought under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for the death of claimant's husband, and for personal injuries sustained by the other claimants while in the employ of the defendant company. Awards set aside.

Statement by Brooke, J.:

These three cases all grow out of the same accident in which Thomas Cennell, husband of Belle Cennell, claimant, lost his life, and claimants Joseph Boissineau and Frank Buvia were injured. The three men were, at the time of the accident, employees of the Oscar Daniels Company. On May 15, 1917, the three men were directed to take thirteen iron mixer wings, weighing about 140 pounds each, from the dock of the Oscar Daniels Company on the fourth lock at Sault Ste. Marie to Brady pier on the river front, where the wings were to be unloaded. The next morning the three men loaded the mixer wings from the dock of the Oscar Daniels Company onto the deck of the launch Ralph T., and proceeded to the Brady pier on the river front for the purpose of unloading them. When they arrived at the pier, they found that the United States buoy tender Clover was moored opposite the point on Brady pier where the Oscar Daniels Company was permitted to unload heavy material for transportation. They moored the Ralph T. a short distance behind or east of the Clover, but opposite the Brady pier. This pier is built of concrete, and is under control of the United States Engineers' Department. Immediately to the east of Brady pier and adjoining it is an old wooden dock. Whether, when moored, the launch

Ralph T. was wholly in front of the concrete pier, or lay partially opposite the wooden dock, is a matter somewhat in dispute in the record. For the purpose of determination, however, the divergence of the testimony upon this point is insignificant. Having moored their boat, Cennell, who was the owner of the Ralph T., ascertained by inquiry that the Clover would soon move out. He told the other two claimants that they would wait the ten or fifteen minutes until the Clover departed. While the three men were awaiting the departure of the Clover, a city scavenger drove upon the wooden dock adjoining the Brady pier, and started to unload some rubbish through a hole in said dock at a point about 60 feet from the face of the dock and about 20 feet east of the east line of Brady pier. The load of rubbish contained a large quantity of dynamite caps. The three men, apparently curious to watch the dumping of the scavenger wagon, walked in the direction of the point where it was being unloaded, and must have reached a point very close to the wagon when an explosion of great violence occurred, resulting in the deaths of one member of the United States Coast Guard, two employees of the city scavenger, and of Thomas Cennell, husband of Belle Cennell, and in the injury of claimants Buvia and Boissineau. Neither the Brady pier nor the wooden dock adjoining was owned or controlled by the Oscar Daniels Company. Liability having been denied by the Oscar Daniels Company, a committee on arbitration heard the matter and rendered a decision in favor of all three claimants, which was later affirmed on appeal to the Industrial Accident Board. Defendants now review said awards in this court.

Brooke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is the contention of appellants:

(1) That the injuries did not arise out of the employment.

(2) That such injuries did not arise in the course of the employment in which claimants were engaged.

We have frequently held that, in order to entitle the injured person to compensation under the act, the injury must arise out of the employment as well as in the course of the employment. Tarpper v. Weston-Moot Co. 200 Mich. 275, L.R.A.1918E, 507, 166 N. W.

587, and cases cited. An injury arises out of the employment when there is apparent to the rational mind, upon consideration of all the circumstances, a causal connection between the conditions under which the work is required to be performed and the resulting injury. McNicol's Case, 215 Mass. 497, L.R.A.1916A, 306, 102 N. E. 697, 4 N. C. C. A. 522. The injury must be the result of one of the risks incident to the employment. Applying these rules to the case under consideration, how can it be said that the employment of Cennell, Boissineau, and Buvia subjected them to the risk of death or injury from which they suffered? Their duties required them to load the mixer wings from defendants' dock on the fourth lock at Sault Ste. Marie, and to transport them to Brady pier and there unload them. Their duty to their master neither required them to, nor warranted them in, wandering from the immediate scene of the contemplated operation and gratifying an idle curiosity. The premises where the accident occurred, and where they had no business, were not under the control of their common master. The scavenger whose possible negligence caused the disaster was a municipal employee. We feel bound to determine, therefore, that the accident causing the injuries did not arise out of the employment. Assuming, however, that the presence of claimants in the vicinity of the scavenger's wagon was justified, which cannot properly be done, then in suffering death and mutilation from the explosion the claimants were subjected to no greater or different risk than that sustained by every member of the general public within the zone of the blast. Three other persons were killed, one totally unconnected with the operation. An injury resulting from a risk common to the general public may not be compensated. Hopkins v. Michigan Sugar Co. 184 Mich. 87, L.R.A.1916A, 310, 150 N. W. 325; Worden v. Commonwealth Power Co. Mich. W. C. Cas. p. 14, July 19, 1916. While the accident in the cases under consideration cannot be treated as "an act of God," as was the one considered in Klawinski v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 185 Mich. 646, L.R.A.1916A, 342, 152 N. W. 213, the argument sustaining the decision in that case is, a fortiori, applicable here. See also Spooner v. Detroit Saturday Night Co. 187 Mich. 125, L.R.A.1916A, 17, 153 N. W. 657, 9 N. C. C. A. 647.

—injury due to curiosity.

The two cases principally relied upon by claimants are Kunze v. Detroit Shade Tree Co. 192 Mich. 435, L.R.A.1917A, 252, 158 N. W. 851, and Haller v. Lansing, 195 Mich. 753, L.R.A.1917E, 324, 162 N. W. 335. Neither is controlling or applicable to the facts in the cases under consideration. In the first case the claimant was injured while in the actual performance of his duties, and in the second case the claimant was injured while within the ambit of his employment, actually upon his master's premises, and using such facilities as his master had provided.

The awards are set aside.

Petition for rehearing denied.

ANNOTATION.

Workmen's compensation: injury through curiosity as arising out of and in the course of employment.

It will be observed that in the reported case (CENNELL v. OSCAR DANIELS Co. ante, 1301) it was decided that an injury to one employed to transport articles by boat, through an explosion of refuse which, while awaiting a chance to unload at a wharf, he had gone out of curiosity to see unloaded by a public scavenger at an adjoining wharf not under his employer's control, did not arise out of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The facts involved present rather a close case, and it would appear that a decision might have been rendered either way.

But one case has been disclosed involving the exact question under consideration (Maronofsky's Case (1920) — Mass. —, 125 N. E. 565), where a workman had been called from his work to a telephone on his employer's premises, and while on his way back to his work he stopped to talk with a fellow workman on matters not connected with the employment, and when so engaged leaned on an iron table and took hold of an electric lamp to enable him to look into a tank, merely for the purpose of satisfying his curiosity, and in so doing received a shock which killed him, it was held that it could not be properly found that the accident arose out of, or in the course of, his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

A few cases involving somewhat similar situations have been considered of sufficient value to warrant their insertion.

In this connection, it may be noted that it is very generally held that, as the Compensation Acts are remedial, they should be liberally construed in harmony with the humane purposes of the act, notwithstanding they are in derogation of the common law. Industrial Commission v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. (1918) — Colo. —, 3 A.L.R. 1336, 174 Pac. 589; Holland-St. Louis Sugar Co. v. Shraluka (1917) — Ind. App. —, 116 N. E. 330; Re Ayers (1918) — Ind. App. —, 118 N. E. 336; Re Betts (1918) — Ind. App. —, 118 N. E. 551; Indian Creek Coal & Min. Co. v. Calvert (1918) — Ind. App. —, 119 N. E. 519; Re Loper (1917) — Ind. App. —, 116 N. E. 324; Brienen v. Wisconsin Pub. Service Co. (1917) 166 Wis. 24, 163 N. W. 182; White v. Industrial Commission (1918) 167 Wis. 483, 167 N. W. 816.

It has been held that a workman who was instructed to get a barge at a wharf, and who, upon going for it, found that he would not be able to get it for sometime because the tide was not right, did not go outside of the course of his employment in attempting to get into a small boat near by, in which he could sit down and watch the tide until it was favorable for him to do his work. May v. Ison [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 41, 110 L. T. N. S. 525, 7 B. W. C. C. 148.

And it has been held that an injury to an employee arose in the course of his employment, where he was employed in a shipping room and was engaged in loading material onto cars, although when he was injured he was not at work, but was waiting for more material to come to be loaded. Dzikowska v. Superior Steel Co. (1918) 259 Pa. 578, L.R.A.1918F, 888, 103 Atl. 351.

It has also been held that it might be found that an injury suffered was by accident arising out of the employment, where the injury was received when the employee was sitting near a fire warming himself while he was waiting for the arrival of some trucks, which it was his duty to oil. *Harrison v. (— Iowa, —, 174 N. W. 331.)

Damages — wrongful death — funeral expenses.

1. The funeral expenses cannot be allowed as such as part of the damages to be recovered by a personal representative for the negligent killing of his intestate, but the item may be considered by the jury in determining the present worth of what he would have accumulated had he been permitted to live out his expectancy.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Wapello County (Cornell, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Gaynor, J.:

This is an action to recover damages resulting from a wrongful act causing death. The only controversy is as to whether or not the administrator of the deceased can recover for funeral expenses. The court held against the defendant on this proposition, and the defendant appeals.

Messrs. Roberts & Webber and Frank T. Roberts for appellant.

Messrs. Jaques, Tisdale, & Jaques, for appellee:

Under the statute the father can recover for funeral expenses of a minor child whose death was caused by negligence.

Gaynor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought by the administratrix of the estate of Pat Brady to recover for injuries causing his death. It is admitted that he came to his death through the negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff included in her claim for damages the sums necessarily expended for funeral expenses, doctor and hospital bills, and introduced evidence as to the same. The necessity for such expenditures, and that the amounts expended are reasonable, is not questioned.

At the conclusion of the evidence the defendant moved "to strike from the record and take from the jury all testimony relating to the matters of funeral expenses, nurse hire, doctor bills, and hospital bills as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not presenting a proper measure of damages." This motion was overruled. Thereupon the plaintiff filed an amendment to her petition claiming $160 for funeral expenses, $15 for doctor bills, $10 for hospital bills, and $15 for church expenses connected with the burial. A motion to strike this amendment was filed and overruled, and exception taken.

Before the argument was begun, the defendant asked the court to withdraw from the jury all evidence relative to funeral expenses, hospital and doctor bills, the same not being within the nature of damages which the law authorizes in cases of this kind. This request was refused, and the refusal excepted to by the defendant.

Thereupon the court gave the jury the following instruction: "If, under the evidence and the instructions given, you should find for the plaintiff, you will then proceed to determine from the evidence the amount of her recovery herein. The measure of such recovery, if any, will be the present worth or value of the estate which deceased would reasonably be expected to have saved and accumulated, if he had been permitted to live out the natural term of his life. The measure of recovery, in cases of this character, is the amount estimated at its present worth which, under all the circumstances disclosed in the evidence, you believe would have been added to the estate which he left at the end of his natural life. Also, such amount as you find from the evidence to be the reasonable funeral expenses, doctor's bill, and hospital bills, not exceeding the amount claimed for such funeral expense, doctor's and hospital bills."

To this instruction proper exceptions were taken.

With this instruction the court submitted the following special interrogatories:

(1) What amount, if anything, do you find that the deceased, Pat Brady, would reasonably be expected to have saved and accumulated had he lived out his natural life? A. $500.

(2) What was the actual amount of the funeral expenses of the deceased, Pat Brady? A. $185.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $685. Judgment was entered upon this verdict.

The defendant in his argument here now concedes that there was sufficient competent evidence introduced on the trial to justify the general verdict and judgment to the amount for which the same was rendered, if, under the law, funeral expenses are properly allowed as an element of damage in such cases as this, and the defendant bases his appeal solely upon the ground that funeral expenses are not a proper element of damage, hence are not properly allowable in such cases. So the only question presented for our consideration at this time is whether funeral expense is an element of damage for which an administrator of an estate may recover. This expenditure came as a proximate result of the wrongful act of the defendant in causing death. But death is inevitable. It comes to all. Undoubtedly this expense is one that would have been incurred by this estate had deceased been permitted to live out his expectancy. The estate, however, is called to meet it now. It is an expenditure which the estate was required to liquidate out of the funds passing into the hands of the administrator immediately upon his death and burial. It was an expense made immediately necessary by the negligent act of the defendant. Ordinarily, the wrongdoer is legally bound to reimburse the injured party, or his estate, for all damages which come as a proximate result of the wrong. Whatever measurable injury the wrong produces, traceable to the wrong as its proximate cause, the wrongdoer in law and in good conscience ought to be called upon to meet. However, it is in the law of nature that all must die, and we assume that in all Christian countries the dead receive decent burial, and that this is attended with some expense to the estate. We assume that the estate of Pat Brady would have been called upon to bury him and pay the expenses incurred in such burial had he been permitted to live out his expectancy, and we assume that the estate would be diminished to that extent then. We must assume that the funeral expenses and burial in this case were the proximate result of the wrong done to Patrick during his life. This expenditure must be met, and the property that comes into the hands of the administrator reduced accordingly, and this, whether death comes now, or whether it comes later. In either event the estate is diminished to the amount of this expense. The question then is: Shall the person who caused this expenditure be called upon to reimburse the estate for it in any sum?

This expenditure which the estate is now called upon to make might not have been incurred for many years, had Pat Brady been permitted to live out his expectancy. If it is not considered against this defendant, the estate must pay it now, though, in the ordinary course of nature, payment might be postponed many years. It is the wrongful act of the defendant that takes this money out of the estate now. What is the wrong that is done to the estate for which compensation ought to be made? The wrong lies in the fact that the wrongful act of the defendant has compelled the estate to make an expenditure, which, in the ordinary course of nature, it would not be required to make perhaps for many years. If we relieve the defendant of all liability for this expenditure, we place a burden on the estate in requiring it to pay now what in the course of nature it would not be required to pay perhaps for many years. There therefore is some loss to the estate. It has suffered some wrong from the negligent act of the defendant. This wrong must be compensated for. It is apparent the estate has lost the use of the money which it is forced to expend now for burial purposes. The use of the money is lost to the estate during the period between the forced death and the time when, in the course of nature, the estate would be called upon to make this expenditure. This, at legal interest, might or might not affect the amount of plaintiff's recovery in a considerable sum, depending upon the expectancy of the deceased at the time of his death. The jury

wrongful death
—funeral

therefore should be instructed to consider this item in determining the present worth of what plaintiff would accumulate and save to his estate if permitted to live out his expectancy. If the jury be not allowed to consider this item at all in estimating the amount which the injured party is entitled to recover from the wrongdoer, there certainly is some loss to the estate for which no compensation is made, for it is apparent that even though death is inevitable, and even though the estate may, at some time, be called upon to incur these expenses, the fact that it is called upon to make the expenditure now, long before the time when death would, under natural conditions, claim the deceased, with its incident of burial, is a fair matter to be considered in determining the amount of plaintiff's recovery.

As to hospital and doctor's bills we say that the deceased suffered physical injuries at the hands of the defendant. These injuries sent him to the hospital for care. These injuries made it necessary to employ the aid of physicians and surgeons. There is no assurance that had he lived out his expectancy he would have ever suffered like injuries resulting in like expenditures, or even approximately like expenditures, or that he would ever have <sup>—hospital expenses and doctors' bills.</sup> suffered the injuries that called upon him for these expenditures. These were properly allowed.

The court, however, erred in allowing the full amount of expenditures for funeral and burial. It should have instructed the jury that this expenditure is an element to be considered by the jury in determining the present worth of that which the plaintiff would, if permitted to live out his expectancy, have accumulated and left to his estate. They should consider that these expenses were forced upon the estate in anticipation of a time when, in the course of nature, they would be incurred.

We find the decisions of other states not in harmony on this question.

For the error pointed out, the case is reversed.

NOTE.

The question as to the measure of damages for death in an action for the benefit of the decedent's estate is the subject of a note appended to FLORIDA EAST COAST R. CO. v. HAYES, post, 1314. Subdivision IV. of this note deals with the question considered in the reported cases (BRADY v. HAW) ante, 1306, as to the right to include the funeral expenses of the deceased as an element of damage to his estate. A reference to this note will indicate that the cases are not in harmony upon the matter.

v.

H. W. HAYES, Admr., etc., of M. S. Hayes, Deceased.

(67 Fla. 101, 64 So. 504.)

Damages — death — suffering.

1. Under the statute the damages that may be recovered by the administrator of a person for the wrongful death of the decedent do not include and have no relation to physical or other suffering of the decedent or his relatives, or to the claims of anyone for present or future support or solatium. The administrator may recover only the present monetary worth of the decedent's life to an estimated prospective estate, to compensate for the estate that the decedent probably would have accumulated to leave at his death.

2. Where a finding of legal liability under the pleadings has substantial basis in competent evidence adduced at the trial, but it is obvious that, in determining the amount of the verdict, the jury were not governed by the evidence or the proper charges of the court thereon, or by any reasonable estimates or computations, and the amount awarded is manifestly inadequate or excessive, it is the duty of the court to grant a new trial, that the error in the verdict may be remedied, and justice administered in due course of law. In proper cases a remittitur may be permitted.

regarded as excessive, the court does not substitute its judgment for that of the jury, but merely indicates the amount the court would not pronounce excessive; and the privilege of a remittitur is given to avoid further litigation.

4. The granting of a new trial by a court does not invade the constitutional right of trial by jury.

Damages — for death of child — amount.

5. An award of $15,000 for death of a boy with a life expectancy of about forty years, after reaching majority, is excessive by all above $2,000, although he was active, with good industrious habits.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Duval County (Simmons, J.) to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed on condition.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Alex St. Clair-Abrams for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. A. H. King and Roswell King for defendant in error.

Per Curiam:

This writ of error was taken to a judgment obtained by the administrator of M. S. Hayes, deceased, an infant, in an action brought under §§ 3145 and 3146 of the General Statutes of Florida, to recover for the wrongful death of said infant "such damages as the party . . . entitled to sue may have sustained by reason of the death of the party killed."

The assignments of error predicated upon the overruling of a de-murrer to the declaration, and upon the denial of a motion for a directed verdict in favor of the defendant below, are sufficiently covered by the discussion of similar questions in Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Hayes, 66 Fla. 589, 64 So. 274.

The declaration alleges actionable negligence, and the demurrer thereto was properly overruled. As there is evidence upon which the jury could legally find for the plaintiff, the court correctly refused to give an affirmative charge for the defendant.

The jury returned a verdict of liability against the defendant, and the finding of liability does not appear to be wholly without legal basis in the evidence. It is, therefore, necessary to determine the proper rule for the measure for damages recoverable under the statute in an action brought by an administrator as the legal representative of the estate of a deceased minor, in order to adjudicate the questions presented as to the propriety of the amount of the judgment. The object of the statute giving the right of action is compensation to those who have sustained damages or loss by reason of the death of a person caused by the fault of another. By the terms of the statute, giving a right of recovery that did not exist at common law, the administrator of the decedent cannot maintain an action, unless the decedent left no husband or wife and no minor child, and no other person dependent on him for support. A husband or wife, a minor child, and a dependent person each occupies his or her particular intimate personal relation of dependence during the life expectancy, and, by the wrongful death, such husband or wife, minor child, or dependent person sustains loss or damage that is not wholly monetary, but such as is peculiar to the relation that existed, and that is concurrent with the life expectancy. See Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. Foxworth, 41 Fla. 1, 79 Am. St. Rep. 149, 25 So. 388. But the administrator, as the legal representative of the decedent's estate, can sustain no loss or damage by reason of the wrongful death, except the pecuniary value of the life to the prospective estate of the decedent, which damage or loss does not include, and has no relation to, physical or other suffering of the decedent or his relatives, or to claims of anyone for present or future support or solatium. Such loss or damage to the estate is wholly monetary, and any compensation therefor, after the payment of debts, passes to the decedent's general heirs as of the end of his life expectancy, to compensate for the estate that the decedent probably would have accumulated to leave at his death to such general heirs. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Jones, 45 Fla. 407, 34 So. 246; Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Bowden, 54 Fla. 461, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 451, 45 So. 755; Hively v. Webster County, 117 Iowa, 672, 91 N. W. 1041, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 590; McAdory v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 94 Ala. 272, 10 So. 507. Where the decedent was an infant, the loss or damage to the estate would not begin until after the time he would have become of age, since, under the statute, the father recovers for the loss of his minor child's service to the adult age, as well as for the mental pain and suffering of the parents caused by the infant's wrongful death. Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Hayes, supra; Gen. Stat. 1906, § 3147.

Where the infant leaves no husband or wife, and no minor child, and no person dependent on him or her for support, the administrator of the deceased infant's estate may, under the statute, maintain an action to recover "such damages" as the estate "may have sustained by reason of the" wrongful death; and the proper measure of such damages is the present worth of the decedent's life to an estimated prospective estate that he probably would have earned and saved after becoming of age, and during his life expectancy, to be left at his death. A determination of the proper amount of such damages requires a consideration of the contingency whether the decedent probably would have lived to become of age and to some given time afterwards, as well as an estimate of the value of the estate he probably would have earned and saved after he would have become of age, and would probably have left at the end of his life expectancy, and also an estimate of the present money value of the decedent's life to the estimated prospective estate. In making this determination, no exact rule of reasoning or computation is afforded by law, but the jury have no arbitrary discretion. The finding should be the result of a fair consideration of all the matters that should, under the circumstances of the particular case, properly enter into the estimate and computation. Among other proper elements that may be considered are the age, mental capacity, habits of life, and industry, and thrift, means, business, earnings, health, probable duration of life, skill, and environment, and reasonable expectations of the decedent. If the jury find that the deceased infant probably would have lived to some given period after he would have become of age, and also find an estimated value of an estate he probably would have accumulated and left for distribution among his heirs at the end of his life expectancy, the present money value of the decedent's life to his estimated prospective estate may be ascertained with some degree of accuracy as a practical or mathematical proposition. In cases of this character, it is left for the jury, in the fair exercise of a sound discretion, in the light of all the information properly available, to ascertain and fix the probable amount of the damage sustained by the plaintiff, or by those whom he represents, "reserving at all times the authority of the court to guard against manifest injustice by way of excessive estimates." See Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Bowden, 54 Fla. 461, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 451, 45 So. 755; An- draws v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 86 Iowa, 677, 53 N. W. 399; Wheelan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 85 Iowa, 167, 52 N. W. 119; Walters v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 36 Iowa, 458; Sherman v. Western Stage Co. 24 Iowa, 515; 18 Cyc. 366. The plaintiff has the burden of adducing proper evidence from which the jury may find "such damages as the" decedent's prospective estate "may have sustained by reason of the death." When future expectations are to be compensated by anticipated present recoveries, the plaintiff is entitled to only the present value of such future expectations.

In effect, the court instructed the jury, if they find for the plaintiff, to award such sum as the evidence shows the decedent would probably have accumulated during his life expectancy from his probable earnings after he would have reached the age of twenty-one years, reduced to a money value, and its present worth be given as damages; and also that, if the decedent and the defendant were both at fault, the plaintiff may recover, but the damages should be diminished in proportion to the decedent's fault.

The statute requires the appellate court to review orders denying new trials, and to reverse or affirm the judgments of trial courts as may be right, or to give judgment as the court below ought to have given, or as it may appear according to law. Gen. Stat. 1906, §§ 1693, 1694, 1707. The 7th Amendment to the Federal Constitution is not applicable to state courts, though it "is controlling in the Federal courts." Slocum v. New York L. Ins. Co. 228 U. S. 364, 57 L. ed. 879, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 523, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 1029. In granting a new trial, the court does not invade the right of trial by jury secured by the state Constitution, since a new trial in cases as at common law is by a jury, unless it is waived. The purpose of granting a new trial is to correct any errors occurring in the proceedings, including errors in the verdict. Where a finding of legal liability under the pleadings has substantial basis in competent evidence adduced at the trial, but it is obvious that, in determining the amount of the verdict, the jury were not governed by the evidence or the proper charges of the court thereon, or by any reasonable estimates or computations, and the amount awarded is manifestly inadequate or excessive, it is the duty of the court to grant a new trial, that the error in the verdict may be remedied, and justice administered in due course of law.

The judgment is for $15,000, obtained more than five years before the decedent would have attained his majority had he lived, and he could not have begun to earn an estate until after he became of age, because his services prior to his majority belonged to his father, and the value thereof is recoverable by the father, under the statute. Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Hayes, 66 Fla. 589, 64 So. 274. The deceased was thirteen years and five months old at his death, May 28, 1911, and there is evidence that he had a life expectancy of forty-six years and three months; that he was an active boy, with good, industrious habits, and was earning $5 a week, or more; that, when compounded periodically at the legal rate of interest, the present value of $1,000 due in forty years is $46.02.

Statistical evidence as to life expectancy, and as to the present value of a prospective future estate, is competent; and, while such evidence does not control the reasonable discretion of the jury in making proper estimates, it may tend to show whether the amount of the verdict is reasonable and just. If $46.02, compounded periodically at the legal rate of interest, is the present value of $1,000 as of the end of forty years, a person's life expectancy, then $15,000, the amount of the verdict, is equal to over $300,000 as of the end of the life expectancy.

Even if the present value of $1,000 as of the end of forty years is $100, instead of $46.02, as shown by the testimony, $15,000 would be equal to at least $150,000 at the end of forty years. Or, if the present value of $1,000 due in forty years is $200, instead of $46.02, then $15,000 would be equal to $75,000 at the end of forty years. If the decedent would probably have lived ten years from the date of the verdict in 1913, which would have been less than five years after he would have become of age and begun to earn an estate, $15,000, the amount of the verdict, compounded periodically at the legal rate of interest, would in ten years be equal to at least $30,000; or, in twenty years, to $60,000; or, in thirty years, to $120,000; or, in forty years, to $240,000.

Guided by the evidence and by common knowledge, observation, and experience as to estates ordinarily acquired and saved, with nothing shown to the contrary, it cannot reasonably be conjectured that the decedent would probably have accumulated such a large estate as the verdict implies. But it is manifest that the award is grossly excessive, and that the jury did not duly consider the evidence, or the charge of the court thereon, or any reasonable estimates, in making their finding of the damages sustained by the deceased minor child's prospective estate, which, but for his wrongful death, he would probably have earned and saved after becoming of age, to leave at the end of his life expectancy.

It must be assumed from the verdict that the jury found that the decedent would probably have lived to become of age, and for a considerable number of years thereafter; but the amount of the damages awarded has no substantial basis in the evidence or in any reasonable estimates, and is not in accord with the applicable charges of the court. The amount of the verdict is, therefore, not authorized by law.

Damages—for death of child—
amount.

In the cases cited in support of the contention that the verdict is not excessive, the administrator was authorized to recover for all beneficiaries, including the widow, minor children, dependents, or others having a present claim to support from the decedents during their life expectancies, and the decedents had established earning capacities as adult men, while, the decedents being adults, there was no recovery by a parent for loss of services, or for mental pain and suffering because of the death of a minor child, as in the case here. See Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Hayes, supra.

"To the end of saving vexatious, expensive, and prolonged litigation," the defendant in error will be given the privilege of entering a remittitur of the amount considered excessive. In this practice the court is not "substituting its judgment for that of the jury, . . . for this is not indicating what amount the court would have given, but only such amount as it would not feel at liberty to pronounce excessive. *Florida R. & Nav. Co. v. The judgment of the court is that if the defendant in error, within thirty days after the mandate of this court in the cause is filed in the court below, shall enter a remittitur of the sum of $13,000 from the judgment as of the date of its rendition in the Circuit Court, that then the residue of such judgment, amounting to $2,000, shall stand affirmed, otherwise the entire judgment of the Circuit Court shall be reversed.

While we still adhere to the views expressed in our dissenting opinions in the case of Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Bowden, 54 Fla. 461, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451, 45 So. 755, as to the measure of damages to an administrator suing for a death by negligence, yet, in order to end vexatious and prolonged litigation, we agree to the judgment announced in the opinion of the court. This same plaintiff, suing on his own behalf as the father of the deceased, recovered a judgment for a large amount against this same defendant for the death of this same child, and we think the litigation should end.

Scope.

The present note, as indicated by the title, is devoted to the measure of damage in actions under Survival Statutes for benefit of the estate where a person dies as a result of injuries negligently inflicted. As to the measure of damage, where the action is commenced by the injured person in his lifetime and is revived, see note appended to Murray v. Omaha Transfer Co. post, 1343. For a consideration of the question as to the basis for assessing the pecuniary loss to the estate of a deceased infant for the latter's wrongful death, see note appended to Dimitri v. Cienci, post, 1336.

It will be observed that the question under consideration is quite distinct from the question as to the measure of damages under statutes permitting recovery for the pecuniary loss to a specified class of beneficiaries.

1. General rule.*a. Pecuniary loss to estate.

In assessing the damages to the estate of a deceased person for his negligent or wrongful death, the basis of the computation of the damage is very largely affected by the language of the statute authorizing the action. In this regard there are special statutes which are construed to require either a very limited or an enlarged measure of damages. These, however, are the exceptions, for in general the statute merely provides, in substance, for the survival of the cause of action or a pending action which the deceased had. These General Survival Statutes are construed in some jurisdictions to furnish the exclusive remedy for the recovery of damages for a negligent or wrongful killing; while in other jurisdictions they are construed to furnish a remedy concurrent with that given by other statutes, authorizing a recovery in behalf of certain beneficiaries. It is obvious that where a statute is construed to provide a remedy which is exclusive, the measure of damages recoverable in behalf of the estate should not be the same as that recoverable under statutes which are construed to provide concurrent remedies, one for the benefit of the estate of the decedent, and one for the benefit of his statutory beneficiaries.

It may be said, however, that the different statutes authorizing the recovery in behalf of the estate of deceased persons, of damages for personal injuries, are intended to permit the recovery merely for the pecuniary loss resulting to the estate from the injury complained of, and the damages are confined to compensation for such pecuniary loss.

In Holmes v. Oregon & C. R. Co. (1880) 6 Sawy. 262, 5 Fed. 523, it is held that where the statute gives the administrator the right to sue for the death of the decedent, the measure of damages is the pecuniary loss to the decedent's estate by reason of his death; Ladd v. Foster (1887) 31 Fed. 827, holds that where the damages for wrongful death, when recovered, are assets of the estate of decedent, they include nothing but the probable pecuniary loss to the estate through his death.

In Rose v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. (1874) 39 Iowa, 246, it is held that the measure of damages recoverable by the personal representative for the wrongful death of his decedent is the amount which will compensate the estate for the pecuniary loss sustained by the death of the deceased.

The right of action is continuous with the right of the deceased, and hence the amount of recovery is the value of his life to decedent's estate, and not the damage to his beneficiaries. Morris v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1885) 26 Fed. 22; Ladd v. Foster (1887) 31 Fed. 827; Holland v. Brown (1888) 13 Sawy. 284, 35 Fed.

43; Kling v. Torello (1913) 87 Conn. 301, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 930, 87 Atl. 987; Trafford v. Adams Exp. Co. (1881) 8 Lea (Tenn.) 96; Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Smith (1882) 9 Lea (Tenn.) 470; Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Pounds (1883) 11 Lea (Tenn.) 129; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. McCloskey (1854) 23 Pa. 526, 12 Am. Neg. Cas. 548; McCabe v. Narragansett Electric Lighting Co. (1905) 27 R. I. 272, 61 Atl. 667.

No other element of damages can enter into or constitute a part of the recovery than such as were sustained by the deceased himself, and for which he could have recovered had he lived and prosecuted the action, and hence loss or injuries to the children or next of kin of the deceased, occasioned by his death, can constitute no part of the cause of action or element of recovery by the personal representative. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Pounds (1883) 11 Lea (Tenn.) 129.

And see, to the same effect, Ladd v. Foster (1887) 31 Fed. 827, holding that, under the Oregon statute giving a claim to the administrator of a person whose death is caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, the damages, when recovered, are assets of the estate of the deceased, and must be administered accordingly, and hence they are assessed as and for a pecuniary injury to such estate, and not for the sufferings of the deceased, or as solace for the wounded feelings or mental anguish of the survivors. In Holland v. Brown (1888) 13 Sawy. 284, 35 Fed. 43, it is held that, under the Oregon statute giving the administrator of a person whose death is caused by the wrongful act or omission of another a right to recover damages therefor, the damages, when recovered, are assets of the estate, and they are assessed for the pecuniary injury to the deceased person's estate caused by his death. Nothing is allowed for the sufferings of the deceased, nor as a solace to the survivors. And Morris v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1885) 26 Fed. 22, holds that, in an action by the administrator for the benefit of the estate of the decedent, the jury cannot award damages for anguish or suffering of the relatives of the person killed. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. McCloskey (1854) 23 Pa. 526, 12 Am. Neg. Cas. 548, also holds that the value of the life lost is the basis of the estimate of the damages, rather than the injury resulting from it to the survivor entitled to sue, where the action is to recover damages to the estate under a General Survival Statute.

In McCabe v. Narragansett Electric Lighting Co. (1905) 27 R. I. 272, 61 Atl. 667, it is held that where the statute provides for the recovery of damages by the personal representative of a decedent killed by the wrongful act of another, and for the division of these damages: first, to the husband, or widow and children, if any, and if not, then to the next of kin, the damages recoverable are such as result to the estate of the decedent by his death, and do not include damages for loss to an infant child of the parental care of the father. And see Dwyer v. Chicago, St. P. & O. R. Co. (1892) 84 Iowa, 479, 35 Am. St. Rep. 322, 51 N. W. 244, holding that the measure of damages for a wrongful death, under the Iowa statute, is the loss to the estate of the decedent in a pecuniary way by reason of his death, not taking into account his pain and suffering, or the grief and distress of his family, or the loss of his society. To the same effect is Wheelan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1892) 85 Iowa, 167, 52 N. W. 119.

II. As to whether basis for computation of pecuniary loss is damage suffered by injured person or loss from his death.

As pointed out, the measure of damages to the estate of a deceased for his negligent death is the pecuniary loss to the estate, as distinguished from any loss to his relatives or dependents. The rule is frequently stated that this loss is to be computed upon the basis of the damage to the deceased himself, that is, the amount the deceased might have recovered, had he survived to prosecute the action. This rule, however, has received different constructions, and is of but little real aid in determining the amount of damage to be awarded in a given case. Where the action is for the benefit of the estate of the deceased, the real questions presented regarding the amount of damage are (1) whether or not the pecuniary loss to the estate is to be computed from the time of the injury, or begins at the time of the death, and (2) whether it should take into consideration the life expectancy of the deceased, or whether the computation of the loss is limited to the time intervening between the date of the injury and the death. Upon these questions the courts are not in harmony. This conflict of opinion, as heretofore suggested and as will be hereinafter more specifically pointed out, is in part due to the fact that in some jurisdictions the action for the benefit of the estate is exclusive, while in others it is concurrent with an action for the benefit of statutory beneficiaries. The conflict, however, is not entirely traceable to this source, but it is, apparently, in part due to the tendency, especially of the earlier decisions, to give a very limited construction to the Survival Statutes, and to hold that they did not extend the right to the deceased to recover damages for any loss beyond the time of his death.

The following cases hold that, in assessing the damages to the estate of a decedent for his wrongful death, there shall be taken into account the life expectancy of the deceased as it may be determined by the jury from the evidence in the case, including mortality tables:

Upon this point, the court in Kling v. Torello (1913) 87 Conn. 301, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 930, 87 Atl. 987, said: "The right of action which the executor or administrator is permitted to pursue is not one which springs from the death. It is one which comes to the representative by survival. The right of recovery for the death is as for one of the consequences of the wrong inflicted upon the decedent. The amount of recovery is determined from the standpoint of the deceased, and not from that of the statutory beneficiaries. Its measure, within the statutory limitation, is the value of life to him whose life has been cut off.

. . . When one, as the result of injuries inflicted, suffers during life, and death later results, there are not two independent rights of action. There is but one liability, and that is for all the consequences of the wrongful act, including the death. . . . There cannot be two recoveries. . . . If the injured man survives to recover, he recovers once for all; if he dies before recovery, his executor or administrator stands in his place. The Survival Statute operates to transfer to the representative the right of action which the deceased had for his sufferings and disability during life, while the death enlarges his right of recovery by permitting an award of additional damages for the death itself, as one of the harmful results of the wrongful act. The court is by the statute, as it was not by the common law, authorized to take that event into consideration, as it might any other physical development consequent upon the injuries, whether occurring before or after action brought. The new event is not regarded as one which creates a cause of action, but one which has a bearing upon the award of damages. Instantaneous death may of itself bring into existence a right of action, which is confined in the matter of recovery to the event of death. . . . But if the death is not instantaneous, the right of action is not so confined. It reaches back to the antecedent harmful results, and the death is, by force of the statute, made one of the incidents in the story of results, which is material in a determination of the amount of recovery to which the representative is entitled."

It has been held, however, that only such damage can be recovered in behalf of the estate of the deceased as the deceased sustained in his lifetime; that nothing can be allowed for the loss of his life, or for what he might have earned had he lived longer. The recovery may, however, include the loss of the decedent's earnings between the time intervening between the injury and his death. Ramsdell v. Grady (1903) 97 Me. 319, 54 Atl. 763; Bancroft v. Boston & W. R. Corp. (1865) 11 Allen (Mass.) 36; Kennedy v. Standard Sugar Refinery Co. (1878) 125 Mass. 90, 28 Am. Rep. 214.

This rule has been based upon the language of the statute which authorizes the recovery of damage for the injury to the deceased. This is the point made in Clark v. Manchester (1883) 62 N. H. 577. In this case the court said: "The rule of damages depends upon the construction to be given to the Statute of 1879, the question being whether damages are given to the surviving relations of the deceased for the loss and injury to them from his death, or for the injury to the deceased which caused his death; whether for the injury resulting from death, or for the injury resulting in death. The statute is that the executor or administrator may recover damages for the injury when the person injured, if death had not ensued, would have been entitled to recover damages. The damages are for the widow and children, in equal shares; and if there be no child, wholly to the widow; and if no widow, to the heirs of the deceased according to the law regulating the distribution of intestate estates. In this case the father of the deceased child will be entitled to the recovery. Prior to the Statute of 1879, no action for an injury resulting in death could be maintained unless commenced before the death of the injured person. The right of action for personal injuries did not survive. . . . The English Statute of 1846, known as Lord Campbell's Act, was, in its first section giving the right of action, substantially like our statute; but a second section provided that 'in every such action the jury may give such damages as they may think proportional to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively, for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought.' This statute, and those of many of the states which have copied the English statute, expressly provide that the damages shall be for the loss to the survivors resulting from death. The prospective value to them of the life of the deceased, had he escaped death, is the measure of damages adopted by these statutes. While our statute reserves the damages recovered for the benefit of the surviving relations of the deceased, it omits the provision for assessing the damages upon the injury to them as a basis of recovery. The ground of recovery in our statute is the injury to the deceased which resulted in or caused his death. 'When the death of a person is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, which, if death had not ensued, would have entitled the person injured to recover damages therefor, then, on the death,' etc., 'the executor or administrator may recover damages for the injury.' From a reference in the context to the 'person injured,' and by the natural interpretation of language, the 'injury' must mean the injury which resulted in or caused the death of the person. Damages are given for the injury the same as they would have been if death had not ensued, and that injury must be the injury to the deceased preceding and resulting in his death."

In jurisdictions where statutes in the form of Lord Campbell's Act and General Survival Statutes are construed to provide for coexistent remedies, which, however, do not permit of the recovery of double damages for the same wrongful act, there is recognized the purpose and intent of the statutes to compensate for the actual pecuniary injury inflicted by the wrongful act. To secure this end and avoid any overlapping of the damages, the general statute is construed to authorize a recovery of damages for the injury to the deceased, not including his death, and a statute following the lines of Lord Campbell's Act to authorize recovery for the pecuniary loss of the statutory beneficiaries. Under the Survival Statute the damages recoverable are held to begin with the wrong and end with the death, and under Lord Campbell's Act the damages are held to begin with the death, and not to include any damages which might have been recovered by the deceased had he lived. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Goode (1914) 42 Okla. 784, L.R.A.1915E, 1141, 142 Pac. 1185; Smith v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1914) 42 Okla. 577, 142 Pac. 398; Bennett v. Spartanburg R. Gas & E. Co. (1914) 97 S. C. 27, 81 S. E. 189; Belding v. Black Hills & Ft. P. R. Co. (1893) 3 S. D. 369, 53 N. W. 750; Brown v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1899) 102 Wis. 137, 44 L.R.A. 579, 77 N. W. 748, 78 N. W. 771, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 255; Nemcek v. Filer & S. Co. (1905) 126 Wis. 71, 105 N. W. 225; Ehlers v. Automobile Liability Co. (1919) — Wis. —, 173 N. W. 325.

For example, Bennett v. Spartanburg R. Gas & E. Co. (1914) 97 S. C. 27, 81 S. E. 189, holds that, under the General Survival Statute and the statute embodying the principles of Lord Campbell's Act, two different causes of action exist, and the elements of damages recovered are entirely different. In the first action the personal representative is entitled to recover the damages which his decedent sustained by reason of the injury complained of, such as physical and mental suffering, loss of time, and impaired earning capacity, for the time intervening between the injury and the death, while in the other action no damages resulting to the deceased are recoverable, but only such damages may be recovered as are caused the statutory beneficiary.

While it is held in Brown v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1899) 102 Wis. 137, 44 L.R.A. 579, 77 N. W. 748, 78 N. W. 771, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 255, that a statute embodying the principles of Lord Campbell's Act, construed in connection with statutory provisions for the survival of actions, or causes of action, for personal injuries, permits two actions, one for the benefit of the statutory beneficiaries, to recover their pecuniary loss, the other for the benefit of the estate of the decedent, it is nevertheless clear that it was not thereby intended to permit a double recovery for the same wrong. On this point it is said that the trial judge can easily, by proper instruction, limit the recovery in a revival action to the loss actually caused to the deceased prior to his death, including his pain and suffering, and in the action under the statute similar to Lord Campbell's Act, to the pecuniary loss sustained by the statutory beneficiaries; and if the two causes of action are joined, the court may readily require the jury to make separate findings as to the damages.

And see Davidson Benedict Co. v. Severson (1902) 109 Tenn. 572, 72 S. W. 967, holding that, under the Tennessee statute, the measure of damages recoverable where a person dies as a result of personal injuries is, first, the damages to the decedent in his own peculiar and personal relations, such as pain and suffering endured by him, and also the pecuniary damages of the widow and next of kin, that is, the pecuniary value of the life of the deceased, as shown by his expectancy of life and earning capacity; and the damages recoverable are not to be duplicated by a recovery of damages to the decedent, not only for pain and suffering, but also for loss to his estate of the pecuniary value of his life, and the pecuniary loss to his widow and next of kin, which in effect is the pecuniary value of the life of the deceased.

In Belding v. Black Hills & Ft. P. R. Co. (1892) 3 S. D. 369, 53 N. W. 750, it is held that, under a statute permitting a recovery in behalf of the estate of a deceased person for such damage as the deceased might have recovered had he survived the injury, the amount of recovery is limited to compensation for the pain and suffering of the deceased, and for loss of time and employment between the time of the injury and death, and the expense of medical and surgical attention, nursing, etc., incident to the injury. It is, however, provided by another statute that certain relatives of the deceased are given the right to recover their pecuniary loss due to his death, which is based upon the decedent's earning capacity.

In Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. Phillips (1887) 64 Miss. 693, 2 So. 537, it is held that the measure of recovery under the Survival Statute is the same as the measure of recovery by the deceased had he commenced an action and died while it was pending. The court said that there was also a right of action to recover for the death, and this was entirely distinct and independent from the action by the personal representative.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Sweet (1897) 63 Ark. 563, 40 S. W. 463, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 295, the facts were that the injured person survived his injuries but a few hours. An action by the personal representative was commenced to recover damages for the benefit of the widow and next of kin of the deceased, and also an action to recover for the mental anguish and bodily pain suffered by the deceased. It was held that the action to recover damages for the pain and suffering of the decedent could be maintained notwithstanding the pendency of the action to recover for the loss to the widow and next of kin of the decedent, since the elements of damage recoverable in the two actions were distinct.

III. Computation of damage from destroyed earning capacity.

a. In general.

Assuming that the basis for compensating the estate of a deceased person for personal injuries which caused his death is the pecuniary loss to the estate, the question arises as to what elements or matters may be taken into account in assessing the damage. As heretofore pointed out, the courts are not agreed as to whether or not account may be taken of the probable earnings of the deceased during his expectancy had it not been for the injury which caused his death. Even in jurisdictions where the earning capacity of the deceased may be taken into account for his life expectancy as fixed by the jury, the courts are not agreed as to whether the gross earnings, the net earnings, or the probable accumulations of the decedent are to be the basis for the assessment of damage in this regard. Upon this point, see infra, b. Neither are the courts in harmony as to whether or not allowance may be made for the pain and suffering of the deceased. See infra, IV. And the same lack of harmony exists as to whether account may be taken of the medical and funeral expenses of the deceased, and of other similar matters. See infra, V.

b. Gross earnings.

Aside from the question hereinafter discussed as to the inclusion of compensation for pain and suffering of the deceased, the principal element of damage, as previously shown, is based upon the earning capacity of the deceased. The courts, however, are not agreed as to just the extent to which the prospective earnings of the deceased are to be taken into account in assessing the damage for his death. In a few jurisdictions it is held that the amount which the deceased would presumably have earned in the future is the basis for the assessment of pecuniary loss to his estate by reason of his death. Linss v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (1899) 91 Fed. 964; Jennings v. Alaska Treadwell Gold Min. Co. (1908) 95 C. C. A. 388, 170 Fed. 146; Broughel v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. (1901) 73 Conn. 614, 84 Am. St. Rep. 176, 48 Atl. 751; Kyes v. Valley Teleph. Co. (1903) 132 Mich. 281, 93 N. W. 623, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 340; Olivier v. Houghton County Street R. Co. (1904) 138 Mich. 242, 101 N. W. 530; Davis v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1907) 147 Mich. 479, 111 N. W. 76; Gates v. Beebe (1912) 170 Mich. 107, 135 N. W. 934; Love v. Detroit, J. & C. R. Co. (1912) 170 Mich. 1, 135 N. W. 963; Beeler v. Butte & L. Copper Development Co. (1910) 41 Mont. 465, 110 Pac. 523; Imbriani v. Anderson (1912) 76 N. H. 491, 84 Atl. 974.

In an action by the administrator of the deceased person to recover damages for his wrongful death, the measure of recovery is the earning power of the decedent, and in estimating this earning power the relationship of husband and wife, child and parent, or other kinship of the beneficiaries to the decedent, or the number dependent upon him, is not to be considered. Linss v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (Fed.) supra.

And see Jennings v. Alaska Treadwell Gold Min. Co. (1908) 95 C. C. A. 388, 170 Fed. 146, holding that under a statute permitting an action for death through negligence of another, and providing that the amount recovered shall inure to the benefit of the wife and children of the deceased, and if he leaves no wife or children then such amount shall be administered as personal property, where the deceased left no wife or children, the damage recoverable for the value of his life to his estate is measured by his earning capacity, thrift, and probable duration of life.

Broughel v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. (1901) 73 Conn. 614, 84 Am. St. Rep. 176, 48 Atl. 751, also holds that, under a statute providing that causes of action for injury to the person shall survive to the personal representative of the injured person, the measure of damages for loss of life is the value of his life to the decedent, based on his earning capacity as affected by the circumstances of each particular case.

See also Beeler v. Butte & L. Copper Development Co. (1910) 41 Mont. 465, 110 Pac. 528, holding that, where a statute authorizes a suit in behalf of the heirs of a person wrongfully killed while working in a mine, giving a right to prosecute and maintain the same action that the injured man could have maintained had he lived, the right of action of the beneficiaries includes damages for the pain and suffering that the decedent endured before death by reason of the injury, and for his diminished and lost earning capacity for the period of his natural expectancy.

In Connecticut, where the Death Statutes are construed to be Survival Statutes merely, and not to create in the personal representative of the deceased a new cause of action, it is held that the amount of recovery is to be determined from the standpoint of the deceased, and not from that of the statutory beneficiary. Its measure, within the statutory limitation, is the value of life to him whose life has been cut off, and also the right to recover for the suffering of the deceased, and his disability during life. Kling v. Torello (1913) 87 Conn. 301, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 930, 87 Atl. 987.

The foregoing cases do not make it entirely clear whether it is the gross earnings of the deceased or his net earnings which are to be taken into account in assessing the loss to his estate by his wrongful death. In some jurisdictions, it is clearly the gross earnings which are to be considered.

In Olivier v. Houghton County Street R. Co. (1903) 134 Mich. 367, 104 Am. St. Rep. 607, 96 N. W. 434, 3 Ann. Cas. 53, the court approves the rule of damages established in Kyes v. Valley Teleph. Co. (1903) 132 Mich. 281, 93 N. W. 623, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 340, that in an action under the Survival Statute to recover damages to the injured person from the wrongful act complained of, where he dies as a result of the injury after having survived same for an appreciable length of time, it is proper to consider his earning ability and the length of time that he would probably have lived had he not been injured, and the loss he sustained by reason of being deprived by such injuries of the ability to labor and earn money during the time he probably would have lived, had he not been injured. In answering the contention that the damages recoverable in such a case should be only for the feelings of pain and anguish of deceased while he actually lived, and the loss of earnings from the time of the injury to his death, the court said: "This is an unreasonable limitation. We need not discuss the reasoning by which the result is reached. We have long ago held that prospective damages are recoverable. An injured person may recover for loss of earnings for the period during which the evidence fairly shows that he would have lived but for the injury. This rule would apply to one who should live long enough to try his case, though he should die the following day. But defendant's contention would substitute another rule upon a second trial after his death, should such trial become necessary. Such recovery is based upon the actual damages suffered through the accident. On the first trial the recovery is based upon a probable prospective incapacity for a probable period. After death, such incapacity (and consequent loss) is made certain, where it was only probable before. The period alone remains uncertain. As to pain and mental suffering, it is different. Upon the first trial, the duration of such pain and suffering is uncertain; upon the second, it is definite. As has been already suggested, it is not a new doctrine that prospective damages, when reasonably certain, may be recovered. It is a part of the right that survives under the act, as was held in the Kyes Case. Such a construction removes the only objection that can be urged against the view which we have taken of the Death Act. It gives to the representatives the absolute right to the remedy which his ancestor had, instead of leaving it to depend upon the accident of his dependency."

It has been expressly asserted that, under the Survival Act, the measure of damages is compensation for the pain and suffering of the decedent and for loss of earnings during the decedent's probable life, had he not been killed through the injury complained of. The amount that he might have saved during his probable life is not to be taken into consideration. Davis v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1907) 147 Mich. 479, 111 N. W. 76.

And see Gates v. Beebe (1912) 170 Mich. 107, 135 N. W. 934, holding that an administratrix suing under the Survival Act for the death of her husband is entitled to recover such sum as the deceased would have earned during the remainder of his life.

And Olivier v. Houghton County Street R. Co. (Mich.) supra, holds that the measure of damages for loss to the decedent's estate from his wrongful death is the amount which the decedent would have earned during the period he probably would have lived, without any deduction for what it would probably have cost him for food, clothing, and other personal expenditures, the damages in this regard being different from the damages sustained by his next of kin.

See also Imbriani v. Anderson (1912) 76 N. H. 491, 84 Atl. 974, holding that the right of the personal representative of the decedent to recover for the decedent's loss of capacity to earn money, as a result of the injury complained of, is not limited to what the deceased would probably have saved, but includes whatever he might have earned for his estate.

It has been held that where the measure of damages, as fixed by the statute, is to be compensation for the full value of the life of the decedent, this is to be determined without any deduction for necessary or other personal expenses of the deceased had he lived. Atkinson v. Hardaway (1912) 10 Ga. App. 389, 73 S. E. 556.

But it has been said that it is neither just nor equitable to sum up the probable gross earnings of the deceased for his lifetime, ignoring the items of necessary food, clothing, etc., and also to give no consideration to the fact that old age and sickness may impair the power of the decedent to labor and produce. Wheelan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1892) 85 Iowa, 167, 52 N. W. 119. In Iowa, however, the measure of damage to the estate of a deceased person for his negligent or wrongful death is based upon the accumulations which the deceased would probably have made to his estate had it not been for the injury which caused his death. See other Iowa cases, infra, d.

According to the Kentucky rule, if an injured person dies of his injuries, his personal representative may recover for his mental and physical sufferings, loss of time, and his surgical and other expenses due to the injury. If, however, the personal representative sues to recover under the other section of the statute for the wrongful death, the measure of damages is limited to compensation to the decedent's estate for the destruction of his power to earn money, to be assessed in view of all the evidences in the case, including the age of the deceased and his expectancy of life. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Stewart (1913) 156 Ky. 550, 161 S. W. 557; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kenney (1915) 162 Ky. 403, 172 S. W. 683; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Ward (1898) 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1900, 44 S. W. 1112; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Milet (1898) 20 Ky. L. Rep. 532, 46 S. W. 498; Southern R. Co. v. Barr (1900) 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1615, 55 S. W. 900; Southern R. Co. v. Evans (1901) 23 Ky. L. Rep. 568, 63 S. Case* (1873) 9 Bush (Ky.) 728; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kelly (1897) 100 Ky. 421, 38 S. W. 852, 40 S. W. 452, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 249; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Eakin (1898) 103 Ky. 465, 45 S. W. 529, 46 S. W. 496, 47 S. W. 872; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Clark (1899) 105 Ky. 571, 49 S. W. 323; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Taaffe (1899) 106 Ky. 535, 50 S. W. 850; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Simrall (1907) 127 Ky. 55, 104 S. W. 1011; Stewart v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1910) 136 Ky. 717, 125 S. W. 154; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Engleman (1911) 146 Ky. 19, 141 S. W. 374; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Dallas (1912) 150 Ky. 442, 150 S. W. 536; Kentucky & I. T. R. Co. v. Becker (1919) — Ky. —, 214 S. W. 900.

And this rule applies, irrespective of whether or not the deceased left surviving him a wife or children. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Eakin (1898) 103 Ky. 465, 45 S. W. 529, 46 S. W. 496, 47 S. W. 872. In this state, it has been expressly held that the jury are not to take into account such sums as the deceased might reasonably have been expected to expend upon himself for his proper maintenance and support. Lexington Utilities Co. v. Parker (1915) 166 Ky. 81, 178 S. W. 1173.

However, in Stewart v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1910) 136 Ky. 717, 125 S. W. 154, the court said that the rule that the damages are to be assessed at such a sum as will reasonably compensate the estate of the deceased for the destruction of his power to earn money does not mean that this amount is to be "computed by simply multiplying the earning power of the deceased at his death by his expectancy of life, as shown by the life tables. The life tables are based on the ordinary expectation of life, and are used by insurance companies, but they are not based on what are known as extrahazardous employments. The work of a brakeman on a railroad train is classed among the extrahazardous employments, and, while the life tables are competent evidence in cases like this, for want of any better evidence on the subject, the extrahazardous character of the service should also be taken into consideration, for the deceased was earning $960 in an extrahazardous employment, and he might not earn so much in an employment less hazardous. The value of a piece of machinery is not to be determined by multiplying its present earning power by the length of its probable use, but the cost of maintenance must be subtracted. The value of the human machine to his estate must be determined in like manner. It must be maintained,—that is, it must be fed, clothed, and supplied with other necessities. What the estate would lose would be the net gain. There is no precise criterion by which this may be measured; it must necessarily be left to the discretion of the jury."

c. Net earnings.

It has also been held that the measure of damages is compensation for the loss of the decedent's net income, based on his prospective earnings during his probable life had it not been for the injury which caused his death, taking into consideration his personal expenses and expenditures. Mendenhall v. North Carolina R. Co. (1898) 123 N. C. 276, 31 S. E. 480; Carter v. North Carolina R. Co. (1905) 139 N. C. 500, 52 S. E. 642; Poe v. Raleigh & A. Air Line R. Co. (1906) 141 N. C. 528, 54 S. E. 406; Gerringer v. North Carolina R. Co. (1907) 146 N. C. 35, 59 S. E. 152; Roberson v. Greenleaf John- son Lumber Co. (1911) 154 N. C. 328, 70 S. E. 630; Ward v. North Carolina R. Co. (1912) 161 N. C. 186, 76 S. E. 717; Gurley v. Southern Power Co. (1916) 172 N. C. 690, 90 S. E. 943; Underwood v. Old Colony Street R. Co. (1911) 83 R. L. 319, 80 Atl. 390; Sebille v. Dunn (1917) — R. L. —, 99 Atl. 831.

In Underwood v. Old Colony Street R. Co. (1911) 33 R. L. 319, 80 Atl. 390, it is held that the measure of damages is the pecuniary loss to the estate of the deceased, sustained by reason of his death. This loss is ascertained by obtaining the present value of the net remainder, after deducting the personal expenses from the estimated income of the deceased from his own exertions during his life expectancy, in the management and control of any business carried on by him.

In Sebille v. Dunn (R. L.) supra, it is held that the damage is based on the present value of the net result remaining after the decedent's personal expenses are deducted from his income or earnings. To ascertain this amount, it is held to be necessary, first, to determine the gross amount of the decedent's prospective income or earnings, then deduct therefrom the amount the deceased would naturally spend for his personal expenditures, taking into account his situation in life, his means, personal habits, etc., and then reduce the net result so obtained to its present value.

It is not entirely clear whether the rule of the Iowa courts is to allow the damage to be based upon the net earnings of the deceased, or upon his accumulations. The two terms seem to be somewhat confused in the opinions. For example, in Neal v. Sheffield Brick & Tile Co. (1911) 151 Iowa, 690, 130 N. W. 898, the contention was made that an instruction to the jury as to the measure of damages was erroneous, in that it allowed the jury to take into consideration the age of the deceased at the time of his death, his occupation, the wages he was earning, the condition of his health, and his ability to earn money, as well as his expectancy of life, in determining the probable pecuniary loss to his estate by his death, without in any way instructing or suggesting to the jury that they should also take into consideration what the deceased would have spent had he lived. In denying this contention the court pointed out that in Lowe v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (1898) 89 Iowa, 420, 56 N. W. 519, the trial court was sustained in rejecting an instruction specifically calling attention to the fact that the allowance should be for the amount the deceased would have accumulated and had, over and above, at his death, and it was said that from this instruction the jury must have understood that the amount of the probable net earnings of the deceased was to form the basis for determining the amount of the verdict, and it was said that the jury should not have been required to estimate the loss to the estate of the deceased by his death, on the basis of what his accumulations had been at that time. See other Iowa cases, infra, d.

d. Accumulations.

In many jurisdictions, the rule obtains that the measure of damages to the estate of a deceased person for his wrongful or negligent death is to be based on the accumulations he would have made to his estate had he lived out his life expectancy, and his earning power is only considered to the extent that it bears on the matter of accumulations.

A statute authorizing compensation for the negligent destruction of a person's life, the amount to cover compensation to relatives who have sustained damage or loss thereby, and providing that, where the decedent left no husband, wife, minor child, or other person dependent upon him for support, the measure of damages should be the pecuniary value of the life of the decedent to his prospective estate, not including or having any relation to physical or other suffering of the decedent or his relatives, or claims of anyone for present or future support or solatium, entitles to the recovery of compensation, based upon the present worth of the decedent's life to an estimated prospective estate, being what he probably would have earned and saved after reaching majority, and during his life expectancy. Stulmuller v. Cloughly (1882) 58 Iowa, 738, 13 N. W. 55.

In Kelley v. Central R. Co. (1888) 48 Fed. 663, it is held that, under the Iowa statute, the damage recoverable for wrongful death is the amount that probably would have been saved to the decedent's estate had he lived, taking into consideration his occupation, age, and habits as to sobriety, industry, and economy, or the amount of his property and the probable duration of his life. And see Morris v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1885) 26 Fed. 22, holding that under the statutes of Iowa providing that, if a person is killed through an accident caused by negligence on the part of another, the pecuniary damages caused to his estate by his death may be recovered in a suit by the administrator of his estate, the jury should take into consideration the age of deceased at the time of his death and his probable accumulations or net earnings after allowing for all expenses.

It has been held that in assessing the damages to the estate of the deceased there is also to be taken into consideration the fact that in the natural course of events the deceased was liable to have died at any time, and there was no certainty that he would have lived out his life expectancy, for it is neither just nor equitable to sum up the probable gross earnings of the deceased for his lifetime, and ignore the items of necessary food, clothing, etc., and give no consideration to the fact that old age and sickness may impair the decedent's ability to labor and produce. Grace v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1911) 153 Iowa, 418, 133 N. W. 672; Wheelen v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1892) 85 Iowa, 167, 52 N. W. 119; Simonson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1878) 49 Iowa, 87.

So, under a statute giving a right of action to the personal representative to secure compensation to those who have sustained damage or loss by reason of the death of a person, caused by the fault of another, where the decedent left no husband, wife, minor child, or other person dependent upon him for support, the measure of damages is the pecuniary value of the life of the decedent to his prospective estate, not including or having any relation to physical or other suffering to the decedent or his relatives, or claims of anyone for present or future support or solatium. Such damage is the present worth of the decedent's life to an estimated prospective estate that he probably would have earned and saved after becoming of age, and during his life expectancy, to be left at his death. A determination of the amount of such damages requires a consideration of the contingency whether the decedent probably would have lived to become of age, and to some given time afterwards, as well as an estimate of the value of the estate he probably would have earned and saved after becoming of age, and would probably have left at the end of his life expectancy, and also an estimate of the present money value of the decedent's life to the estimated prospective estate. Among other elements to be considered are age, mental capacity, habits of life and industry, thrift, means, business, earnings, health, probable duration of life, skill and environment, and reasonable expectations. FLORIDA EAST COAST R. Co. v. HAYES (reported herewith) ante, 1310.

MacFeat v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. (1904) 5 Penn. (Del.) 52, 62 Atl. 898, holds that the measure of recovery for wrongful death, in an action by the personal representative of the decedent, is such sum as the decedent would probably have earned during his life expectancy, and have left as his estate at the time of his death, taking into consideration his age, reasonable probability of life, his ability and disposition to labor, habits of living and expenditure. To the same effect is DiPrisco v. Wilmington City R. Co. (1904) 4 Penn. (Del.) 527, 57 Atl. 906.

And see Skonieczny v. Churchman (1905) 7 Penn. (Del.) 226, 78 Atl. 634, holding that in an action by the personal representative to recover for a child's death, the damage recoverable is such a sum as will represent the amount the deceased would have accumulated at the end of his life, and left to be divided among his heirs, considering his condition and probability of life.

In Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Hayes (1913) 66 Fla. 589, 64 So. 274, it is held that, for the wrongful death of his decedent, the administrator may recover only the present monetary worth of decedent's life to an estimated prospective estate, to compensate for the estate the deceased would probably have accumulated had he lived out his life expectancy. And see Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Bowden (1907) 54 Fla. 461, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451, 45 So. 755, holding that where there is no widow or husband, minor child or dependent, surviving the deceased, and his personal representative sues for his death under the statute authorizing such suit under the circumstances, the rights of the personal representative are to be determined by the laws regulating the rights and duties of the administrator, where same are not defined in the statute authorizing the suit. As damages, he may recover the value to decedent's estate of the prospective earnings and savings that the evidence shows could have been expected had the decedent continued to live.

Hammer v. Janowitz (1906) 131 Iowa, 20, 108 N. W. 109, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 324, holds that the measure of damages to the decedent's estate for his wrongful death is not a sum which, placed at interest, will yield an amount necessary for the support of his family, but is such an amount as the evidence shows the decedent would have saved and accumulated had he lived out his full expectancy, based on his age, health, ability to earn money, and habits as to industry, thrift, and economy.

In Neal v. Sheffield Brick & Tile Co. (1911) 151 Iowa, 690, 130 N. W. 398, it is pointed out that while the probable net earnings of the deceased should form the basis for determining the amount of the verdict for his wrongful death, the jury should not be required to estimate the loss of the deceased on the basis of what his accumulations had been at that time.

In Carlson v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (1891) 21 Or. 450, 28 Pac. 497, it is held that in an action to recover damages for wrongful death for the benefit of the estate of the decedent, as distinguished from the beneficiaries, under a statute somewhat similar to Lord Campbell's Act, the proper measure of damages is the pecuniary loss suffered by the estate without any solatium for the grief and anguish of surviving relatives, or pain and suffering of the deceased, and that loss is the amount which the deceased would probably have earned by his intellectual or bodily labor in his business or profession during the residue of his life, and which, as representing his net savings, would have gone to the benefit of his estate, taking into consideration his age, ability and disposition to labor, and his habits of living and expenditure.

But, in Carter v. North Carolina R. Co. (1905) 139 N. C. 500, 52 S. E. 642, it is pointed out that to deduct not only the reasonable personal expenses of the deceased, but also the amount spent for his family or those dependent on him, would deprive the families of a very large majority of men from recovering any damages for their death. The court said: "But a small number of men accumulate estates. Their income or earnings, after paying their actual personal expenses, are expended in the support and education of their children. Certainly, it was not contemplated that for wrongfully causing the death of such a man no damage could be recovered, although his death deprives his family of their sole support, while for the death of one without any family, or who, by miserly living and hoarding, deprives his family of support and education, large damages should be awarded. It cannot, with any show of truth, be said that in the first case the family sustain no pecuniary loss by reason of the death of the husband and father. Such a construction of the statute would place beyond the protection of the law nine tenths of the people."

In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. McCloskey (1854) 23 Pa. 526, 12 Am. Neg. Cas. 548, it is pointed out that it would be wrong to limit the value of a man's life to his probable accumulations, "for many men make none in a lifetime, and many have arrived at an age when they no longer attempt to make any, and many women never make any; and yet everyone is entitled to his life, and we have as yet discovered no standard for its valuation.

It is not human possessions that are destroyed, but humanity itself; and as this has no market value, it must necessarily be very much a matter of human feeling. Hard, then, as the task may be, and however uncertain its results, it is to be performed by the jury, aided by the cautions and counsels of the judge, who has been trained in the consideration of juridical questions. Looking, on the one hand, to the dignity of human nature, as it has been assailed, and on the other to the position and rights of the defendant, and considering the dignity of their positions as judges of most sacred right, and their own dignity and responsibility as individuals, and loving mercy even while doing justice, the jury must place a money value upon the life of a fellow being, very much as they would upon his health or reputation. The law can furnish no definite measure for damages that are essentially indefinite."

e. Other considerations.

In jurisdictions where the earning capacity of the deceased is taken into account, there is no exact rule of law for determining compensation for the pecuniary loss to the estate of the decedent by the destruction of his earning capacity. The amount must be left largely to the judgment and common sense of the jury. They may take into consideration the age of the deceased at the time of his death, his health and strength, probable length of life, the business he was engaged in, his habits as to sobriety and industry, his earning capacity at the time of his death, and fix such sum as, being now paid in a lump, and being freed from all the contingencies and uncertainties that inhere in human life, will fairly compensate his estate for what it has been deprived of in the way of the earnings or accumulations of deceased had he lived out his life expectancy.

Cas. 1916C, 661, it is said that the rule of damages for a death, while sound in principle, in application is beset with many difficulties, since it calls for an estimate or conclusion which must be arrived at by the balancing of mere probabilities and possibilities deduced by way of inference from the age, character, habits, condition, education, employment, surroundings, and apparent capacity of the deceased. It has been said that the only fixed rule to follow in awarding damages for a wrongful death is that all the elements are to be considered which in their nature affect the value of a human life, as such elements appear in evidence. Korab v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1918) 165 Iowa, 1, 146 N. W. 765, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 637.

In Walters v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1878) 36 Iowa, 458, it is held that, under a statute giving a right of action to the personal representative of a person whose death results from a wrongful act to recover damages for the estate of the decedent, except that under certain circumstances it shall not be subject to his debts, the measure of damage is such as resulted to decedent's estate, and an estimate thereof may be based upon evidence of decedent's occupation, health, habits, etc., and this rule applies with equal force where the decedent is a minor.

In Putman v. Southern P. Co. (1891) 21 Or. 230, 27 Pac. 1033, it is held that, where the statute provides that the damage recoverable is to be administered as other personal property of the deceased, the recovery is the loss of the estate through the death of the decedent, and this is measured, as nearly as can be, by the value of the life lost. As a basis for estimating the damages, the expectancy of life of the deceased, his age, health, habits, occupation or earnings, etc., are important elements to be considered.

In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. McCloskey (1854) 23 Pa. 526, 12 Am. Neg. Cas. 548, it is held that under the Pennsylvania Statute of 1851, which, by one section, provides that an action commenced for personal injuries shall not abate by the plaintiff's death, but shall survive by a substitution of the personal representative, and, by another section, that if no suit for damages for personal injury is brought during life by the person injured, then the widow, and if there be no widow, the personal representative, may maintain an action, etc., the measure of damages must necessarily be based upon the value of the life lost, and not upon the pecuniary loss to designated representatives. In estimating these damages, the jury may compute them by the probable accumulations of a man of such age, habits, health, and pursuits as the deceased, during what would probably have been his lifetime.

In Kelly v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1908) 188 Iowa, 273, 128 Am. St. Rep. 195, 114 N. W. 536, it is held not to be error to refuse to charge the jury, in effect, that in estimating the damages to the decedent's estate they should allow nothing for his pain and suffering, or by way of exemplary damages, but should take into consideration his age at the time of his death, his ability, if any, to earn money, his expectancy, accumulations of property, and other circumstances affording any aid in establishing the present value of his life to his estate, where the court did very fairly and fully state to the jury the general rule that the loss or damage which the plaintiff was entitled to recover, if the issues were found in his favor, was the loss or damage occasioned to the estate of the decedent by the premature death, taking into consideration his age, health, occupation, earnings, his ability to earn, and other matters in evidence tending to show the extent of his loss, and that in arriving at such a result consideration should be given to the fact that the sum allowed was to be paid at once, and not at the end of the decedent's expectancy of life.

In Kansas P. R. Co. v. Cutter (1877) 19 Kan. 88, 9 Am. Neg. Cas. 355, it is held that the jury may consider the relations between the decedent and his next of kin, the amount of his property, the character of his business, and the prospect of increase or decrease of wealth likely to accrue to a man of such business and means.

There should be taken into consideration the condition of the decedent's health at the time of the injury which resulted in his death, including any ailments or diseases with which he was afflicted, and also the possibility or probability that, had he lived out his life expectancy, he would not have become a producer of more wealth, but the consumer of some of the wealth he had already produced. Underwood v. Old Colony Street R. Co. (1911) 83 R. I. 319, 80 Atl. 390.

Where the action is by the administrator to recover for the benefit of the estate, and the evidence shows that the decedent's health, habits, or other conditions of life were such that he had no reasonable expectation of an estate, the recovery is merely nominal. Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Bowden (1907) 54 Fla. 461, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 451, 45 So. 755.

In Simonson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1878) 49 Iowa, 87, it is said that if a man is killed whose earnings have been large, but who has retired from business with no intention of resuming, it is not certain that he is injured with reference to his prospective estate because of his wrongful death; yet, because he might resume his business, the jury would not be justified, where a cause of action existed for the injury, in allowing nothing for the injury sustained by the decedent in reference to his prospective estate.

And see Kinser v. Soap Creek Coal Co. (1892) 85 Iowa, 26, 51 N. W. 1151, declaring that the damages allowable are not the subject of exact computation, but are largely a matter of speculation, that the loss to the estate of the deceased is to be estimated from the probable duration of his life, his habits as to industry, his health, character, employment, his earnings, and other facts and circumstances pertinent to the inquiry, and that there is to be taken into consideration, in connection therewith, the contingency of sickness, old age, etc.

In Grace v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1911) 153 Iowa, 418, 133 N. W. 672, it is held that the jury are limited to the consideration of the present pecuniary loss to the decedent's estate resulting from his death. In assessing same, they may take into consideration the decedent's age, occupation, habits, condition of health, ability to earn money, habits as to industry, and probable duration of life, in connection with the fact that the deceased, in the natural course of events, was liable to die at any time, and there was no certainty that he would have lived until the end of his expectancy.

Where the damages recoverable for death by a wrongful act are those resulting from the death of deceased to his estate, his age, health, habits, and disposition and capacity to labor and make and save money and acquire property must be considered, and also all losses to his estate, or creditors or next of kin to whom it belongs, and for whose benefit the action is allowed, as may be fairly implied from the cessation of his life. It does not, however, include items of expense for the sickness and burial of the deceased. Holland v. Brown (1888) 13 Sawy. 284, 35 Fed. 43.

IV. Pain and suffering.

By the great weight of authority, where the statute provides for the survival of a cause of action for wrongfully causing the death of a human being, the recovery to be in behalf of the testator's estate, the damages recoverable are such as the decedent himself might have recovered had he survived, and hence it includes any pain and suffering he endured because of the injury.

In Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Maxwell (1910) 61 Tex. Civ. App. 80, 128 S. A recovery for the mental anguish and physical suffering of the deceased can only be in behalf of his estate. Such damage cannot be included in the recovery in behalf of the decedent's widow. Smith v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1914) 42 Okla. 577, 142 Pac. 398.

Beeler v. Butte & L. Copper Development Co. 41 Mont. 465, 110 Pac. 528, holds that where the statute provides that the right of action, where death results from the injury, shall survive to and may be prosecuted by the heirs of the deceased, the measure of recovery is the same as though he had lived and prosecuted the action, and may include damages for pain and suffering endured by him, and also damages for diminished and lost earning capacity for the period of his natural expectancy.

For the pain and suffering of the decedent in his lifetime, his personal representative is entitled to recover to the same extent as the decedent might have recovered if he had survived, and had obtained perfect and permanent relief at the moment of his death. Hansford v. Payne (1875) 11 Bush (Ky.) 380. And see Covington Street R. Co. v. Packer (1872) 9 Bush (Ky.) 455, 15 Am. Rep. 725, declaring that the statutory provision permitting the personal representative of a person whose life is lost to institute suit to recover damages in the same manner that the person himself might have done for the injury, had death not ensued, authorized a recovery, as part of the actual damages sustained, for the physical and mental suffering of the deceased caused by the injury, and also his loss of services up to his death, but it does not authorize a recovery for mental suffering of any third person because of such injury.

In some jurisdictions a narrower construction is placed upon the term "pecuniary loss," and it is held to allow compensation only for the destruction of the decedent's earning capacity, and not to include compensation for his pain and suffering.

Thus, in Kinser v. Soap Creek Coal Co. (1892) 85 Iowa, 26, 51 N. W. 1151, it is held that, under the Iowa statute, the measure of damages is different in an action brought originally by the person injured and prosecuted to judgment after his death by the administrator of his estate, and where the action is originally brought by the administrator. In the first case, the jury are authorized to allow damages for bodily pain and mental anguish of the person injured. In the latter action, however, no damages are to be allowed for the pain and suffering. Followed in Jacobs v. Glucose Sugar Ref. Co. (1905) 140 Fed. 766, applying Iowa statute.

In Spaulding v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. (1896) 98 Iowa, 205, 67 N. W. 227, it is also held that nothing is to be allowed for the pain and suffering of the deceased, or for the wounded feelings or grief of his next of kin. In this state the damages recoverable are the pecuniary loss to the estate of the decedent.

And see Carlson v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (1892) 21 Or. 450, 28 Pac. 497, holding that, where the recovery is limited to the pecuniary loss suffered by the estate of the decedent, there can be no recovery for his pain and suffering. Wellman v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (1892) 21 Or. 580, 28 Pac. 625, following 21 Or. 450.

In Kansas P. R. Co. v. Cutter (1877) 19 Kan. 83, 9 Am. Neg. Cas. 355, it is held that the measure of damages in an action by a personal representative for the wrongful death of his decedent is compensation for the pecuniary loss to his estate. Unless exemplary damages are awarded, the pain and suffering of the decedent are not included.

It has been held that the ordinary grounds of damage, where the cause of action for personal injury survives to the personal representative, and is prosecuted by him, are the expenses of the board, nursing, and medical aid incident to the injury, and compensation for the loss of time and mental and physical pain of the deceased. Kennedy v. Standard Sugar Refinery Co. (1878) 125 Mass. 90, 28 Am. Rep. 214; Corliss v. Worcester, N. & R. R. Co. (1885) 63 N. H. 404; Belding v. Black Hills & Ft. P. R. Co. (1892) 3 S. D. 369, 58 N. W. 750; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Goode (1914) 42 Okla. 784, L.R.A.1915E, 1141, 142 Pac. 1185; Ehlers v. Automobile Liability Co. (1919) 169 Wis. 494, 173 N. W. 325.

The expense of nursing the decedent may be included in the damages recoverable for his death. Muldowney v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1873) 36 Iowa, 462. Also burial expenses. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Goode (1914) 42 Okla. 784, L.R.A.1915E, 1141, 142 Pac. 1185. Especially where, by statute, they are made a debt of the decedent's estate. Ehlers v. Automobile Liability Co. (Wis.) supra. See Herning v. Holt Lumber Co. (1913) 153 Wis. 101, 140 N. W. 1102, holding that, where the burial expenses of the decedent are by statute made a debt of his estate, they may be included as part of the damages accruing to decedent from the injury resulting in his death.

It has been held that, while funeral expenses of the decedent, as a whole, are not to be taken into account in assessing the damage to the estate of the deceased for his wrongful death, the interest on the funeral expenses for the term of the life expectancy of the deceased may be taken into account. This holding is upon the ground that the estate of the deceased, at some time, will have to bear his funeral expenses, and hence this expense cannot properly be chargeable to the injury complained of, but since the injury did have the effect of accelerating the time when the estate had to bear this expense, to this extent the loss may be ascribed to the injury. Brady v. Haw (1919) — Iowa, —, 174 N. W. 381.

And see Holland v. Brown (1888) 13 Sawy. 284, 35 Fed. 43, holding that when damages to the estate of decedent for his wrongful death become assets of the estate, they include only what is consequent on the death, and therefore no allowance can be made for expenses of illness and burial. And in Wilcox v. Wilmington City R. Co. (1899) 2 Penn. (Del.) 157, 44 Atl. 686, it is held that the recovery cannot include the funeral expenses of the decedent. And see to the same effect, the reported case (FLORIDA EAST COAST R. Co. v. HAYES, ante, 1310).

And see also Gates v. Beebe (1912) 170 Mich. 107, 135 N. W. 934, holding that an administratrix, suing under the Survival Statute to recover for her husband's death, is not entitled to recover the amount expended for medical attention for the deceased.

VI. Where deceased was a married woman.

It is to be remembered that the scope of the note, as outlined at the beginning, excludes the measure of damages for the death of a married woman under statutes which provide for the recovery of damages sustained by the statutory beneficiaries.

In actions to recover compensation for the benefit of the estate of a married woman for her wrongful or negligent death, in assessing the damage, her earning capacity is, of course, to be considered; but there is also to be taken into consideration the fact that her husband is entitled to her services. The loss in this regard is to be assessed, after giving due weight to both of these elements.

In Wilcox v. Wilmington City R. Co. (1899) 2 Penn. (Del.) 157, 44 Atl. 686, it is held that in an action by the personal representative for the death of his decedent, a married woman, the amount recovered cannot include her funeral expenses, nor the value of her services to her husband, but only compensation for the destruction of her earning capacity, independent of the rights of the husband.

Stulmuller v. Cloughly (1882) 58 Iowa, 738, 13 N. W. 55, holds that the jury should not be instructed that, in assessing the damages to the estate of a married woman by reason of her wrongful death, they should be assessed as though she were unmarried, since part of a woman's time must be devoted to her family.

It has been held that, where a married woman had no independent business or occupation, no damage can be recovered for the benefit of her estate for her wrongful death, since, as a mere housewife or homemaker, her services belong to her husband, and hence it cannot be presumed that she would have accumulated any estate had she lived out her life expectancy. Nolte v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1914) 165 Iowa, 721, 147 N. W. 192.

In an action for damage to the estate of a married woman by her wrongful death, the value of her time cannot be recovered for, since this belongs to her husband. Grand Trunk Western R. Co. v. Gilpin (1918) 125 C. C. A. 278, 208 Fed. 126.

Where a married woman is engaged in business independently of her husband, recovery may be had for her wrongful death, based upon the accumulation that she would be presumed to have made to her estate had she lived out her life expectancy. Niemeyer v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (1909) 143 Iowa, 129, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 408, 136 Am. St. Rep. 752, 121 N. W.

521; Fleming v. Shenandoah (1885) 67 Iowa, 505, 56 Am. St. Rep. 354, 25 N. W. 752.

In Walker v. Lansing & Suburban Traction Co. (1909) 156 Mich. 514, 121 N. W. 271, it is held that where a husband recovered as his damage for the wrongful death of his wife, compensation for the loss of her services and for his expenses attending her injury, he cannot subsequently, as the administrator of her estate, maintain an action to recover damage to her estate for her wrongful death, based upon her pain and suffering and the destruction of her earning power. The holding as to the pain and suffering of the decedent was based upon a statute which remained in force but a short time, and which included recovery for pain and suffering in survival actions. The denial of the right to recover for the destruction of the earning power of the deceased was based upon the ground that the testator, by recovering for the loss of decedent's services, had successfully established the fact that she was not emancipated, and that he was entitled to her services because of the marital relation.

In Kentucky & I. T. R. Co. v. Becker (1919) — Ky. —, 214 S. W. 900, on the basis that the only damage recoverable is for the destruction of the earning power of the deceased, a married woman engaged merely in performing her household duties, it is held that evidence of the decedent's age and health, and as to the household duties she performed, was sufficient to support a substantial verdict. The court said: "It is true, of course, such evidence does not furnish figures from which $16,000, or any other sum, may be adduced as the value of deceased's earning capacity, yet she had earning capacity that defendants negligently destroyed, the value of which her administrator is entitled to recover, even in the absence of direct proof as to value."

(41 R. I. 393, 103 Atl. 1029.)

Damages — for wrongful death of minor.

The damages recoverable by the next of kin for wrongful death of a minor are the present value of the gross amount of his prospective earnings less what he would have had to lay out as a producer to render the service or acquire the money and also less the money which he would have earned during minority.

CERTIFICATION by the Superior Court for Providence and Bristol Counties for determination by the Supreme Court of a question arising in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiffs' son alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmative answer returned.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Comstock & Canning and Henry C. Hart, for plaintiffs:

The damages are to be measured by ascertaining the gross amount of the prospective income or earnings of deceased based upon his expectancy of life, after deducting therefrom what he would have to lay out as a producer to render services or to acquire the money or income that he might be expected to produce, computing such expenses according to his situation in life, his means and personal habits, and reducing the net result so obtained to its present value.

Mr. John Henshaw, for defendants:
The measure of damages in this state is strictly limited to the pecuniary loss which the parents sustain by reason of being deprived of the child's services during his minority.

Sweetland, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass on the case for negligence to recover damages for the death of one Luigi Dimitri, alleged to have been caused by the wrongful neglect of the defendants and their servants.

The plaintiffs allege that they are respectively the father and the mother, and are all of the next of kin of said Luigi Dimitri, deceased; that they are suing by force of the statute as the next of kin of said Luigi for the benefit of all of his next of kin; that no executor or administrator has been appointed to administer his estate; and that said Luigi at the time of his injury and death was twenty years, ten months, and nineteen days old. The case is before us solely with reference to the proper measure of damages applicable thereto. The specific point is set forth in a question of law certified by the superior court to this court for determination. The question is as follows: "In a case of the character of the one herein, are the damages to be measured by ascertaining the gross amount of the prospective income or earnings of the said Luigi Dimitri, the plaintiffs' intestate, based upon his expectancy of life, after deducting therefrom what said deceased would have to lay out as a producer to render services or to acquire the money or income that he might be expected to produce, computing such expenses according to his situation in life, his means and personal habits, and then reducing the net result so obtained to its present value?"

The defendants contend that, as the deceased was a minor, the damages recoverable are limited to the pecuniary loss which the father of said Luigi sustained by reason of being deprived of his child's services during the child's minority; and they rely upon the authority of Schnable v. Providence Public Market, 24 R. I. 477, 53 Atl. 634. That case has generally been followed in practice since its determination, and has been approved in the later cases of Powell v. Rousseau, 38 R. I. 295, 94 Atl. 867, and Russo v. Rhode Island Co. 38 R. I. 323, 95 Atl. 666. Schnable v. Providence Public Market was an action brought by a father to recover under the statute for the death of his minor child, five years old, alleged to have been caused by the wrongful neglect of the defendant. In its opinion the court said: "In an action of this sort the parent can only recover the net value of the child's services during his minority."

The contention of the plaintiffs is that the rule for measuring damages in all cases brought under the statute to recover for the death of a person caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another, whether the deceased be a minor or an adult, is that laid down in McCabe v. Narragansett Electric Lighting Co. 26 R. I. 427, 59 Atl. 112, as follows: "It is obvious, too, that the loss sustained by the plaintiff here is the present value of the net result remaining after his personal expenses are deducted from his income or earnings. To ascertain this it is, of course, necessary to ascertain first the gross amount of such prospective income or earnings, then to deduct therefrom what the deceased would have to lay out as a producer to render the service or to acquire the money that he might be expected to produce, computing such expenses according to his station in life, his means and personal habits, and then to reduce the net result so obtained to its present value."

wrongful death

This rule has since been followed without exception in this state in every case brought under the statute to recover damages for the death of an adult. Reynolds v. Narragansett Electric Lighting Co. 26 R. I. 457, 59 Atl. 393; Sebille v. Dunn, — R. I. —, 99 Atl. 831, and many other unreported cases. If the rule in the McCabe Case is one of general application, appropriate in an action involving the death of a minor as well as in one to recover for the death of an adult, then the rule of the Schnable Case and that of the McCabe Case are clearly in conflict. Both actions were brought under the same statute, which statute is the foundation of the case at bar.

Prior to 1846 no action could be maintained at common law to recover for a death caused by the wrongful act of another. Then Parliament enacted the English statute of 9 & 10 Victoria, chapter 93, known as Lord Campbell's Act. This was "An Act for Compensating the Families of Persons Killed by Accidents." As was pointed out in Lubrano v. Atlantic Mills, 19 R. I. 129, 34 L.R.A. 797, 32 Atl. 205, Lord Campbell's Act was not for the benefit of an estate, but for the family. Said act provided that "the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom or for whose benefit such action shall be brought."

And it was provided that the amount recovered should be divided among said parties in such shares as the jury should direct. After Lord Campbell's Act the states of this country, generally, passed statutes providing for recovery against a person or persons causing the death of another by wrongful act, neglect, or default. The provisions of these acts differ widely. Some clearly have the same purpose as the English act. They give to the parties for whose benefit an action is provided pecuniary compensation for the loss which they have suffered through the death of the deceased. In others, the action provided may be regarded as one brought in behalf of the decedent's estate to recover the value of the decedent's life, with the provision that the amount recovered shall be distributed among certain named beneficiaries as the statute directs. Such distribution, however, is made without reference to any special pecuniary loss which the beneficiaries may have suffered by reason of the decedent's death. In 1853 the original Rhode Island statute, providing for a recovery on account of a death by wrongful act, was passed. This act has been amended and rearranged from time to time until, when Schnable v. Providence Public Market, supra, was decided in 1902, it was substantially in the form in which it now appears as § 14, chap. 283, Gen. Laws 1909. Said section, so far as it relates to the question before us, is as follows:

"Sec. 14. Whenever the death of a person shall be caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, the person who, or the corporation which, would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to a felony. Every such action shall be brought by and in the name of the executor or administrator of such deceased person, whether appointed or qualified within or without the state, and the amount recovered in every such action shall one half thereof go to the husband or widow, and one half thereof to the children of the deceased, and if there be no children the whole shall go to the husband or widow, and, if there be no husband or widow, to the next of kin, in the proportion provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal property left by persons dying intestate: Provided, that every such action shall be commenced within two years after the death of such person. If there is no executor or administrator, or if, there being one, no action is brought in his name within six months after the death, one action may be brought in the names of all the beneficiaries, either by all, or by part stating that they sue for the benefit of all, and stating their respective relations to the deceased."

The answer which should be given to the question before us depends upon the view we take as to the purpose of our statute. Is it intended to provide recovery in order to compensate the beneficiaries for the loss which they have suffered, or is it an action in behalf of the decedent's estate? If the former, then the decision in the Schnable Case is based upon a sound principle, although perhaps not entirely in accord with the weight of authority in some particulars. Said decision appears to have been rendered after a consideration of a number of cases from other jurisdictions, which cases are cited in the opinion and are considered by the court as having been brought "under statutes similar to ours." It appears from an examination that such statutes are generally of the class which follows Lord Campbell's Act, and provide for the recovery of compensation for the pecuniary loss which results from the decedent's death to the person or persons for whose benefit the action is brought.

In McCabe v. Narragansett Electric Lighting Co: 27 R. I. 272, 61 Atl. 667, the court considered the plaintiff's motion for a reargument after the opinion reported in 26 R. I. 427, 59 Atl. 112, supra, analyzed at length the provisions of our statute, and considered its nature and purpose. The court then reached the conclusion that our statute differs widely from Lord Campbell's Act and the Canada statute of the same kind; that an action under our statute "should be considered as though it were brought in behalf of the estate of the decedent for the damage to that estate caused by the death in question." The reasoning upon which this conclusion is based appears to us to be sound, and, as we have said above, it has been adopted without question in all later cases when the decedent has been of full age. Should a different view of the purpose of the statute be taken, when the decedent is a minor? The statute in its language makes no distinction, and in our opinion a difference in construction, based upon a difference in the ages of decedents, would be entirely unwarranted. If in the case of a minor the recovery provided in the act is for damages to the minor's estate, as we believe it is, then we are forced to the conclusion that the rule for the measurement of damages stated in the Schnable Case is based upon a misconception of the purpose of the act; for that rule proceeds upon the theory that the recovery by the parent is for the pecuniary loss which the parent has suffered by being deprived of the services of his minor child during that child's minority.

After a full consideration of the matter we have reached the opinion that the rule of Schnable v. Providence Public Market is erroneous, and that in so far as said case deals with the measurement of damages it should be overruled. Sweet v. Providence & S. R. Co. 20 R. I. 785, 40 Atl. 237, was an action brought to recover damages caused by the death of a minor, and was decided in 1890. In that case this court apparently took a position as to the purpose of the Rhode Island statute not in accord with the later opinion in Schnable v. Providence Public Market; for in the Sweet Case the court held that the Carlisle Life Tables were properly introduced at the trial. If recovery is to be limited to damages caused by the loss of a child's services during minority, then the child's expectancy of life is immaterial.

In the consideration of cases brought under statutes similar to ours, the courts in a number of jurisdictions have reached conclusions in accord with that which we have here expressed. *Nelson v. v. Hayes, 67 Fla. 101, ante, 1310, 64 So. 504.

As the deceased was a minor, the amount of his earnings during minority should not be considered in ascertaining the gross amount of his prospective income or earnings, unless it appears that during minority he had been emancipated, in which latter case the amount of his earnings up to the time of his emancipation should not be considered in the computation. For if he had lived, and had not been emancipated, such income or earnings would have belonged to his father until the minor reached the age of twenty-one years; hence the loss of earnings until that time forms no part of the damage to his estate, caused by his death.

With the proviso contained in the above suggestion we answer the question certified in the affirmative.

The papers in the case, with this decision certified thereon, are sent back to the Superior Court for further proceedings.

ANNOTATION.

Measure of damage recoverable in behalf of the estate of an infant for his wrongful death.

The general question of the measure of damages recoverable for the benefit of the estate of a person killed through the wrongful or negligent act of another is the subject of a note appended to Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Hayes, ante, 1310, and see references therein to notes on related subjects. The question here under discussion is limited to the damage recoverable for the benefit of the estate of an infant, and does not include damages recoverable in behalf of his parents or other beneficiaries.

New Hampshire. — Carney v. Concord Street R. Co. (1903) 72 N. H. 364, 57 Atl. 218.

It has been held that the fact that the child's death occurred before he became a wage earner does not foreclose inquiry as to the practical value of his services. In such case a wide latitude must be allowed in the admission of testimony as to the child's status, future prospects, vocation, or remuneration which might reasonably be expected to be open to him. Love v. Detroit, J. & C. R. Co. (Mich.) supra.

Linss v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (Fed.) supra, holds that under the Kentucky statute, where the deceased person is an infant, the jury cannot take into consideration his earning power until he has reached his majority, nor can they consider the cost of his maintenance during this period. But see Kentucky cases hereafter referred to.

In Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Hayes (Fla.) supra, it is said that "the administrator as a legal representative of the decedent's estate can sustain no loss or damage by reason of the wrongful death except the pecuniary value of the life to the prospective estate of the decedent, which damage or loss does not include, and has no relation to, physical or other suffering of the decedent or his relatives, or to claims of anyone for present or future support or solatium. Such loss or damage to the estate is wholly monetary, and any compensation therefor, after the payment of debts, passes to the decedent's general heirs as of the end of his life expectancy, to compensate for the estate that the decedent probably would have accumulated to leave at his death to such general heirs. . . . Where the decedent was an infant, the loss or damage to the estate would not begin until after the time he would have become of age, since under the statute the father recovers for the loss of his minor child's service to the adult age, as well as for the mental pain and suffering of the parents caused by the infant's wrongful death."

In Carney v. Concord Street R. Co. (N. H.) supra, it is held that the damage recoverable for the death of an infant in behalf of the latter's estate is to be based upon not only the earning capacity of the deceased, but there is also to be taken into account the mental and physical pain of the deceased, and the expenses occasioned by the injury. As to the earning capacity, it is pointed out that when the deceased is an infant of tender years, "he has no present capacity for earning money for himself or anyone else; but the capacity referred to is not limited to the time of death; it is the capacity that would exist during life but for the injury. Besides the physical incapacity of an infant, he is under a legal incapacity to earn money for himself or his estate during his minority; for, unless he has been emancipated, his earnings belong to his father, if living, or in case of the father's death, to the mother,—a right arising from the duty of the parent to support and educate the child."

In assessing the damage to the estate of an infant for his negligent death, in most jurisdictions the fact is taken into account that until the infant reaches his majority his services belong to his parents and hence no part of his earnings would go toward the creation of his estate during this period of time. Therefore account is taken only of earnings or accumulations between the time the decedent would have reached his majority and the termination of his life expectancy.

In Walters v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1873) 36 Iowa, 458, supra, it is held that where the decedent is a minor, computation of the life expectancy should be made from the date of the decedent's death, and not from the time when he would have reached his majority, although the recovery dates from this time. To the same effect, see Whelan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1892) 85 Iowa, 167, 52 N. W. 119, supra. In Hively v. Webster County, 117 Iowa, 672, 91 N. W. 1041, 12 Am.

Neg. Rep. 590, it is held that for the death of a young child the measure of damages to his estate is the present worth of his life to his estate; nothing can be computed for the time prior to the majority of the child; hence the recovery ought not to exceed the present worth of the damages which would be allowed for the wrongful death of a person with similar prospects in life at majority.

In some jurisdictions account is apparently not taken of the fact that the deceased was a minor, and hence his service would have belonged to his parents had he survived the injury causing his death, and the damage for his death is assessed upon the basis of the prospective earning capacity of the deceased without reference to his age.

Thus in Russell v. Windsor S. B. Co. (1900) 126 N. C. 961, 36 S. E. 191, it is held that under a statute providing for the recovery of such damages as are fair and just compensation for the pecuniary injury resulting from the death complained of, there is no distinction in the application of the rule between the death of a child and of an adult. The court said that "the measure of damages is the same; but we frankly admit that the difficulty of its application is greatly increased in the case of an infant. Still, the jury must do the best they can, taking into consideration all the circumstances surrounding the life that is lost, and relying upon their common knowledge and common sense to determine the weight and effect of the evidence. Where life is lost by reason of the actionable negligence of another, the measure of damages is the present value of the net pecuniary worth of the life of the deceased, to be ascertained by deducting the probable cost of his own living from the probable gross income derived from his own exertions, based upon his life expectancy." In this case the infant killed was only five years old.

In Gurley v. Southern Power Co. (1916) 172 N. C. 690, 90 S. E. 643, it is held that only right of action for the death of an infant is by the administrator, and the recovery is for the entire loss due to the death including loss of earning capacity both before and after majority. The court said that the question of the right of the parent to a portion of the recovery is between the parent and the administrator.

In Tully v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. (1901) 3 Penn. (Del.) 455, 50 Atl. 95, the court instructed the jury that the measure of damage to the estate of an infant eight years old for its wrongful death was such sum as the deceased would probably have earned in his business during life and which would have gone to his next of kin, taking into consideration the age of the deceased, his ability, disposition to labor, habits of living, and expenditure. And in Gismondi v. People's R. Co. (1911) 2 Boyce (Del.) 577, 83 Atl. 136, a similar instruction was given.

In Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Hawkins (1909) 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 309, 98 C. C. A. 443, 174 Fed. 597, it is held that under a statute authorizing the recovery of such damages as the jury shall deem fair and just, substantial damages are recoverable in behalf of the estate of an infant, about four years old, killed through the negligent act of the defendant. Without specifically pointing out the elements of damage recoverable, it is said that the jury are vested with absolute control over the question of damage, and the courts are clothed with no authority to disturb their findings, and the law requires no measure of damages other than the opinion of the jury guided by all the facts and circumstances in the particular case.

In Kentucky, the measure of damage to the estate of a deceased person for his wrongful death is compensation for the destruction of the decedent's power to earn money. Applying this rule it is held that where the deceased was an infant, the measure of damage is to be computed from the time of his death. In denying the contention that, since the services of an infant belong to the parents until he reaches his majority, in assessing the damage to the estate of an infant his earning power from the time of death until he reaches his majority should not be taken into account, the court said that the fault of this argument lies in the fact that the right of a parent to the services of a child ceases with its death. An award in cases of this character is not for services but for the destruction of the decedent's power to earn money. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Lang (1896) 100 Ky. 221, 38 S. W. 503, 40 S. W. 451, 41 S. W. 271; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Creighton (1899) 106 Ky. 42, 50 S. W. 227; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kimble

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Engleman (Ky.) supra, it is held that since the right of the parents to the services of a child ceases on its death, the administrator of the estate of the child, for its death through negligence, is entitled to recover for the benefit of its estate, damages based on the loss of its earning power from the time of its death. #### Abatement — amount of recovery.

1. Where plaintiff dies from personal injuries for which he brought suit, and the action is revived in the name of an administrator, the latter takes the decedent's place in the litigation, and is entitled to recover for the benefit of the estate what the injured person would have been entitled to recover had he survived his injuries.

— death of plaintiff.

2. Under § 455 of the Code, a pending action for personal injuries does not abate by the death of the plaintiff.

— revival by administrator.

3. Where the plaintiff dies from personal injuries for which he brought suit, the action may be revived by the administrator of his estate and prosecuted to final judgment for the benefit of such estate.

Appeal — immaterial question.

4. On appeal a question not necessary to a decision may be disregarded, though argued by both parties.

Abatement — revival — right to damages.

5. Where the plaintiff dies from personal injuries for which he brought suit, and the action is revived in the name of the administrator of his estate, the damages to which the injured person was entitled follow the order of revivor to the administrator.

Appeal — harmless error.

6. Harmless error in an instruction is not a ground for the reversal of a judgment.

— objection to evidence.

7. To make error available in the overruling of a motion to suppress a deposition, there must be an objection to such deposition when offered in evidence.

— admission of Carlisle tables.

8. A ruling admitting in evidence that part of the Carlisle table showing the expectancy of life at the age of fifty, held not reversible error, under facts stated in the opinion, where there was direct, uncontradicted evidence that the deceased person was fifty years old, though a physician who did not know his age testified: "In my opinion he was in the neighborhood of fifty years of age. I do not think he could have been over 55 years."

— admission of photograph.

9. Admission in evidence of the photograph of a deceased person held not prejudicial to appellant.

[See 2 R. C. L. 247.]

Mr. John J. Sullivan also for appellee.

Mr. W. A. De Bord, amicus curiæ.

Rose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Henry Miller commenced this action August 29, 1910, to recover damages in the sum of $15,000 for personal injuries alleged to have been negligently inflicted upon him by the Omaha Transfer Company on August 27, 1910. At the intersection of Sixteenth and Cuming streets, in Omaha, he was run over and injured by a horse and wagon in charge of a driver in the employ of defendant. From resulting injuries Miller died August 29, 1910, a few hours after his petition had been filed. Later the action was revived in the name of Thomas B. Murray, administrator. After revivor, an amended petition, also demanding damages for Miller's injuries, was filed by the administrator for the benefit of decedent's estate. In an answer to the amended petition, it was admitted that Miller was struck by a horse and wagon of defendant while they were in charge of one of its employees, and that the resulting injuries were fatal; but defendant denied the negligence imputed to it, and pleaded, among other things, that the injuries were caused by carelessness on the part of Miller. From judgment on a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $4,000, defendant has appealed.

The judgment is vehemently assailed in an extended argument directed to propositions that the suit for damages arising from personal injuries abated with the death of the original plaintiff, that the action could not legally be revived for the benefit of the estate of Miller, and that after his death there was no existing cause of action except the statutory one for the benefit of the widow and next of kin. It is asserted that the legislation relating to this subject, when considered together, does not authorize a recovery for the benefit of the estate of Miller in an action by the administrator. In this connection defendant refers to §§ 45, 454, and 455 of the Code, relating to the abatement and the survival of actions; to Lord

Campbell's Act (Comp. Stat. 1911, chap. 21, §§ 1, 2), authorizing a suit for the benefit of the widow and next of kin, who have been deprived of the support of one who came to his death by the wrongful act of another; and to the statute (Comp. Stat. 1911, chap. 15a, § 1) adopting as the law of this state applicable and consistent portions of the common law of England. Counsel for defendant state their position as follows: "Section 455 simply provides: 'No action pending in any court shall abate by the death of either or both the parties thereto,' etc. It is not a survivor law. This statute of abatement, and no other statute of abatement, and no statute of survivor create a new cause of action. The Death Act creates an entirely new cause of action. The beneficiaries are entirely different. The rule of damages is different. Therefore, when Miller died, the cause of action then pending died with him, and a new cause of action for the injuries immediately came into being under the Death Act for the benefit of the widow and next of kin. As, therefore, § 455 does not create a new cause of action, it does not, nor any other provision of the statute, authorize the revivor of a cause of action that has become extinct. Section 455, or any other provision of the statute, was not intended to keep the action alive after the death of the injured party, in favor of attorneys and creditors, and deprive the widow and next of kin of the benefits of the so-called Campbell Act. There is no petition in this case based on the death cause of action." In support of the position thus taken, many cases are cited, among them the following: Brown v. Chattanooga Electric R. Co. 101 Tenn. 252, 70 Am. St. Rep. 666, 684, 47 S. W. 415; Perry v. Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. 1 Boyce (Del.) 399, 77 Atl. 725; Holton v. Daly, 106 Ill. 131; *Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. On the contrary, plaintiff relies on § 455 of the Code, providing: "No action pending in any court shall abate by the death of either or both the parties thereto, except an action for libel, slander, malicious prosecution, assault, or assault and battery, for a nuisance or against a justice of the peace for misconduct in office; which shall abate by the death of the defendant."

It is contended by plaintiff that Miller's action for personal injuries is not included in the enumerated actions which abate by the death of a party; that the right of Miller to recover damages for personal injuries survives; that the administrator takes the decedent's place and is entitled to recover what Miller would have been entitled to recover had he survived his injuries.

It is apparent from an examination of analogous cases that the courts of different states are not harmonious in their rulings on the point in controversy. The question, however, does not seem to be an been held that, under

§ 455 of the Code, a pending action for personal injuries does not abate by the death of the plaintiff. Webster v. Hastings, 59 Neb. 563, 81 N. W. 510; Cleland v. Anderson, 66 Neb. 252, 270, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 136, 92 N. W. 306, 96 N. W.

The statutes, as already construed, make no such exception, and the court should not. Mahoning Valley R. Co. v. Van Alstine, 77 Ohio St. 395, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 893, 83 N. E. 601; Frame v. administrator.

It is further argued that the recovery in favor of Miller's estate for personal injuries, if sanctioned, may subject defendant to double damages in another suit for the benefit of the widow and next of kin. This question is not necessary to a decision. If the allowance of an erroneous measure of recovery has been properly challenged on this appeal, the error will be corrected. The record does not disclose any purpose on behalf of the widow and next of kin to sue defendant for damages for the death of Miller.

the injured person was entitled followed the order of revivor to the administrator of his estate. The correct rule seems to be that the administrator takes the decedent's place in the litigation and is entitled to recover for the benefit of the estate what the injured person would have been entitled to recover had he survived his injuries. The rules for determining the measure of damages, had Miller survived his injuries, are well settled, and there was no substantial departure therefrom in the instructions.

An instruction of considerable length is pointed out as erroneous, because by it "the jury are told that upon certain facts the defendant was guilty of negligence, while other most material facts bearing upon that issue are entirely omitted." There are a number of reasons why the judgment should not be reversed for the giving of the instruction thus criticized:

The overwhelming weight of the evidence tends to show that the negligence of defendant's servant was the proximate cause of Miller's injuries. The charge as a whole directed the jury to consider all of the evidence. They found for plaintiff on the issue of negligence. It seems clear from the whole record that the verdict would not have been different without the instruction criticized. An instruction on the same subject, conforming to defendant's view of the law and the proofs, was not offered. Error is not assigned in a manner conforming to the rules of this court. Other instructions are criticized, but no prejudicial error has been found therein.

Complaint is made because the court below, previously to the trial, overruled a motion to suppress a deposition on behalf of plaintiff. Neither the abstract nor the bill of exceptions shows that the objection to the entire deposition was renewed when it was offered at the trial. Parts of it were read to the jury without objection. This assignment of error is therefore unavailing for the following reason: "Where a motion to suppress a deposition has been erroneously overruled, in order to make such error available, the party against whom such ruling is made must, when such deposition is offered in evidence, object thereto and save his exception." Dawson v. Dawson, 26 Neb. 716, 42 N. W. 744; Starring v. Mason, 4 Neb. 367.

Was that part of the Carlisle table showing the expectancy of life at the age of fifty erroneously admitted in evidence? The affirmative of this question is argued by defendant, and reference is made to the following testimony of a physician in regard to the age of Miller at the time of his death: "In my opinion, he was in the neighborhood of fifty years of age. I do not think he could have been over fifty-five years." It is insisted that the ruling in regard to the Carlisle table took from the jury the question of Miller's age and arbitrarily fixed it at fifty years, while the evidence was that he was about fifty, and not more than fifty-five. This testimony is merely the opinion of a physician who did not know the age of decedent. Defendant offered no proof on that issue, but there is uncontradicted, direct evidence that Miller was fifty at the time of his death. Plaintiff asserted that this was his age, and had a right to prove his expectancy on that basis. To aid the jury in ascertaining the probable duration of life, had death not resulted from violent means, part of the table was introduced. Defendant did not offer tables showing the expectancy of life between the ages of fifty and fifty-five, nor request an instruction limiting them to its view of the evidence as here asserted. In Pearl v. Omaha & St. L. R. Co. 115 Iowa, 535, 88 N. W. 1078, it is said: "The tables, to be admissible, need not show the precise age, but approximately that of the person involved. As defendant did not ask an instruction limiting the force and effect to be given these tables, it is not in a situation to complain of the court's omission to so instruct." On the record presented for review, the ruling under consideration does not seem to call for a reversal.

—admission of

A photograph of Miller, taken after his death, was admitted in evidence, and the ruling is also assailed. Plaintiff attempts to justify the admission of this exhibit by asserting that it was within the discretion of the trial court to admit it as indicating Miller's appearance with respect to age and vigor. However this may be, the jury's consideration of the photograph could only affect the measure of damages. Aside from the questions of negligence and contributory negligence, the manner in which Miller was fatally injured is not in dispute.

Unless the recovery is excessive, prejudicial error does not appear, and no substantial ground for interfering with the verdict as excessive has been found.

Barnes, Letton, and Sedgwick, JJ., not sitting.

A petition for rehearing having been granted, Sedgwick, J., on June 5, 1915, handed down the following additional opinion (98 Neb. 482, 153 N. W. 488):

After our former decision in this case (95 Neb. 175, ante, 1343, 145 N. W. 860), argument was allowed on the measure of damages. Upon this question we have had the assistance, not only of the attorneys engaged in the case, but also of other able attorneys interested in similar cases pending in this and other courts. For this reason, and because of the importance of the question, and the inconsistent, or at least incomplete, provisions of the statute, we have thought it best to state further reasons for our conclusion. The facts are sufficiently stated in our former opinion.

When one is injured in his person by the wrongful act of another, and begins an action to recover damages so sustained, and afterwards dies while his action is pending, what are the elements of damage which can be recovered? Our former opinion holds that, when the "action is revived in the name of an administrator, the latter takes the decedent's place in the litigation, and is entitled to recover for the benefit of the estate what the injured person would have been entitled to recover had he survived his injuries." The opinion cites Webster v. Hastings, 59 Neb. 563, 81 N. W. 510, and other decisions of this court which could not have been determined as they were, unless this is the law. Sections 8022, 8023, Rev. Stat. 1913, are:

"In addition to the causes of action which survive at common law, causes of action for mesne profits, or for an injury to real or personal estate, or for any deceit or fraud, shall also survive, and the action may be brought, notwithstanding the death of the person entitled or liable to the same."

"No action pending in any court shall abate by the death of either or both the parties thereto, except an action for libel, slander, malicious prosecution, assault, or assault and battery, for a nuisance, or against a justice of the peace for misconduct in office; which shall abate by the death of the defendant."

These are sections 463 and 464 of the Code as now numbered, and were enacted in 1858. Rev. Stat. 1866, p. 469. The latter section quoted provides that such an action as this shall not abate by the death of the plaintiff. This language is so direct and clear that it must be conceded that the administrator may continue the action. There seems to be no good reason in the nature of the case to forbid an administrator to begin and prosecute an action and at the same time allow him to continue an action for the same cause begun by the deceased in his lifetime. It is the duty of the court to construe these statutes together. If the deceased had lived to complete his action, he would have recovered for all damage done him by defendant's wrongful act, including the injury to his earning power during his expectancy of life. What he recovered would, of course, be directly for his own benefit, but it would become a part of his estate; and upon his death, occurring after the receipt of such remuneration, it would benefit his next of kin and all others who would be interested in his estate. His wife and children are interested in his estate while he lives, and his creditors are interested in so much thereof as is necessary to satisfy their claims. The rights of wife and children in a specified and limited amount of his estate are superior to the rights of creditors. The husband and father cannot ignore the rights of his family nor of his creditors in his property. His relation in them is analogous to that of trustee. It would seem, therefore, that, if in his lifetime he recovered full compensation for his injuries, the liability of the wrongdoers would be extinguished.

The supreme court of South Dakota has, in a recent case, considered that there is a double liability; that their Death Act, which is essentially the same as ours, creates a new cause of action. This conclusion is earnestly contested by two of the judges in dissenting opinions. Rowe v. Richards, 35 S. D. 201, L.R.A.1915E, 1075, 151 N. W. 1001, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 294. We refer to this as one of the very recent cases in which many authorities are collected and freely quoted. The majority opinion is largely devoted to a discussion of the difference between a "cause of action" and "a right of action," and particularly between the "cause of the injury" and "the injury itself." The opinion considers that the failure to observe this distinction has led to the view "that there could be but one recovery for one wrong—'one wrongful act.'" There would be much force in this suggestion if the cause of action were the wrongful act. As suggested in the opinion: "A, in negligent disregard of the rights of others, fires a bullet from his rifle."

If the shot does no damage, there is no cause of action; but if it injures B and C, then each have a cause of action against A. B's cause of action is not the wrongful act, but the injury it has done him. But under our Death Act the cause of action is not the wrongful act, but damage that act has caused. It has injured the earning capacity of the deceased. It is not for the death of the deceased that the widow sues. It is for her loss caused by the injury to her husband. That the injury caused the total destruction of his earning capacity and all benefits which she otherwise would have received from her husband is rendered certain by his death as the result of that injury. If one maliciously sets fire to a building in which the property of A and B is stored, their loss is the destruction of their property, and not the "wrongful act." If each owns a separate and distinct part of the property destroyed, each has a distinct cause of action. If the title to the property is in a trustee for their benefit, the trustee may recover the whole loss in one action, and payment of the full value of the property to the trustee would ordinarily satisfy the claims of both A and B. Under our statutes, the wife has an interest in the property and rights of her husband at his decease, of which he cannot deprive her by any act of his. His creditors also have an interest which he cannot ignore. His administrator represents all of those interests. Therefore, there seems to be no reason why the whole matter could not be disposed of in one action. If the petition, in addition to the other allegations of damages, alleged the earning power of the deceased, and who were the dependents, and what each of them was entitled to recover under Lord Campbell's Act, which is called by some courts the "Death Act," and how much the estate of the deceased ought to recover, and if the verdict of the jury or findings of the court were equally specific, there would be no difficulty in administering the two sections of the statute together. We have alluded to the question actually decided in the South Dakota case, because, as the decision in that case shows, the question of the power of the party injured to collect full compensation, and so bar any future action, is so connected with the question in the case at bar that neither can be satisfactorily determined without reference to the other. The suggestion of a "double recovery" has injected itself into very many decisions. Of course, if a settlement with the party injured is affected with fraud or overreaching, it might be avoided, and, if the amount received was grossly inadequate to the injury suffered, that of itself would be evidence tending to show unfair practice.

By the ancient common law there could be no private action for the felonious killing of a human being. Such damages inhered in the felony and belonged to the Crown. The courts in those times appear to have extended the principle so as to forbid an action for death caused by any wrongful act, whether felonious or otherwise. If the legislature had abolished this rule, and expressly provided for an action for damages caused by an unlawful act, whether death resulted or not, the difficulties of the situation would be removed. Judge Cooley says it is remarkable that the legislatures have not done so. "Why should not the money value of his life, when it has been taken away by unlawful act or negligence, be a right of action in the hands of his representatives?" 1 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. p. 31 (*27).

Such a statute could give a preference to the widow or widower and next of kin as our statute does, and, when the entire damage sustained by all parties was recovered by the administrator, the proceeds in the hands of the administrator could be reported to the probate court as other assets to be distributed as the law required, or, perhaps still better, the statute might provide for the determination of the rights of the respective parties upon the trial in the district court, as suggested above.

It has been suggested that if the administrator should prosecute such an action for the benefit of the estate, and also for the benefit of the next of kin (that is, making the claim under the survival statute and the claim under the Death Act in one action), the administrator might be more zealous for the estate than for the widow and next of kin, and so the latter would be wronged. But no action can be brought under the Death Act for the widow and next of kin, except by the administrator; and, if there is danger of discrimination, the probate court can determine the rights of the respective parties in the recovery when the district court has failed to do so.

It would appear from the diversity of judicial decisions that there has been unfortunate and incomplete legislation in the other states as well as in our own. Construing these statutes in the light of history and of present conditions, we conclude that the intention of the legislature was that, when an action has been begun by the party injured to recover damages suffered because of the wrongful act of another, the action does not abate, nor any part thereof, by the death of plaintiff, and the administrator takes the place of the plaintiff therein and can recover any and all damages that the injured party could have recovered if he had survived, including injuries to or loss of his earning power.

We adhere to our former opinion.

Barnes, J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in either the original opinion by Judge Rose or the present opinion by Judge

Sedgwick, affirming the judgment of the district court.

By the majority opinion the administrator of the estate of Miller is allowed to recover, not only for the pain and mental suffering actually sustained by his decedent, the physical injury suffered by him, the expense incurred for necessary medical and surgical attention in treating him for his injuries, but in addition thereto such sum as decedent would have earned for the whole term of his life expectancy, as shown by the Carlisle table, if he had not died as a result of his injuries. As to this last item of the recovery, I am convinced that the majority of the court is wrong.

By the Act of February 25, 1873 (Gen. Stat. 1873, chap. 15), it was provided:

"Section 1. That whenever the death of a person shall be caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of any person, company or corporation, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages, in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person who, or company, or corporation which would have been liable if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony.

"Sec. 2. That every such action shall be brought by and in the names of the personal representatives of such deceased person, and the amount recovered in every such action, shall be for the exclusive benefit of the widow and next of kin of such deceased person, and shall be distributed to such widow and next of kin in the proportion provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal property left by persons dying intestate; and in every such action the jury may give such damages as they shall deem a fair and just compensation with reference to the pecuniary injuries, resulting from such death, to the wife and next of kin of such deceased person, not exceeding the sum of $5,000: Provided, that every such action shall be commenced within two years after the death of such person."

Prior to the passage of that act there was no statutory right for anyone to recover for death by wrongful act; and whatever right accrued to the administrator of the deceased person, or those dependent upon him for support, was that which existed at the common law. By the act above quoted, a new right of action was created, and the widow and next of kin of the deceased were allowed to recover a sum not exceeding $5,000 for the pecuniary injuries resulting to them by reason of death caused by wrongful act. That statute has remained unchanged to the present time, except by an amendment including the widower, and the repeal of so much thereof as limited the amount of the recovery to the sum of $5,000.

It appears that the statutes of this state have made no direct provision for a recovery by the administrator of the estate of one who is killed by wrongful act, of any amount whatever, representing the earning capacity of a deceased person after his death, except such recovery as may be had for the benefit of the widow or widower and next of kin of his decedent. Plaintiff decedent, Miller, in the case at bar, left no widow or next of kin, and no one dependent in any manner upon him for support. Therefore the plaintiff in this case could not recover anything representing the earning capacity of decedent after his death occurred. The right of recovery, so far as that matter was concerned, was extinguished at Miller's death. I am satisfied, from a thorough investigation, that no case can be found which holds that the loss of earning capacity can be recovered for the benefit of creditors of the decedent.

It is true that, under the revivor statute, the action commenced by Miller in his lifetime was properly revived, and it seems clear, from the weight of authority, that the administrator could recover for the benefit of the estate of his decedent for the pain and suffering, both mental and physical, and decedent's loss of wages during the time he survived his injuries, for the necessary hospital charges, and for the value of the medical treatment furnished him by his physician, but the statutes have not made any provision for a recovery for decedent's earning capacity, excepting such as provided for the benefit of the widow and next of kin, above mentioned.

In Dwyer v. Chicago, St. P. & O. R. Co. 84 Iowa, 479, 35 Am. St. Rep. 322, 51 N. W. 244, it was said: "The statutes deal with the 'cause of action,' and not with the rule of damage to be applied. In fixing the damage, we look to the wrong to be remedied, to the injury to be repaired."

In Brown v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 102 Wis. 137, 44 L.R.A. 579, 77 N. W. 748, 78 N. W. 771, the court said: "Such damages to the widow and next of kin begin where the damages of the intestate ended, viz., with his death."

And on rehearing (102 Wis. 150): "The death is the end of the period of recovery in one case and the beginning in the other. In one case the administrator sues as legal representative of the estate for what belonged to the deceased; in the other he acts as trustee for those upon whom the act confers the right of recovery for the pecuniary loss inflicted upon them." . . . The damages in one right are limited to the loss which accrues to the injured person before death, and the damages in the other to the pecuniary loss of surviving relatives, as before the survival statute. The two rights in no way overlap each other."

See Johnson v. Eau Claire, 149 Wis. 194, 135 N. W. 481.

In Jacobs v. Glucose Sugar Ref.

Co. (C. C.) 140 Fed. 766, it was said: "And, if this be so, then by what logic or reasoning can it be said that two actions cannot be brought against one wrongdoer, the one for pain and suffering and the other for damages to the estate? Both are actions for compensatory damages. The one survives to the administrator under one statute, and the other is given to the administrator under another."

In Quinn v. Johnson Forge Co. 9 Houst. (Del.) 338, 32 Atl. 858, the court instructed the jury as follows: "Should you decide in favor of the plaintiff, you should assess damages in such reasonable sum as you deem proper and right under the circumstances, and in fixing that amount you should consider such damages as have been actually proved by reason of loss of wages from the 20th day of July, 1891, up to March 3, 1892, when he died, and also allow such sum as you deem adequate and proper by reason of his physical pain and mental sufferings. As regards the death of Peace as being the result of his injuries, you cannot take that into consideration in the estimation of damages. It has no connection with this case."

In Belding v. Black Hills & Ft. P. R. Co. 3 S. D. 369, page 375, 53 N. W. 752, we find the following: "In what manner and under what circumstances could the deceased have recovered had death not ensued? He could have recovered, in addition to his physical and mental suffering, for loss of time and employment, the expenses of medical and surgical attendance, nursing, etc., incident to the injury. . . . Anything more? Certainly not."

In 3 S. D. pages 380, 381: "It does not provide, as we have seen, for the recovery of damages by the widow and heirs, and it is not provided that the personal representative shall institute the action for the use or benefit of such widow and heirs, or that the sum recovered shall be apportioned between the beneficiaries. The section [Lord Campbell's Act] seems to have been adopted with another object in view, and that was to give the widow, having in the death of a husband sustained the greater loss, the prior right to institute the action and recover the damages she has sustained by reason of the death of her husband.

. . . . To carry into effect the evident intention of the legislature, the widow should have the prior and exclusive right to institute the action and to the damages for the loss of the life of the husband. . . . If the action can be instituted by the personal representative, the damages recovered by him would be assets of the estate, and, in case the estate was insolvent, the money recovered would go to the creditors. This could not have been the intention of the legislature. . . . This seems but reasonable and just. All must concede, we think, that the wife, in the loss of her husband, on whom she is dependent for support, sustains a greater loss by such death than any other person."

The same rule is announced in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Rowe, 56 Kan. 411, 43 Pac. 683; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hosea, 152 Ind. 412, 53 N. E. 419; Peake v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (C. C.) 26 Fed. 495; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Goodykoontz, 119 Ind. 111, 12 Am. St. Rep. 371, 21 N. E. 472; Hilliker v. Citizens Street R. Co. 152 Ind. 86, 52 N. E. 607; Sturges v. Sturges, 126 Ky. 80, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1014, 102 S. W. 884; Stewart v. United Electric Light & P. Co. 104 Md. 382, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 384, 118 Am. St. Rep. 410, 65 Atl. 49; Davis v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 53 Ark. 117, 7 L.R.A. 283, 13 S. W. 801; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59, 57 L. ed. 417, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 176.

14 Ann. Cas. 551, is to the same effect. The court said in that case: "The administrator recovers damages based upon the reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit of the persons named by the statute, often not the husband, as the beneficiaries of the action."

In this state, however, the husband is included as one who may recover for the pecuniary injuries sustained by death by wrongful act. The authorities are almost numberless on this question. To summarize the whole matter, I have found by my investigation that the courts of fourteen of our sister states, the Federal courts, and the English cases support the rule announced in this dissenting opinion. The courts of five of the states refuse to allow any damages, stating that the action abates. The courts of last resort in eleven of the states permit a division of the damages, a part to the estate, and a part to the widow and next of kin, while the courts of but four states support the rule stated in the majority opinion. I am therefore constrained to hold that the widow and next of kin are entitled to recover the damages allowed them by Lord Campbell's Act, in an action brought by an administrator of their own choice, without being compelled to resort to the probate or county court for a distribution. Their recovery should be for their benefit alone. The provisions of the statutes have been in force since 1873, and no difficulty has been encountered in enforcing them. They are plain, and are sufficiently explicit to cover all cases without resort to speculation or judicial legislation. It is my opinion that the judgment of the district court should be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

ANNOTATION.

Measure of damages in action for personal injuries commenced by deceased in his lifetime and revived by personal representative.

- I. Where action may be maintained concurrently with action under Lord Campbell's Act, 1355.
- II. Where remedy under survival statute is exclusive:
  - a. In general, 1357.
  - b. Illinois rule, 1359.
- III. Revival after verdict, 1360.
- IV. Where injury is not proximate cause of death, 1360.

As indicated by the title this note is limited to cases involving the measure of damage to be assessed in an action commenced by an injured person in his lifetime to recover for personal injuries, and revived after his death, under a general survival statute. For a treatment of the general question of the measure of damage in actions for the wrongful death of a person for the benefit of his estate, see note appended to Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Hayes, ante, 1310. And see references therein for notes on related questions.

- I. Where action may be maintained concurrently with action under Lord Campbell's Act.

There is some conflict among the courts as to the measure of recovery by a personal representative in an action revived by him which was commenced by his decedent in his lifetime to recover damages for personal injuries which subsequently resulted in his death. This difference is in part, although not wholly, due to the different view with which the court regards general survival statutes under which the case is revived. Where this remedy is regarded merely as concurrent with an action by the personal representative to recover compensation to the decedent's statutory beneficiaries for their pecuniary loss growing out of his death, it necessarily follows that, in order to avoid a double recovery, the damage allowed in the revived action must be limited to such as the deceased might have recovered had he lived, but not extending beyond the time of his death.

A good example of a case within this rule is St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Goode (1914) 42 Okla. 784, L.R.A. 1915B, 1141, 142 Pac. 1185. In that case the decedent in his lifetime had commenced an action to recover damage for personal injuries received while a passenger on the defendant's train; while that action was pending he died as a result of the injuries; following his death the decedent's personal representative brought an action to recover damages in behalf of the statutory beneficiaries, in which recovery was had; subsequently the action commenced by the deceased in his lifetime was revived and prosecuted in behalf of his estate. It was held that this action was maintainable, not being barred by the recovery in the other action, but that the damages should be limited to such as accrued to the decedent up to the time of his death. The court said that two causes of action under such circumstances are co-existent; that a recovery on the one does not bar a recovery on the other; that damages to the estate begin with the wrong and cease with the death; that the widow's damages begin with the death; hence they do not cover the same field or overlap. "Both actions are prosecuted in the name of the personal representative, where there is one, and may proceed pari passu, without a recovery in the one having the effect of barring a recovery in the other, because the suits are prosecuted in different rights, and the damages are given upon different principles to compensate different injuries. One is for the loss sustained by the estate and for the suffering from the personal injury in the lifetime of the decedent, the recovery in which goes to the benefit of the decedent's creditors, if there are any; the other takes no account of the wrongs done to the decedent, but is for the pecuniary loss to the next of kin, occasioned by the death alone. The death is the end of the period of recovery in one case and the beginning in the other. In one case the administrator sues as legal representative of the estate, for what belonged to the deceased; in the other he acts as trustee for those upon whom the act confers the right of recovery for the pecuniary loss inflicted upon them."

In Hamel v. Southern R. Co. (1915) — Miss. —, 66 So. 809, in holding that the administrator was entitled to revive an action brought by the deceased in his lifetime to recover damage for personal injuries, and to prosecute the same to a judgment, without thereby barring his right also to prosecute an action to recover compensation for the statutory beneficiaries for their loss growing out of the decedent's death, the court pointed out that the revived action included damages for the injuries to the decedent, but did not cover damages for the decedent's death, and hence the action did not interfere with the action in behalf of the beneficiaries.

While in Brown v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1899) 102 Wis. 137, 44 L.R.A. 579, 78 N. W. 771, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 255, the case did not involve the measure of damages in an action by the decedent's personal representative, the court, in discussing the construction of a general survival statute, suggested that the objections to permitting the revival of such an action and also the prosecution of an action in behalf of the statutory beneficiaries on the ground of difficulties in administering the law, and the danger of injustice to the defendants, were largely imaginary and will gradually disappear, "as we adapt ourselves to the new conditions which the revival statute creates. The trial judge can easily, by proper instructions, limit the recovery in a revived action to the loss actually caused to the deceased prior to his death; and in the action under § 4255, Rev. Stat., to the pecuniary loss sustained by the surviving relatives entitled to the benefits of that provision. If the two causes of action are joined, the court can readily require the jury to make separate findings as to damages. As the elements entering into each are entirely distinct, it will readily be seen that there is no more danger of a double recovery under such circumstances than in any one of the numerous cases that might be suggested where two causes of action result from a single wrong. The injustice of two recoveries for distinct grievances, suggested by the learned counsel, and by some courts that have taken the view pressed upon us, is not perceived. A little dispassionate reflection on the subject, it would seem, would prevent unqualified condemnation of the legislative wisdom that says, if a person be wrongfully injured, the pain and suffering and expenses to him in consequence thereof shall not be lost to his estate by the circumstance of his death from the injury before receiving satisfaction for his damages, even though the damages to his surviving relatives, to satisfy their own grievance, may be recovered."

In Mahoning Valley R. Co. v. Van Alstine (1907) 77 Ohio St. 395, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 893, 88 N. E. 601, it is held that, in an action for the benefit of the statutory beneficiaries, the measure of damages is their pecuniary loss sustained by the decedent's death; and the measure of damages in an action commenced by the deceased in his lifetime to recover for his injuries, and revived by his personal representative, is the loss to the estate of the deceased, being for lost time occasioned by the injuries, the value of the decedent's services for such lost time, and his physical suffering, hence the two causes of action are coexistent and a recovery in the one is not a bar to a recovery in the other.

In MURRAY v. OMAHA TRANSFER CO. (reported herewith) ante, 1343, the right is sustained to prosecute an action revived by the personal representative, which was commenced by the deceased in his lifetime, and also an action by the personal representative in behalf of the decedent's beneficiaries. The court said that when an action has been begun by the party injured to recover damages suffered because of the wrongful act of another, the action does not abate nor any part thereof by the death of the plaintiff. The administrator takes the place of the plaintiff therein and can recover any and all damages that the injured party could have recovered if he had survived, including injuries to and loss of his earning power. In this case it is to be noted that the decedent left no widow or next of kin and no one in any manner dependent upon him for support.

Even where the action pending at the time of the death of the deceased is the exclusive remedy, it has been held that the measure of damage recoverable in behalf of the decedent's estate was the amount which he could have recovered had he survived to prosecute the action, and that nothing could be recovered for his death. By denying recovery for the death of the deceased some of the courts apparently mean that the fact of the death cannot be taken into account to increase the damages, rather than to hold that no element of loss can be taken into account beyond the time of the death of the deceased. It has, however, been held in other cases that the computation of the damage must be confined to the different elements of loss intervening between the injury to the deceased and his death, and that no account can be taken even of the prospective earnings of the deceased beyond the time of his death.

For example, in Quinn v. Johnson Forge Co. (1892) 9 Houst. (Del.) 338, 32 Atl. 858, it is held that where the injured person brings an action in his lifetime to recover damages for injuries which subsequently resulted in his death, upon the continuance of the action by his personal representative, the death of the decedent cannot be shown as an aggravation of damages. In such case, the damages recoverable are for loss of wages from the time of the injury to the time of death, and for physical pain and mental suffering. It is to be noted that in this jurisdiction there is no choice of remedy, where the injured person has commenced a suit in his lifetime to recover for the injury. In such case the only remedy open is the survival and prosecution of this action.

And see Bowen v. Baltimore & P. S. B. Co. 3 Boyce (Del.) 428, 84 Atl. 1022, holding that the administrator of the plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries, who revives the suit and prosecutes same to judgment, is entitled to recover for the decedent's pain and suffering, loss of earnings, medical attendance, traveling expenses incident to the injury, but not for the death itself.

In Swanson v. Pacific Shipping Co. (1910) 60 Wash. 87, 110 Pac. 795, an action brought in the lifetime of the deceased to recover damages for personal injuries was revived in behalf of the beneficiaries under a statute in effect providing that no action for personal injuries shall abate by reason of the death of the injured person, and that it may be prosecuted for the benefit of certain beneficiaries. The deceased was a man with a family, and it was held that the measure of damages recoverable was such as the decedent would have been entitled to recover had the cause been tried at any time prior to his death. It is apparently assumed that the damage would include compensation for the impaired earning capacity of the deceased; for while it is said that no damage could be recovered for the death itself, it is pointed out that the deceased was a man earning a good salary and in good health prior to the injury; and a judgment in his favor for over $17,000, reduced to $10,000, was sustained for the latter amount, though the deceased survived his injuries for less than fourteen months. In Thompson v. Seattle, R. & S. R. Co. (1912) 71 Wash. 436, 128 Pac. 1070, however, in a proceeding under the same statute to recover for injuries to a woman who was survived by several children, the trial court said that he intended to make it clear to the jury that the damages sustained by the mother of the plaintiffs, if any, up to the time of her death, would be the only damage to be considered in arriving at the amount of the award, and that no damage resulting from her death could be considered by the jury; and subsequently, in reply to a question by a juror, the court stated that the damage would be what would have compensated the mother for conditions brought about by the accident, the suffering, mental and physical, which she might have endured simply for the time between the accident and the death. On appeal, the court, in referring to these instructions, said that it was clear that such error as there was in the instructions first given was cured by these subsequent proceedings. Nevertheless, although a judgment for $10,000 was held excessive and was reduced to $7,000, it was sustained for the latter amount.

It has been held that the measure of recovery is the actual damage occasioned to the decedent for the injury inflicted, including pain, suffering, and physical inability and inconvenience. McCabe v. Narragansett Electric Lighting Co. (1905) 27 R. L. 272, 61 Atl. 667.

In Legg v. Britton (1890) 64 Vt. 652, 24 Atl. 1016, in considering the damages to be awarded in an action commenced by the decedent in his lifetime and revived by his personal representative, the court, after pointing out that the damages recoverable are such as the injured person might have recovered if he had survived, including expenses for doctoring and nursing, loss of his services, and compensation for pain and suffering, said that "one element of damages would be the bodily pain and suffering caused to the intestate by the wrongful act or neglect occasioning his death. The natural effect of such pain and suffering is to weaken, and if of adequate intensity, sufficiently continued, to destroy the vital forces. The damages for this element, recovered in the right of the intestate, may be said indirectly, if not directly, to be given for destroying the life of the intestate and ending his earning capacity. Such damages are not given to make up to his estate what it has lost by the wrongful injury. Unless required to pay the debts of the estate they are distributed to the widow and next of kin. But the bulk of the damages recovered in the right of the intestate are different from those recovered for the benefit of the widow and next of kin."

In Bradley v. Andrews (1879) 51 Vt. 525, it is held that where an action to recover damages for personal injuries is pending at the death of the plaintiff and is revived by his administrator, the measure of recovery is the pain, suffering, and personal inconvenience occasioned the decedent by the injury, and also exemplary damages if the act complained of was wanton or reckless.

Under the Iowa statute, it has been held that the measure of damages is different in an action brought originally by the deceased and prosecuted to judgment after his death by his personal representative, than it is in an action originally brought by the latter. In the former action damages may be allowed for bodily pain and mental anguish of the deceased due to the injury. In the latter action, however, no damages can be allowed for these elements. Muldowne v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1878) 36 Iowa, 462; Kinser v. Soap Creek Coal Co. (1892) 85 Iowa, 26, 51 N. W. 1151.

Under very similar statutes in other jurisdictions, it has been held that the amount recoverable where an action for personal injuries is revived by the administrator of the plaintiff after the latter's death remains the same as if the deceased had lived to prosecute the action, and the recovery may include compensation for decedent's physical and mental suffering, reasonable surgical and medical expense and for time lost, and any permanent impairment of his power to earn money during the remainder of his life expectancy. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Perkins (1907) 127 Ky. 110, 105 S. W. 148; Maher v. Philadelphia Traction Co. (1897) 181 Pa. 391, 37 Atl. 571, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 85; McCafferty v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1899) 193 Pa. 339, 74 Am. St. Rep. 690, 44 Atl. 435, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 693; Edwards v. Gimbel (1902) 202 Pa. 30, 51 Atl. 357.

In McCafferty v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1899) 193 Pa. 339, 74 Am. St. Rep. 690, 44 Atl. 435, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 693, supra, it is held to be error to permit the jury in an action commenced by the deceased in his lifetime and revived by his personal representative, who was substituted as the plaintiff, to enter a verdict both for the loss the deceased sustained by reason of his injuries and for the loss his parent sustained by reason of his death. The true measure of damages was held to be the loss sustained by the deceased, that is, the same damage which the deceased could have recovered had he lived to prosecute the action, including compensation for pain and suffering and diminished earning power during the period of the decedent's probable life expectancy.

And in Maier v. Philadelphia Traction Co. (1897) 181 Pa. 391, 87 Atl. 571, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 85, it is held that where an action is brought in the lifetime of the injured party to recover damages for personal injuries, and the action is revived after his death, the damages recoverable are the same as the injured person might have recovered had death not ensued, including damages not only for mental and physical suffering of the injured decedent, but also for the value of his life.

In Edwards v. Gimbel (1902) 202 Pa. 30, 51 Atl. 357, it is held that the measure of damages recoverable in an action commenced by the decedent in his lifetime, and revived by his personal representative, is the loss which the deceased sustained by reason of his injuries, not including recovery for his death. But the court apparently intended that the damage assessed should include compensation for loss due to the destruction of the decedent's earning power. See McCafferty v. Pennsylvania R. Co. and Maier v. Philadelphia Traction Co. (Pa.) supra. And to the same effect, applying Pennsylvania statute, The City of Belfast (1905) 135 Fed. 208.

b. Illinois rule.

In Illinois there are acts similar to Lord Campbell's Act, and also a survival act. Under these different acts it is held that the administrator of the plaintiff, in a pending action to recover damages for a personal injury, may revive the action; but there is a vital difference as to the effect of this revival, dependent upon the statute under which the revival is permitted. Thus, while the revival of the pending action is permitted under the statute similar to Lord Campbell's Act, the plaintiff occupies precisely the same position that he would have occupied had the action not been commenced until after the death of the original plaintiff. His measure of damages which he is entitled to recover are no more or less than had no action been brought by the injured person in his lifetime, and the administrator had commenced an action based upon this statute. In other words he can recover only pecuniary loss to the beneficiaries designated in the statute, resulting to them from the death complained of. On the other hand if he revives the pending action by the injured person under the survival act, his measure of recovery is no more or less than that which the plaintiff might have recovered had he lived to prosecute the action; and it is not a matter of option with the personal representative as to which statute he will proceed under to revive a pending action. This is determined by the cause of the death. If the death results from some cause other than the wrongful act, then revivor can only be by virtue of the general revival act; if death results from the injury, then the action can be revived only by virtue of the act similar to Lord Campbell's Act. Holton v. Daly (1882) 106 Ill. 131; Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. O'Connor (1886) 119 Ill. 586, 9 N. E. 263; Savage v. Chicago & J. Electric R. Co. (1909) 238 Ill. 392, 87 N. E. 377; Prouty v. Chicago (1911) 250 Ill. 222, 95 N. E. 147; Ohnesorge v. Chicago City R. Co. (1913) 259 Ill. 424, 102 N. E. 819; Merrihew v. Chicago City R. Co. (1900) 92 Ill. App. 346; Wetherell v. Chicago City R. Co. (1902) 104 Ill. App. 357; Clark v. O'Gara Coal Co. (1908) 140 Ill. App. 207.

Where the action commenced by the deceased in his lifetime to recover damages for injuries which later resulted in his death is revived and prosecuted by the personal representative for the benefit of the statutory beneficiaries, the recovery is limited to compensation for the pecuniary loss to such beneficiaries. In such case there can be no recovery for bodily pain and suffering of the deceased in his lifetime by reason of the injury sustained. Holton v. Daly (1882) 106 Ill. 131; Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. O'Connor (1886) 119 Ill. 586, 9 N. E. 263; Mattoon Gaslight & Coke Co. v. Dolan (1902) 105 Ill. App. 1.

In Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. O'Connor (1886) 119 Ill. 586, 9 N. E. 263, it is said that actions to recover for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant survive upon the death of the plaintiff, and when death is the result of the injuries for which suit is brought, the action must be prosecuted after the death of the plaintiff for the benefit of the widow and next of kin, and in such case there can be no recovery for bodily pain or suffering, but that where death results from a cause other than the injuries for which the suit is brought, there may be a recovery for precisely the same injuries that the plaintiff could have recovered for had he lived until after final trial.

III. Revival after verdict.

In Clay v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1908) 104 Minn. 1, 115 N. W. 949, where the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries died after a verdict in his favor, and the administratrix was substituted as plaintiff, it was held that the case was controlled by the statute providing that after a verdict fixing the amount of damages for a wrong, such action shall not abate by reason of the death of a party, and not by the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act, which permits generally in actions for personal injuries revived after the death of plaintiff a recovery for the damages sustained by statutory beneficiaries. The result was that a verdict of $35,000, recovered before the death of the injured person, was upheld, although apparently greatly in excess of what could have been recovered in behalf of the beneficiaries.

In Wilcox v. International Harvester Co. (1917) 278 Ill. 465, 116 N. E. 151, the facts were that after a verdict had been rendered in favor of the plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries, but before judgment had been rendered on the verdict, the plaintiff died. It was held proper to permit her personal representative to revive the action and to have judgment entered upon the verdict nunc pro tunc as of the date of the verdict.

IV. Where injury is not proximate cause of death.

The right of action for personal injuries, not resulting in the death of the injured person, survives his death, and a suit commenced by him in his lifetime to recover damages occasioned him by such injuries may be continued by virtue of the survival statute by his personal representative after his death with the same effect, according to the same rules, and to recover the same damages as if he were living and prosecuting his action in person. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. O'Connor (1886) 119 Ill. 586, 9 N. E. 263; Prouty v. Chicago (1911) 250 Ill. 222, 95 N. E. 147; Wetherell v. Chicago City R. Co. (1902) 104 Ill. App. 357; Tri-City R. Co. v. Brennan (1903) 108 Ill. App. 471; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Rowe (1896) 56 Kan. 411, 43 Pac. 683; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Chance (1896) 57 Kan. 40, 45 Pac. 60; Rouse v. Michigan United R. Co. (1911) 164 Mich. 475, 129 N. W. 179; Clay v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1908) 104 Minn. 1, 115 N. W. 949.

For example, it has been held that one who suffers an injury to his person as the consequence of the wrongful or negligent act of another has a right of action for the damages resulting from the injury. He may recover for pain and suffering, physical and mental, for expenses of medical treatment and attendance, and the permanent effects upon his person reasonably certain to result. If he dies from some cause other than the injury, the action for the injury to his person survives by virtue of the general survival act to his personal representative, who may recover these damages for the personal injury. Prouty v. Chicago (1911) 250 Ill. 222, 95 N. E. 147.

In Rouse v. Michigan United R. Co. (1911) 164 Mich. 475, 129 N. W. 719, it is held that where the injured person dies after having commenced a suit to recover damages for his injuries, and his suit is revived by his personal representative under the survival act, and death was the result of some cause other than the injury, the measure of damages is the same as that which would have applied to the decedent had he lived and prosecuted the suit, except that compensation for loss of power to earn money cannot be given for any period after his death, and must not go beyond the time of his last sickness; and where the injury did not cause his last sickness, if this sickness disabled the injured person from working and earning money, no damages can be allowed for any loss of earning power resulting from such sickness or from expenses attending the same, or upon the theory that his life was shortened by his injuries, or for pain and suffering caused by this sickness.

It has been held that although damages for the loss of a limb are usually calculated on the basis of the mortality table, showing the expectation of life of the injured person, where he subsequently dies from some cause other than the injury, in a suit for personal injuries pending at the time of his death and revived and prosecuted by the beneficiaries designated in the statute, such calculation cannot extend beyond the day of his death, and the substituted plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for the pain and suffering and disfigurement of the deceased and for disability resulting from the loss of his limb during the remainder of his life (fixed by the court at $2,000). Payne v. Georgetown Lumber Co. (1906) 117 La. 983, 42 So. 475. In the latter case it is held that where an action to recover damages for personal injuries is revived by the personal representative of the injured person on his death, the measure of damages is compensation for pain and suffering, physical or mental, of the deceased by reason of the injury, also money expended or liability incurred necessarily and reasonably by the deceased for medical attendance as a result of the injury, and the value of time lost, if any, by the deceased, together with the disability of diminished earning capacity, whether total or partial, as a result of the injury, from the time of the injury to the time of the death.

Where a pending action to recover damage is revived by the personal representative after the death of the plaintiff from some cause other than the injury, the measure of recovery includes the pain and suffering of the deceased, not including, however, any pain and suffering which the decedent might have suffered from the injury had he lived out his life expectancy. Memphis Street R. Co. v. Prince (1912) 2 Tenn. C. C. A. 688. A. G. S.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff and the defendant are brothers. From 1898 till April, 1907, the plaintiff (a dentist) practised his profession in an office in Pawtucket, Rhode Island. The defendant, a younger brother, also a dentist, began working for him in 1898. His wages, beginning at $10 a week, were increased from time to time, until April, 1907, when he received $30 a week. Before this last increase, "he had expressed an intention of leaving his brother and starting business on his own account. . . . But he still expressed his desire to quit and had given his brother notice that he should leave in thirty days." The exact time when this notice of the defendant was given does not clearly appear. We infer from the report of the master that it was given either in March, 1907, when the defendant's wages were increased, or a short time before June 1, 1907.

In April, 1907, the plaintiff broke down. As the master reports, "he was evidently mentally unbalanced and utterly incapacitated to do any business that required intelligent thought." He continued in this condition for some time. "During the month of May, 1907, the plaintiff occasionally visited his office, but after that and until after the 1st of January, 1910, he gave no attention at all to the business, and during all that time was mentally incapable of giving any attention to it." In 1908 he was taken to a sanitarium and later to an insane hospital. In January, 1910, he recovered, and since then his condition has been normal.

May 28, 1907, the plaintiff went before a justice of the peace and executed a deed, "purporting to convey to his brother, the defendant, all his real estate and personal effects." After a few days he delivered the deed to the brother, and at this time gave him written orders to collect his money, deposited in different banks. There was no valuable consideration for this deed.

The defendant continued to practise his profession at the same office, using the materials, tools, and furniture therein; "for a few months he sent out bills on the billheads then in the office, in the name of the plaintiff; . . . for a few months also he entered upon the cash book weekly payments to himself of $30." In January, 1910, the plaintiff being then in normal condition, demanded of the defendant a return of the property which had been intrusted to him, and an account of the work done by him in the office. The defendant delivered to him the bank books, and on July 20th vacated the room in which the plaintiff had previously carried on his practice as a dentist, and in which the defendant practised from June 1, 1907, until that date, July 20, 1910. Thereupon this bill in equity was brought.

The two brothers lived with their mother at Attleboro, the plaintiff paying the necessary family expenses as head of the family. Beginning in June, 1907, and during the plaintiff's disability, the defendant paid the expenses of the home out of his own funds, amounting to $4,789.03.

The defendant, from money turned over to him by the plaintiff, paid for the latter's expenses while he was mentally unbalanced. The master found "that from and after June 1, 1907, there was no valid contract for services or otherwise, existing between the parties." The plaintiff, on account of his condition, was obliged to give up his business, and "he made no contract with his brother as to the future conduct of the business. . . . He simply gave up and went out, and his brother stayed and went on with the business." The master then states the account, showing a balance due the defendant of $105.77. The master also made the alternative finding: "If, on the other hand, it must be found upon the foregoing facts that the defendant was still in the service of the plaintiff, then the account between them must be stated differently, as follows." Then follows the account, showing a balance of $1,996.74 due the plaintiff from the defendant.

The bill alleges that the deed of May 28, 1907, was obtained from the plaintiff "by fraud and deception practised upon the complainant, and by undue influence exerted upon the complainant by said respondent." The master made no finding on this question. His report, however, negatives any fraud on the part of the defendant, and as this question was not argued, we take it to have been waived.

The bill, however, states that the plaintiff "gave into the charge of the respondent the office and furnishings and the tools of his profession, his customers and business, for the respondent to take care of until the complainant's return to health and to the duties of his profession." The superior court, upon the master's report, ordered the defendant to reconvey to the plaintiff the real estate described in the deed of May 28th, and to pay the plaintiff the costs of suit, taxed at $70, and directed that the plaintiff pay to the defendant $105.77. The case is before us on the plaintiff's appeal from this decree.

The findings of the master show that in June, 1907, the plaintiff was insane. The contract of employment, therefore, between the parties, ended at this time by reason of the insanity of the employer. Where a relation similar to that of principal and agent exists, on the insanity of the principal the relation ceases. See Drew v. Nunn, L. R. 4 Q. B. Div. 661, 48 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 591, 40 L. T. N. S. 671, 27 Week. Rep. 810; Story, Agency, 8th ed. § 481.

servant—

The plaintiff argues that, the defendant being in the employ of the plaintiff, upon the latter's insanity, or from June 1, 1907, until January, 1910, he continued to be the agent of the plaintiff, and is chargeable with the profits of the business during that time.

The defendant was employed to assist his brother in his practice as a dentist, on a weekly salary of $30. While he was in the employ of his brother, he was, strictly speaking, his servant or employee. He did not stand toward him in a fiduciary relation, in the real sense of the expression. He was not an agent held to the utmost good faith. See Randall v. Peerless Motor Car Co. 212 Mass. 352 at page 375, 99 N. E. 221.

Leaving out of consideration the question of responsibility of the defendant to the plaintiff during the few months following June 1, 1907, when he charged himself with a weekly salary of $30 and sent out bills in his brother's name, when the contract between them was ended by the insanity of the plaintiff, the defendant had the right to practise his profession on his own account. No obligation to continue the brother's business for his brother's profit rested upon the defendant because person—duty to

he was his brother, or because he had been in his employ. While he used the machinery, tools, and furniture of the plaintiff, and must pay for them, or their use, and the master has so found in his account, that fact is not enough to make the defendant, a dentist practising his profession in his own name, responsible to the owner of the material for the profits of the business; nor does the fact that the defendant occupied the room formerly occupied by his brother make him his agent, and make the business conducted by him, under his own personal supervision and management, the business of his former employer. He was contributing his own personal efforts and ability in the work of his profession, and a servant or employee who has assisted another in the practice of a profession is not guilty of a breach of trust merely because he continues to practise on his own account, and in his own name, at the office occupied by his employer before his insanity. Even if the question were open on the pleadings, there is nothing to show that the defendant was responsible for the good will of the plaintiff. There is no finding of the master that the defendant practised in the plaintiff's name or held himself out as his successor. As stated by Braley, J., in Foss v. Roby, 195 Mass. 292, at page 297, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1200, 81 N. E. 200, 11 Ann. Cas. 571, in "the practice of dentistry, the personal qualities of integrity, professional skill, and ability attach to and follow the person, not the place." See Moore v. Rawson, 199 Mass. 494, 85 N. E. 586; Hutchinson v. Nay, 187 Mass. 262, 68 L.R.A. 186, 105 Am. St. Rep. 390, 72 N. E. 974.

We think in one respect there was an error. The master made no finding showing the amount of the business during the period of a few months following June 1, 1907. Nor is there any finding of the master to show when the defendant ceased to manage the office and its business for the benefit of his brother, or when he began to practise his profession on his own account, while the master does find that there was no contract between the brothers after June 1, 1907, and the defendant was not in the service of the plaintiff after that time, and although the plaintiff may have contemplated or intended, so far as he could, that the defendant was to carry on the business for him, the defendant did not agree to this, and in no way bound himself to any such arrangement, except in so far as shown by his conduct, in acting for the plaintiff during this period of a few months.

Notwithstanding the findings of the master, the acts and conduct of the defendant show that, during this period when he sent out the bills in the name of his brother and charged himself with a weekly salary of $30, he then was carrying on the work of the office for the plaintiff, and must account to him for the profits during that time. It may be the defendant thought his brother's incapacity would be temporary. But whatever his motive, he was, during that period, conducting the work of the office in the interest of and in behalf of the plaintiff.

The findings of the master show there was no fraud or wrong intention on the part of the defendant in acting as he did during the entire period of the plaintiff's absence. In the early part of it, the defendant was seeking to help his brother, expecting the mental trouble would be of short duration. He was not bound to do as he did. He was not compelled to carry on the business on his brother's account for any length of time; but having done so during this indefinite period, his position is analogous to that of one who voluntarily takes upon himself the duties of an agent, and so becomes responsible to the principal as such. Dennis v. McCagg, 32 Ill. 429; Salsbury v. Ware, 183 Ill. 505, 56 N. E. 149. See 39 Cyc. p. 190.

When the defendant learned that the plaintiff was not improving and it was uncertain how long he would be incapacitated, he then had the legal right to practise his profession on his own account, solely for his own profit. He could do this, we think, without breaking faith with his former employer, or being in any way responsible to him for the income and profits.

There must be further hearing to determine the time when the defendant began to practise his profession on his own account, the returns of the office from June 1, 1907, to that time, and to state the account between the parties during this period beginning June 1, 1907, and ending when the defendant ceased to carry on the work of the office for the benefit of the plaintiff.

So ordered.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of employee who continues business or profession after death or insanity of employer, to account for profits or good will.

A search has disclosed no case, other than the reported case (WIGHTMAN v. WIGHTMAN, ante, 1361), directly in point on the above subject, the question usually arising, where the employee has continued in the employment after the death or insanity of the employer, being as to the employee's right to recover the contract wages or the reasonable value of his services, and not as to his liability to account for the profits.

In Sands v. Potter (1897) 165 Ill. 397, 56 Am. St. Rep. 253, 46 N. E. 282, one employed for a term of years, for a stated salary and a per cent of the profits, who continued in the employment (butter and cheese business) after the employer became insane, was held entitled to recover the stipulated wages and profits. The contract of employment was held not abrogated by the employer's insanity, notwithstanding a provision therein, giving him an option to terminate it at any time on payment of a certain sum, even if his insanity would prevent the exercise of the option. v.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN, &amp; HARTFORD RAILROAD COMPANY.

(215 Mass. 45, 102 N. E. 92.)

Carrier — stoppage in transitu — duration of right.

1. The right of stoppage in transitu endures so long as the goods remain in possession of the carrier by virtue of the contract of carriage and until there has been an actual or constructive delivery to the consignee.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1374.]

Evidence — title — consignee in bill of lading.

2. That one was named as consignee in a bill of lading is some evidence that he has title to the property, and possession of the bill of lading by the consignee is evidence of right to immediate possession of the consignment.

[See 4 R. C. L. 15.]

Trial — ownership of property — matter of law.

3. The court cannot rule, as matter of law, that the consignee in possession of the bill of lading is the owner of the consignment and entitled to possession of the property.

[See 26 R. C. L. 1067.]

Evidence — burden of proof — ownership of consignment.

4. A consignee in possession of the bill of lading seeking damages from the carrier for refusal to deliver the property to him has the burden of showing ownership and right of possession.

[See 4 R. C. L. 941.]

Trial — right to stoppage in transitu — determination by court.

5. The court cannot rule, as matter of law, that the right of stoppage in transitu has ceased upon evidence that the consignment had arrived at destination, that the consignee had been notified, and that he had paid the charges to a certain date.

Evidence — termination of transit — payment of freight.

6. The payment of freight by the consignee is not decisive evidence of the termination of transit.

[See 24 R. C. L. 147.]

Carrier — stoppage in transitu — insolvency of buyer.

7. The right of stoppage in transitu by a seller who has transferred title to the buyer can be exercised only when the buyer is insolvent.

[See 24 R. C. L. 133.]

Damages — loss of goods by carrier — cost to consignee.

8. It is not against public policy for a bill of lading to fix the damages for loss at the bona fide invoice price of the goods to the consignee.

— when provision of bill of lading abrogated.

9. It is only where the contract of carriage is repudiated by the carrier that the limitation as to the value of the goods in the bill of lading is abrogated.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County (Aiken, J.) made during the trial of an action brought to recover the value of certain goods stored by plaintiff with defendant, which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Joseph Wentworth and Edmund S. Kochersperger, for defendant:

McWhinney, 36 Ind. 436; Lawson, Contracts of Carriers, § 150; Carver, Carr. of Goods by Sea, § 77.

Rugg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover the value of goods. The material facts are that in July, 1909, the plaintiff agreed to purchase from the Lake Shore Rubber Works fifty-five bales of scrap packing weighing 4,400 pounds, the invoice price being 2½ cents per pound. The packing was shipped by the Lake Shore Rubber Works, consignor, from Erie, Pa., to William C. Coleman Company, consignee, Boston, Massachusetts. A bill of lading was issued by the initial carrier and sent by the consignor to the plaintiff. The consignment reached Boston on July 12th, and the plaintiff was notified by the defendant, who was the final carrier. Soon after the plaintiff went to the freight house of the defendant, examined the goods, and on two occasions, the dates of which are not fixed in the report, took samples. On September 20th he paid the freight and storage charges to that date. On November 5th the defendant sent a notice to the plaintiff to the effect that storage charges were running against the consignment, and requesting disposition of the goods. In October, 1909, the consignor drew on the plaintiff by draft on a Boston bank, which was returned to the consignor with notice that the plaintiff was out of the city. On several earlier occasions demand for payment was made on the plaintiff, but he has never paid for the goods. Late in November, 1909, the consignor requested the initial carrier to return the consignment to it, and on November 29th the defendant, on demand by it, returned the goods to that carrier, which delivered them to the consignor. In the latter part of February or early in March, 1910, the plaintiff demanded the goods of the defendant. There were four counts in the declaration, the first and second being for a conversion, and the third and fourth for breach of contract. The first and fourth counts describe the property which is the subject of the action as 1,397 pounds of piston packing, 1,533 pounds of hydraulic packing, 757 pounds of mixed packing, and 704 pounds of special packing, while the second and third counts describe the property as fifty-five bales of rubber packing. At the close of the evidence, the defendant requested that a verdict be directed in its favor on all the evidence and on each of the counts, and made other requests for rulings,—all of which were refused. Upon this evidence (which is stated to be all that is material) the presiding judge instructed the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and left for determination by the jury only the fair market value of the goods.

1. The defendant has argued at length that there was no sufficient evidence that the plaintiff was the owner of the goods. But this contention is not sound. The plaintiff was named as consignee in the bill of lading. This was some evidence of title. Rosenbush v. Bernheimer, 211 Mass. 146, 149, 97 N. E. 984, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1317. Possession of the bill of lading in which the plaintiff was named consignee was at least evidence of right to immediate possession of the goods. The question is not presented whether the contract for the sale of fifty-five bales of scrap packing was complied with by the delivery of such property as was described in counts one and four. The evidence is not reported on this point, and hence one cannot say that it ought to have been ruled either that the plaintiff was not the owner, or that the proof did not correspond with the allegations.

2. But, on the other hand, it could not have been ruled as matter of law that the plaintiff was the owner or entitled to possession, which was the effect of the direction of a verdict. The burden of proof in this respect was on the plaintiff. Where one party has the burden of establishing certain facts affirmatively, and a substantial part of the evidence offered is either oral or consists of inferences to be drawn from circumstances, it is rarely that it can be ruled as matter of law that the party upon whom rests the burden of proof is entitled to a verdict. The present is not such a case. As the case must go back for another trial we consider such questions as are likely to arise then, which are raised on this record.

3. The question of difficulty is whether the transit was at an end as matter of law, so that the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu was gone. The abstract statement of the law in this particular has been so thoroughly considered that it is not now open to doubt. The right of stoppage in transitu is one favored by commercial law. It endures so long as the goods remain in the possession of the carrier by virtue of the contract of carriage and until there has been an actual or constructive delivery to the consignee. No controversy ordinarily can arise when there has been an actual delivery. A constructive delivery may be found when the carrier has recognized the title of the consignee, has attorned to him, and has agreed to hold the goods "not merely as carrier or as a warehouseman pending a complete delivery to the purchaser, but as agent for the purchaser under a contract made and assented to by both the carrier and the purchaser."

Norfolk Hardwood Co. v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 202 Mass. 160, 162, 88 N. E. 664; Brewer Lumber Co. v. Boston & A. R. Co. 179 Mass. 228, 54 L.R.A. 435, 88 Am. St. Rep. 375, 60 N. E. 548. It was said in Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 Mees. & W. 518, at pages 534, 535, 152 Eng. Reprint, 219: "Where the carrier enters expressly or by implication into a new agreement, distinct from the original contract for carriage, to hold the goods for the consignee as his agent, not for the purpose of expediting them to the place of original destination pursuant to that contract, but in a new character, for the purpose of custody on his account and subject to some new or further order to be given to him," then constructive possession is in the vendee, and the transit is at an end. To the same point see Ex parte Cooper, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 68, 48 L. J. Bankr. N. S. 49, 40 L. T. N. S. 105, 27 Week. Rep. 518, 4 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 63; Bethell v. Clark, L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. 615, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 302, 59 L. T. N. S. 808, 36 Week. Rep. 611, 6 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 346; Lyons v. Hoffnung, L. R. 15 App. Cas. 391, 397, 59 L. J. P. C. N. S. 79, 63 L. T. N. S. 298, 39

It could not have been ruled rightly as matter of law that under these principles of law the transit in the case at bar was ended. All that had occurred was the arrival of the goods in Boston and two notices, alike in tenor, sent by the carrier to the consignee, and payment of the charges up to a certain time.

It is not certain that the consignee had accepted the goods. Trial—right to stoppage in transitu—determination by court.

After paying the freight charges, if his testimony is taken literally, he had examined the bales at least once, for the taking of samples. The purpose of this is not disclosed, but it is not inconceivable that it may have been to ascertain whether the goods corresponded with the terms of the contract of sale to him. The payment of freight is not a decisive evidence of the termination of the transit.

Naylor v. Dennie, 8 Pick. 198, 19 Am. Dec. 319; Reynolds v. Boston & M. R. Co. 48 N. H. 580. Evidence—termination of transit—payment of freight.

4. The question whether the consignor had the right of stoppage in transitu was one of fact upon all the evidence, and not properly one of law. This right of an unpaid vendor to enforce his lien by possessing himself of goods whereof the purchaser has acquired the title, but not the possession, can be exercised only when the buyer is insolvent. By insolvency in this connection is meant not an adjudication by a court of competent jurisdiction, but simply inability to pay debts in the usual course of business. Such inability need not be absolute. It may be proved as a rational inference from convincing facts and circumstances. A business man in good standing commonly meets his obligations at maturity. A failure to pay a single debt might occur under such conditions as to constitute persuasive evidence of general inability to pay one's debts. Lee v. Kilburn, 3 Gray, 594, 599, 600; Durgy Cement & Umber Co. v. O'Brien, 123 Mass. 12; Peabody v. Knapp, 153 Mass. 242, 26 N. E. 696; Jeffris v. Fitchburg R. Co. 93 Wis. 250, 33 L.R.A. 351, 57 Am. St. Rep. 919, 67 N. W. 424; Williston, Sales, § 522, and cases there cited. There were circumstances in the case at bar tending to throw such doubt upon the solvency of the plaintiff as to require the submission of that question to the jury.

5. If upon a new trial it should be found that the transit had not ended, and yet the plaintiff was not insolvent so that the vendor had no right of stoppage in transitu, the measure of damages may become important. The bill of lading contained the condition that "the amount of any loss or damage for which any carrier is liable shall be computed on the basis of the value of the property (being the bona fide invoice price, if any, to the consignee . . .)." It was a reasonable contract to base the damages to be recovered in case of loss upon the genuine and honest invoice price between the parties. There is nothing contrary to public policy in such a contract. It comes within the principle declared in Bernard v. Adams Exp. Co. 205 Mass. 254, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 293, 91 N. E. 325, 18 Ann. Cas. 351, which has been adopted in Adams Exp. Co. v. Croninger, 226 U. S. 491, 57 L. ed. 314, 33 Sup.

Ct. Rep. 148, as applicable to interstate commerce under Federal statutes. If the plaintiff at a new trial shows himself entitled to recover for breach of the contract to deliver under the bill of lading he must be limited in damages to the amount therein stipulated. It is only when the contract of carriage is repudiated by the carrier that the limitation as to value of the goods is abrogated. McKahan v. American Exp. Co. 209 Mass. 270, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1046, 95 N. E. 785, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 612.

NOTE.

The reported case (COLEMAN v. NEW YORK, N. H. & H. R. Co. ante, 1366) is illustrative of that general class of cases which hold that a constructive delivery of goods by a carrier to the consignee thereof is sufficient to terminate the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu, as well as of the more specific holding that a carrier pursuant to agreement with the consignee may hold as his agent so as to terminate all right of the consignor to stop the goods. The general question where the right of stoppage in transitu ends is treated in the annotation following NORTHERN GRAIN CO. v. WIFFLER, post, 1874, the constructive delivery rule is treated in II. b, 2, and the phase as to the carrier acting as special agent of the vendee is discussed in III. a, 8.

Carrier — when right of stoppage in transitu ceases.

1. The right of stoppage in transitu is not lost by the vendee's taking his bill of lading to the carrier and having it stamped "Canceled by delivery," if he immediately inspects the goods, refuses to accept them, has the indorsement canceled, and leaves them in the possession of the carrier, which subsequently sells them for freight charges.

3. The right of stoppage in transitu is not defeated by the fact that title to the goods had passed to the vendee. [See 24 R. C. L. 150.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, in favor of defendants, upon submission of a controversy to determine the rights of the parties in the proceeds of a carload of oats sold on credit by plaintiff to defendant Wiffler, and shipped over the line of the defendant railroad company, to which plaintiff claims to be entitled because of its right of stoppage in transitu. Reversed.

The nature of the controversy and material facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Richard F. Weeks, with Mr. Mortimer Boyle, for appellant:

The proceeds of the oats were in transit at the time they were stopped, because the railroad company had not acknowledged to defendant Wiffler that it held the oats on his behalf and continued in possession as his bailee.

Hiscock, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal involves a consideration of the right of stoppage in transitu of goods sold on credit and shipped by a common carrier. The question of the existence of the right is to be determined upon an agreed statement of facts.

Plaintiff sold to one Wiffler, on credit, a carload of oats, which were shipped to the latter over the line of the defendant railroad company. A bill of lading covering the shipment was forwarded with a draft for the purchase price of the oats, and upon acceptance by the vendee of the draft the bill of lading was delivered to him. He presented the same at the office of the defendant railroad company, where it was received and marked "Canceled by delivery." "Thereupon" the vendee examined and was dissatisfied with the condition of the oats, and "thereupon" withdrew the bill of lading from the railroad company, caused the words "Canceled by delivery" to be stricken from the face of the bill, and "thereupon" returned it to the plaintiff with the statement that he refused to accept the oats or take delivery thereof by reason of their condition, and that he rejected the same.

Nothing more was done by which there is claimed to have been accomplished a delivery to or acceptance by the vendee of the oats. These, after remaining in a car in the possession of the railroad company for six months, were sold at public auction to satisfy its lien for transportation charges, and the surplus of the proceeds over such charges was held by the railroad company, and is the subject of the present controversy.

The draft which had been accepted by the vendee was not paid at maturity, and an action was commenced against him thereon by the vendor, and a judgment recovered which has never been satisfied. In such action the vendee alleged that "the draft was given by defendant in payment of a certain carload of oats which plaintiff sold to the defendant and that the same were good, marketable, and usable (thus written in the agreed statement), and that when defendant received said carload the same were old and musty, and could not be sold and used, and were of no value whatsoever, and for that reason the note was given without consideration." Intermediate the commencement of this action and entry of judgment, the vendee made an assignment for the benefit of creditors to the defendant Dana, and thereafter plaintiff surrendered to the defendant railroad company for cancelation the bill of lading before mentioned, and served upon it notice asserting the exercise of its right of stoppage in transitu of said oats, claiming that the latter had never been delivered to the vendee.

In the arguments addressed to us there is, of course, no dispute about the general principles applicable to the exercise of the right of stoppage in transitu, and no serious question is presented but that under these principles plaintiff had the right to stop delivery of the oats to its non-paying insolvent vendee, provided they still remained in the possession of the carrier under its original contract of transportation, and had not been delivered either actually or constructively. It is true that some little attempt is made by respondents' counsel to argue the proposition that the surplus proceeds of the oats do not stand in the place of the latter, but we do not regard this as worth discussion. Some attention also has been paid to the fact that plaintiff recovered a judgment against its vendee for the purchase price of the oats, but this circumstance does not seem to be of importance. It may be conceded that by recovery of such judgment the title to the oats passed to the vendee, and that under ordinary conditions the latter would have been entitled to take possession of them. This, however, does not defeat the right which plaintiff is now seeking to exercise.

Sale—passing of title—recovery of judgment.

There has been, at times, debate whether the exercise of a right of stoppage in transitu was the assertion of a right in the nature of a lien against property whereof another held title, or amounted to a rescission of a contract. The preponderance of authority, we think, sustains the former theory. Babcock v. Bonnell, 80 N. Y. 244; Coleman v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 215 Mass. 45, 49, ante, 1366, 102 N. E. 92. But however this may have been, it is now provided by § 134 of article 5 of the Personal Property

Carrier—stoppage in transitu—effect of passing of title.

Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 41, amended by Laws 1911, chap. 571), relating to sales of goods, that "subject to the provisions of this article, notwithstanding that the property in the goods may have passed to the buyer, the unpaid seller of goods, as such, has . . . (b) In case of the insolvency of the buyer, a right of stopping the goods in transitu after he has parted with the possession of them."

Thus we come to the question, stripped of accidental conditions, whether plaintiff could and did successfully exercise the right asserted by it. The tests by which to decide this question are especially found in two sections of the statute already referred to. Section 138 provides: "Subject to the provisions of this article, when the buyer of goods is or becomes insolvent, the unpaid seller who has parted with the possession of the goods has the right of stopping them in transitu, that is to say, he may resume possession of the goods at any time while they are in transit. . . ." Section 139 then tells when goods are to be considered in transit, within the meaning of the prior section. It says that they are thus in transit—

"(a) From the time when they are delivered to a carrier by land or water, . . . until the buyer . . . takes delivery of them from such carrier . . . ;

"(b) If the goods are rejected by the buyer, and the carrier . . . continues in possession of them, even if the seller has refused to receive them back."

And, throwing some light on the interpretation of the clauses stating when goods are in transit, it likewise states when they are to be regarded as not in transit. The same section already quoted from enacts that they are not in transit, "if, after the arrival of the goods at the appointed destination, the carrier . . . acknowledges to the buyer . . . that he holds the goods on his behalf and continues in possession of them as bailee for the buyer. . . ."

The only debatable question under the tests thus prescribed is the one whether the goods had been delivered by the carrier to the vendee. It seems to us that —when right of stoppage in transitu ceases.

The facts determinative of that question have already been stated, and need not be repeated. Referring back to them, it may be conceded that if the vendee, after taking his bill of lading to the carrier and permitting it to be marked "Canceled by delivery," had stopped, there would have been a constructive delivery. Also, if he had allowed the matter to rest in that situation for a substantial time before doing anything to recall this act, it might be necessary to submit to the jury the question whether a delivery had not been so consummated that it could not thereafter be avoided. But he pursued neither of these courses. After the stamping of the bill of lading, he "thereupon," that is, immediately, examined the oats, and made what, if then permissible, was a clear and decisive refusal of acceptance of them from the buyer and of delivery from the carrier. It is only by separating these steps and regarding them as divisible and distinct transactions that a delivery can be made out. We do not think they ought to be thus separated, but that they were so closely connected in point of time and otherwise that they should be given the effect of one connected transaction. This being done, it is clear that there was no delivery.

We think that the subsequent history of the shipment confirms this view. It remained in the physical possession of the carrier for months. There was no suggestion of any agreement under which it was thus held by the latter as agent for bailee for the vendee. On the other hand, that which was done by the carrier, and, so far as appears, without objection or question by the parties, shows that the former was holding the oats under its original contract of shipment. As has been stated, it sold the oats for the purpose of satisfying its lien for freight charges, and this it could not have done if by delivery it had surrendered its possession as carrier. Bigelow v. Heaton, 4 Denio, 496; Pennsylvania Steel Co. v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 94 Ga. 636, 21 S. E. 577. While in our opinion the facts which we have discussed lead necessarily, and under simple principles, to the conclusion which we have adopted, general support for that conclusion may be found, if necessary, in the discussion of the subject of stoppage in transitu contained in Brewer Lumber Co. v. Boston & A. R. Co. 179 Mass. 228, 54 L.R.A. 435, 88 Am. St. Rep. 375, 60 N. E. 548; Coleman v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 215 Mass. 45, ante, 1366, 102 N. E. 92; Bolton v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 431, 35 L. J. C. P. N.

In accordance with these views the judgment should be reversed and judgment directed in favor of plaintiff against the defendant New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company, for the sum of $287.85, with any interest received thereon by said railroad company, together with further judgment against the defendant Dana as trustee of its disbursements incurred in this court and in the Appellate Division.

Judgment accordingly.

In Fraser v. Witt (1868) L. R. 7 Eq. (Eng.) 64, Lord Romilly, M. R., said: "The doctrine of stoppage in transitu may be shortly expressed thus: It is the right which the seller of goods has, after they have been sold and despatched to the buyer, to stop them at any time before they have been delivered to the buyer, if the buyer has not paid for the goods, and has, in the meantime, become insolvent. The real and indeed the only question in all these cases is whether the transitus is over; in other words, whether the goods have been delivered to the buyer; if they have, then the right to stop is gone, and the only remedy of the seller is by action at law, or by proof against the estate of the buyer. . . . The doctrine of stoppage in transitu is that a vendor may stop the goods which he has sold to, and which have become the property of, the purchaser, at any time before they have got into

In Kendall v. Marshall (1888) L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. (Eng.) 356, Brett, L. J., explained the theory of stoppage in transitu and the extent of that right as follows: "The doctrine as to stoppage in transitu is not founded on any contract between the parties; it is not founded on any ethical principle; but it is founded upon the custom of merchants. The right to stop in transitu was originally proved in evidence as part of the custom of merchants; but it has afterwards been adopted as a matter of principle, both at law and in equity. It is analogous to, but not the same as, the right of an unpaid vendor to retain the goods when the purchaser has become insolvent. If there has been a delivery of goods to the vendee and an appropriation of them to his own use, the right of stoppage does not exist; in a case of that kind, the property in and the possession of the goods have passed to the vendee; but where the goods are in the course of transit from the vendor to the vendee, although the property has passed to the vendee, and although he has the constructive possession of them, the right to stop prevails. Where the goods have been appropriated by the vendor, and have been delivered by him to a carrier to be transmitted to the vendee, a constructive possession exists in the vendee: nevertheless, whilst the goods are in the hands of the carrier, they are in the course of transit, and the right of stoppage may arise. There is another kind of constructive possession by the vendee; that is, when the goods have been delivered by the carrier, and have reached the hands of an agent of the vendee, to be held at his disposal. When the goods are in actual transit, hardly any difficulty occurs in determining the rights of the parties. But there may be a difficulty when the goods are in the hands of an agent, to be held by him at the disposal of the vendee: the goods may not have reached the end of the transit as originally contemplated, they may have come only to an intermediate stage. The question is not necessarily solved by what was said before the contract was entered into; but what was said may be a material fact to be considered, because it may determine where the transit ended. I think that the definition of the transitus is well given in Abbott on Merchants, Ship & Seamen, pt. 3, chap. 9, 5th ed. p. 374, and pt. 4, chap. 10, 12th ed. p. 409. The principle is there stated in the following terms: 'Goods are deemed to be in transitu not only while they remain in the possession of the carrier, whether by water or land, and although such carrier may have been named and appointed by the consignee; but also when they are in any place of deposit connected with the transmission and delivery of them, and until they arrive at the actual or constructive possession of the consignee.' It is clear that the author, in the latter part of this definition, is alluding to the second kind of constructive possession; if the wording of the latter clause may be enlarged, I should prefer it to stand thus: 'But also when they are in any place of deposit connected with the transmission and delivery of them, having been there deposited by the person who is carrying them for the purposes of transmission and delivery, until they arrive at the actual possession of the consignee, or at the possession of his agent, who is to hold them at his disposal and to deal with them accordingly.'"

And in Weber v. Baessler (1893) 3 Colo. App. 459, 34 Pac. 261, the court, in discussing when the right of stoppage in transitu is terminated, among other things, said: "This right must be exercised while the goods are on their passage and before possession is taken by the vendee; and if they have ceased to be in transit, and have come into the hands of the vendee or of his agent for custody, the vendor's right of stoppage is defeated. The goods are regarded as in transit until they have passed out of the possession of every intermediate agent and have been actually delivered to the consignee; and until the transit has been terminated by such actual delivery, the right of the vendor to reclaim the goods is unimpaired."

In Re Gurney (1892) 7 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. (Eng.) 249, the court said: "The question in very nearly all cases of stoppage in transitu is, speaking generally, one of fact. The law, speaking generally, as applicable to cases of this kind, is that the right of the unpaid vendor is a right which continues in him, notwithstanding that he has parted with the property in the goods during their transit, until they reach the possession of the purchaser. The first thing to be ascertained is, What was the transit of these goods; and the next is, Whether that transit has been determined by the purchaser taking possession."

And as said by Sir H. M. Cairns, L.J., in Schotsmans v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. (1867) L. R. 2 Ch. (Eng.) 332: "The essential feature of a stoppage in transitu, as has been remarked in many of the cases, is that the goods should be at the time in the possession of a middleman, or of some person intervening between the vendor who has parted with, and the purchaser who has not yet received them."

So in Ex parte Rosevear China Clay Co. (1879) L. R. 11 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 560, James, L. J., in the English court of appeal, said: "The authorities show that the vendor has a right to stop in transitu until the goods have actually got home into the hands of the purchaser, or of someone who receives them in the character of his servant or agent. That is the cardinal principle. In order that the vendor should have lost that right, the goods must be in the hands of the purchaser, or of someone who can be treated as his servant or agent, and not in the hands of a mere intermediary. . . . When the vendor knows that he is delivering the goods to someone as carrier, who is receiving them in that character, he delivers them with the implied right which has been established by the law, of stopping them so long as they remain in the possession of the carrier as carrier."

In Orr v. Murdock (1851) 2 Ir. C. L. Rep. 9, Pigot, C. B., stated the test or rule as follows: "Where anything remains to be done, either by the vendee to complete the contract, or by the vendor to transfer the possession, the right of stoppage in transitu exists in the vendor."

And the rule is that the laches of the vendor in attempting to enforce his right of stoppage in transitu does not affect the right so long as the goods are still in transitu at the time the stop order is given. Schwabacher v. Kane (1883) 13 Me. App. 126; Buckley v. Furniss (1836) 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 137; Morley v. Hay (1828) 3 Mann. & R. (Eng.) 696, 7 L. J. K. B. 104. In Buckley v. Furniss (N. Y.) supra, the court said: "I am not aware that it has ever been held that the mere lapse of time was a circumstance of any importance in determining the right of the vendor to resume possession of the goods, provided the right be exercised before the transitus is at an end. As between the vendor and vendee, no reason is perceived why this consideration should be permitted to affect the question."

II. Delivery to vendee.

a. Actual delivery terminates.

1. Generally.

It is universally conceded that consignors lose any right they may have had to stop a consignment of goods in transitu by an actual delivery thereof by the carrier to the consignee. The following cases are illustrative of those in which it has been held that actual delivery to the consignee terminates the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu:

Canada. — Brassert v. McEwen (1885) 10 Ont. Rep. 179; Couture v. McKay (1889) 6 Manitoba L. R. 273.

In Conyers v. Ennis (1821) 2 Mason, 236, Fed. Cas. No. 3,149, Story, Ch. J., in answering the contention that the right of a consignor to stop property in cases of insolvency ought not to be confined to stoppage in transitu, but in equity should extend to all cases where the property is not paid for and remains in the hands of the consignee, said: "It is admitted that the decisions in England have confined the right of stoppage to cases where the property is in its transit. But it is suggested that the point has not been solemnly adjudged in the United States, and that it is open. . . . Nothing is better settled, if an uninterrupted series of authorities can settle the law, than the doctrine that the vendor, in cases of insolvency, can stop the property only while it is in its transit. If it has once reached the consignee, there is an end of all right to reclaim it as a pledge for the payment of the purchase money. If the doctrine were to go the length now contended for, it is far from certain that it would promote public convenience or policy. Where could we stop? Could it be applied with safety to purchases made at any distance of time, if it should turn out, in the event, that the buyer was then insolvent? It is very true, as has been stated at the bar, that our law respecting the distribution of the estates of persons dying insolvent differs from that of England, where the assets are marshaled, and payment goes according to the dignity of the debt. Here, all debts are paid pari passu. This, however, affords no ground to change the general rights and duties of vendor or vendee, or to create relations between debtor and creditor hitherto unknown to the law. The cases arising under the Bankrupt Laws are not in principle unlike those which arise here under insolvencies. And the Bankrupt Laws furnish no instance of an attempt to establish any doctrine like that now sought from the court. It is sufficient for me to stand upon the law, as it is now universally received. If there are public mischiefs growing out of its principles, let them be remedied by the legislature."

And it has been held that the application of the rule that actual delivery terminates the vendee's right of stoppage in transitu is not affected by the fact that the consignee, when he received the goods, made an undisclosed mental reservation to hold them for the vendor. Smith v. Gail (1902) 44 Fla. 863, 33 So. 527. However, in Heinekey v. Earle (1857) 8 El. & Bl. 410, 120 Eng. Reprint, 153, 4 Jur. N. S. 848, 6 Week. Rep. 687, 28 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 79, it was held that putting the goods into the consignee's possession, against his wishes and without his knowledge, did not terminate the right of stoppage in transitu, but that a subsequent consent to hold the same did constitute a delivery and acceptance sufficient to cut off the vendor's right of stoppage. And that the insolvent consignee not only should, but is bound to, reject purchased goods, see Booker & Co. v. Milne (1870) 9 Sc. Sess. Cas. 3d series, 314.

And a delivery terminating the right of stoppage in transit is not affected by the fact that the carrier subsequently takes possession of the shipment in an effort to reinstate its lien for shipment. Re Dancy Hardware & Furniture Co. (1912) 198 Fed. 336, affirmed without opinion in (1913) 119 C. C. A. 276, 201 Fed. 1023, holding that the attempt of a carrier to reinstate its lien was not an exercise of the right of stoppage in transitu which inured to the benefit of the seller.

Nor does it affect the case that the consignor elected to exercise his right of stoppage in transitu before actual delivery to the consignee or lawful demand therefor, provided such election was not communicated to the carrier in time to be communicated to the point of destination prior to such delivery or demand therefor. Re White (1913) 205 Fed. 393.

Under the rule that actual delivery terminates the transitus, it is held that by a reshipment from the point to which the goods were originally consigned, under the orders of the consignee, the transitus is ended and the right of the consignor to stop the goods terminated. Re W. A. Paterson Co. (1911) 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 31, 108 C. C. A. 493, 186 Fed. 629; The Natchez (1887) 31 Fed. 615; E. & G. Brooke Iron Co. v. O'Brien (1883) 135 Mass. 442; Norfolk Hardwood Co. v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1909) 202 Mass. 160, 88 N. E. 664; Ætna Nat. Bank v. Union P. R. Co. (1897) 69 Mo. App. 246; A. J. Neimeyer Lumber Co. v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. (1898) 54 Neb. 321, 40 L.R.A. 534, 74 N. W. 670; Eaton v. Cook (1859) 32 Vt. 58; Mollison v. Lockhart (1891) 30 N. B. 398.

But under this rule an order for a delivery of goods to a party other than the consignee does not constitute a reshipment from the point of original delivery, where the consignee and such third party are both within the original destination, and the goods are still being held by the carrier, as such, for the purpose of completing the original transportation. Lewis v. Sharvey (1894) 58 Minn. 464, 59 N. W. 1096. However, it has been held that, where the vendee directs the vendor to ship the goods to a third party in the vendee's name as consignor, there is a clear and unmistakable exercise of dominion and ownership on the part of the vendee which is recognized by the vendor's compliance with the request, so as to terminate his right of stoppage in transitu. Treadwell v. Aydlott (1872) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 383; Eaton v. Cook (1859) 32 Vt. 58.

According to some authorities the transitus ceases and the right of stoppage terminates when the vendee intercepts the shipment before it reaches its original destination, and lawfully and actually obtains possession thereof.

This is especially true where the consignee takes possession through an agent with the consent of the consignor. Muskegon Booming Co. v. Underhill (1880) 43 Mich. 629, 5 N. W. 1073.

So it has been held that the shipment need not reach the consignee's place of abode, it being sufficient to terminate transit and the right of the vendor to stop the goods that the consignee has gained possession or exercised some act of ownership, previous to their reaching such place of abode. Wright v. Lawes (1801) 4 Esp. (Eng.) 82.

Also in some instances controlling statutes have been enacted. For instance, by the express terms of the Sale of Goods Act (56 & 57 Vict. chap. 71, § 45, subd. 2), if the buyer or his agent obtains delivery of the goods before their arrival at the point of destination, the transit is at an end. See Mechan & Son v. North Eastern R. Co. (1911) 48 Scot. L. R. 987, which quotes and construes the act.

As the above-stated general rule indicates, one of the great elements to be considered in answering the question under consideration is, What constitutes delivery? for, as that rule states, delivery to the vendee terminates the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Then, of course, arises the question what constitutes delivery. Upon this phase of the subject, the majority of the courts maintain that delivery, either actual or constructive, is sufficient to cut off the vendor's right of stoppage, but a few maintain that actual manual delivery and possession are necessary.

The decided weight of authority is to the effect that the right of stoppage in transitu continues during the transitu, or, as otherwise expressed, until the goods are delivered to the buyer, or possession, actual or constructive, is taken by him at the point of destination; in other words, that constructive possession by the consignee is sufficient to terminate the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu. The following cases support this rule:

(D) Application of rule.

(1) "Destination" governed by intention of parties.

Under the rule that actual or constructive delivery is sufficient to terminate the right of stoppage in transitu, the destination of the goods is that contemplated by the contract of sale, or understood between the consignor and the consignee at the time of the shipment, so that, generally speaking, the right of stoppage does not terminate before the goods reach that point.

In Re M. Burke & Co. (1905) 140 Fed. 971, it was held that where goods were shipped to a store at a given address, but such store was closed when they arrived, and the carting company retained them in its possession, the goods were still in transit so as to enable the consignor to exercise his right of stoppage in transitu.

In Re Arctic Stores (1919) 258 Fed. 688, it was held that delivery on a specified railroad siding, as provided by the bill of lading, constituted a delivery and terminated the right of stoppage in transitu.

In Biggs v. Barry (1855) 2 Curt. C. C. 259, Fed. Cas. No. 1,402, it was held that delivery of goods to forwarding agents employed by the buyer, to hold subject to the further orders of the buyer, was in legal effect a delivery which terminated the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu.

In White v. Mitchell (1878) 38 Mich. 390, it was held that goods were still in transit, although they had been placed in the hands of a local carrier to be delivered to the consignee's store, the delivery man not being an agent of the consignee.

In Covell v. Hitchcock (1840) 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 611, it was held that the deposit of goods by the carrier in a public warehouse did not terminate the transitu, where such warehouse was merely an intermediate point between the place of sale and the destination of goods.

In Sawyer v. Joslin (1848) 20 Vt. 172, 49 Am. Dec. 768, it was held that a wharf  $\frac{1}{2}$  mile from the consignee's place of business was the point contemplated by the parties.

In Mechan & Sons v. North Eastern R. Co. (Scot.) supra, it was held that the point of delivery to a local cartman was not the point of delivery contemplated by the parties, the contract having called for delivery at the vendee's place of business.

The mere arrival at or on the premises of the carrier at the point of destination does not terminate the transportation and the right of stoppage in transitu, for "transit" includes not only carriage of goods to destination, but delivery there according to the terms of the contract.

Canada. — Mollison v. Lockhart (1871) 30 N. B. 398.

And when goods arrive at the destination contemplated by the parties, an order for delivery at a particular warehouse or point within the original destination does not constitute a constructive possession sufficient to end the right of stoppage in transitu, at least, where the carrier is still holding the goods as such. Lewis v. Sharvey (1894) 58 Minn. 464, 59 N. W. 1096.

And the fact that a vendee has been accustomed to receive his freight at a certain depot or wharf does not constitute mere arrival there of a particular consignment of goods a delivery thereof, so as to terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Seymour v. Newton (1870) 105 Mass. 272; James v. Griffin (1837) 2 Mees. & W. 623, 150 Eng. Reprint, 906, 6 L. J. Exch. N. S. 241. And this, even though the carrier promised the consignee or his assignee to deliver the goods as soon as it could get at them. Coventry v. Gladstone (1868) L. R. 6 Eq. (Eng.) 44, 37 L. J. Ch. N. S. 492, 16 Week. Rep. 837. However, in Ex parte Gouda (1872) 20 Week. Rep. (Eng.) 981, it was held that arrival at the general point of destination, together with notice by the carrier to the consignee that the goods had so arrived, constituted a constructive delivery sufficient to terminate the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu.

Nor does the mere fact that the goods shipped under a bill of lading making them deliverable to the consignee, or his order, terminate the right of stoppage in transitu upon their arrival at the point of destination, since such fact does not destroy the carrier's relation as such, or make it the agent of the consignee. Brindley & Co. v. Cilgwyn Slate Co. (1885) 55 L. J. Q. B. N. S. (Eng.) 67.

So, it has been held that the fact that the vendee had his bill of lading stamped "Canceled by delivery" did not terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, where the vendee immediately inspected the goods, refused to accept them, and had the indorsement canceled, and left the goods in the carrier's possession, the theory being that the acts of the vendee constituted one connected transaction, so that there was no delivery and acceptance. NORTHERN GRAIN CO. v. WIFFLER (reported herewith) ante, 1870.

In Harding Paper Co. v. Allen (1886) 65 Wis. 576, 27 N. W. 329, it was held that it was not conclusively shown that goods had been so delivered as to terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, by evidence tending to show that they had arrived at their destination, that the consignee had been notified by the carrier of their arrival, and had requested that they be taken away under penalty, for failure, that they be stored at the consignee's expense, to which request no attention was paid.

So, it has been held that a tender by the carrier and a refusal by the vendee to accept do not constitute a delivery sufficient to terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Kahnweiler v. Buck (1870) 2 Pearson (Pa.) 69; James v. Griffin (1837) 2 Mees. & W. 623, 150 Eng. Reprint, 906, 6 L. J. Ch. N. S. 241.

And in Massachusetts it has been held that arrival at the point of destination, together with notice thereof to the consignee, payment of the freight charges by him up to a certain time, and his subsequent taking of samples, makes the question of constructive delivery and the dependent right of stoppage in transitu one of fact, and, upon all the evidence, for the jury, no definite acceptance or rejection being shown. COLEMAN v. NEW

(3) Carrier holding as warehouseman.

The great weight of authority is to the effect that a consignment of goods, in the absence of special circumstances is in the possession of the carrier, and therefore still in transitu and subject to stoppage, as long as the goods are in its custody, either as such, or as a warehouseman.

In A. B. Symms & Co. v. Wm. Schotten & Co. (1886) 35 Kan. 310, 10 Pac. 828, where the railroad company had removed the goods to its warehouse to await payment of freight charges and delivery to the vendee, the court answered the contention that, because the goods had reached the point to which they were shipped and had been placed in the carrier's warehouse, the transitus was at an end and the vendor's right of stoppage extinguished, as follows: "The general rule is that the vendor may resume possession of the goods at any time before they actually reach the possession of the vendee. This right continues in the vendor not only while the goods are being carried to the place of consignment, but may be exercised at any time until delivery to the vendee or his agent has been completed. The unloading of the goods and the placing of them in the warehouse of the railroad company does not necessarily terminate the transitus, nor put an end to the right of stoppage; so long as they remain in the hands of the carrier or middleman, as such, the right does not cease. There may be cases where the possession of the carrier or warehouseman, after the final destination is reached, will, owing to the agreement of the parties or the special circumstances of the case, be regarded as the possession of the vendee, and so put an end to the vendor's right of stoppage. But where goods are consigned and shipped in the ordinary way, and the railroad company which brings them to the point of delivery, in performance of its duty as carrier, unloads and places the goods in its warehouse, awaiting the payment of the freight charges before delivery to the vendee, the presumption will be that the goods are still in transit, and that the right of stoppage yet remains in the vendor."

(4) Vendee's agent or representative.

See infra, III., and the several subdivisions thereof.

3. Doctrine that actual delivery is necessary.

Some cases, apparently, take the view that actual delivery to and possession by the consignee are essential to a termination of the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, and that constructive delivery, such as to a carrier, warehouseman, or other intermediary, is not sufficient.

E. 194 (holding that where goods were delivered by the vendor to a third party to be bleached on account of the buyer, the vendor could terminate the transit while the goods were in the hands of the intermediate party).

England.—Hunter v. Beale (1785) 3 T. R. 466, 100 Eng. Reprint, 680; Ellis v. Hunt (1789) 3 T. R. 464, 100 Eng. Reprint, 679, 1 Revised Rep. 743, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 416. The later English cases lay down a broader rule—see supra, II. b, 2.

In Scott Bros. v. William B. Grimes Dry-Goods Co. (Mo.) supra, the court said: "The essential ground of the right of lien is possession; that of stoppage in transitu is nondelivery to the vendee. The title of the vendor is never entirely divested until the goods have come into possession of the vendee; until then, he may retract the intended delivery and stop the goods in transitu. The goods must be delivered to the vendee, and be in his actual and absolute possession; they need not, however, come to his corporal touch; otherwise, they may be stopped in transitu. . . . The general rule is that the right of stoppage is gone when the goods fairly arrive at their destination, so as to give the vendee the actual and absolute possession of them. But this right is not lost by constructive delivery."

The reason for this rule of "actual" possession is, of course, much stronger where the bill of lading provides for actual possession at the point of destination. Stubbs v. Lund (1811) 7 Mass. 453, 5 Am. Dec. 63.

And in Georgia the statutes declare that the right of stoppage in transitu exists while the goods are in the hands of a carrier or middleman in transit, and continues until the vendee obtains actual possession of the goods, and it has been held that such provisions contemplate actual delivery and possession, as distinguished from constructive possession, so that the vendor may stop a shipment at any time prior to actual delivery at destination. This statute, and the construction placed upon it by the courts, are illustrated by the following cases: Macon & W. R. Co. v. Meador (1880) 65 Ga. 705 (holding that a constructive delivery, such as that resulting from the carrier, at the direction of the vendee, storing the goods for sale and agreeing to apply the proceeds on an account for freight, did not prevent a stoppage in transitu); Ocean S. S. Co. v. Ehrlich (1891) 88 Ga. 502, 30 Am. St. Rep. 164, 14 S. E. 707; Branan Bros. v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. (1899) 106 Ga. 70, 75 Am. St. Rep. 26, 33 S. E. 836.

c. Partial delivery.

A considerable number of cases have passed upon the effect of a partial delivery of goods to the vendee to terminate the right of stoppage in transitu.

The majority of the decisions are to the effect that the fact that a part of the goods has rightfully come into the possession of the vendee at the point of destination does not constitute a constructive delivery, so as to terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu as to the balance of the goods which is still undelivered. Johnson v. Eveleth (1899) 98 Me. 306, 48 L.R.A. 50, 45 Atl. 35; Buckley v. Furniss (1837) 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 504; Jeffris v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1896) 93 Wis. 250, 33 L.R.A. 351, 57 Am. Cas. 399. And see Mohr v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1870) 106 Mass. 67. At least, in the absence of a showing that it was the intention of the parties that such a partial delivery should operate as a delivery of the whole. Jeffris v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1896) 93 Wis. 250, 33 L.R.A. 351, 57 Am. St. Rep. 919, 67 N. W. 424; Ex parte Cross (1851) Fonbl. Eq. (Eng.) 215, as set out in 25 Laws of England (Halsbury) p. 255. In the Jeffris Case (Wis.) supra, it was said that this is upon the theory that it cannot be supposed that the carrier intended to abandon its lien for unpaid freight and charges. And, as is expressly enacted by the Sale of Goods Act (56 & 57 Vict. chap. 71, § 45, subd. 7), "where part delivery of the goods has been made to the buyer, or his agent in that belief, the remainder of the goods may be stopped in transitu unless such part delivery has been made under such circumstances as to show an agreement to give up possession of the whole of the goods." In Mechan & Son v. North Eastern R. Co. (1911) 48 Scot. L. R. 987, it was said that this provision "raises a presumption against actual delivery of a part of a consignment of goods operating as constructive delivery of the whole, especially where, as in the present case, the goods are clearly divisible." In Bolton v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. (1866) L. R. 1 C. P. (Eng.) 431, Willes, J., in discussing the effect of partial delivery on the right of stoppage in transitu, laid down the rule as follows: "The delivery of part operates as a constructive delivery of the whole only where the delivery of part takes place in the course of the delivery of the whole, and the taking possession by the buyer of that part is the acceptance of constructive possession of the whole."

But especially is this rule applicable where it actually does appear that the intention of both parties was to separate the part delivered from the residue. Bunney v. Poyntz (1833) 4 Barn. & Ad. 568, 110 Eng. Reprint, 569, 1 Nev. & M. 229, 2 L. J. K. B. N. S. 55; Dixon v. Yates (1835) 5 Barn. & Ad. 813, 110 Eng. Reprint, 806, 2 Nev. & M. 177, 2 L. J. K. B. N. And it has been held that, where the freight on a cargo has not been paid, a delivery of a part of the cargo cannot be a constructive delivery of the whole, because it must be assumed that the carrier would not have delivered the whole until he had received the whole of the freight, from which it follows that if it could not be said that the carrier had constructively delivered the whole, it would be impossible to say that the vendee had constructively accepted a delivery which was never made, and consequently that the vendor, upon the insolvency of the vendee, had a right to stop the undelivered part of the cargo. Ex parte Cooper (1879) L. R. 11 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 63, 48 L. J. Bankr. N. S. 49, 40 L. T. N. S. 105, 27 Week. Rep. 518. A similar conclusion was reached in Ex parte Falk (1880) L. R. 14 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 446, 42 L. T. N. S. 780, 28 Week. Rep. 785, 4 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 280.

However, it has been held without qualification that a delivery to the vendee or his general agent of only a part of the goods sold is a delivery of the whole, so as to bar the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Stevens v. Wheeler (1858) 27 Barb. (N. Y.) 658.

And it also has been held that transitu is ended by a complete delivery of a part of the goods sold under an entire contract, where no intention appears, either previous to or at the time of the delivery, to separate such part from the rest. Slubey v. Heyward (1795) 2 H. Bl. 504, 126 Eng. Reprint, 672, 3 Revised Rep. 386; Hammond v. Anderson (1803) 1 Bos. & P. N. R. 67, 127 Eng. Reprint, 384, 5 Esp. 139, 8 Revised Rep. 763; Crawshay v. Eades (1823) 1 Barn. & C. 181, 107 Eng. Reprint, 68, 2 Dowl. & R. 288, 1 L. J. K. B. N. S. 90, 25 Revised Rep. 348; Jones v. Jones (1841) 8 Mees. & W. 431, 151 Eng. Reprint, 1107, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 481. However, under special circumstances, the contrary has been held, where the delivery was of a part only of an "entire" cargo. Thus, in Crawshay v. Eades (1823) 1 Barn. & C. 181, 107 Eng. Reprint, 68, where a carrier landed a part of a cargo on the consignee's wharf, but, upon discovering that he had stopped payment, reloaded the same and retained possession thereof, it was held that there had been no such delivery of any part of the cargo as would terminate the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu. This was upon the theory that during all the time the special property in the entire cargo remained in the cargo as security for its freight charges. Bayley, J., said: "In order to stop the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu, there ought to be such a delivery to the consignee as to divest the carrier's lien on the whole cargo. I am of opinion, therefore, that, the entire freight not having been tendered or paid, the delivery in this case was not complete, as to any part; that the special property remained in the carrier; and that the consignor was not deprived of his right of stoppage in transitu."

But the fact that the undelivered part of the goods sold under an entire contract are stopped in transit does not re-vest the part delivered in the vendor, at least where they had been shipped by a different route and means from those stopped. In other words, the fact that a part of the goods are still in transitu does not extend the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu to goods shipped by a different route, and which have arrived at their destination and been delivered to the vendee. Wentworth v. Outhwaite (1842) 10 Mees. & W. 436, 152 Eng. Reprint, 541, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 172.

III. Who may accept or take possession.

a. Agents.

1. In general.

While it has been said that to terminate the right of stoppage in transitu the goods must have come to "the corporal touch" of the vendees (Hunter v. Beal (1785) cited in 3 T. R. 466, 100 Eng. Reprint, 680), it is now generally conceded that the corporal touch of the consignee is not necessarily an essential to termination of the transit, so as to prevent a stoppage by the consignor (Klein v. Fischer (1888) 30 Mo. App. 568; Mottram v. Heyer (1845) 1 Denio (N. Y.) 483, affirmed in (1846) 5 Denio, 629; Williams v. Hodges (1893) 113 N. C. 36, 18 S. E. 83; Ellis v. Hunt (1789) 3 T. R. 464, 100 Eng. Reprint, 679, 1 Revised Rep. 743, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 416; Dixon v. Baldwin (1804) 5 East, 175, 102 Eng. Reprint, 1036). In fact, in Ellis v. Hunt (1789) 3 T. R. 464, 100 Eng. Reprint, 679, 1 Revised Rep. 743, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 416, Lord Kenyon, Ch. J., said: "As to the necessity of the goods coming to the 'corporal touch' of the bankrupt, that is merely a figurative expression, and has never been literally adhered to." And Dixon v. Baldwin (1804) 5 East, 175, 102 Eng. Reprint, 1036, contains a similar statement. And again, in Wright v. Lawes (1801) 4 Esp. (Eng.) 82, Lord Kenyon said: "I once said that, to confer a property on the consignee, a corporal touch was necessary. I wish the expression had never been used, as it says too much."

In fact, under the general rule that the constructive possession of the vendee is sufficient to terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, there seems to be no question that the vendee may accept delivery through an agent and take such a possession as will terminate the right of stoppage in transit.

2. General and forwarding agents.

As has often been pointed out, there is a clear distinction between general and forwarding agents, but the practical and at the same time the difficult question is whether the agent in a particular case should, under the facts, be regarded as a general agent, or as a mere forwarding agent. For instance, Denio, J., in Harris v. Pratt (1858) 17 N. Y. 249, in discussing a situation of the character under consideration, said: "The general rule in this class of cases is that, while the goods remain in the possession of persons concerned in their transportation to the place of destination named by the purchaser, they may, in the event of his failure, be reclaimed by the seller. It is not material whether the person in whose possession they are when the seller interposes his claim be a carrier, a warehouse keeper, a wharfinger, packer, or other depository, or an agent for the purposes of forwarding, nor by which of the parties to the sale he was employed. He may be the agent of the purchaser, designated, paid, and employed by him, yet if the purpose of his employment is to expedite the property towards its destination, or to aid those engaged in forwarding it, the seller's right to stay the final delivery continues. But, however clearly the general principle may be stated, the circumstances of commercial dealings are so various that cases are apt to arise in which its application is a matter of extreme difficulty. When the seller attempts to claim the goods, the question is whether they have arrived at the end of their transit, and this usually depends upon the further question whether the party in whose hands they are found is acting in the character of an agent for transportation, or as the agent of the purchaser, holding them simply for his use, unconnected with the business of forwarding them. It sometimes happens that the seller delivers goods sold on credit immediately to an agent of the purchaser, or that, as in the present case, he sends them a part of the way to their final destination, and they are delivered to such agent of the buyer. When they have been so delivered according to the vendee's direction, either immediately upon the sale or after being carried a part of the distance, the question arises whether the seller retains a right to stop them on account of the failure of the purchaser. Under certain circumstances the depository in these cases is considered as the general agent of the purchaser, and the goods, when in his hands, are adjudged to be virtually in the possession of such purchaser, and not in transitu; while under a state of facts somewhat different, the person into whose custody they thus came is regarded as an agent for expediting them, and the right of stoppage continues until they come to the purchaser's hands at his place of business, or at some other place where he has directed them to be sent. The question is within which of these classes the present case falls."

A considerable number of authorities have laid down the rule that the right of stoppage in transitu of goods sold is terminated by a final delivery thereof to the vendee's general agent, either at the general point of final destination or at an intermediate point, he not being a mere forwarding agent.

Canada.—Couture v. McKay (1889) 6 Manitoba L. R. 273.

The following cases illustrate various situations in which the agent has been held, under the noted facts, to have been a general agent within the meaning of the foregoing rule: In Grange Co. v. Farmers' Union & Mill. Co. (1906) 3 Cal. App. 519, 86 Pac. 615, under a statute providing that the transit of property is at an end when it comes into the possession of the consignee or into that of his agent, unless such agent is employed merely to forward the property to the consignee, it was held that delivery had been made to a general agent so as to cut off the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, it appearing that plaintiff sold grain to a San Francisco firm, and shipped the same, pursuant to directions given by it, "care of" defendant, a general warehouseman at Stockton; that a draft on the consignee was dishonored on September 15, and the consignee became bankrupt on the 16th; that on the following day the consignor notified the carrier not to deliver the grain, but was informed that it had already done so; that the consignor then notified the defendant not to forward the grain to the consignee, as it held the receipts; and that, according to a customary and unvarying business method and usage between the consignee and the defendant, as well as so considered by plaintiff, such delivery was a complete and final one to the consignee. In Lane v. Robinson (1857) 18 B. Mon. (Ky.) 623, goods were delivered, although without express authority by the carrier, at the point of destination, to one who paid the freight and agreed to hold them as special agent for the vendee at that point. In Walsh v. Blakely (1886) 6 Mont. 194, 9 Pac. 809, the vendee's agent received the goods at an intermediate point, not as a warehouseman, carrier, or mere forwarding agent, but as a special agent or bailee for the vendee, and held the same subject to his further directions. In Guilford v. Smith

(1858) 30 Vt. 49, the vendee, residing in B., purchased flour in T., and ordered it shipped to his agent in O., who was in the habit of receiving flour and holding it subject to the orders of the vendee, and it was held that delivery of the flour to such agent was for the purpose of custody, so as to cut off the right of stoppage in transitu. In Pottinger v. Hecksher (1855) 2 Grant, Cas. (Pa.) 309, it was said that delivery of goods at an intermediate point to agents who so far represented the vendee as to have general and unlimited power, with respect to future control thereof, was a final delivery, and effectual to cut off the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. And for decisions illustrating the converse of the above rule, see cases set out infra, this subdivision.

And the deposit of goods at the general point of destination with a warehouseman, subject to the order and control of the vendee, has been held to be such a delivery as effectually to cut off the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Frazer v. Hilliard (1847) 38 S. C. L. (2 Strobb.) 309; Orr v. Murdock (1851) 2 Ir. C. L. Rep. 9.

And this rule is not altered by the fact that the vendor is the warehouseman, provided he accepts warehouse rent from the vendee, such acceptance precluding a claim by him that he still retains possession as owner. Hurry v. Mangles (1808) 1 Campb. (Eng.) 452, 10 Revised Rep. 727.

On the other hand, the depositing of the goods at either an intermediate point or at the general point of destination, with an agent of the vendee, to be forwarded to their final destination, does not terminate the transitus so as to prevent a stoppage by the vendor.

Illustrations of facts and circumstances under which the agent to whom delivery was made has been regarded as a mere forwarding agent, instead of a general agent, are afforded by the cases which follow.

In Scott Bros. v. William B. Grimes Dry-Goods Co. (1892) 48 Mo. App. 521, cited supra, and quoted and discussed infra, the goods, at the time of the stoppage, were in the hands of a local transfer company at the destination point of the general carrier, under a previous general order of the vendee to receive any goods arriving for the latter, and for the mere purpose of being conveyed to the vendee's place of business.

In Weber v. Baessler (1893) 3 Colo. App. 459, 34 Pac. 261, T. & A., partners doing business in Denver, ordered goods of B., a manufacturer in Buffalo. The goods were shipped to the vendee and delivered to a local transfer company in Denver, which had general orders to receive and deliver any freight sent to the vendee. While in the hands of such transfer company the vendee refused to accept them, and they were delivered under an attachment obtained by a creditor of the vendee. Subsequently, the order of stoppage was given to the transfer company.

In Harris v. Tenney (1892) 85 Tex. 254, 34 Am. St. Rep. 796, 20 S. W. 82, the goods at the time of the stoppage had arrived at their rail destination, and were in the hands of local carriers for transportation to the vendee's place of business, they having been delivered by the carrier upon an order signed by the vendee, but which had been obtained by a creditor who had sued out an attachment.

In Blackman v. Pierce (1863) 23 Cal. 508, the vendee, living at T. C., ordered goods of B., of S. F., who shipped the same to T. C., care of P., at R. B., the point of transshipment from a steamer to wagons. P., who had orders from the vendee to forward the goods, placed them in his warehouse and advised the vendee of their arrival, and he advised that he would send his wagon for them. While so held in the warehouse at R. B., a creditor attached the goods, and subsequently the vendor gave notice of stoppage in transitu.

In Frame v. Oregon Liquor Co. (1906) 48 Or. 272, 85 Pac. 1009, rehearing denied in (1906) 48 Or. 276, 86 Pac. 791, a dealer at D., a town located back from the railroad, ordered goods which were consigned by the vendors to the vendee at D., by way of H., a point on the railroad. When the goods reached H. they were, pursuant to directions from the vendee, received by a local warehouseman and forwarding teamster, and stored in his warehouse to be transported to D. when ordered. The holding was that while so held the goods were in the hands of a mere forwarding agent, and, therefore, subject to stoppage in transitu.

In Jones v. Earl (1869) 37 Cal. 630, 99 Am. Dec. 338, the vendee, residing in V. C., ordered goods of B., in S. F., and the same were shipped care of E., at C., to be forwarded by him to the vendee at V. C. While the goods were at C., and in the custody of E.'s agent, the order to stop in transit was given.

In Hepp v. Glover (1840) 15 La. 461, 35 Am. Dec. 206, goods were purchased in New York, and were consigned care of A. of New Orleans to be forwarded to the vendee at Jackson, Mississippi.

In Markwald v. Their Creditors (1857) 7 Cal. 213, M. C. & Co. of San Francisco purchased in Havana an invoice of cigars, directed the vendor to ship to P. & S. at New York, and to draw on the vendee's London agents, and directed P. & S., on receipt of the cigars, to reship them to San Francisco after paying the duties and charges. The goods were stopped while being carried from New York to San Francisco, and it was claimed on behalf of the vendee that he, through his New York agents, had taken possession of the shipment at New York by exercising well-defined acts of ownership over the cigars, such as entering them in the bonded warehouse, giving bond for the duties, withdrawing them from bond and reshipping them under new bills of lading, paying freight charges, etc.; but the court ruled that P. & S. of New York "were agents only for the purpose of expediting the carriage of the goods to their original destination, and performed only such acts as were necessary to this end." In connection with this decision it should be noted that it does not appear, except perhaps by inference from the case as reported, whether or not the vendors were aware that the destination of the goods was San Francisco, instead of New York, but both the court and the party seeking to defeat the right of stoppage in transitu seem to have regarded San Francisco as the "original destination."

In Covell v. Hitchcock (1840) 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 611, the goods in question were consigned to the vendee at W., and when the right of stoppage was attempted were in the hands of a public warehouseman at H., between which point and W. there was no public conveyance, so that the goods were awaiting conveyance by teams to be sent on by the vendee.

In Hays v. Mouille (1850) 14 Pa. 48, the goods, which were bought in P. and directed to the vendee at M., were stopped while in the hands of a collecting agent, they, according to business custom, having been collected at one store by one of several vendors, to be shipped to the vendee.

In Cabeen v. Campbell (1858) 30 Pa. 254, the agents of the vendor took possession at an intermediate point with the understanding that they were to forward the goods without waiting for further orders or communicating with the vendee, and both the vendor and the vendee understood that such agents were mere agents for transportation to the place of original destination.

In Half v. Allyn (1883) 60 Tex. 278, the goods were sold at G. and shipped to the vendee at B. G., care of the railroad agent at C., the nearest railroad point to B. G., and were delivered by the freight agent to A., at C., who presented unindorsed bills of lading therefor, and while so held the right of stoppage in transitu was exercised. In this case it was held that the question whether the agent was a mere forwarding agent, as distinguished from one authorized to take possession and exercise general control over the goods, was for the jury.

In Chandler v. Fulton (1853) 10 Tex. 2, 60 Am. Dec. 188, the goods were received at an intermediate point to be forwarded, and not for safe custody or disposal.

In O'Neil v. Garrett (1858) 6 Iowa, 480, the carrier, after notice to stop the goods, and unknown to the consignee, delivered them to a warehouseman for storage, and not as agent of the consignee.

In Aguirre v. Parmelee (1853) 22 Conn. 473, T. & Co., of T., purchased through their New York purchasing agent, certain bales of wool of A., of New York. The wool was delivered to such agent, and in holding that such delivery did not terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, the court said: "The delivery was not to him as owner, nor as agent of the owner to dispose of them in any other way than to transmit them to the vendee's place of business. The finding is that he was the agent of the vendees, to make purchases of wool to be transmitted to T., and this seems to be the extent of his agency. He stood, therefore, rather in the position of a mere forwarding agent than in that of an agent to receive the goods for the vendee's use."

In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. National Live Stock Bank (1895) 59 Ill. App. 451, reversed in (1899) 178 Ill. 506, 53 N. E. 326, the cattle in suit were purchased by and delivered to the vendee's brother in Chicago, for the express purpose of shipping them at once to the vendee in New York, and not for the purpose of holding them for disposal in any other way. The order of stoppage was given while the goods were in transit from Chicago to New York.

In Johnson v. Eveleth (1899) 93 Me. 306, 48 L.R.A. 50, 45 Atl. 35, logs were sold to be delivered "over the dam" at the outlet of a certain lake, to be driven by the K. Co. to the vendee's booms, and the right of stoppage was exercised while they were being so driven.

In Mohr v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1870) 106 Mass. 67, A. sold to B., in Boston, a number of barrels of whisky then in a bonded warehouse in Indiana, B. giving his acceptances for the price and the warehouseman giving his certificate for the whisky as the property of B. A. agreed that when so requested he would draw the whisky from the warehouse, pay the taxes, charges, and insurance, and draw on B. for the amount. The goods, while in the warehouse, were regarded as in the hands of an intermediate agent on their way to the vendee.

And probably as good an illustration as any of the extent to which courts will go in protecting the right of the vendor to stop goods in transitu is afforded by the New York case of Harris v. Pratt (1858) 78 N. Y. 249, affirming (1857) 6 Duer, 606. Here two partners, under different firm names, carried on businesses at New York and at Nottingham, England. The Nottingham firm bought goods in their firm name, expressly stating that they were for the New York house, and directing that they be sent to a Liverpool firm, which was a shipping agent, to await further orders for shipment. The invoice was to the Nottingham firm, and the vendors, on shipping the goods to the Liverpool agent, wrote that they were sending the goods for the Nottingham firm, from whom "you will receive further instructions." On the same day the vendee sent shipping directions to the Liverpool firm. While the goods were on shipboard between Liverpool and New York, the vendors sought to exercise the right of stoppage in transitu, and it was held that the transit had not ended with the delivery to the Liverpool agents, the court holding to the theory that New York was the destination contemplated by both the vendors and the vendees, wherefore the Liverpool firm was merely a forwarding agent. In this connection, Denio, J., among other things, said: "We cannot consider the sending of the goods by the plaintiffs to the shipping agents at Liverpool as a full and final delivery of them to the purchasers. We regard what was done by the Halls of Nottingham, in giving directions to the shipping agents, to have been in aid of the general purpose of sending the goods to New York. The partner at Nottingham, though in law one of the purchasers, acted in regard to these goods as an agent of the house at New York in facilitating the transportation to that city. During the short time the goods remained in the hands of these agents, before the directions came from Nottingham, they could not be said to be 'awaiting new orders from the purchaser to put them again in motion, to communicate to them another substantive destination.' . . . New York was the destination contemplated from the beginning. It was the one named to the vendor, and there was no thought of diverting the goods from that point, at any time or by any person. They were awaiting a new impulse only in the sense in which that may be predicated of freight in transitu which is temporarily at rest while arrangements are making to send it forward on the journey on which it was originally embarked. We are of opinion, therefore, that the transitus was not determined at Liverpool." And Strong, J., in the same connection, said: "The employment of Edwards, Sandford, & Company, was as mere forwarding agents, in their usual course of business. The goods purchased of the vendors for Hall Brothers were uniformly sent to those agents, and by them shipped for New York. There is nothing in the case which will warrant the idea of any special agency. I do not think any weight is due on this subject to the fact that the goods were sent to them with advice that they would receive from J. & J. Hall further instructions in regard to the goods. It is apparent from the evidence that the instructions referred to were those subsequently given as to the time of shipment and the vessel to be employed. That the goods were to be sent to New York was determined when the purchase was made, and for that purpose the direction was given that they should be forwarded to Edwards, Sandford, & Company. No change of that determination was made, or, so far as appears, intended or thought of. It appears that the vendors were to pay the expenses of sending the goods to Liverpool, from which place the vendees were to provide for their carriage; and hence the propriety of instruction from the vendees to Edwards, Sandford, & Company as to their shipment from that place. But the employment by the vendees of a carrier from Liverpool, and deferring instructions as to shipment from there until the goods should arrive, did not create a new transit from that point. If the destination of the goods, as understood between the vendors and vendees, was New York, the transit and right of stoppage continued to New York, entirely unaffected by the consideration that the vendors employed carriers for part of the route, and the vendees as to the residue. A transit may be single and entire, and yet carriers be employed for different stages of the route as they are needed, with directions as to the carriage to each carrier, and knowledge by him as to their ultimate destination limited to the distance he is to carry. The extent of the transit does not depend upon the direction or address of the goods, in a shipping bill or otherwise, or any information to the carrier, but only upon the purposes of the buyers communicated to the sellers, unless some change of purpose occurs. When directions as to the carriage for part of the distance the goods are to be taken are delayed, and subsequently given, a new motion is not by the new instruction impressed upon the goods, as that language is used in some of the cases. The original motion continues, although the employment of new carriers and new instructions may be necessary from time to time in the course of the transit. A new motion takes place only when, after goods have reached their original destination, they are started to another destination. Those words express only a secondary transit. We must find such a transit before we can say a new motion has been given to the goods. Inquiry for a new motion is inquiry for a new transit. They are the same thing."

But, generally speaking, the receipt of the shipment, either at an intermediate point or at the destination specified in the contract by forwarding agents of the buyer, who are to hold the goods subject to the orders of the buyer, terminates the transit as regards the vendor, so that he cannot stop any further transit. *Biggs v. R. 987, which quotes the Sale of Goods Act (56 & 57 Vict. chap. 71, § 45, subsec. 3) to the effect that where the custodian at the general point of destination acknowledges that he holds the goods for the buyer, the transitus is at an end, "and it is immaterial that a further destination for the goods may have been indicated by the buyer."

In fact, in Guilford v. Smith (1858) 30 Vt. 49, it was said that the rule is well settled that, when goods are delivered at a place where they will remain until a fresh impulse is communicated to them by the vendee, the transitus is at an end and the right of stoppage terminated. And in Dixon v. Baldwin (1804) 5 East, 175, 102 Eng. Reprint, 1036, Lord Ellenborough, Ch. J., said that, as between the vendor and vendee, if the transit be once at an end, the delivery is complete and cannot commence de novo merely because the goods are again sent upon their travels toward a new and ulterior destination, and that goods have been so delivered when they have so far gotten to the end of their journey that they wait for new orders from the purchaser to put them in motion again, and without which they would continue stationary.

In Scott Bros. v. William B. Grimes Dry-Goods Co. (1892) 48 Mo. App. 521, the court pointed out the distinction between the situation where the delivery is to a forwarding agent of the vendee, and that where the delivery is to a general agent, such as for safe custody or for disposal of the goods, in the following language: "Whether the right of stoppage continues or not depends upon whether the party to whom the actual possession of the goods is delivered by the carrier be the agent, so far representing the principal — the vendee — as to make the delivery to him a full, effective, and final delivery to the principal, as contradistinguished from a delivery merely to a person acting as a carrier or means of conveyance to or on account of the principal in a mere course of transit towards him. If the carrier or other person receiving the goods at their destination be the agent of the vendee beyond the duty and position of such person as a mere carrier, the possession of such agent would be effectual to bar the right of stoppage as the actual, manual possession of the vendee." However, the Scott Case seems to be qualified in O'Neal v. Day (1893) 53 Mo. App. 189, so as to limit the rule of a right to stoppage in transitu after delivery to an agent for delivery, to cases where the goods were billed to a store or other particular point, as distinguished from the general point of destination. In O'Neal v. Day, the carrier delivered to a local carrier having authority to receive and transport all of the vendee's freight to his place of business, and it was held that such a receiving of freight billed to the carrier's station was, prima facie, a termination of the transit. And the O'Neal Case was expressly followed in Shoninger v. Day (1893) 53 Mo. App. 147, which involved similar facts, and was again approved on subsequent appeal in (1895) 61 Mo. App. 366.

But similar language to that quoted in Scott Bros. v. William B. Grimes

Dry-Goods Co. (Mo.) supra, was again used in Bolin v. Huffnagle (1828) 1 Rawle (Pa.) 9.

And in Mills v. Ball (1801) 2 Bos. & P. 457, 126 Eng. Reprint, 1382, Lord Alvanley, Ch. J., in discussing the right of a vendor to stop goods in transit while they were in the hands of a wharfinger at an intermediate point, to be forwarded to the vendee, said: "The question is whether the goods in the hands of the wharfinger were in such a situation that the vendors could stop them. The cases cited for the plaintiffs have established that where there is a contract for the sale of goods, and a delivery has been made to a middleman, who is merely the vehicle between the buyer and seller, the latter, in case of the insolvency of the former, may stop them at any time before they have arrived in such a state as to be in the actual or constructive possession of the buyer. The only question is whether these goods are to be considered as having been in the hands of a middleman, or as having been taken in the possession of the person for whom they were ultimately intended? If, in the course of the conveyance of the goods from the vendor to the vendee, the latter be allowed to exercise any act of ownership over them, he thereby reduces the goods into possession, and puts an end to the vendor's right to stop them. . . . I am of opinion that the wharfinger in this case, not having been particularly employed by the vendee, is to be considered as a middleman."

And in Bethell v. Clark (1888) L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. (Eng.) 615, affirming (1887) L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 553, 57 L. T. N. S. 627, 36 Week. Rep. 185, the master of the rolls said: "When the goods have not been delivered to the purchaser or to any agent of his to hold for him otherwise than as a carrier, but are still in the hands of the carrier as such, and for the purposes of the transit, then, although such carrier was the purchaser's agent to accept delivery so as to pass the property, nevertheless the goods are in transit and may be stopped." This passage was quoted with approval and the doctrine again applied in Lyons v. Hoffnung (1890) L. R. 15 App. Cas. (Eng.) 391, 6 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 551, 59 L. J. P. C. N. S. 79, 63 L. T. N. S. 293, 39 Week. Rep. 390, which is cited supra, this subdivision. And again in the Bethell Case, Lord Esher, M. R., said: "Where the transit is a transit which has been caused either by the terms of the contract or by the directions of the purchaser to the vendor, the right of stoppage in transitu exists; but, if the goods are not in the hands of the carrier by reason either of the terms of the contract, or of the directions of the purchaser to the vendor, but are in transitu afterwards in consequence of fresh directions given by the purchaser for a new transit, then such transit is no part of the original transit and the right to stop is gone. So also, if the purchaser gives orders that the goods shall be sent to a particular place, there to be kept till he gives fresh orders as to their destination to a new carrier, the original transit is at an end when they have reached that place, and any further transit is a fresh and independent transit."

Where delivery is made by the carrier to a general warehouseman acting as agent for it, as, for instance, for the purpose of collecting freight and charges due upon the goods, they are regarded as in transit while so held, and the vendor's right of stoppage is not cut off because of lack of delivery, either actual or constructive, to the vendee. Hoover v. Tibbits (1860) 13 Wis. 79 (this case clearly points out the distinction between delivery to a general agent of the vendee and delivery to an agent of the carrier); Ex parte Barrow (1877) L. R. 6 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 783, 25 Week. Rep. 466, 46 L. J. Bankr. N. S. 71, 36 L. T. N. S. 325.

And if the vendor deposits the goods with the vendee's agent with the understanding that delivery was conditional upon payment of the purchase price, such agent becomes a trustee for the vendor, and delivery, neither to such agent, nor by him to the vendee without receiving the price, constitutes such delivery as terminates the right of stoppage in transitu. Loeschman v. Williams (1815) 4 Campb. (Eng.) 181, 16 Revised Rep. 772.

But, of course, the carrier may hold as agent of the consignee under a new agreement with him pending a complete and actual delivery, in which case the right of stoppage in transitu terminates with the making of such new contract and the constructive delivery of the goods.

In Foster v. Frampton (1826) 6 Barn. & C. 107, 108 Eng. Reprint, 392, Bayley, J., in discussing the question of a carrier acting as warehouseman for a consignee, said: "Where a man orders goods to be delivered at a particular place, the transitus continues until they are delivered to the consignee at that place; but that must be understood of a delivery in the ordinary course of business; for if the consignee, before the goods reach their ultimate destination, postpone the delivery, or does any act which is equivalent to taking actual possession of them, the transitus is at an end. Now here, the bankrupt has done such an act, for he not only postponed the delivery which would have taken place in the ordinary course of business, but he took samples, and directed the carrier to keep the goods in his warehouse until he received further directions. From that time the carrier became the warehouseman of the bankrupt, and the goods were as much in the possession of the latter as if he had taken them into his own warehouse. . . . Now here the bankrupt, on the particular occasion, used the warehouse of the carrier as his own, and made it the repository of his goods. I, therefore, think that the transitus was at an end as soon as the bankrupt took the samples from the hogsheads, and desired that they should remain in the warehouse till further directions." And in Bolton v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. (1866) L. R. 1 C. P. (Eng.) 431, Earle, Ch. J., said: "There is no doubt but that the carrier may and often does become a warehouseman for the consignee; but that must be by virtue of some contract or course of dealing between them that, when arrived at their destination, the character of carrier shall cease, and that of warehouseman supervene." So, in Whitehead v. Anderson (1842) 9 Mees. & W. 518, 152 Eng. Reprint, 219, Parke, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "A case of constructive possession is where the carrier enters expressly, or by implication, into a new agreement, distinct from the original contract for carriage, to hold the goods for the consignee as his agent, not for the purpose of expediting them to the place of original destination, pursuant to that contract, but in a new character, for the purpose of custody on his account, and subject to some new or further order to be given to him."

And in such a case the termination of the right of stoppage in transitu has been held not to be affected by the fact that the carrier, as such, claims a lien on the goods. Allan v. Gripper (1832) 2 Crompt. & J. 218, 149 Eng. Reprint, 94, 1 L. J. Exch. N. S. 71, 2 Tyrw. 217.

And by the Sale of Goods Act (56 & 57 Vict. chap. 71, § 45, subd. 3) it is provided that, "if after the arrival of the goods at the appointed destination, the carrier or other bailee or custodian acknowledges to the buyer or his agent that he holds the goods on his behalf, and continues in possession as bailee or custodian for the buyer or his agent, the transit is at an end." This act is quoted and applied in Mechan & Sons v. North Eastern R. Co. (1911) 48 Scot. L. R. 987.

But it has been held that a mere business custom by which the vendee is allowed to leave the goods in the carrier's warehouse, to be removed at his convenience upon payment of charges, does not create a new relationship such as will terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Jeffris v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1896) 93 Wis. 250, 83 L.R.A. 351, 57 Am. St. Rep. 919, 67 N. W. 424.

And in England it has been held that the right of the consignor, under the rule allowing stoppage in transitu at any time before delivery, cannot be affected by any usage of the carrier to retain goods as a lien for a general balance of account between it and the consignee. Oppenheim v. Russell (1802) 3 Bos. & P. 42, 127 Eng. Reprint, 24, 6 Revised Rep. 604. And see Richardson v. Goss (1802) 3 Bos. & P. 119, 127 Eng. Reprint, 65, 6 Revised Rep. 727. But see also Rowe v. Pickford (1817) 8 Taunt. 83, 129 Eng. Reprint, 313, 1 J. B. Moore, 526, 19 Revised Rep. 466; and Foster v. Frampton (1826) 6 Barn. & C. 107, 108 Eng. Reprint, 892, 9 Dowl. & R. 106, 2 Car. & P. 469, 5 L. J. K. B. 71, 30 Revised Rep. 255.

Where a vendor delivers goods to his agent to have work done upon them before being forwarded to the vendee, they are still in transit while so held, and may be stopped by the vendor upon the insolvency of the vendee. Owenson v. Morse (1796) 7 T. R. 64, 101 Eng. Reprint, 856.

Under the rule requiring actual delivery, it has been held that where the goods are consigned to the vendee at a foreign port, the right of stoppage in transitu continues until delivery into the actual possession of the vendee at the port of delivery, and that the rule is not affected by the fact that the goods were carried in the vendee's ship. In other words, where goods are shipped to a foreign port in the vendee's ship and consigned to him, the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu does not terminate when the goods are delivered to the ship. Newhall v. Vargas (1836) 13 Me. 93, 29 Am. Dec. 489; Stubbs v. Lund (1811) 7 Mass. 453, 5 Am. Dec. 63; Parker v. M'Iver (1792) 1 S. C. Eq. (Desauss.) 274, 1 Am. Dec. 656.

And where the consignee has no control over the ship, but has merely contracted with the master to employ his ship in bringing goods for him, it has been held that delivery of goods on board does not terminate the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu any more than if delivered on board a general ship to be carried to the consignee. Bohtlingk v. Inglis (1803) 3 East, 381, 102 Eng. Reprint, 643, 7 Revised Rep. 490; Berndtson v. Strang (1868) L. R. 3 Ch. (Eng.) 538, 37 L. J. Ch. N. S. 665, 19 L. T. N. S. 40, 16 Week. Rep. 1025; Ex parte Rosevear China Clay Co. (1879) L. R. 11 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 560, 48 L. J. Bankr. N. S. 100, 40 L. T. N. S. 730, 27 Week. Rep. 591, 4 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 144. And this although no different or further destination than the ship was communicated to the vendor. Ex parte Rosevear China Clay Co. (Eng.) supra. In this case Cotton, L. J., said that the verbal agreement which the purchaser entered into to charter the ship did not make the captain the agent or servant of the purchaser, as he was only a carrier; and Brett, L. J., argued that "it can make no difference whether the destination of the goods is communicated to [by] the purchaser at the time of the contract for sale, or whether the destination is to be named after the contract, but before the shipment."

Nor does the mere fact that the carrying ship was named by the buyer make any difference as to the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu. Thompson v. Trail (1826) 2 Car. & P. 334, 6 Barn. & C. 36, 108 Eng. Reprint, 366, 6 Dowl. & R. 31, 5 L. J. K. B. 34, 30 Revised Rep. 242; Ex parte Watson (1877) L. R. 5 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 35, 25 Week. Rep. 489, 46 L. J. Bankr. N. S. 97, 36 L. T. N. S. 75, 3 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 396. But see Wilmshurst v. Bowker (1843) 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 475, 7 Mann. & G. 882, 135 Eng. Reprint, 358, where goods were put on board a ship designated by the vendee to be carried for and at his risk, and the vendor sent an indorsed bill of lading and invoice to the vendee, in which it was held that the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu was terminated, it not appearing that payment was a condition precedent to transfer of title and possession.

However, the contrary has been held where the goods were consigned to the one owning, controlling, or designating the means of transportation,—as, for instance, a ship,—to be shipped to a foreign market rather than to be transported to the consignee, the right of stoppage in transitu terminating in such a case, on delivery to the ship. Stubbs v. Lund (1811) 7 Mass. 453, 5 Am. Dec. 63; Rowley v. Bigelow (1832) 12 Pick. (Mass.) 307, 23 Am. Dec. 607; Fowler v. McTaggart, as cited in Inglis v. Usherwood (1801) 1 East, 515, 102 Eng. Reprint, 198, 7 T. R. 442, 101 Eng. Reprint, 1066, 4 Revised Rep. 485. And see Sturtevant v. Orser (1862) 24 N. Y. 538, 82 Am. Dec. 321. In Rowley v. Bigelow (1832) 12 Pick. (Mass.) 307, Shaw, Ch. J., said that it was very clear that delivery of goods on board a vessel appointed by the vendee to receive it, "not for the purpose of transportation to him, or to a place appointed by him to be delivered there for his use, but to be shipped by such vessel, in his name, from his own place of residence to a third person, was a termination of the transit, and the right of the vendor to stop in transitu was at an end."

And it has been held that where goods are shipped on the consignee's own vessel in a foreign port, to be transported and delivered to him, the transitus as between the vendor and vendee is terminated upon delivery to the ship's master, so as to prevent a subsequent stopping by the vendor. Bolin v. Huffnagle (1828) 1 Rawle (Pa.) 9, approved in Hays v. Mouille (1850) 14 Pa. 48; Humberston v. Frodsham (1844) DeG. Bankr. Cas. (Eng.) 262, 8 Jur. 675; Van Casteel v. Booker (1848) 2 Exch. 691, 154 Eng. Reprint, 668, 18 L. J. Exch. N. S. 9; Straker v. Ewing (1865) 34 Beav. 147, 55 Eng. Reprint, 590, 11 Jur. N. S. 127, 11 L. T. N. S. 588, 13 Week. Rep. 286; Schotsmans v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. (1867) L. R. 2 Ch. (Eng.) 332, 36 L. J. Ch. N. S. 361, 16 L. T. N. S. 189, 15 Week. Rep. 537; Re Bruno (1887) 6 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. (Eng.) 138, 56 L. T. N. S. 577, 4 Morrell, 146. In Bolin v. Huffnagle (Pa.) supra, the court said: "The relation of the master is that of a special agent to his employer. He so far represents his principal as to make a delivery to him (in the absence of a special agreement to the contrary) a full, effectual, and final delivery to the principal himself. The master of the ship cannot, with any propriety, be considered a common carrier, or mere middleman, between the consignor and the consignee. . . . After the delivery of the goods at M. to the captain, B. & Company [the vendors] ceased to have any control over them. Every connection between the vendors and the agent was at an end, and the agent became alone responsible to his employers. Nor had the agent any demands against the vendors. Not so in the case of a common carrier or middleman, who, for certain purposes, is considered as the agent of both parties." At least, this is the rule unless the vendor reserves some control over the shipment. Schotsmans v. Lancashire

& Y. R. Co. (1867) L. R. 2 Ch. (Eng.) 332. In the latter case Lord Chelmsford, L. C., among other things, said that the essence of the doctrine of stoppage in transitu is that during the transitus the goods should be in the custody of some third person intermediate between the seller who has parted with and the buyer who has not acquired possession, and continued as follows: "If the goods are actually delivered to an agent of the vendee, employed by him to receive delivery, the vendor is divested of his right of stoppage in transitu. On the other hand, although there is no actual delivery to the vendee's agent, the vendor may annex terms to such delivery, and so prevent it from being absolute and irrevocable. In this case, the goods were shipped on board the consignee's own ship, and delivered into the possession of his own servant, the master, who signed bills of lading making the goods deliverable to the consignees or assigns. There was, therefore, a delivery to the agent for his principal, and no control over the delivery was in terms reserved to the vendor."

And it has been held that delivery to a ship chartered by the vendee, of goods for a voyage to a domestic port, constitutes a constructive delivery sufficient to terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Thompson v. Stewart (1870) 7 Phila. (Pa.) 187.

However, where it does clearly appear that the vendors reserved dominion over the goods, delivery to the vendee's ship does not terminate the right of stoppage in transitu. Thus, in Turner v. Liverpool Docks (1851) 6 Exch. 543, 153 Eng. Reprint, 659, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 393, 14 Eng. Rul. Cas. 725, it was held that where a bill of lading in terms made the goods deliverable to the order of the vendors, they reserved such a title as prevented the goods passing to the vendees by delivery on board their ship, so that the right of stoppage in transitu continued during the voyage to the point of destination. So, in Moakes v. Nicolson (1865) 19 C. B. N. S. 290, 144 Eng. Reprint, 798, 34 L. J. C. P. N. S.

273, 12 L. T. N. S. 573, in holding that delivery of goods on board a ship chartered by the vendee had no effect whatever in passing the property so as to terminate the right of stoppage in transitu, Earle, Ch. J., said that if the intention was that the ship should be regarded as the warehouse of the vendor until the happening of a contemplated event (payment of the price), the putting of the goods on board the ship did not alter the position of the contracting parties. And in Berndtson v. Strang (1867) L. R. 4 Eq. (Eng.) 481, 87 L. J. Ch. N. S. 665, 19 L. T. N. S. 40, 16 Week. Rep. 1025, it was held that delivery by the vendor of goods on board a ship chartered by the vendee of such goods, under a bill of lading making the shipmaster a carrier, preserved the right of stoppage in transitu until the ship reached the point of destination. And in Van Casteel v. Booker (1848) 2 Exch. 691, 154 Eng. Reprint, 668, 11 L. J. Exch. N. S. 9, it was said that delivery to the purchaser's ship ends transit unless it appears that the consignor clearly intended to preserve his title to the goods until he did a further act, as by transferring the bill of lading. And in Ruck v. Hatfield (1822) 5 Barn. & Ald. 632, 106 Eng. Reprint, 1321, 24 Revised Rep. 507, it was held that where a delivery is made under a contract calling for delivery free on board, and the vendor's agent demands a receipt acknowledging shipment on account of the vendors, the transitus is not ended by the mere delivery of the goods, and the vendors still have a right to stop them, even though the ship's officer refused to sign the receipt as requested. And see Ex parte Rosevear China Clay Co. (1879) L. R. 11 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 560, 48 L. J. Bankr. N. S. 100, 40 L. T. N. S. 730, 27 Week. Rep. 591, 4 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 144, wherein the contract called for delivery "free on board" a ship chartered by the vendee, and in which it was held that such a delivery did not terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu.

But even admitting the validity of the rule that a delivery of goods on board vendee's ship is, under ordinary circumstances, a delivery which terminates the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, a case may be taken out of the rule by a law of the vendor's country. Thus, in Inglis v. Usherwood (1801) 1 East, 515, 102 Eng. Reprint, 198, it was held that where delivery on board vendee's ship was made in Russia, and by a law of that country the owner may retake the same on board a ship upon the bankruptcy of the vendee, the vendor could stop the same in transit upon discovering the insolvency of his vendee.

b. Customs officials.

The taking of possession from the carrier by customs officials, under general orders, does not itself terminate the transitus, where the freight and duty remain unpaid and the entry has not been made, the custody of the carrier in such a case being regarded as continued by the customs officials. Burnham v. Winsor (1843) Fed. Cas. No. 2,180; Parker v. Byrnes (1871) 1 Low. Dec. 539, Fed. Cas. No. 10,728; Re Bearns (1878) 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 500, Fed. Cas. No. 1,191; Re Talbot (1911) 185 Fed. 985; Hauterman v. Bock (1859) 1 Daly (N. Y.) 366; Fraschieris v. Henriques (1868) 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 261; Strahlheim v. Wallach (1884) 12 Daly (N. Y.) 313; Donath v. Broomhead (1847) 7 Pa. 301; Burr v. Wilson (1856) 13 U. C. Q. B. 478; Lewis v. Mason (1875) 36 U. C. Q. B. 590; Ascher v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1875) 36 U. C. Q. B. 609; Morgan Envelope Co. v. Boustead (1885) 7 Ont. Rep. 697. And in England the same conclusion has been reached where it merely appeared that the duties were unpaid. Northey v. Field (1797) 2 Esp. (Eng.) 613. Lord Kenyon said that until the duties were paid the goods were quasi in custodia legis.

But where the customs officials have entered the goods as belonging to the consignee and the freight has been paid, it has been held that the right of stoppage in transitu has terminated, although the goods are still held in bonded warehouses pending payment of duties. Re Talbot (1911) 185 Fed. 986; Wiley v. Smith (1877) 2 Can. S. C. 1, affirming (1877) 1 Ont. App. Rep.

179, and overruling Graham v. Smith (1876) 27 U. C. C. P. 1, and Howell v. Alport (1862) 12 U. C. C. P. 375, upon which the Graham decision was based; Wilds v. Smith (1877) 2 Ont. App. Rep. 8, reversing (1877) 41 U. S. Q. B. 136, and following Wiley v. Smith (1877) 2 Can. S. C. 1, affirming (1877) 1 Ont. App. Rep. 179. And that entry of goods at a customhouse, and the placing of the same in the public warehouse, terminate the right of stoppage in transitu, even though the duties have not been paid, see Mottram v. Heyer (1846) 5 Denio (N. Y.) 629, and Cartwright v. Wilmerding (1862) 24 N. Y. 521.

And in Ireland, in Orr v. Murdock (1851) 2 Ir. C. L. Rep. 9, the court applied the rule that transitus terminates when nothing remains to be done, either by the vendee to complete the contract, or by the vendor to transfer the possession, and held that lodgment of a delivery order with customs officials who held goods bought from the drawer of the order, by the one to whom delivery was ordered, terminated the transitus so as to prevent the vendor's stopping the consignment, since the order, especially as it was acted upon, made the officials the agents of the vendee instead of the vendor; and this even though there was no actual transfer on the excise books. It was also held in this case that payment of the duty by the vendee was not a condition precedent under the delivery order.

And where the consignee has the goods entered and bonded and warehoused in his own name, the seller has thereafter no right of stoppage. Parker v. Byrnes (1871) 1 Low. Dec. 539, Fed. Cas. No. 10,728; Fraschieris v. Henriques (1868) 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 261.

On the other hand, it has been held that, where the consignor has the goods entered and placed in bond in his own name, and, under treasury rulings, his order is necessary in order to enable the consignee to withdraw the same from bond, there has been no delivery such as would terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Re Bearns (1878) 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg.

500, Fed. Cas. No. 1,191. And that the mere entry of goods by the vendee at the customhouse, without the payment of the duties, and when not placed in the public warehouse, does not terminate the transitus or the right to stop the same before the delivery to the vendee, see Mottram v. Heyer (1846) 5 Denio (N. Y.) 629; Holbrook v. Vose (1860) 6 Bosw. (N. Y.) 76, and Fraschieris v. Henriques (N. Y.) supra. And the same has been held where the consignee merely entered the goods before notice of arrival, at least, while they remained in the hands of the carrier as such. Harris v. Pratt (1858) 17 N. Y. 249, affirming (1857) 6 Duer, 606.

It is generally conceded that seizure of goods from an intermediate carrier or a warehouseman, on an attachment, garnishment, or other legal process by a general creditor of the consignee, before delivery, does not end transit so as to terminate the consignor's right of stoppage.

In Sherman v. Rugee (1882) 55 Wis. 346, 13 N. W. 241, the court discussed the right of stoppage in transitu as affected by a seizure of goods on execution as follows: "If at that time [time of seizure by sheriff] the leather had not come to the possession of the purchasers, the right of the plaintiffs [vendors] to claim and take possession of it is clear. The fact that it had been seized by the sheriff by virtue of process against the goods of the purchasers does not destroy that right. Notwithstanding such seizure, the leather was still in transit when demanded of the sheriff. . . . It was argued that the taking of the leather by the sheriff from the railroad company, and removing it to the store of the purchasers, operated as a delivery to the purchaser and foreclosed the right of the plaintiffs to reclaim it. We find nothing in the testimony which supports this position. It is conclusively proved that the sheriff seized the property and held it under his processes, against the purchasers, and not as the agent of the purchasers. It is entirely immaterial that they delivered to him or allowed him to take the bill of the leather and the plaintiff's letter of advice inclosing it, or that he stored the goods in the building in which, before their failure, the purchasers carried on their business. The testimony fails entirely to show that there was ever a moment in which they had any dominion over or control of the property." In Naylor v. Dennie (1829) 8 Pick. (Mass.) 198, 19 Am.

Dec. 319, the court discussed the question of the right of stoppage in transitu as affected by an intervening attachment by a general creditor of the consignee as follows: "This right is founded upon an implied condition in the sale that, if the vendee should become actually insolvent between the shipment of the goods and the reception of them by the vendee, the vendor shall have the right to rescind the contract and reclaim the goods. To allow an attachment, before the transit is at an end, to have effect, will be to defeat a useful and necessary provision of the law merchant." And in Buckley v. Furniss (1836) 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 137, Bronson, J., in discussing a similar question, said that an attaching creditor has no better right to the goods than the debtor consignee, and continued as follows: "He [the attaching creditor] might by legal process acquire a priority over other creditors, who were less diligent, and thus secure his debt; but he could not divest a right already existing in the plaintiff [the consignor]. The process does not proceed on the ground of defeating a prior right in a third person, but on the ground of acquiring such interest in the property attached as the debtor had himself. If the levy of an execution, or the service of an attachment against the vendee, were allowed to defeat the claim of the vendor, the right of stoppage in transitu would be of little value; for in this state judgments and attachments not infrequently furnish the first public evidence of the insolvency of a trader."

And the same has been held to be the rule where the attachment is levied at an intermediate point while the goods are in the hands of an agent of the vendee to be forwarded. Blackman v. Pierce (1863) 23 Cal. 508; Weber v. Baessler (1893) 3 Colo. App. 459, 34 Pac. 261; Atkins v. Colby (1849) 20 N. H. 154.

But in a few instances the courts have seemingly regarded a seizure upon execution as upon a different footing than an attachment or garnishment, and have held that goods while in transit may be seized on execution so as to terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. The following cases are to this effect: Couture v. McKay (1889) 6 Manitoba L. R. 273; McLean v. Breithaupt (1884) 12 Ont. App. Rep. 383. And see Smith v. Goss (1808) 1 Campb. (Eng.) 282, 10 Revised Rep. 684.

And it has been held that where the vendor of goods himself attaches them as the property of the vendee while they are in transit, such attachment destroys the right of the vendor to subsequently stop them in transit. Woodruff v. Noyes (1843) 15 Conn. 335; Fox v. Willis (1883) 60 Tex. 373. At least, unless the vendor, in the belief that he still has a right of stoppage in transitu, promptly dismisses the writ and seeks to stop the transit. Fox v. Willis (Tex.) supra.

And it has been broadly stated, and seemingly in square conflict with the general rule above stated, that an attachment levied on goods after their delivery to the carrier for transportation to the vendee, but before the right of stoppage in transitu was exercised, terminated the right of stoppage. Boyd v. Mosely (1853) 2 Swan (Tenn.) 661. This was upon the theory that the one in whose favor the attachment was made was a bona fide holder; but it seems that this reasoning is fallacious, and in fact is declared to be obiter in the subsequent Tennessee case of Mississippi Mills v. Union & P. Bank (1882) 9 Lea (Tenn.) 314, in which, as shown supra, the general rule is adhered to.

And it has been held that after the goods have reached the point of destination they may be taken on attachment or execution sued out by creditors of the vendee, so as to work a delivery and terminate the right of stoppage in transitu. French v. Star Union Transp. Co. (1883) 134 Mass. 288; Wentworth v. Outhwaite (1842) 10 Mees. & W. 486, 152 Eng. Reprint, 541, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 172.

d. Executors and administrators.

When the vendee dies, his administrator or executor, who succeeds to his rights, may take possession of goods which have arrived at the point of destination, thereby terminating the transit and putting an end to the vendor's right of stoppage. Jacobs v. Bentley (1908) 86 Ark. 186, 126 Am. St. Rep. 1086, 110 S. W. 594.

Where goods have reached the point of destination, it has been held that either an assignee in insolvency or a receiver in bankruptcy of the consignee may take the goods from the carrier, so as to terminate the shipper's right of stoppage in transitu. Re Arctic Stores (1919) 258 Fed. 688; McElroy v. Seery (1884) 61 Md. 389, 48 Am. Rep. 110; Ellis v. Hunt (1789) 3 T. R. 464, 100 Eng. Reprint, 679, 1 Revised Rep. 743, 28 Eng. Rul. Cas. 416 (assignee in bankruptcy put mark on goods after arrival, and previous to the consignor's attempted stoppage in transitu); Scott v. Pettit (1803) 3 Bos. & P. 469, 127 Eng. Reprint, 255, 7 Revised Rep. 804; Bird v. Brown (1850) 4 Exch. 786, 154 Eng. Reprint, 1488, 19 L. J. Exch. N. S. 154, 14 Jur. 132, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 422; Davis v. McWhirter (1877) 40 U. C. Q. B. 598. In Bird v. Brown (1850) 4 Exch. 786, 154 Eng. Reprint, 1433, supra, the court said: "There could be no valid stoppage in transitu, after the formal demand of the goods by Bird on the 11th of May, and the subsequent delivery of them to the defendants. The goods had then arrived at Liverpool, and were ready to be delivered to the parties entitled. Bird, on behalf of the assignees, demanded the goods, and tendered the amount due for the freight. Assuming that there had been no previous stoppage in transitu, the masters of the several ships were thereupon bound to deliver up the goods to Bird, as representing Carne & Telo, and they could not, by their wrongful detainer of them and delivering them over to other parties, prolong the transitu, and so extend the period during which stoppage might be made. The transitu was at an end when the goods had reached the port of destination, and when the consignees, having demanded the goods and tendered the amount of the freight, would have taken them into their possession but for a wrongful delivery of them to other parties."

On the other hand, it has been held that a messenger in insolvency of a vendee cannot, at least as against the refusal of the vendee himself to accept a shipment from a carrier, terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu by accepting the goods, it being said that "a bankruptcy messenger acts in a passive capacity, is intrusted with no discretionary powers, acts under mandate of court, or does certain things particularly described by the law which creates the office, is mostly a defender or keeper of property, a custodian until an assignee comes,—and he can neither add to nor take from the bankrupt's estate." Tufts v. Sylvester (1837) 79 Me. 213, 1 Am. St. Rep. 303, 9 Atl. 357.

And it has been held that the carrier's agent has a right to refuse to turn over the goods pending instructions from the company, so that a mere demand on the part of the assignee does not work a constructive delivery sufficient to cut off the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Anderson v. Fish (1838) 16 Ont. Rep. 476, affirmed on opinion below in (1890) in 17 Ont. App. Rep. 28.

And, of course, the mere fact that the consignee has made an assignment in bankruptcy before the goods arrive at the point of destination does not terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Kinloch v. Craig (1790) 4 Bro. P. C. 47, 2 Eng. Reprint, 32, 3 T. R. 119, 788, 100 Eng. Reprint, 487, 863, 1 Revised Rep. 664.

And in England, in a very early case, it was held that as between the assignee for creditors of the consignee and the consignor, and as against the carrier, the consignor may stop the goods at any time before they actually come into the hands of the assignee. D'Aquila v. Lambert (1761) 2 Eden, 75, 28 Eng. Reprint, 824, 1 Ambl. 399, 27 Eng. Reprint, 266. And see Winks v. Hassall (1829) 9 Barn. & C. 372, 109 Eng. Reprint, 138, 7 L. J. K. B. 265.

In fact, in what appears to be the earliest reported English case, it was held that if the consignor can "by any means" prevent the goods coming into the hands of the consignee or his assignees in bankruptcy, it was lawful to do so. Wiseman v. Vandeputt (1690) 2 Vern. 203, 23 Eng. Reprint, 732.

IV. Partial payment; taking commercial paper or security.

The receipt of part payment for the goods shipped does not terminate the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu. Burnham v. Winsor (1843) Fed. Cas. No. 2,180; Newhall v. Vargas (1836) 13 Me. 93, 29 Am. Dec. 489; Jordan v. James (1831) 5 Ohio, 88; Hodgson v. Loy (1797) 7 T. R. 440, 100 Eng. Reprint, 1065, 4 Revised Rep. 483; Feise v. Wray (1802) 3 East, 93, 102 Eng. Reprint, 532, 6 Revised Rep. 551; Barnes v. Lopez (1864) Newfoundl. Rep. 89. And this, even though a draft for the balance has been presented and accepted after arrival of the goods. Burnham v. Winsor (Fed.) supra.

Nor does receipt by the consignor of the consignee's acceptance for a part of the goods terminate the right of stoppage in transitu. Edwards v. Brewer (1837) 2 Mees. & W. 375, 150 Eng. Reprint, 802, Murph. & H. 132, 6 L. J. Exch. N. S. 135, 1 Jur. 432. And the bill need not be tendered back. Ibid.

Likewise, it has been held that the right of stoppage in transitu is not lost by the taking by the vendor of the vendee's draft for the price, and the acceptance thereof by the latter, the same not constituting an absolute payment as between the vendor and the vendee. Ainis v. Ayres (1891) 62 Hun, 376, 16 N. Y. Supp. 905; Kinloch v. Craig (1790) 4 Bro. P. C. 47, 2 Eng. Reprint, 32, 3 T. R. 119, 783, 100 Eng. Reprint, 487, 858, 1 Revised Rep. 664; Jenkyns v. Usborne (1844) 7 Mann. & G. 678, 135 Eng. Reprint, 273, 8 Scott, N. R. 505, 13 L. J. C. P. N. S. 196; Barnes v. Lopez (1864) Newfoundl. Rep. 89. In fact, it has been broadly stated that the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu is not abridged or in any way affected by the fact that he has received the vendee's bill of exchange, or other negotiable securities for the whole price, even though they have been negotiated and are still outstanding. Diem v. Koblitz (1892) 49 Ohio St. 41, 34 Am. St. Rep. 531, 29 N. E. 1124; Bell v. Moss (1840) 5 Whart. (Pa.) 189; Feise v. Wray (1802) 3 East, 93, 102 Eng. Reprint, 532, 6 Revised Rep. 551; Wood v. Jones (1825) 7 Dowl. & R. (Eng.) 126.

And in Pennsylvania it has been held that the giving of a bank check does not constitute a payment sufficient to suspend the right of stoppage in transitu, unless it was so agreed and the deposit was actually placed to the drawee's account. Bell v. Moss (1840) 5 Whart. (Pa.) 189.

And it has been held that the fact that the vendor has accepted the vendee's note for the price does not terminate the right of stoppage in transitu (Brewer Lumber Co. v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1901) 179 Mass. 228, 54 L.R.A. 435, 88 Am. St. Rep. 375, 60 N. E. 548; Donath v. Broomhead (1847) 7 Pa. 301; Hays v. Mouille (1850) 14 Pa. 48), even though the vendor has also receipted the bill for the goods, provided he can produce and tender the note (Brewer Lumber Co. v. Boston & A. R. Co. (Mass.) supra). And in such a case it is immaterial that the note has, in the meantime, been in the hands of a third person for collection, or after discount. Ibid. And in Pennsylvania it has been held that the note need not be tendered back before stopping the goods in transitu. Hays v. Mouille (Pa.) supra.

However, it has also been held that the taking of the vendee's promissory note for the price, and discounting it and having it outstanding, constitute a payment sufficient to prevent the retaining of the goods by the vendor. Bunney v. Poyntz (1833) 4 Barn. & Ad. 568, 110 Eng. Reprint, 806, 1 Nev. & M. 229, 2 L. J. K. B. N. S. 55.

It has been held that the consignor is not precluded from stopping goods in transitu by the fact that he holds collateral security for the price. Bell v. Moss (1839) 5 Whart. (Pa.) 189.

V. Sale or transfer by original vendee.

a. Bona fide transfer terminates.

It is well settled that a shipper of goods has no right of stoppage in transitu after a bona fide sale thereof, by an assignment or indorsement of the bill of lading, by the vendee to a third party, for a valuable consideration, even though the sale was made before actual arrival of the goods at point of destination.

However, in England, it has been held in a few cases that a consignor may stop goods in transitu notwithstanding the consignee has assigned the bill of lading to a third person for a valuable consideration and without notice. Snee v. Prescott (1743) 1 Atk. 245, 26 Eng. Reprint, 157; Fearon v. Bowers (1753) 1 H. Bl. 364, note, 126 Eng. Reprint, 214, note; Burghall v. Howard (1759) 1 H. Bl. 365, note, 126 Eng. Behrend* (Eng.) supra, it was held that, for the purpose of showing that the right of stoppage in transitu was gone, it was not enough that a transferee of an indorsed bill of lading had become a bona fide holder for a valuable consideration, but that it was also essential to show that the indorser had a right to transfer it. As thus qualified, Lord Campbell, Ch. J., stated the rule as follows: "The bona fide transferee for value of a bill of lading, indorsed by the shipper or his consignee, and put into circulation by the authority of the shipper or consignee, has an absolute title to the goods, freed from the equitable right of the unpaid vendor to stop in transitu, as against the purchaser."

In Audenreid v. Randall (1868) 3 Cliff. (U. S.) 99, Fed. Cas. No. 644, Clifford, C. J., discussed this question as follows: "When the goods are sold at sea, the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading to the buyer, and the acceptance of the same by him under the contract, are the proper substitutes for an actual delivery and acceptance of the goods, and have the effect to vest a perfect title in the buyer, discharged of all right of stoppage in transitu on the part of the seller and indorser of the bill of lading. . . . The right of stoppage in transitu was conceded to the seller, in order to prevent the injustice which would take place if, in consequence of the vendee's insolvency, while the price of the goods was yet unpaid, they were to be seized and appropriated in satisfaction of his other liabilities, to the prejudice of the rights of his unpaid vendor. The vendor's right in respect of his price is not a mere lien which he will forfeit if he parts with the possession, but grows out of his original ownership and dominion. Such a right attaches to goods sold on credit, where nothing is agreed on as to the time of delivery. In that state of the case, the vendee is immediately entitled to the possession, and the property and the right of possession vest at once in him; but his right of possession is not absolute, because it is liable to be defeated, if he becomes insolvent before he obtains the absolute control of the goods. . . . Nothing can be more certain than the rule that, as between the consignor and the consignee on the one side, and third parties on the other, the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading by the consignee of goods at sea, and the acceptance of the same by the buyer under a contract, made in good faith, defeats the right of stoppage in transitu by the consignor. The settled rule is that in such cases, where there has been a sale by the consignee which would give a title to the vendee, as against the consignor, independently of the indorsement of the bill of lading, the effect of the indorsement would be to take away that right, even in cases where it would otherwise exist. . . .

The bona fide transferee, for value, of a bill of lading indorsed by the consignee of the shipper, takes an absolute title to the goods, free from the equitable right of the unpaid vendor to stop the goods in transitu, as against the purchaser. The obvious reason of the rule is that by reason of such a transfer of the bill of lading the transitu is regarded as ended, and the right of stoppage, therefore, is gone."

And for a better reason the right of stoppage in transitu is terminated by a bona fide sale by the consignee after arrival at the point of destination and actual delivery by the carrier to the transferee. Klein v. Leibes Bros. (1887) 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 350; Stoveld v. Hughes (1811) 14 East, 308, 104 Eng. Reprint, 619, 12 Revised Rep. 523. This is especially true where the original consignee consents to the transfer. Stoveld v. Hughes (1811) 14 East, 308, 104 Eng. Reprint, 619, 12 Revised Rep. 523.

And the right of stoppage in transitu is terminated by a bona fide sale for value to a third person while the goods are in the hands of a warehouseman pending final delivery, at least where such warehouseman acknowledges that he holds the goods as agent for the purchaser from the original vendee (Hawes v. Watson (1824) 2 Barn. & C. 540, 107 Eng. Reprint, 484, 4 Dowl. & R. 22, 2 L. J. K. B. 83, 26 Revised Rep. 448), as, for instance, by the acceptance of warehouse rent from the subpurchaser, following a transfer of the goods on the books to such person (Harman v. Anderson (1809) 2 Campb. (Eng.) 243, 11 Revised Rep. 706). And the same is true where the goods are held by the warehouseman subject to the order of the original vendee, and an order of delivery is given to a bona fide subpurchaser. Frazer v. Hilliard (1847) 38 S. C. L. (2 Strobh.) 809. Especially, where the warehouseman acknowledges the rights of the subpurchaser. Pooley v. Great Eastern R. Co. (1876) 34 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 537.

Likewise the right of stoppage in transitu is terminated where goods are reshipped from the point of destination by the carrier, to a new destination, under orders from a bona fide subpurchaser from the original vendee. Mollison v. Lockhart (1891) 30 N. E. 898.

And the rule that a sale to a bona fide purchaser terminates the right of stoppage in transitu has been held to apply, even though the notice to stop in transit was given before the goods reached their destination. Schmidt v. The Pennsylvania (1879) 7 W. N. C. (Pa.) 98, affirmed on this point in (1880) 4 Fed. 548; Walter v. Ross (1808) 2 Wash. C. C. 283, Fed. Cas. No. 17,122; Ryberg v. Snell (1809) 2 Wash. C. C. 403, Fed. Cas. No. 12,190; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Heidenheimer (1891) 82 Tex. 195, 27 Am. St. Rep. 861, 17 S. W. 608.

So, it has been held that the rule that the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu is terminated by a sale to a bona fide purchaser, made while the goods are in transit, applies even though such sale was made after the notice to stop was given, provided, of course, that the sale was to a bona fide purchaser. Newhall v. Central P. R. Co. (1876) 51 Cal. 345, 21 Am. Rep. 713. And see Ætna Nat. Bank v. Union P. R. Co. (1897) 69 Mo. App. 246. In the Newhall Case (Cal.) supra, the court discussed this question as follows: "If the bill of lading is assigned, and the legal title passes to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration before the right of stoppage is exercised, the lien of the vendor ceases as against the assignee, on the well-known principle that a secret trust will not be enforced as against a bona fide holder for value of the legal title. . . . The vendor has voluntarily placed in the hands of the vendee a muniment of title, clothing him with the apparent ownership of the goods; and a person dealing with him in the usual course of business, who takes an assignment for a valuable consideration, 'without notice of such circumstances as render the bill of lading not fairly and honestly assignable,' has a superior equity to that of the vendor asserting a recent lien, known, perhaps, only to himself and the vendee. . . . These being the conditions which determine and control the relative rights of the vendor and assignee, where the assignment is made before the notice of stoppage is given, precisely the same principles, in my opinion, are applicable when the assignment is made after the carrier is notified by the vendor. . . . The law provides no method by which third persons are to be affected with constructive notice of acts transpiring between the vendor and the carrier; and in dealing with the vendee, whom the vendor has invested with the legal title and apparent ownership of the goods, a stranger, advancing his money on the faith of this apparently good title, is not bound at his peril to ascertain whether possibly the vendor may not have notified a carrier—it may be on some remote portion of the route—that the goods are stopped in transitu. If a person taking an assignment of a bill of lading is to encounter these risks, and can take the assignment with safety only after he has inquired of the vendor and of every carrier through whose hands the goods are to come whether a notice of stoppage in transition has been given, it is quite certain that prudent persons will cease to advance money on such securities, and a very important class of commercial transactions will be practically abrogated."

The rule of some jurisdictions that an actual delivery and possession are essential to terminate the right of stoppage in transitu generally is qualified by the provision that a bona fide assignee of a bill of lading will be protected against the seller's right of stoppage in transitu. An illustration of a qualifying provision of this character is found in Ocean S. S. Co. v. Ehrlich (1891) 88 Ga. 502, 30 Am. St. Rep. 164, 14 S. E. 707, wherein it was held that the fact that the consignee had sold the goods to a bona fide purchaser for value, who had paid the purchase money, did not terminate the shipper's right of stoppage in transitu in the absence of either actual possession in the vendee or his assignee, or an actual assignment of the bill of lading. So, in Branan Bros. v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. (1899) 108 Ga. 70, 75 Am. St. Rep. 26, 33 S. E. 836, it was held that in the absence of actual delivery, the title of a bona fide purchaser from the consignee could only be made good against the right of stoppage in transitu by an assignment of the bill of lading. And a similar conclusion was reached in Delta Bag Co. v. Kearns (1904) 112 Ill. App. 269. And see also Pattison v. Culton (1870) 33 Ind. 240, 5 Am. Rep. 199. It has also been held that the rule that the right of stoppage in transitu is terminated by indorsement of the bill of lading to a bona fide purchaser for value is not affected by the first section of the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. chap. 111), which provides that every indorsee of a bill of lading shall be subject to the same liabilities as to the goods as if the contract had been made with him, and, therefore, does not extend the right of stoppage in transitu so that it can be invoked against a bona fide indorsee for value. Kemp v. Canavan (1864) 15 Ir. C. L. Rep. 216. This was upon the theory that a different construction would violate not only the spirit of the Bills of Lading Act, but would be in contravention of § 2, which provided that nothing therein should prejudice or "affect" any right of stoppage in transitu.

In all cases, in order to have the effect of defeating the right of stoppage in transitu, the sale or assignment must be to a bona fide purchaser for value, since, if the sale is fraudulent, or without consideration, or made for the express purpose of defeating the right of stoppage, it will not have that effect. Loeb v. Peters (1879) 63 Ala. 243, 35 Am. Rep. 17; Stanton v. Eager (1835) 16 Pick. (Mass.) 467; Rosenthal v. Dessau (1877) 11 Hun (N. Y.) 49; Gass v. Astoria Veneer Mills (1909) 134 App. Div. 184, 118 N. Y. Supp. 982; Gass v. Southern P. Co. (1902) 152 App. Div. 412, 137 N. Y. Supp. 261; Holbrook v. Vose (1860) 6 Besw. (N. Y.) 76; Wheeling & L. E. R. Co. v. Koontz (1899) 61 Ohio St. 551, 76 Am. St. Rep. 435, 56 N. E. 471, affirming (1897) 15 Ohio C. C. 288, 9 Ohio C. D. 102; Chandler v. Fulton (1858) 10 Tex. 2, 60 Am. Dec. 188; Poole v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. (1882) 58 Tex. 134, on subsequent appeal in (1885) 63 Tex. 246; Salomons v. Nissen (1788) 2 T. R. 674, 100 Eng. Reprint, 863; Coxe v. Harden (1803) 4 East, 211, 102 Eng. Reprint, 811, 1 Smith, 20, 7 Revised Rep. 570; Newsom v. Thornton (1805) 6 East. 17, 102 Eng. Reprint, 1189, 2 Smith, 207, 8 Revised Rep. 378; Cuming v. Brown (1808) 9 East, 506, 103 Eng. Reprint, 666, 1 Campb. 104, 9 Revised Rep. 603; Ex parte Golding, D. & Co. (1880) L. R. 13 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 28, 42 L. T. N. S. 270, 48 Week. Rep. 481, 4 Eng. Rul. Cas. 851. And it has been held that by the use of the words "Not negotiable," stamped on a bill of lading, a transferee thereof is given notice of the possible rights of the consignor or at least is put on inquiry in this respect, so that the taking of the same without inquiry does not terminate the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu. Gass v. Astoria Veneer Mills (1909) 134 App. Div. 184, 118 N. Y. Supp. 982; Gass v. Southern P. Co. (1912) 152 App. Div. 412, 137 N. Y. Supp. 261. But an indorsee of a bill of lading may be a bona fide holder, although he knows that the consignor has not received money payment for the goods, but had taken the consignee's acceptances, so that after such an assignment, the consignor cannot stop the goods in transit. Cuming v. Brown (1808) 9 East, 506, 103 Eng. Reprint, 666. In this case Lord Ellenborough, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The question is whether the indorsement of the bill of lading in this case passed the property of the goods, the plaintiff having notice that the goods had not been paid for in money. It must be taken to have been found that the indorsement was bona fide, for valuable consideration, and without notice of any circumstance which ought in fairness to have prevented the plaintiff's taking it; unless, indeed, notice that the goods had not been paid for in money be such circumstance. But to render this circumstance one which ought in fairness to have prevented the assignee of the bill of lading from taking it, it should have appeared that the consignor, by the terms of his dealing with the consignee, had bargained for or expected that the payment should precede the assignment of the bill of lading. But if we look at the actual facts of the case as between the consignor and the consignee, by the memorandum at the foot of the invoice transmitted before the bill of lading, (and which arrived on the 3d of January, 1806), the price of the goods was 'payable in bill on London at three months from 20th December;' and at the time of the assignment Maine, the consignee, had done all that such bargain required, by having accepted a bill on London at three months from the 20th of December, which was not due at the time of the indorsement of the bill of lading on the 23d of February. If, therefore, the plaintiff had known all the circumstances of the case as they stood between consignor and consignee, he would have known nothing which should have made it unfair in the consignee to assign, or in himself to accept, the assignment of the bill of lading. If he had assisted in contravening the actual terms of sale on the part of the consignor, or his reasonable expectations arising out of them, or his rights connected therewith, it would have been otherwise, and he would, in that case, have stood in the same situation with the consignee. If, for instance, he had known that the consignee had been in insolvent circumstances, and that no bill had been accepted by him for the price of the goods, or that, being accepted, it was not likely to be paid, in that case the interposition of himself between the consignor and consignee, in order to assist the latter to disappoint the just rights and expectations of the former, would have been an act done in fraud of the consignor's right to stop in transitu, and would, therefore, have been unavailable to the party taking an assignment of the bill of lading under such circumstances, and for such purpose; but here, any knowledge or suspicion of the kind on the part of the plaintiff is negatived expressly by the plaintiff's answer read on the part of the defendant. And if a bill of lading should be held by us not assignable under these circumstances, the consequence would be that no bill of lading could be deemed safely assignable before the goods arrived, unless the assignee of the bill of lading was perfectly assured that the goods were paid for in money, or paid for in account between the parties, which is the same thing,—a position which would tend to overturn the general practice and course of dealing of the commercial world on this subject, and which is warranted, as we conceive, by no decided case upon the subject."

And, of course, a mere agreement by a consignee before receipt of the goods or the evidence of the right thereto, to transfer the same to a third person, does not deprive the consignor of the right of stoppage in transitu. Clapp Bros. v. Sohmer (1880) 55 Iowa, 273, 7 N. W. 639; Holbrook v. Vose (1860) 6 Bosw. (N. Y.) 76; Moakes v. Nicolson (1865) 19 C. B. N. S. 290, 144 Eng. Reprint, 798, 34 L. J. C. P. N. S. 273, 12 L. T. N. S. 573. Especially where the assignment is for the benefit of creditors, and the assignee takes with full knowledge of the insolvency of the consignee. Stanton v. Eager (1835) 16 Pick. (Mass.) 467.

It will be observed that the rule, as stated supra, V. a, as to the effect of a sale during transit by the vendee to a third person to terminate the right of stoppage in transitu, includes the condition that the sale is by the assignment or indorsement of the bill of lading, and there is express and affirmative authority for this condition. Thus, it has been held that the rule of constructive delivery by assignment to a bona fide purchaser is limited to bills of lading which possess something of the character of negotiable paper, and that no other instrument of transfer or mercantile document possesses the power of terminating the right of stoppage in transitu until perfected by actual possession. Ives v. Polak (1857) 14 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 411 (holding that an order authorizing the transferee to withdraw goods from a bonded warehouse was not a constructive delivery); Jenkyns v. Usborne (1844) 7 Mann. & G. 678, 135 Eng. Reprint, 273, 8 Scott, N. R. 506, 13 L. J. C. P. N. S. 196 (holding that a mere delivery order is insufficient); M'Ewan v. Smith (1849) 2 H. L. Cas. 309, 9 Eng. Reprint, 1109, 13 Jur. 265 (holding that a delivery order on a warehouse was insufficient). Likewise it has been held that a mere order by the consignee upon the carrier for delivery to a third person upon payment of freight and charges, left with the carrier, only operates to give such person the rights of the consignee, and cannot of itself prevent a stoppage in transitu, especially where there is nothing to show that the carrier ever assumed to act as agent of such third person, or that it ever recognized any right on his part to have the delivery of the goods, or that it ever agreed to deliver them to him upon any terms whatever. Jeffris v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1896) 93 Wis. 250, 33 L.R.A. 351, 57 Am. St. Rep. 919, 67 N. W. 424. And in Withers v. Lyss (1815) 4 Campb. (Eng.) 237, Holt, N. P. 18, 16 Revised Rep. 781, it was held that the giving to a warehouseman by an original vendee, of an order to weigh and deliver certain goods to a subpurchaser, did not itself terminate the original vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, but that such right continued, at least, until the goods were actually weighed so that the price could be determined. And according to Abbott on Shipping, 7th Am. ed. 539, it was held, in 1805, in the English case of Nix v. Olive, that the transmission of a bill drawn to order or assigns unindorsed was insufficient to divest the right of the consignor to stop the goods in transit. It is also stated that Lord Ellenborough, in reaching this conclusion, expressly said that he was of the opinion that there was a difference between the indorsement of the bill of lading and the sending it unindorsed in a letter containing equivalent orders. In Jenkyns v. Osborne (1844) 7 Mann. & G. 678, 135 Eng. Reprint, 273, Tindal, Ch. J., discussed this question as follows: "The actual holder of an indorsed bill of lading may undoubtedly, by indorsement, convey a greater right than he himself has. It is at variance with the general principles of law that a man should be allowed to transfer to another a right which he has not; but the exception is founded on the nature of the instrument in question, which, being, like a bill of exchange, a negotiable instrument, for the general convenience of commerce, has been allowed to have an effect at variance with the ordinary principles of law. But this operation of a bill of lading, being derived from its negotiable quality, appears to us to be confined to the case where the person who transfers the right is himself in possession of the bill of lading, so as to be in a situation to transfer the instrument itself, which is the symbol of the property itself. In the present case, Thomas was not in possession of the bill of lading; he had only an order on the captain to deliver the goods on arrival; and when, under the circumstances stated in the case, that order was handed over to the defendant, it appears to us that, although an interest in the contract passed to the defendant, the interest in the goods did not pass as it would have done if the transfer had been by assignment of the bill of lading, but that such interest in the goods was still liable to be defeated by the insolvency of Thomas and a proper exercise of the right of stoppage in transitu."

But where the goods are in a warehouse, and according to custom an order thereon is necessary to complete delivery, it has been held that the mere giving by the original vendee of an invoice and receipt of payment for the goods, without a delivery order, does not constitute a delivery such as will cut off the original vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Dixon v. Yates (1833) 5 Barn. & Ad. 313, 110 Eng. Reprint, 806, 2 Nev. & M. 177, 2 L. J. K. B. N. S. 198, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 385. And the order, to be effective to transfer title and terminate the original vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, must be such a one as the warehouseman is accustomed to act upon. Lackington v. Atherton (1844) 8 Jur. 407, 7 Mann. & G. 360, 135 Eng. Reprint, 151, 13 L. J. C. P. N. S. 140, 8 Scott, N. R. 38. For instance, where goods have been held up at an intermediate point and placed in a warehouse, the giving of authority by the consignee to the warehouseman to sell the same has been held to be conditional only, at least, in the absence of an actual sale pursuant to such authority, so that it does not cut off the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu. Re Foot (1874) 11 Blatchf. 530, Fed. Cas. No. 4,907.

So, it has been held that while the right of stoppage in transitu is adverse to the rights of the consignee, it need not necessarily be exercised adversely, and that the consignor's right of stoppage is not defeated by his obtaining from the consignee a writing in which he revokes the order for the goods, declines to receive the same, and requests the intermediary holder thereof to return them to the consignor, or, in other words, by a relinquishment of the consignment by the consignee to the consignor. Naylor v. Dennie (1829) 8 Pick. (Mass.) 198, 19 Am. Dec. 319; Re O'Sullivan (1892) 67 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 464, which reversed (1892) 66 L. T. N. S. 619, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 228.

And where goods are shipped without being ordered, and upon account, and at the risk of the shipper, as distinguished from a sale to the consignee, it has been held that a factor cannot, while the goods are still in transit, and without the possession of the bill of lading, make a sale thereof which will terminate the shipper's right of stoppage in transitu. Walter v. Ross (1808) 2 Wash. C. C. 283, Fed. Cas. No. 17,122.

It has been expressly held that the original vendor's right of stoppage in transitu is not terminated by his vendee selling to a subpurchaser, where the purchase money has not been paid, since in such a case the exercise of such right by the vendor does not interfere with any rights of the subpurchaser for which a valuable consideration has been paid. Ex parte Golding, D. & Co. (1880) L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 628, 42 L. T. N. S. 270, 48 Week. Rep. 481, 4 Eng. Rul. Cas. 851; Ex parte Falk (1880) L. R. 14 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 446, 42 L. T. N. S. 780, 28 Week. Rep. 785, 4 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 280, affirmed in (1882) L. R. 7 App. Cas. 573, 31 Week. Rep. 125, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 167, 47 L. T. N. S. 454, 5 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 1, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 399. At least, the vendor is entitled to intercept, to the extent of his own unpaid purchase money, so much of the subpurchaser's purchase money as is unpaid by him. Ex parte Falk (1880) L. R. 14 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 446. But on this point see the opinion of Lord Selborne; L. C., on appeal in L. R. 7 App. Cas. 573, wherein he said: "It is not consistent with my idea of the right of stoppage in transitu that it should apply to anything except to the goods which are in transitu."

And a number of authorities are to the effect that, for the purposes of the rule that a valid sale terminates the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu, the consideration may be an antecedent debt so that no right of stoppage in transitu exists after a bona fide transfer to a third person, even though the valuable consideration was an existing indebtedness. St. Paul Roller Mill Co. v. Great Western Despatch Co. (1886) 27 Fed. 434; Loeb v. Peters (1879) 63 Ala. 243, 35 Am. Rep. 17; First Nat. Bank v. Schmidt (1895) 6 Colo. App. 216, 40 Pac. 479; Lee v.

Kimball (1858) 45 Me. 172; Shepard & M. Lumber Co. v. Burroughs (1898) 62 N. J. L. 469, 41 Atl. 695; Leask v. Scott (1877) L. R. 2 Q. B. Div. 376, 46 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 576, 36 L. T. N. S. 784, 3 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 469, 4 Eng. Rul. Cas. 790; Clementson v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1877) 42 U. C. Q. B. 263. In Leask v. Scott (1877) L. R. 2 Q. B. Div. 376, 4 Eng. Rul. Cas. 790, the English court of appeal, speaking through Bramwell, L. J., refuted the contentions "that the right of stoppage in transitu is available and effectual against everyone, except the assignee of a bill of lading for valuable consideration, and unless that valuable consideration has been got by means of the bill of lading; that if the consideration were past, it was not such a consideration, and the title gained by it was not such a title, as would defeat the equitable right of stoppage in transitu," and "that such right was only defeated where there was a transfer for present consideration," and said: "Practically such a consideration as is now under consideration has always a present operation. It stays the hand of the creditor. If the plaintiff had agreed on the day the bill of lading was handed to him, to give a week's time, there would have been a present consideration. Is it necessary there should be a formal agreement in lieu of that which, whether it would support legal proceedings, as was contended by the plaintiff, or not, was, no doubt, such an understanding that, if the plaintiff had taken proceedings against Geen & Company the day after he had received the security, he would have committed a breach of faith? If in this case the plaintiff had bought the goods out-and-out, and been paid part of his debt with the price, the consideration would have sufficed, if the transaction was not colorable. If the plaintiff had said: 'I cannot take this bill of lading safely, as the consideration would be past; do it with the broker next door, and give me his check,' that would have been valid. Is it desirable to introduce such niceties into commercial law? Moreover, there really always is a present consideration." Of course, under this rule, the assignment must be bona fide. Loeb v. Peters (1879) 63 Ala. 243, 35 Am. Rep. 17; Wheeling & L. E. R. Co. v. Koontz (1899) 61 Ohio St. 551, 76 Am. St. Rep. 435, 56 N. E. 471, affirming (1897) 15 Ohio C. C. 288, 9 Ohio C. D. 102 (holding that a sale to the carrier to cover freight and other pre-existing debts did not constitute the carrier a bona fide purchaser).

However, in England, it has been expressly held that the mere release of an antecedent debt is not a sufficiently valuable consideration for the indorsement of a bill of lading, to terminate the unpaid vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Rodger v. Comptoir D'Escompte de Paris (1869) L. R. 2 P. C. 393, 5 Moore P. C. C. N. S. 538, 16 Eng. Reprint, 618, 21 L. T. N. S. 33, 17 Week. Rep. 468, 38 L. J. P. C. N. S. 30. This case was expressly criticized in Leask v. Scott (Eng.) supra, which is set out and quoted supra, this subdivision.

And in the states it has also been held that a transfer of a bill of lading as a mere collateral to previous obligations, without anything advanced, given up, or lost on the part of the transferee, does not constitute such an assignment as will preclude the vendor of the goods from exercising the right of stoppage in transitu. Lesassier v. The Southwestern (1874) 2 Woods, 35, Fed. Cas. No. 8,274; Dymock v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1893) 54 Mo. App. 400, as explained on subsequent appeal in (1896) 67 Mo. App. 97. And see Loeb v. Peters (1879) 63 Ala. 243, 35 Am. Rep. 17, and Lee v. Kimball (1858) 45 Me. 172. In Farrell v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1889) 102 N. C. 390, 3 L.R.A. 647, 11 Am. St. Rep. 760, 9 S. E. 302, where a consignee of a safe, while in the carrier's warehouse, said that he placed it in the agent's hands as security for past freight charges, it was held that the transaction did not amount to such a delivery of the safe as would defeat the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, even if it be conceded that the carrier's agent accepted the offer. This was upon the theory that the carrier already had a lien on the safe for the freight on it, and that there was no new consideration for the vendee's offer. And it has been held, generally, that the rule applies only to indorsements for the purpose of sale, and consequently that an indorsement by way of pledge does not work a termination of the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Newsom v. Thornton (1805) 6 East, 17, 102 Eng. Reprint, 1189, 2 Smith, 207, 8 Revised Rep. 378. However in Re Westzinthus (1833) 5 Barn. & Ad. 817, 110 Eng. Reprint, 992, 2 Nev. & M. 644, 3 L. J. K. B. N. S. 56, 4 Eng. Rul. Cas. 845; Spalding v. Ruding (1843) 6 Beav. 376, 49 Eng. Reprint, 871, 12 L. J. Ch. N. S. 503, affirmed in (1846) 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 374; Coventry v. Gladstone (1868) L. R. 6 Eq. (Eng.) 44, 37 L. J. Ch. N. S. 492, 16 Week. Rep. 837; and Kemp v. Falk (1832) L. R. 7 App. Cas. 573, 31 Week. Rep. 125, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 167, 47 L. T. N. S. 454, 5 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 1, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 399, affirming (1880) L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 446, 42 L. T. N. S. 780, 28 Week. Rep. 785, 4 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 280, it was held that a transfer by a consignee for a valuable consideration and for a limited purpose, such as security, does not destroy the original vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, but that such stoppage is, however, subject to the transferee's lien for the amount secured.

So, in Texas, it has been broadly held that where the transfer of the bill of lading is by way of mortgage or pledge, the right to stop the goods is not absolutely defeated as in the case of a bona fide sale by the consignee, since if the mortgage or pledge has been made bona fide, the vendor may still resume his interest, subject to the rights of the mortgagee, and will have a right to the residue which may remain after satisfying the mortgagee's claim. Chandler v. Fulton (1853) 10 Tex. 2, 60 Am. Dec. 188. It follows, and it has been held, that the seller cannot exercise the right until he has discharged the debt secured by the transfer. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Heid-enheimer (1891) 82 Tex. 195, 27 Am. St. Rep. 861, 17 S. W. 608.

On the other hand, in Missouri, a bona fide assignment of a bill of lading as collateral security, "and not in payment of an antecedent indebtedness," has been held to create a title which is paramount to the unpaid vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Dymock v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1893) 54 Mo. App. 400, as explained on subsequent appeal in (1896) 67 Mo. App. 97.

It has been held that no delivery creating a change of property sufficient to terminate the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu is made by an assignment of the bill of lading to a third person, to enable him to receive and hold the goods for the shipper. Scholfield v. Bell (1817) 14 Mass. 40; Grout v. Hill (1855) 4 Gray (Mass.) 361.

In Secomb v. Nutt (1853) 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 324, it was held that a lawful sale of a part of the shipment did not terminate the right of stoppage in transitu as to the balance thereof still in the possession of the carrier as such.

Where duplicate or triplicate bills of lading have been issued, one holding is that those bills marked "original," and those marked "duplicate," are of equal legal effect, so that the indorsement of the duplicate bill to a bona fide holder passes the title and terminates the original vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Heidenheimer (1891) 82 Tex. 195, 27 Am. St. Rep. 861, 17 S. W. 608.

But the better rule seems to be that, where the attempted sale is merely by assignment of the duplicate bill of lading, the third person purchases at his peril, and is subject to the right of the consignor to stop the shipment in transit. In other words, the duplicate bill of lading does not represent the goods, and a purchaser who takes the same has notice that there is an original which, if paid, renders the duplicate of no value, so that he does not acquire a legal title which would defeat the right of the consignor, holding the original bill, to stop the goods in transit. This rule was adopted in Castanola v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1885) 24 Fed. 267. The Castanola Case, however, was expressly disapproved in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Heidenheimer (Tex.) supra. G. J. C.

FIRST LUTHERAN CHURCH OF PONTIAC.

Deed — distinction between covenant and condition.

1. The chief distinction between a condition subsequent and a covenant in a deed pertains to the remedy in case of breach, which in the former subjects the estate to forfeiture and in the latter is merely a ground for recovery of damages.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1429.]

2. A provision in a resolution authorizing conveyance of property by one church to another, that the deed is to be on condition that the grantee be and remain connected with a specified synod, does not make connection with that synod a condition precedent to the vesting of title, where to the knowledge of the grantor it was being organized as an independent church and there was a desire by the grantor to convey its property at once to the grantee in order that there would not be two churches of the same denomination in the city.

— construction of condition — rule.

3. Courts prefer conditions subsequent to conditions precedent, and when the words are of doubtful meaning the courts prefer to construe the condition as subsequent, so as to give a present estate liable to be divested rather than to defer the vesting.

7. The words, “on condition that said church be and remain connected with a specified synod,” in a deed by one church to another, is a condition subsequent, and not merely an incident to the consideration, although the purpose is to prevent two churches of the same denomination in the city, and the conveyance is subject to a mortgage.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Livingston County (Patton, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Tuesburg, Wilson, & Armstrong, for appellant:

If the condition be subsequent it must have been complied with in a reasonable time to escape a forfeiture.

Nowak v. Dombrowski, 267 Ill. 103, 107 N. E. 807; 2 Devlin, Real Estate 3d ed. § 972.

Where the clause goes to the whole of the consideration, it is a condition.

Barnes v. Southfield Beach R. Co. 202 N. Y. 301, 95 N. E. 691.

Where a condition precedent goes only to part of the consideration and a breach of it can be compensated in damages, it ceases to be a condition, and the remedy for a breach of it must be an action for damages.

Palmer v. Meriden Britannia Co. 188 Ill. 508, 59 N. E. 247; Rubens v. Hill, 213 Ill. 525, 72 N. E. 1127; Chicago Legal News Co. v. Browne, 103 Ill. 317; Nelson v. Oren, 41 Ill. 18; Chitty, Pl. 12th Am. ed. 823.

The estate is upon condition where the grantor has reserved no other effectual remedy for the enforcement of performance on the part of the grantee.

Richter v. Richter, 111 Ind. 456, 12 N. E. 698.

Where it appears from the deed that the grantor intended the property to be used in a specific way, and no other, and there are apt words of condition used, it will be construed as a conveyance on condition.

Scovill v. McMahon, 62 Conn. 378, 21 L.R.A. 58, 36 Am. St. Rep. 350, 28 Atl. 479.

There need be no expressed clause of forfeiture or right of re-entry for condition broken to create a condition where apt words of condition are used.

Downen v. Rayburn, 214 Ill. 347, 73 N. E. 364, 3 Ann. Cas. 36; Glocke v. Glocke, 113 Wis. 303, 57 L.R.A. 458, 89 N. W. 118; Scovill v. McMahon, 62 Conn. 378, 21 L.R.A. 58, 36 Am. St. Rep. 350, 28 Atl. 479; 13 Cyc. 690.

Even the word “condition” is not necessary to the creation of an estate upon condition if it plainly appears that the intent of the parties was to create an estate of that description.

Richter v. Richter, supra.

While conditions are not favored, and in the construction of deeds courts will incline to interpret the language as a covenant, rather than as a condition, the intention of the parties to the instrument, when clearly ascertained, must control.

Where compensation can be made in money, courts of equity will relieve against forfeitures, and compel the party to accept a reasonable compensation in money.

Gallaher v. Herbert, 117 Ill. 160, 7 N. E. 511.

The consequence of the nonfulfilment of a condition is a forfeiture of the estate.

The clause is a condition precedent.

Words of re-entry are not essential to create a condition.

But where the clause of condition or covenant goes to the whole consideration it may be treated as a condition subsequent.

Although there be no express assumption of the payment of mortgage indebtedness, if the purchase be made expressly subject to the encumbrance and the amount of the mortgage indebtedness forms a part of the consideration, the grantee will be held to have assumed the mortgage indebtedness.

The clause cannot be construed as a condition merely because there may be no adequate remedy for its breach.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action in ejectment brought in the circuit court of Livingston county by appellant against appellee to recover certain real estate in Pontiac. After a hearing before the court and jury the court instructed the jury to find for appellee and the verdict was so returned. The cause was then appealed to this court.

On March 6, 1907, appellant conveyed by warranty deed to appellee, both being religious corporations duly organized under the laws of this state, lot 5 in block 61 in the original town of Pontiac. That deed reads as follows:

This indenture witnesseth, that the grantor, the Rooks Creek Evangelical Lutheran Church of Rooks Creek township, Livingston county, Illinois, by Lewis B. Shay, Andrew F. Johnson, and John Carlson, its trustees, of the county of Livingston and state of Illinois, for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar, and in order to carry into effect a resolution adopted by the members of said church at a meeting held as hereinafter set forth, convey and warrant to the First Lutheran Church of Pontiac, whose trustees are James M. Mitchell, Julius Johnson, Peter Peterson, P. J. Sjoborg, and Ole Erickson, to them and their successors in office, county of Livingston and state of Illinois, the following described real estate, to wit: Lot five (5) in block sixty-one (61) in the original town (now city) of Pontiac, in Livingston county, Illinois.

Resolution hereinabove referred to:

"Whereas Rooks Creek Evangelical Lutheran Church at Rooks Creek township, Livingston county, Illinois, did in the year 1894-1895 purchase a church building and lot for the purpose of establishing a station for worship in the city of Pontiac for members of said congregation and others; and whereas, said church building was duly dedicated for worship by the officials of the Hauges Lutheran synod (of which said Rooks Creek Church was and still is a member) according to the teachings and rules of said synod, and said worship and other mission work has been continually kept up by the members of said church; and whereas, the pastor, O. O. Riswold, now in the service of said church, has solicited subscriptions for the organization of an independent church in the city of Pontiac, consisting of the original members of said Rooks Creek Evangelical Lutheran Church and others now living in and near the city of Pontiac, and said members desire to maintain their connection with said synod; and whereas, it appears proper for the permanent establishment of said independent church to connect with some Lutheran synod, and for the purpose of avoiding strife and contention in the said city of Pontiac, where there apparently is no room for more than one Lutheran church to succeed, it seems to us reasonable and proper, and in accordance with the Christian practices, where peace is predominating and local success desired, that the new church, composed as above set forth, should unite with the synod already established in said city, and, if possible, to divide pastoral service with said Rooks Creek Church:

"Therefore be it resolved, the board of trustees for Rooks Creek Evangelical Lutheran Church be and are hereby authorized to convey and transfer to the said church in Pontiac lot 5, block 61, in the original town (now city) of Pontiac, together with the church building thereon, subject to the indebtedness thereon due to A. Erickson, Th. Ryerson, and R. Aarvig, on condition that said church be and remain connected with the Hauges Lutheran synod.

"Adopted by the Rooks Creek Evangelical Lutheran congregation at their regularly appointed annual meeting, held at the First Lutheran Church of Pontiac, Ill., Feb. 7, 1907.

"O. O. Riswold, Chairman; O. S. Ryerson, Temporary Secretary."

Dated this sixth (6) day of March, A. D. 1907.

Andrew F. Johnson, [Seal.]
John Carlson. [Seal.]

Trustees of the Rooks Creek Evangelical Lutheran Church.

The deed was delivered to appellee March 8, 1907, and duly recorded on June 17, 1907. The appellee corporation, after the delivery of the deed, entered into the possession of said lands and premises and still remains in possession. It was not then, and never has since become, connected with the Hauges Lutheran synod. In May, 1911, the appellee corporation regularly adopted, at a regular session of the corporation, a revised constitution, which provided, among other things, that they recognized the necessity of maintaining some connection with a Lutheran body in order to secure the services of regularly trained and ordained pastors in good standing, but that, as the membership of the church was then made up of various nationalities and people coming from different Lutheran synods, it was deemed expedient for the present until action shall have been taken as hereinafter provided, to remain as an independent organization synodically, "provided, however, that this section shall not be construed as a repudiation of one certain clause set forth in a deed conveying the church property on the corner of Oak and Water streets to the First Lutheran Church of Pontiac, namely, that the church 'be and remain connected with the Hauges Lutheran synod.'" It appears from the record that the appellee church never joined the Hauges synod, but that in January, 1918, it joined the Evangelical Lutheran synod of Northern Illinois. We do not deem that the transactions since the execution of this deed are necessarily controlling, but have stated them, so that all the circumstances in connection with the transaction may be in mind in construing this deed.

It is contended by counsel for appellant that the deed conveyed the land first upon a condition precedent that the appellee church should become connected with the Hauges synod; and, second, on a condition subsequent that it should remain connected with said synod. Counsel for the appellee argue that the language of the deed, if construed as a condition, must be construed as a single condition, and that is, that the grantee church should have a continuing connection with said Hauges synod; that, as these two provisions or conditions in the deed are connected by the conjunction "and," both clauses must be construed together as one condition (6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 505), and that by this same authority, if the language does create a double condition, neither condition is required to be performed before the vesting of the title.

We do not think the clause in the deed should be construed as a condition precedent. It is disclosed by the wording of the deed that at the time it was executed the Rooks Creek congregation was aware that its pastor was organizing an independent Lutheran church in Pontiac; that it was not the intention of the Pontiac church to then be connected with the Hauges synod or any other synod; that it was evidently the desire of the Rooks Creek congregation to transfer its property at once to the new congregation in order that there would not be two Lutheran churches in said city. The resolution on which the deed was executed provided for immediate conveyance, and the deed was duly executed shortly after the passage of the resolution. We do not think condition—connection

it can be fairly argued that the deed either expressly or impliedly provided that the grantee church should first join said synod before the title passed. The grantee church was placed in possession of the property in question, and remained in undisturbed possession, without objection on the part of the grantor church, for nearly twelve years. There is nothing in the language of the deed, or in the resolution under which the deed was executed, which made it necessary that the connection with the synod should be made before the title vested in the grantee. This connection with the synod could be made contemporaneously with or subsequent to the vesting of the title, equally as well as prior thereto. Courts prefer conditions subsequent to conditions precedent, and when the words are of doubtful meaning the courts prefer to construe the conditions as subsequent, so as to give a present estate liable to be divested rather than to defer the vesting. Phillips v. Gannon, 246 Ill. 98, 92 N. E. 616, and authorities cited; Nowak v. Dombrowski, 267 Ill. 103, 107 N. E. 807. "If the act or condition required do not necessarily precede the vesting of the estate, but may accompany or follow it, and if the act may as well be done after as before the vesting of the estate, or if, from the nature of the act to be performed and the time required for its performance, it is evidently the intention of the parties that the estate shall vest and the grantee perform the act after taking possession, then the condition is subsequent." Tiedeman, Real Prop., 3d ed. § 202. Under the rules laid down by these authorities, as applied to the facts in this case, it must be held that the wording of the deed in question, if held to be a condition, creates a condition subsequent, the performance of which did not necessarily precede the vesting of the title.

The deciding and crucial question in this case, however, is whether the deed in question is so worded as to create a condition subsequent or a mere covenant. It must be conceded that the words "on condition," in a deed, are apt words to create a condi- —effect of words tion; yet such "on condition."

words have often been construed, in view of the context, as creating a covenant rather than a condition. 2 Devlin, Real Estate, 3d ed. § 971; Nowak v. Dombrowski, supra. One of the most important considerations in determining whether a clause is a condition subsequent or something else is the presence or absence of a clause providing for re-entry by the grantor or his heirs or for forfeiture of the estate for a breach. Koch v. Streuter, 232 Ill. 594, 83 N. E. 1072. Such a clause, while not indispensable, is always important as evidence of an intention to impose a condition subsequent, and will make certain that which, in its absence, is left open to construction. Druecker v. McLaughlin, 235 Ill. 367, 85 N. E. 647. It is difficult to say with any degree of precision when language importing a condition will be construed as a covenant. "The general rule undoubtedly is that courts will incline to construe language, wherever it is possible to do so,

into a covenant rather than a condition. Still, if it is the clear intention of the parties to create an estate upon condition subsequent the court must give effect to the intention of the parties." 2 Devlin, Deeds, 970d; 7 R. C. L. 1086. It has been held that a covenant or condition may be created by the same words. The chief distinction between a condition subsequent and a covenant pertains to the remedy in the event of a breach, which in the former subjects the estate to a forfeiture and in the latter is merely a ground for recovery of damages. Whether a clause shall be construed to be a condition subsequent or of covenant must depend upon the contract or circumstances and the intention of the party creating the estate. 12 C. J. 411. According to the weight of authority, a clause only operates as a condition when it is apparent, from the whole scope of the instrument, that it was intended so to operate, or, in other words, there is no technical rule, but the courts are bound in each case to ascertain the intent and give the instrument effect accordingly. The intention of the parties as ascertained from the instrument itself will be enforced when this can be done consistently with the rules of law. Woodruff v. Woodruff, 44 N. J. Eq. 349, 16 Atl. 4, 1 L.R.A. 380, and authorities cited in note; Victoria Hospital Asso. v. All Persons, 169 Cal. 455, 147 Pac. 124. A covenant is an agreement duly made between the parties to do or not to do a particular act. Bald v. Nuernberger, 267 Ill. 616, 108 N. E. 724, and authorities cited.

It is argued by counsel for appellee that the clause, "on condition that said church be and remain connected," etc., is not the whole consideration, but only part of it, and that the conveyance in question was not voluntary; that the consideration therefor was the establishment of a single Lutheran church in Pontiac and the payment of the mortgage debt of $1,600, and the promise of the Pontiac church (appellee herein) to be connected with the Hauges synod; that this promise to be connected with the Hauges synod being only a part of the consideration, therefore the failure to perform it could not defeat the whole title and right of the Pontiac church to the premises; that such promise should be construed as a covenant and not as a condition; that it has been held where a clause claimed to be a condition was only part of the consideration that it was merely a covenant or promise, and not a condition (Victoria Hospital Asso. v. All Persons, supra); that it has also been held that where a conveyance is not purely voluntary, and there is consideration other than the clause of condition or covenant, such condition will not be held to be a condition subsequent (Rawson v. School Dist. 7 Allen, 125, 83 Am. Dec. 670).

—effect of intention of parties.

It is further insisted by counsel for appellee that the amount of the mortgage mentioned in the deed was a part of the purchase money, and under the form of the deed it must be held that the grantee assumed the payment of this mortgage debt; that no precise and formal words are necessary to impose upon a grantee an engagement to pay off a mortgage, but the inquiry is as to the intention of the parties. Brosseau v. Lowy, 209 Ill. 405, 70 N. E. 901, and cases cited. It is argued just as earnestly by counsel for appellant that the grantee in this deed did not assume and agree to pay the encumbrance; that the property was primarily liable for the mortgage, and that under the reasoning of this court in Ray v. Lobdell, 213 Ill. 389, 72 N. E. 1076, it must be held that the grantee only took the equity of redemption in encumbered property, and therefore was not personally liable to pay said indebtedness; that therefore it cannot properly be held that the mortgage indebtedness was a part of the consideration. It is also argued by counsel for appellee that the absence of any remedy under the covenant will not, by itself, make into a condition language which is not so framed as to warrant in law such interpretation; that the provision with reference to the connection with the Hauges synod was a mere incident of the consideration, and not its principal feature.

We cannot hold that the connection with the Hauges synod was a mere incident to the consideration. Considering the words of the resolution in connection with the rest of the deed, we are of the opinion that the grantors intended the connection with the Hauges synod to be one of the principal considerations upon which the title was conveyed. The words used were apt words, creating a condition subsequent, and where the terms are distinctly and plainly terms of condition, where the whole provision precisely satisfies the requirements of the definition, and where the transaction has nothing in its nature to create any incongruity, there is no room for refinement and no ground for refusing to assign to the subject its predetermined legal character. In such a case the law attaches to the act, and ascribes to it, a definite significance, and the parties cannot be heard to say, where there is no imposition, no fraud, no

erately made a condition, and nothing but a condition, they yet meant that it should be enforced as a covenant. Blanchard v. Detroit, L. & M. R. Co. 31 Mich. 43, 18 Am. Rep. 142. See also United States v. Oregon & C. R. Co. (C. C.) 186 Fed. 861. The action on the covenant would not give appellant an adequate remedy. There were apt words of consideration. There is here largely an absence of other consideration and also an absence of other remedy. In discussing a somewhat similar question it has been said: "If the vendee had altogether failed in the performance of his agreement as to the vendor, would it have been an adequate remedy to the vendor to give him an action of covenant? It is manifest it would not." Bear v. Whisler, 7 Watts, 144.

In the light of all the facts in the case, the same may be said here. The facts and circumstances as disclosed by the record, including the recognition by the grantee in its action thereafter, all unite in tending to show that a condition rather than a covenant was intended by the words of this deed. The only thing that could make such position stronger would be words of re-entry or forfeiture in the deed, and these, as the authorities show, are not necessary or indispensable in order to create a condition.

words of forfeiture.

The judgment will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in harmony with the views herein expressed.

ANNOTATION.

Distinction between condition and covenant in grant of land for church purposes.

The rule that the question whether a provision in a deed constitutes a covenant or a condition depends on the intention of the parties, as gathered from the entire instrument, and that in case of doubt a covenant is favored rather than a condition, has been applied in the following cases in deeds of land for church purposes, which have been construed as creating covenants rather than conditions subsequent: Board of Education v. First Baptist Church (1872) 63 Ill. 204; Bald v. Nuernberger (1915) 267 Ill. 616, 108 N. E. 724; St. Stephen's Protestant Episcopal Church v. Church of Transfiguration (1909) 130 App. Div. 166, 114 N. Y. Supp. 628; St. Peter's Church v. Bragaw (1907) 144 N. C. 126, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 633, 56 S. E. 688; Ashland v. Greiner (1898) 58 Ohio St. 67, 50 N. E. 99.

A covenant, and not a condition subsequent, it was held in St. Stephen's Protestant Episcopal Church v. Church of Transfiguration (1909) 130 App. Div. 166, 114 N. Y. Supp. 628, was created by a provision in a deed made for a substantial money consideration, that the grantee, for himself, his heirs, and assigns, "doth covenant and agree" with the grantor, that the grantee should not at any time thereafter occupy or use the premises, or permit the same to be occupied or used, for any purpose other than church purposes only; and that "the said covenant" should run with the land.

It was held in Bald v. Nuernberger (1915) 267 Ill. 616, 108 N. E. 724, that a covenant, and not a condition subsequent, was created by a deed to a church, which provided that "the above-subscribed land being deeded in trust that said premises shall be used, kept, maintained, and disposed of as a place of divine worship for the use of the ministry and membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church." The court said: "There is nothing in the form of the language in the deed in question to indicate that it was intended that the conveyance was upon a condition subsequent. No word or terms show a condition of any kind, and no words of equivalent meaning are found in the deed. There is no re-entry clause. These are the usual indications of an intent to create a condition subsequent. . . . Under the authorities we think the provision in the deed in question must be considered a covenant, and not a condition subsequent." The consideration for the deed does not appear.

A provision in a deed of lots to a religious society that the property should not be used as a cemetery was held in St. Peter's Church v. Bragaw (1907) 144 N. C. 126, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 633, 56 S. E. 688, not a condition subsequent, breach of which would work a forfeiture, but a covenant the observance of which would be enforced by equity.

It was held in Ashland v. Greiner (1898) 58 Ohio St. 67, 50 N. E. 99, that a covenant, and not a condition subsequent, was created by a deed made for a stated financial consideration, which contained a provision that "it is expressly to be understood that the said grantees nor their successors in office, shall not at any time use or occupy the aforesaid premises for any other purpose or purposes than whereon to erect or build religious meeting houses or parsonages, and for cemetery or burying ground." The court said that when value is paid for the estate, a stipulation that it is to be used only for particular purposes is construed as a covenant running with the land, in the nature of a trust, for the uses and purposes expressed in the deed; and that in such cases a breach of the covenant restricting the uses and purposes to which the estate is to be devoted does not have the legal effect of forfeiting the estate and of reinvesting the title in the grantor, his heirs, or assigns; but that to have such legal effect there must be words of forfeiture or re-entry in the deed.

Also in Board of Education v. First Baptist Church (1872) 63 Ill. 204, it was held that a covenant rather than a condition subsequent was created by a deed providing that the property should be used for church purposes only, but that when it ceased to be so used the grantee should pay to the grantor a certain sum and have an absolute title thereto. The court referred to the well-established rule that courts will always incline to interpret the language of deeds as a covenant rather than a condition, and stated in effect that the plain intent of the grantor in this instance was that if the property was not used for church purposes the consideration for the deed, which was otherwise only nominal, should be the sum stated.

In Hays v. St. Paul M. E. Church (1902) 196 Ill. 683, 63 N. E. 1040, it was not denied that a provision in a deed to a church that "this conveyance is made strictly subject to the condition that no building or structure shall be built or erected" beyond the limits therein specified, created a valid, personal obligation to the grantor, the proposition that a condition subsequent was created thus being negatived at least by implication.

A condition subsequent, it was held in Mills v. Davison (1896) 54 N. J. Eq. 659, 85 L.R.A. 113, 55 Am. St. Rep. 594, 35 Atl. 1072, was not created by a conveyance, for a nominal consideration, of a lot to a religious society, with an habendum "to have and to hold unto the said party of the second part and their successors forever, with this express condition and limitation," namely, that neither the grantor nor his successors should sell, mortgage, or in any way convey the land, and that no building should be erected thereon except for the purpose of public worship. It was said that the conveyance created a trust which the grantee was bound to perform, enforceable, not by forfeiture of the title, but by those methods by which a court of equity compels the performance of such trusts; and that the word "condition" is a term of flexible meaning, and in leases is often construed as a covenant.

In holding that a declaration of trust, and not a condition subsequent or a covenant, was created by a deed to a religious society "to have and to hold all and singular the above-mentioned and described premises . . . unto the said party of the second part . . . on condition" that the church erected on the premises should be called by a certain name, that no instrumental music should be used in the worship of the church, etc., the court in MacKenzie v. Presbytery of Jersey City (1905) 67 N. J. Eq. 652, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 227, 61 Atl. 1027, said: "Words seemingly appropriate to a condition only may introduce a covenant, a condition, or declaration of trust; and the whole of the clause submitted to investigation must, in form and scope, be considered, in order to determine within which class it should fall. . . . All of the words used in the clause in question being considered, and the absence of words of determination or reverter being noted, the intent of the parties, to be exercised as permitted by the principles of law, will be best subserved by holding the clause to be a declaration of trust. Examining the deeds in the light of the authorities, we find no words whereby either party binds itself to the other for the doing or not doing of a particular thing, or for the existence or nonexistence of a particular state of facts, and for breach whereof the party bound should be answerable in damages. Hence we have no difficulty in concluding that the words are not words of covenant."

As an illustration of a line of cases which the annotation does not cover, dealing with the creation of trusts as distinguished from conditions subsequent in deeds to a religious society, see Taylor v. Campbell (1912) 50 Ind. App. 515, 98 N. E. 657, citing numerous other cases of a similar nature.

But a condition subsequent, and not a mere covenant personal to the grantee, it was held in Upington v. Corrigan (1896) 151 N. Y. 143, 37 L.R.A. 794, 45 N. E. 859, was created by deed, for a nominal consideration, providing in the habendum clause "to have and to hold . . . unto the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, . . . upon the conditions following, to wit, that said party of the second part shall consecrate, or cause to be consecrated, the said property for the purpose of erecting a church building, and shall, within a reasonable time, erect, or cause to be erected, such building."

And as construing a provision in a deed to a church "on condition that said church be and remain connected" with a certain Lutheran synod, as a condition subsequent, and not as a covenant, see the reported case (ROOKS CREEK EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH v. FIRST LUTHERAN CHURCH, ante, 1422).

In a number of other cases the question arose as to whether a deed for church purposes was made on a condition subsequent, and the court, without discussing the distinction between conditions and covenants, held that the provision in question was not a condition subsequent. Some of these cases are of value on the subject under annotation for the reason that provisions were involved of a nature similar to those in the cases previously set out. A few of these decisions are, therefore, referred to, without intending to treat this line of cases exhaustively.

The use of the words, "upon and subject to the condition," in a deed of land, for a nominal consideration, to a religious society, was held not to create a condition subsequent, in Episcopal City Mission v. Appleton (1875) 117 Mass. 326, where the deed was of land on which a chapel stood, and was made "upon and subject to the condition" that the land should be held for religious worship, but it was also provided that no building should be erected on a certain portion of the land until the adjoining landowner should cease to keep open a contiguous strip of land, or the premises should "cease to be a chapel." The court said that although the words "upon condition" in a conveyance of real estate were apt words to create a condition, yet they were not to be allowed that effect when the intention of the grantor, as manifested by the whole deed, was otherwise, and that it was of the opinion that such an intention appeared on the face of this deed.

And it was said in Farnham v. Thompson (1885) 34 Minn. 330, 57 Am. Rep. 59, 26 N. W. 9, that while certain words have acquired a technical signification as creating a condition, as the words, "provided," "on condition," or "so as," when followed by words imposing an obligation, these, though apt and proper for the purpose, do not necessarily create a condition, since the instrument in which they were used may contain other qualifying words showing that they were not used in their technical sense, and that a condition was not intended. And it was held in this case that a condition subsequent was not created by a deed, made without money consideration, to a church, of land "for the purpose of erecting a church thereon."

So, the words, "in trust nevertheless, and upon condition always," in a deed, it was stated in Sohier v. Trinity Church (1871) 109 Mass. 1, do not always create a condition; and it was held that these words in the habendum clause of a deed that the property should be held for specific church use did not make a condition subsequent where the deed was given by a church trustee, who held title for the church, to the vestry and wardens and their successors.

Attention is called also to Stanley v. Colt (1866) 5 Wall. (U. S.) 119, 18 L. ed. 502, in which, in holding that a trust, and not a conditional estate, was created by a devise to a religious society, the court said: "It is true that the word 'proviso' is an appropriate one to constitute a common-law condition in a deed or will, but this is not the fixed and invariable meaning attached to it by the law in these instruments. On the contrary, it gives way to the intent of the parties as gathered from an examination of the whole instrument, and has frequently been thus explained and applied as expressing simply a covenant or limitation in trust."

It was held in Packard v. Ames (1860) 16 Gray (Mass.) 327, that an estate on condition was not created by a grant to persons who, the deed recited, had associated together for the purpose of erecting on the land a meetinghouse for public worship, with habendum that the grantees should hold the estate for the purpose of erecting and maintaining thereon a house for public worship.

In Downen v. Rayburn (1905) 214 Ill. 342, 73 N. E. 364, 3 Ann. Cas. 36, it was held that a condition subsequent was not created by a deed to church trustees of "a certain tract or parcel of land to be used as a church location," but that the grantee acquired an unrestricted title.

And it was held in Cushman v. Church of Good Shepherd (1892) 14

Pa. Co. Ct. 26, that a condition subsequent was not created by a provision in a deed to a church, that the land should never be used as a place of sepulture, and that no other building should be put on the same except the church and Sunday-school buildings.

Also in First Presby. Church v. Bailey (1916) — Del. Ch. —, 97 Atl. 583, it was held that a condition subsequent was not created by a deed to church trustees, the consideration being a stated sum of money, and that the land might remain and inure under the said trustees and their successors forever for a meetinghouse, burying ground, and such other good and pious uses as to the trustees and elders of the church might seem most fitting and convenient. The court regarded these recitals merely as expressing the purpose of the conveyance and the rule as well settled that such recitals do not import a condition.

A conveyance of land to a church "to have and to hold the said lot of ground for mission-school purposes" was held in Rankin Regular Baptist Church v. Edwards (1902) 204 Pa. 216, 53 Atl. 770, not to create an estate on condition.

An estate on condition, it was held in Brown v. Caldwell (1883) 23 W. Va. 187, 48 Am. Rep. 876, was not created by a conveyance, made in consideration of a stated sum of money and of the trusts therein expressed, viz., that the grantee should at all times permit all the white religious societies of Christians to use the land as a common burying ground, and for no other purpose, unless for the erection of a house for public Christian worship.

Although not strictly within the scope of the annotation, the provision being in a will, attention is called to the case of Adams v. First Baptist Church (1907) 148 Mich. 140, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 509, 111 N. W. 757, 12 Ann. Cas. 224, holding that a devise of real estate to a religious corporation, "to be used as a parsonage and nothing else, and to be kept for that purpose and used for nothing else," did not create a condition subsequent so as to cause a forfeiture if the property was devoted to other uses.

But in Scott v. Stipe (1859) 12 Ind. 74, a grant to the use of the trustees of a church and their successors, in consideration of Christianity and a desire that the church might have a suitable place of worship, was held to be on a condition subsequent and to be forfeited by the sale and secular use of the property.

And it was held in Southwick v. New York Christian Missionary Soc. (1912) 151 App. Div. 116, 135 N. Y. Supp. 392, that a condition subsequent was created by a provision in a deed to church trustees that "the above-described land being designed for church purposes, it is understood and agreed that the seats therein shall be forever free for the use of any and all persons to occupy in the capacity of worship. But if the seats of the church to be erected thereon or any other church thereon shall be rented or sold then the said above-described premises shall revert to said party of the first part or her heirs." The decision was affirmed in (1914) 211 N. Y. 515, 105 N. E. 204, and rehearing denied in (1914) 212 N. Y. 564, 106 N. E. 1043. R. E. H.

Defendant is bound to reimburse plaintiff for the amount of the loan.

Wojciechowski v. Johnkowski, 16 Pa. Super. Ct. 444.

Walling, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of assumpsit for money loaned. The defendant company was incorporated in 1910, with an authorized capital stock of $200,000, divided into shares of $100 each. It owned a tract of 2,200 acres of timberland in Sullivan county, where it was engaged in the manufacture and sale of lumber. Prior to August, 1915, 1,500 shares of its capital stock had been issued, of which 1,100 shares were owned or controlled by John Hughes Blackman, and the remaining 400 shares by C. F. Carter. The latter manufactured the lumber for the corporation, and the former looked after its business affairs. In the spring of 1915 Carter secured from Blackman an option for the purchase of his stock. Blackman was president of the corporation, and insisted that, in connection with the sale of his stock, all the company's direct and collateral liabilities, amounting to about $41,000, must be paid. The agreed price for his stock was, in round numbers, $50,000, making the amount necessary to consummate the transaction $91,000. Carter employed plaintiff, who was an attorney, to assist him in securing this money, which was obtained largely by loans from banks and individuals. The option as drawn expired July 15th of that year, but was extended. The parties in interest met at a bank in Pittston on July 31st, also on August 2d, and again on August 4th, when the matter was finally consummated, and Carter became the owner of practically all the stock of the corporation. At the same time the company was reorganized, and the number of directors increased from three to five, which included Carter, his two sons, plaintiff, and H. W. Ruggles. A share of stock was transferred to each of the two latter to qualify them to act as such. Mr. Carter became president, his son, Bruce A. Carter, secretary, and Mr. Ruggles, treasurer.

Some of the notes given by Carter to raise the money were indorsed by plaintiff, who also furnished $5,000 of his own, which amount, with the balance of the $91,000, was turned over to Blackman at the meeting on August 4th. So far as appears, Mr. Blackman paid all the debts and liabilities of the old company and retained the balance as the price of his stock. The only question involved in this suit is whether the $5,000 was a loan to Carter or to the corporation; plaintiff says to the corporation. The $41,000 indebtedness included $6,500 owing to Blackman for salary. On the day last mentioned there was a meeting of the new board of directors, at which four were present; and the evidence for plaintiff tends to show that it was then agreed and understood that his $5,000 was a loan to the corporation and to be used in payment of Blackman's salary. In corroboration of this a three-months' note for that amount, drawn payable to plaintiff and executed by the new president and secretary in the corporate name, was put in evidence. The note was not signed by the treasurer as the by-laws provide; but plaintiff's evidence is to the effect that the treasurer was present, consented to the transaction, and said he would sign the note, if necessary. This is denied by the treasurer, who testifies, in effect, that it was a loan to Carter, and not to the company, and that the question of treating it as a loan from plaintiff to the company was broached at the meeting on August 2d, when he (the treasurer) refused to so consider it, or to sign the note, and that later, after a private conversation between Carter and plaintiff, they stated that other arrangements had been made as to the $5,000, and further that he had no knowledge of said note until long afterwards, and never consented thereto.

As we understand the facts none of the funds turned over to Blackman passed through the hands of the treasurer. The minutes of the corporate meeting held that day contain no reference to this loan. Ruggles seems to have been interested in this suit as the holder of a large block of the company's stock as collateral for a loan to Carter, who died in November, 1915, apparently insolvent. The note was admitted in evidence in support of plaintiff's contention. As the court below says, there was a sharp conflict in the evidence. Each side was supported to some extent by more than one witness, and the case became largely one of fact; as such it was submitted to the jury with adequate instructions. The verdict was in favor of the plaintiff, and the lower court, after careful consideration, directed judgment to be entered thereon, from which defendant appealed.

We find no error in the record. Some of the funds turned over to Blackman were for his stock, and the balance for corporate indebtedness. The jury found this $5,000 was a part of the latter; that being so, the corporation received the benefit of the loan. Conceding that the president and secretary were not authorized to execute the note, yet the company got the money, which it cannot retain and repudiate the agency by which it was secured. Upon this question we adopt the following from the opinion of the court below: "If plaintiff's money was loaned and used for such purpose, it is of no consequence that the election of officers was irregular, or that one of them was absent at the time of such loan, or that the treasurer did not execute the note. Such irregularities give way to the principle that a party cannot avail himself of the benefit of his agent's act and repudiate his authority; in the application of which it is held that a corporation which has received the benefit of a note irregularly issued cannot escape liability thereon by showing it was not executed by the proper officers. Hartzell v. Ebbvale Min. Co. 239 Pa. 602, 86 Atl. 1093; Pannebaker v. Tuscarora Valley R. Co. 219 Pa. 60, 67 Atl. 923; Presbyterian Bd. v. Gilbee, 212 Pa. 310, 61 Atl. 925; Pennsylvania Natural Gas Co. v. Cook, 123 Pa. 170, 16 Atl. 762; MacGeorge v. Chemical Mfg. Co. 141 Pa. 575, 21 Atl. 671. And a director of a company, suing, is not denied the application of such rule. Kendall v. Klapperthal Co. 202 Pa. 596, 52 Atl. 92."

The defendant's obligation arises from the receipt of the money by it, and the note, although defectively executed, is evidence as tending to establish the loan.

—power—borrowing money.

See Wojciechowski v. Johnkowiak, 16 Pa. Super. Ct. 444. A corporation may lawfully borrow money to pay its indebtedness, and when used for that purpose the obligation to repay is undoubted. The fact that the loan in question did not pass through the hands of the treasurer is not controlling, nor is the absence of any reference thereto in the corporate minutes.

The assignments of error are overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

NOTE.

The proposition of the first head-note of the reported case (SCOUTON v. STONY BROOK LUMBER Co. ante, 1483) is a specific application of the general principle promulgated in the annotation beginning at page 1446, post, to the effect that where an officer, without authority, enters into a contract for a corporation, and the corporation receives and retains the benefits of the contract after acquiring knowledge of the circumstances attending its execution, it thereby ratifies the contract and makes it good by adoption.

Corporation — contract approved by manager — binding effect.

1. A publisher which continues performance of an advertising contract after notice of its terms comes to the attention of its business manager, who has authority to make such contract, is bound by its terms.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1446.]

Appeal — findings sustained by evidence — effect.

2. A finding of the trial court, sustained by the evidence, cannot be disturbed on appeal on the ground that it is against the clear preponderance of the evidence.

Injunction — against breach of contract.

3. Injunction lies to prevent a newspaper publisher which has contracted to furnish advertising space at a certain rate for a specified time from refusing to continue the performance of its contract unless the advertiser will pay in advance an increased rate for space before the termination of the agreement.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County (Gregory, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to restrain defendant from breaching the terms of an advertising contract. Affirmed.

Statement by Siebecker, J.:

This action is brought in equity to restrain the defendant from breaching the terms of an advertising contract.

The plaintiff is a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of the state of Wisconsin, and operates three department stores. The defendant is also a corporation existing by virtue of the laws of the state, and publishes a newspaper in the city of Milwaukee. On or about the 18th of February, 1913, the merchandise manager of the plaintiff and the advertising manager of the defendant contracted as follows:

"We hereby agree to contract with Ed. Schuster & Co. to sell you fifteen thousand (15,000) inches or more of space in the Kuryer Polski, to cover three (3) years, beginning with March 1, 1913, and ending February 28, 1916, at the rate of 18c. per inch, bills to be payable before the 15th of each month following. It is also understood that 5,001 inches, or more, are to be used each year.

"The right is hereby granted to Ed. Schuster & Co. to renew this contract for another two years, under like conditions and at the same rate."

The contract was executed for three years by the parties. On December 27, 1915, the plaintiff elected to renew the contract under the option contained therein, and notified the defendant of such election by mail. It appears that the defendant corporation had a rule that all contracts for advertising for a period of more than one year must be submitted to the business manager of the corporation. At the time of making this contract plaintiff had no knowledge of such a rule of defendant. The contract, however, came to the notice of the business manager of the defendant corporation some time after August 1, 1914, and the defendant continued to furnish advertising to the plaintiff thereafter in accordance with the terms of the agreement and in no way disavowed the contract. After March 1, 1916, the defendant refused to accept and publish the advertisements tendered it by the plaintiff, except upon the condition that the plaintiff would in advance of publication agree to pay a higher rate of advertising than the rate set forth in the original contract.

The circuit court adjudged that the defendant corporation be permanently enjoined and restrained during the continuance of the two years' extension of the contract after March 1, 1916, from refusing to receive and publish the advertising tendered by the plaintiff in compliance with the terms and conditions of such contract. It was also adjudged by the court that the plaintiff recover from the defendant nominal damages and its costs and disbursements of the action. From such judgment this appeal is taken.

Messrs. Cochems & Wolfe, for appellant:

The alleged contract is not one specifically enforceable in equity under the proofs in the present case.

Siebecker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is no dispute concerning the terms of the contract as originally agreed upon between the plaintiff's merchandise manager and defendant's advertising manager on February 18, 1913. The court's finding that the "contract came to the notice of said Michael Kruszka, business manager of said defendant, some time after August 1, 1914, and that after it came to his notice the said defendant continued to receive advertising from the said plaintiff in accordance with terms of the contract and did not disavow the same," is sustained by the evidence and hence cannot be disturbed on appeal as against the clear preponderance of the evidence. In the light of these facts it must be held that the contract became and is a binding obligation on the defendant in its entirety, and plaintiff had the right to elect, as it did, to extend the contract for two years from March 1, 1916. The evidence shows that defendant refused to receive and publish plaintiff's advertisements in its paper, as required by the contract, after March 1, 1916, unless plaintiff agreed in advance to pay a higher rate for this space in defendant's paper, which it had sold to the plaintiff under the contract. It is manifest that, had plaintiff complied with defendant's demands in the respect mentioned, plaintiff would thereby have waived its right to recover compensation for the breach of the contract and the right to have the contract specifically enforced. Under such circumstances it was the plaintiff's right to stand upon the terms of the agreement and seek the redress the law affords for defendant's refusal to perform the obligations the contract imposes. The plaintiff asserts that the threatened breach of the contract would cause it irreparable damage, and therefore invoked equitable interposition to prevent defendant from carrying out such threatened breach of the agreement.

Appeal—Findings sustained by evidence—effect.
Corporation—contract approved by manager—binding effect.

The court found, as the evidence establishes, that the damages resulting from such a breach of the agreement, under the peculiar and special nature of the contract, are impossible of ascertainment, and hence a legal measure thereof cannot be arrived at to compensate plaintiff in an action at law. Under the facts and circumstances shown by the record it is obvious that if plaintiff is deprived of advertising its business in defendant's paper, as specified in the contract, the loss thereby occasioned cannot possibly be ascertained within any legal rules, and would result in irreparable injury. This state of the case furnishes ample basis for invoking equitable jurisdiction to restrain defendant from committing the threatened breach of the contract. Langan v. Supreme Council, A. L. H. 174 N. Y. 266, 66 N. E. 932; Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 10 Wall. 339, 19 L. ed. 955, 3 Mor. Min. Rep. 291; Rolfe v. Burnham, 110 Mich. 660, 68 N. W. 980; Inter-Ocean Pub. Co. v. Mr. W. W. Blake for defendant in error.

Messrs. J. L. Peeler and Thelburt Martin in support of a motion for rehearing by defendant in error.

Yantis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

R. L. Weathersby owned 80,000 shares of stock in the Jasper County Lumber Company, which was in the hands of a receiver. He was an indorser on two notes which it owed to W. W. Willson, in the aggregate sum of $3,503.96. He filed a plea of intervention in a receivership suit which was pending against the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company, in which he asked for judgment in his favor against the said Texas & Ohio Lumber Company for the said sum, alleging that said company purchased from him an option which he owned, to purchase from George N. Smalley 3,743 acres of timberland in Jasper county, and that as a part consideration for the purchase of his said option said Texas & Ohio Lumber Company agreed and contracted to protect him against the payment of said notes; and that when he caused the owner of said land, George N. Smalley, to deed it to the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company, it took said land charged with a lien in his favor to secure said protection; that he had been sued by said Willson on said notes, and a judgment had been rendered against him for the said amount, and that he had paid and discharged said judgment. In his plea of intervention he asked for judgment in his favor against the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company in said amount, with interest thereon, and for a foreclosure of said lien on the said 3,743 acres of land.

The receiver answered said plea of intervention by denying any contractual relationship between the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company and Weathersby. He alleged that the 3,743 acres of land were purchased by Applegate, and the deed was taken in his name as trustee for the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company; that a cash payment was made by the promoters of the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company; that the contract to hold the intervener Weathersby harmless by reason of his having to pay off the said notes was signed without the authority of the board of directors of the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company, and without any knowledge on their part of the conditions of such contract.

The district court rendered judgment against Weathersby. He appealed to the honorable court of civil appeals for the first district, where the judgment of the trial court was affirmed. A writ of error was granted by this court upon the view that the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company was bound by the contract of its promoters to protect Weathersby against liability on said notes. We will now consider this question, which is the only one presented for decision.

The undisputed evidence shows that in April, 1906, A. P. Laughlin, and several other parties, acting together, had in contemplation and were arranging for the organization of a lumber company corporation which, when organized, would purchase timberlands to be used in the operation of the business of said corporation. The corporation was organized and chartered in June, 1906, and said Laughlin was elected its president, and H. D. Applegate was elected its vice president. Prior to the actual organization of the corporation, among the lands Laughlin contemplated buying for the prospective corporation were 3,743 acres of timberland in Jasper county, which were owned by one George N. Smalley. Laughlin engaged one H. D. Applegate, afterwards vice president of the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company, as a promoter for the prospective company, and directed him to contract for the purchase of this tract of land for such company. However, he could not purchase the land direct from Smalley, as he ascertained, for the reason that Weathersby held a legal contract with said Smalley, which gave said Weathersby an option to purchase said land, and said option had not expired. So that Applegate and Laughlin ascertained that they could only secure said land by purchasing said option from Weathersby, or by contracting with him to waive said option in their favor. Accordingly, on April 25, 1906, said Applegate, the promoter of the prospective corporation, made a written contract with said Weathersby, through the latter's agent, John H. Kirby, by the terms of which Weathersby agreed to release his option on the land in their favor, and that Smalley should convey the land direct to said Applegate as trustee for his said associates and the prospective corporation. In this contract the consideration moving to Weathersby was the purchase from him by Applegate and his associates of 80,000 shares of the capital stock of the Jasper County Lumber Company, which said Weathersby owned, at its par value of $8,000, which was to be paid in cash; and, further, that said Weathersby would be protected by said Applegate and said prospective corporation against loss as an indorser or guarantor upon any of the promissory notes, accounts, or obligations of the Jasper County Lumber Company, which was in the hands of a receiver. In obedience to said contract, said Weathersby did procure said George N. Smalley to convey by deed said land to said Applegate, which deed was executed, but not delivered, on June 8, 1906, but was delivered after the execution of the contract of September 18, 1906, which was of the following nature: It was executed by the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company, by A. P. Laughlin, president. It was also signed by H. D. Applegate and A. P. Laughlin, individually. By its terms it confirmed said contract of April 25, 1906, which was made by said Applegate and said Kirby, as agent for Weathersby. Said new contract of September 18 recited that the one of April 25 had been made, and named the consideration which was to be received by Weathersby as stated above, and recited that through said contract of April 25 Weathersby had promised to deliver a deed to said land to the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company, and that said lumber company was now desirous of having said deed from Smalley, the owner of said land, delivered to it, and it then, in said September contract, agreed to pay to Weathersby all the considerations recited in said April contract, including the protection of Weathersby against paying the said notes, said September contract reciting a lien on said land to secure Weathersby against liability on said notes.

This contract of the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company, of September 18, was made long subsequent to the organization of the corporation, whose charter was secured in June, 1906, and when said contract was made Laughlin and Applegate were its duly elected and acting president and vice president, respectively.

The deed to the Smalley land at the date of the execution of the said September contract had not been delivered to Applegate by Weathersby or his agent Kirby, who had refused to deliver it until such time as the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company itself would become responsible to Weathersby for the considerations mentioned. After the execution of this September contract, Kirby delivered the deed to Applegate, and thereafter Applegate conveyed the land to the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company.

There is no merit in the contention made by the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company, defendant in error, or its receiver, that there was no consideration for the September contract. The consideration was plainly expressed therein. It stated, in substance, that in order to secure the deed to the said land the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company agreed to pay to Weathersby, the plaintiff in error, the considerations mentioned and promised in the April contract, expressly agreeing to protect him against liability on the notes referred to, which were the foundation of the judgment secured against Weathersby, on account of which the latter sues herein. When the deed was delivered to Applegate the $8,000 cash consideration was paid to Weathersby, and only that portion of the consideration mentioned in said contracts which provided protection to Weathersby against the payment of said notes was left outstanding, and this was assumed to be cared for by the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company. This was ample consideration to support the contract; and as soon as it was agreed by the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company to pay said considerations, Kirby, the agent for Weathersby, delivered the deed to Applegate, the promoter, who then conveyed the land to the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company, in accordance with the general understanding, when each of said contracts was executed.

It is contended, however, that the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company was not bound on said contract of September 18, because it is denied that Laughlin, its president, had authority from the board of directors to execute it. It is true the evidence shows that Laughlin had not been authorized by the board of directors to make this contract, and we will consider the question whether the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company is bound by its provisions from that viewpoint. That is, that Laughlin, when he executed said contract, exceeded his authority as president of the corporation. We will assume, also, that he did not act within the apparent scope of his authority, because there is evidence in the record that when he signed said September contract as president of the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company, he stated to the interested parties that the board of directors had not authorized him to make the contract. But there still remains the fact that the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company took and retained the land under his contract and the April contract, made for its benefit by its promoters, and that it is still holding and claiming said land which was acquired through the provisions of said contract, without offering in this suit to surrender said land. We do not think there can be any sound reason for sustaining the position thus occupied by it, which, in effect, would mean that it could receive the benefits of these contracts made by its promoters for it, and at the same time refuse the burdens imposed upon it by the contract. The title to this land it acquired through the provisions of said contracts, and it is by the force of the provisions contained in said contract that it still holds and claims the land. Under such circumstances equity would not allow it to refuse to pay the consideration promised by its promoters in said contract, for in good conscience it should not be permitted to keep the lands and at the same time refuse to pay for them. When the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company asserts title to said lands, it affirms the validity of said contract through whose provisions they secured said title. It cannot affirm the contract in part and repudiate it in part. It cannot accept its benefits and reject the burdens; and having affirmed the portion of the contract favorable to it, which it did in accepting and holding the lands, equity estops it from denying any portion of the contract, and especially that portion which provides for the consideration to be paid to Weathersby for securing the title thereto.

delivery of deed.

Estoppel—of corporation to question authority of officer—retention of benefit.

The question involved is not a new one. It has been directly passed upon by this court in the case of Weatherford, M. W. & N. W. R. Co. v. Granger, 86 Tex. 350, 40 Am. St. Rep. 837, 24 S. W. 795. Judge Gaines, then associate justice, gave careful and exhaustive consideration to the identical question involved here. In that case he said: "It is also generally held that contracts by promoters, made on behalf of the corporation within the scope of its general authority, may be adopted by the latter after its organization. Some of the courts say they may be ratified, but ratification presupposes a principal existing at the time of the agent's action, and it seems to us, therefore, that the term is not applicable in its technical sense. McArthur v. Times Printing Co. 48 Minn. 319, 31 Am. St. Rep. 653, 51 N. W. 216; Spiller v. Paris Skating Rink Co. L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 368, 26 Week. Rep. 456. With the exception of the law courts of England, the rule is also very generally recognized that if a contract be made on behalf of a corporation by its promoters, and the corporation, after its organization, with a knowledge of the facts, accepts its benefits, it must take it with its burdens, and if the other party has performed the stipulation binding upon him, it may be enforced as against the corporation. . . . Where the promoters of a railway company have agreed with a landed proprietor, through whose estates the road is projected to run, to take the requisite quantity of his land at a stipulated price, and after the corporation is formed it takes the land, it is certainly equitable that the company should be made to pay the agreed compensation; and the doctrine is recognized in many English equity cases. . . . Having exercised rights and enjoyed benefits secured to it by the terms of a contract made by its promoters in its behalf, a corporation should be held estopped to deny its validity. Again, when the promoters of a corporation have made a contract in its behalf, to be performed after it is organized, it may be deemed a continuing offer on part of the other party to the agreement, unless withdrawn by him, and may be accepted and adopted by the corporation after such organization; and the exercise of any right inconsistent with the nonexistence of such contract might be deemed conclusive evidence of such adoption."

In the case of Texas Western R. Co. v. Gentry, 69 Tex. 625, 8 S. W. 98, Judge Gaines again gave consideration to this question, and the following excerpt from his said opinion is directly decisive thereof. He says: "But it is further insisted that the resolution, as a contract to issue bonds secured by a mortgage, was void, because it was never authorized or ratified by a two-thirds vote of the stock of the corporation, as required by our statute. Rev. Stat. art. 4220. There is some conflict among the authorities upon the question of the validity of the contract of a corporation, when made in excess of its powers. When the contract is executed and the corporation has received the benefit, the weight of authority seems to be that the corporation should be held estopped to deny its authority to make it. Jones v. New York Guaranty & Indemnity Co. 101 U. S. 622, 25 L. ed. 1030; Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 L. ed. 188; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. McCarthy, 96 U. bert, 44 Iowa, 239; Foulke v. San Diego & G. S. P. R. Co. 51 Cal. 365. The rule is correctly stated in a recent work on estoppel: 'When a contract has in good faith been fully performed and nothing remains to be done by . . . the party seeking relief, and all the shareholders have acquiesced in its performance, the plea of ultra vires or mere want of power is not available by the corporation in an action brought against it for not performing its portion of the contract.' 2 Herman, Estoppel & Res Judicata, § 1179, and the numerous cases there cited. There are some decisions which hold that a contract by a corporation ultra vires is wholly void and cannot be enforced, either by or against it. But if the contract be within the general scope of the corporate authority, and the prohibition be merely against the mode of its execution, it is valid as against the corporation which has received its benefits, in favor of a party who has fully complied with the obligations on his part. In the case before us the railroad company had power to make a mortgage, but the statute provides it must be authorized by a vote in meeting of two thirds in value of the stockholders. This provision is evidently for the protection of the latter. It seems from the evidence in this case that the defendant corporation was organized for the purpose of extending and operating the railroad acquired, or then about to be acquired by Gentry. It is fully shown that it made the purchase, promised the bonds and mortgage as a part of the consideration for the property, and had operated the road for about three years when this suit was brought. It does not appear that it ever had any other assets save the property so acquired and a short extension of the line. Under these circumstances, the corporation must be held estopped to deny the want of assent of its shareholders. The promise to make a mortgage under these circumstances is deemed, in equity, equivalent to a mortgage, as between the original parties to the transaction."

It is contended that the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company had no notice of the terms of the contracts of April 25 and September 18, and that for this reason said company would not be bound by the provisions of said contracts, or estopped from holding the land without paying all of the consideration to Weathersby provided in said contracts. But we think the undisputed evidence shows that the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company did have such notice, both actual and constructive. After its incorporation it complied with every provision in the contracts except the one which exacted of it to hold Weathersby harmless on these two notes. It paid the cash consideration of $8,000 for the stock which Weathersby owned in the Jasper County Lumber Company. This was one of the provisions in the contract. It paid the note of Heiseg & Norvell, which was one of the provisions mentioned in the contract. It accepted the deed from Weathersby, which was one of the provisions in the contract. It is inconceivable that the company would have voluntarily paid out such large sums of money to comply with some of the provisions of the contract, without ascertaining all of the provisions of the contract, for certainly it would not have undertaken to comply with any of the provisions in the contract without intending to comply with all its provisions, for it knew that it could not secure the benefit to itself which it desired, namely, the deed, unless it complied with the entire contract. It knew that to comply with some of the provisions would not entitle it to the deed. In addition to this the undisputed evidence shows that Laughlin, the president of the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company, had actual knowledge of all of the provisions of the contract of April 25, and of the contract of September 18, because he directed Applegate to make the former, and had in person made and executed the latter, and must have been familiar with its contents. In each instance, he acquired notice and information of all of the provisions in said contract while engaged in furthering the business of the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company: in the first instance, before the company was organized, and in the latter instance, several months after it was chartered, and while he was its acting president. Having acquired such notice and information while attending to business for the benefit of the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company, the notice he had as its president was imputed to the said company. If he had acquired this notice while acting for himself in his own private business affairs, it would not be imputed to the Texas & Ohio Lumber Company, but since he acquired the notice while transacting business for the lumber company, such notice was, in law, imputed to the company. Teagarden v. R. B. Godley Lumber Co. 105 Tex. 616, 154 S. W. 973.

We conclude that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals, and of the District Court, should be reversed, and judgment should be here rendered in favor of plaintiff in error R. L. Weathersby, in the sum of $3,503.96, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from and after the 17th day of May, 1907, together with all costs incurred by him in the District Court, as well as in the Court of Civil Appeals, and in this court, and that he have a foreclosure of his said lien upon said 3,743 acres of land in Jasper county, Texas, covering the full amount of said indebtedness; and it is accordingly so ordered.

Petition for rehearing denied.

herein cases where contracts were made by agents not officers of a corporation, or cases wherein the courts have held corporate contracts to have been ratified by acquiescence alone, without a receipt and retention of the benefits.

II. General rule.

It is well established that where an officer, without authority so to do, enters into a contract for a corporation, and the corporation receives and retains the benefits of the contract after acquiring knowledge of the circumstances attending its execution, it thereby ratifies the contract and makes it good by adoption.

Thus, in a comparatively early case, Fister v. La Rue (1853) 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 323, concerning the unauthorized execution of a contract of employment by a trustee of an incorporated school district, it was said: "It is well settled, at least in this country, that where a person is employed for a corporation by one assuming to act in its behalf, and goes on and renders the services according to the agreement, with the knowledge of its officers and without notice that the contract is not recognized as valid and binding, such corporation will be held to have sanctioned and ratified the contract, and be compelled to pay for the services, according to the agreement. Having availed itself of the services and received the benefits, it is bound in conscience to pay, and will not be heard to say that the original agreement was not made by a person legally authorized to contract."

So, too, in a recent case, in holding that a corporation ratified the unauthorized contract of its officer by knowingly receiving and retaining the benefits thereof, the court said: "It is repugnant to every sense of justice and fair dealing that a principal shall avail himself of the benefits of an agent's act, and at the same time repudiate his authority. A corporation may not avail itself even of ultra vires as a defense, where a contract has been entered into and executed in good faith by the other party, and the corporation has received the benefit of the performance." McBride v. Western Pennsylvania Paper Co. (1919) 263 Pa. 345, 106 Atl. 720.

Where the president of a corporation enters into a contract of employment with a servant, and the latter performs services pursuant to the contract, which are received by the company with full knowledge of the contract, the corporation may not deny the authority of its officer in order to evade the liability incurred under the agreement, having accepted and retained the advantages derived from the contract. Egbert v. Barton (1918) — Okla. —, 173 Pac. 1135; De Forest v. Northwest Townsite Co. (1912) 236 Pa. 125, 84 Atl. 674.

In Mutual Oil Co. v. Hills (1918) 160 C. C. A. 335, 248 Fed. 257, it appeared that the plaintiff was employed as a manager of the defendant corporation pursuant to a contract of employment made by the latter's president, by which the plaintiff was to receive, in addition to his salary, a number of shares of the corporation. Pursuant to this contract, and with full knowledge of its existence and character on the part of the corporate officers and shareholders, the plaintiff entered on and performed his managerial duties. In this action to compel the issuance of the stock provided for in the contract, the court held that the corporation, having accepted the plaintiff's services with knowledge of the contract under which he was employed, had incurred a liability which it could not evade by disclaiming the president's authority to act.

Where the manager of a corporation appointed and employed a superintendent at a monthly salary, despite the fact that the charter of the corporation provided that a superintendent could only be appointed by an election of the board of directors, and the corporation through its directors, knowing of such employment, received the benefits thereof, the court held that the act of the manager was ratified, quoting from Gribble v. Columbus Brewing Co. (1893) 100 Cal. 71, 34 Pac. 529, as follows: "That which . . . a principal may authorize an agent to perform, he may ratify when performed by the latter without authority, and the same rule applies to a corporation; where, with full knowledge of all the facts involved, a principal reaps the fruits of an unauthorized contract of his agent, and for some time yields acquiescence to its provision, he will be deemed to have ratified it, and will be estopped, as against one who has fully performed the contract, from repudiating it to the injury of the latter. And this doctrine applies to corporations equally with individuals." Colpe v. Jubilee Min. Co. (1905) 2 Cal. App. 393, 84 Pac. 324.

So, in Brown v. Crown Gold Min. Co. (1907) 150 Cal. 376, 89 Pac. 86, it was held that where the board of directors of a corporation, knowing of the unauthorized act of its manager de facto in hiring the plaintiff, nevertheless failed to disaffirm the contract of employment and allowed the plaintiff to perform services beneficial to the corporation, it must be deemed that the manager's contract of hiring was ratified.

In Domenico v. Alaska Packers' Asso. (1901) 112 Fed. 554, an action brought by several employees of the defendant corporation, it appeared that they were employed by the defendant's general superintendent and rendered such services as their employment required. The company, although denying the authority of its officer to make the contracts of employment, retained the benefit of the claimants' services. It was held that the corporation, by receiving the benefits of the contracts, was estopped from disputing the authority of its superintendent to act for it in making the contracts.

In Fallon v. Clifton Mfg. Co. (1911) 207 Mass. 491, 93 N. E. 800, it was held that a corporation was liable for services rendered by the plaintiff pursuant to a contract of employment executed by the corporation's treasurer, under which the plaintiff performed the services required, the benefits of which were received and retained by the company with knowledge of the terms of the contract made by its officer.

Where it appeared that a school-teacher was employed under a contract executed by one of the trustees of an incorporated school district, and rendered the required services with the knowledge of the other officers, the court held that the contract was thereby ratified, saying: "It is well settled, at least in this country, that where a person is employed for a corporation by one assuming to act in its behalf, and goes on and renders the services according to the agreement, with the knowledge of its officers and without notice that the contract is not recognized as valid and binding, such corporation will be held to have sanctioned and ratified the contract, and be compelled to pay for the services, according to the agreement. Having availed itself of the services and received the benefits, it is bound in conscience to pay, and will not be heard to say that the original agreement was not made by a person legally authorized to contract." Fister v. La Rue (1853) 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 323.

And in Finnegan v. Pacific Vinegar Co. (1894) 26 Or. 152, 37 Pac. 457, a corporation was held liable under an unauthorized contract of employment where the plaintiff entered upon and performed his duties under the contract with the knowledge of the corporation, the court saying: "The defendant having suffered the plaintiff to work for it under a contract made with its vice president, for the period of eight months, without protest or objection, and without in any way signifying its dissent, the jury was justified in finding that it had ratified the act of its agent, and therefore could not be heard to impeach the validity of the contract on the pretense that it was made without authority. If it desired to disavow the contract, it was its duty to have been active in doing so as soon as the fact came to its knowledge."

In Wehrung v. Portland Country Club & Live Stock Asso. (1912) 61 Or. 48, 120 Pac. 747, it appeared that the plaintiff rendered services as a general manager of the defendant corporation, pursuant to a contract of employment executed on the part of the corporation by its vice president and secretary, and it further appeared that the corporation received and retained the benefits of the plaintiff's services under, and with knowledge of, the contract. The court held that the agreement made by the corporation's officers was thereby ratified, saying: "In an action upon a contract, executed by one assuming to act in behalf of the corporation, where plaintiff has rendered services in accordance with the agreement, and with the knowledge of the officers of the corporation, without notice that the contract is not recognized by it as valid, such corporation will be held to have ratified the contract, and will be liable for the services rendered according to the agreement."

In Moyer v. East Shore Terminal R. Co. (1894) 41 S. C. 300, 25 L.R.A. 48, 44 Am. St. Rep. 709, 19 S. E. 651, wherein it appeared that the defendant's general manager employed the plaintiff by contract executed by him, without authority, and the plaintiff performed services thereunder for a considerable period of time with apparent knowledge on the part of the corporation of the agreement made by its officer-agent, the court held that it could not now, allege the invalidity of the contract because of the want of authority of its agent to execute the same, for it had accepted and retained the benefits of the transaction, with knowledge of its terms and purport.

And in Totterdell v. Fareham Blue Brick & Tile Co. (1866) 35 L. J. C. P. N. S. (Eng.) 278, L. R. 1 C. P. 674, 12 Jur. N. S. 901, 14 Week. Rep. 919, wherein it appeared that two of the directors of the defendant stock company employed the plaintiff as a foreman in the company's plant, and that, pursuant to the contract, the plaintiff performed the services required, which were received by the corporation to its benefit, the court held that he could recover the value of his services, as the company was bound under the contract made by its directors, having accepted and retained the value thereof.

Also in Arkansas Amusement Asso. v. Higgins (1910) 96 Ark. 493, 132 S. W. 635, the court held that a corporation was liable for services rendered by an employee hired by its president and general manager, it being shown that the corporation received the benefits and enjoyed the fruits of the enterprise conducted for it by its officer-agent.

In Brooks v. Geo. Q. Cannon Asso. (1919) — Utah, —, 178 Pac. 589, the court held that a charge to the jury in the following words was proper: "That if you find from the evidence that any officer of defendant, purporting or pretending to act for defendant, did employ plaintiff, and defendant did receive and accept the benefit of plaintiff's services, although you may find that plaintiff was not employed in a formal way by the defendant corporation, or by anyone having authority from the defendant corporation to employ her in said matter, still said defendant is liable to plaintiff for the reasonable value of the services so rendered by her and accepted by the defendant." However, it appeared that the corporation received no benefits from any contract entered into with the plaintiff.

In Bank of Columbia v. Patterson (1818) 7 Cranch (U. S.) 299, 3 L. ed. 351, wherein it appeared that a duly appointed committee of the defendant corporation contracted, without express authority, with the plaintiff, to perform certain services for the corporation, and pursuant to and with knowledge of such a contract the defendant accepted the benefits of the plaintiff's services, the court held that by so doing the corporation ratified and adopted the contract of its committee, and therefore the defendant was bound and liable to the plaintiff for the payment of the value of the latter's services.

In Heinze v. South Green Bay Land & Dock Co. (1901) 109 Wis. 99, 85 N. W. 145, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff rendered services as a civil engineer to the defendant corporation pursuant to, and with knowledge on its part of, a contract retaining the plaintiff, and executed by a party who was elected president of the corporation by its de facto board of directors, the court held that the defendant, having knowledge of the transaction and receiving its benefits, adopted the same and could not question the authority of its officer to bind it.

So, in Balet v. New York & N. J. Bridge Co. (1899) 40 App. Div. 245, 58 N. Y. Supp. 19, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, a civil engineer, at the instance and request of the defendant corporation's officers, performed services for the company in the nature of drawing plans, and having cuts made thereof, of a bridge proposed to be constructed by the defendant corporation, and wrote a descriptive article of the same, all of which were used in a newspaper article for the purpose of influencing public opinion in favor of the defendant, the court held that, having received and accepted the benefit of the plaintiff's performance of an unauthorized contract, it must be deemed that the corporation ratified the same and was liable thereon.

In Davies v. Harvey Steel Co. (1896) 6 App. Div. 166, 39 N. Y. Supp. 791, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff performed work, labor, and services for the defendant corporation at the instance of its president, and pursuant to a contract executed by him, and it further appeared that the corporation, knowing of the transaction, accepted and received the benefits thereof, the court held that the corporation was liable under the agreement, having ratified the same by accepting and retaining the fruits derived therefrom, stating the general rule as follows: "The general rule is that an agreement by an officer or agent of a corporation, who assumes to act in its behalf, can be enforced against the corporation where it has received the benefit of the agreement."

And in Hooker v. Eagle Bank (1864) 30 N. Y. 83, 86 Am. Dec. 351, it appeared that the president and two directors of the defendant corporation contracted with the plaintiff for his services as an architect in the construction of a building for the defendant. It further appeared that after the plaintiff had partly performed, and the corporation, with knowledge of the contract made by its officers, had accepted and retained the benefits of the performance, it canceled the contract. In this action to recover the value of the services, the court held that the corporation was liable on an implied assumpsit; having accepted and retained the benefits of the unauthorized contract, it thereby ratified the same.

In Ruttle v. What Cheer Coal Min. Co. (1908) 153 Mich. 300, 117 N. W. 168, it appeared that, with knowledge of the defendant corporation, the plaintiff rendered services to it pursuant to a contract made by a principal stockholder, who was also the president and treasurer of the company, and that the corporation received the benefits of the services performed. It was held that the corporation was as much bound as though it had itself formally contracted for the services, having ratified the contract by receiving and retaining the benefits flowing therefrom.

In Underwood v. Newport Lyceum (1844) 5 B. Mon. (Ky.) 129, 41 Am. Dec. 260, the court held that a corporation was liable on an assumpsit to a person for rendering services and performing work for the corporation at the instance of a contract made by the company's officers, where it appeared that the corporation accepted and retained the benefits of the contract.

In Wood v. Ontario & Q. R. Co. (1874) 24 U. C. C. P. 334, the court found the evidence insufficient to show a receipt of the benefits of the plaintiff's services, pursuant to a contract executed by a director of the defendant corporation to retain the plaintiff, but said: "The acceptance or enjoyment by the company [if shown] is evidence of its having contracted for the thing done, and agreeing to pay for it."

In Thomasson v. Grace M. E. Church (1896) 113 Cal. 558, 45 Pac. 838, the court held that work performed under an unauthorized contract was "wholly worthless," and therefore there was no acceptance of benefits so as to create a ratification.

b. Contract of employment of agent, broker, or attorney.

Where it appeared that the general manager of a corporation contracted with the plaintiff, a broker, to procure a purchaser for certain stock of the corporation, and, the broker having succeeded in selling the stock, the corporation received the proceeds of the sale with knowledge of the alleged unauthorized contract of its officer, the court held that the broker could recover his commissions, saying: "When a contract is made by any agent of a corporation in its behalf, and for a purpose authorized by its charter, and the corporation receives the benefit of the contract without objection, it may be presumed to have authorized or ratified the contract of its agent." J. D. Pace & Co. v. Alexandria Electric R. Co. (1916) 138 La. 879, 70 So. 867.

In Bauersmith v. Extreme Gold Min. & Mill. Co. (1906) 146 Fed. 95, it appeared that the secretary of the defendant corporation contracted, without authority, with the plaintiff, a stockbroker, for the sale of the company's stock, and the plaintiff, having procured a buyer, sold the stock and delivered the proceeds of the sale to the corporation, which accepted and retained the moneys so received. In this action brought by the broker to obtain his commissions under the unauthorized contract, the court held that the corporation authorized and ratified the contract of its secretary by accepting the benefits and profits derived from the plaintiff's performance, and having done so, it was estopped from asserting the lack of authority of its officer-agent in order to throw off the obligation.

In Meeuwse v. Clough & W. Co. (1919) — Mich. —, 175 N. W. 408, it was held that a corporation which had purchased the plant and business of another corporation, having accepted the benefits of a contract subsequently made in the name of the latter corporation for the payment of commissions on orders, by filling the orders in part, could not escape liability for commissions on the part of the orders that were canceled, upon the ground that it did not know the terms of the contract, since it was its legal duty to discover all the terms of the commission contract the benefits of which it accepted.

In Plymer v. Hartford & N. Y. Transp. Co. (1900) 103 Fed. 674, affirmed in (1903) 57 C. C. A. 288, 120 Fed. 624, it was held that the act of a general manager of a corporation in retaining the services of a broker to effect the sale of a steamship was ratified by the acceptance by the corporation of the purchase price of the boat, obtained from a sale effected by the broker.

So, where it appeared that the president of a corporation, without authority, retained the services of a broker to sell certain property of the corporation, and the latter, knowing of the contract, accepted a purchaser procured by the broker, and completed a sale of the property through him, it was held that the broker could recover his commissions, as the corporation in effect ratified the contract made by its officer without authority, by knowingly accepting and retaining the benefits thereof. Rowland v. Progressive Invest. Co. (1918) — Mo. App. —, 202 S. W. 257.

And in Lyon v. West Side Transfer Co. (1909) 132 App. Div. 777, 117 N. Y. Supp. 648, the court held that where it appeared that a corporation knowingly received the benefits of a sale of property procured through the services of a broker, who was employed without authority by its officers, the burden was upon the corporation to prove that it did not thereby ratify the unauthorized contract of employment.

In Pescia v. Societa Co-operativa (1904) 91 App. Div. 506, 86 N. Y. Supp. 982, it appeared that certain officers of the defendant corporation, having purchased a building through a real estate broker, made a contract with the latter without authority, by which it was agreed that the corporation should pay the broker commissions for his services in finding tenants for the property, in consideration that he relinquish and pay to the corporation a part of his commission received from the sale under which the company was the vendee. And, it further appearing that the corporation knowingly received and retained the consideration stipulated in the unauthorized contract, the court held that it thereby ratified the same, and having received the plaintiff's money it could not deny the authority of its officers to retain him under the contract.

And in Peach River Lumber Co. v. Ayers (1906) 41 Tex. Civ App. 334, 91 S. W. 387, wherein it appeared that the vice president, secretary, and treasurer were authorized by the by-laws of the defendant corporation to contract for the services of a broker in making sales of corporate property, and the secretary and treasurer of the corporation, acting without the vice president contrary to the requirement, employed the plaintiff as broker, and subsequently the vice president, on behalf of the corporation, accepted the benefits of the plaintiff's services, the court held that his action in so doing ratified the contract executed by the other two officers, and validated the same ab initio.

In Pixley v. Western P. R. Co. (1867) 33 Cal. 183, 91 Am. Dec. 623, the court held that where an attorney, retained by the president of a corporation, performed the services required under the contract, it would be deemed that the corporation ratified the same and was liable for the value of the services rendered.

But in Foulke v. San Diego & G. S. P. R. Co. (1876) 51 Cal. 365, the court explained the foregoing ruling, saying: "There are indeed dicta in the opinions delivered in Pixley v. Western P. R. Co. to the apparent effect that, where all has been done by the other contracting party which the contract requires of him, the corporation should be held to have ratified the express contract, and a recovery be had according to the terms of such contract. But these were not called for by the circumstances of that case, which was an action on the quantum meruit. The true rule to be deduced from the opinions in Pixley v. Western P. R. Co. is, the provision of the statute must be limited to contracts wholly executory. It cannot refer to those liabilities which the law itself implies from benefits received and actually enjoyed, where the services have been performed on the one side and received and enjoyed on the other. In the last class of cases, however, the action must be brought upon the implied promise, and the recovery must be limited to the value of the actual benefit received."

In Goodwin v. Central Broadway Bldg. Co. (1913) 21 Cal. App. 376, 181 Pac. 896, wherein it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation, without authority, employed an attorney, and the corporation with knowledge of the contract accepted the services rendered thereunder, the court held that the contract of employment was ratified by the acceptance and retention of the benefits derived therefrom, saying: "Where, with full knowledge of all the facts involved, a principal reaps the fruits of the unauthorized contract of his agent, and for some time yields acquiescence to its provisions, he will be deemed to have ratified it, and will be estopped, as against one who has fully performed the contract on his part, from repudiating it to the injury of the latter. And this doctrine applies to corporations equally with individuals."

Where it appeared that an officer of a corporation contracted for the services of an attorney, and the corporation received the benefit of his services, the court held that the acceptance of the advantages of the contract precluded the corporation from asserting want of authority on the part of its officer to incur a liability for the same. Bankers' Trust Co. v. Cooper (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 179 S. W. 541.

So in Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Woolley (1876) 12 Bush (Ky.) 451, the court held that a contract made by a director, retaining the services of an attorney, could not be avoided on the ground of want of authority of the agent-officer to contract, where it appeared that the corporation knowingly received the benefits of the agreement by accepting the attorney's services.

See also Ney v. Eastern Iowa Teleph. Co. (1919) — Iowa, —, 171 N. W. 26, reversing (1913) 162 Iowa, 525, 144 N. W. 383, wherein the court held that evidence of the fact that the defendant corporation accepted the services of the plaintiff as an attorney, retained in pursuance of an alleged unlawful contract with the company's president, should have been submitted to the jury as a question of fact whether or not the corporation ratified the contract.

In Lord & Thomas v. Sanitary Drinking Cup Co. (1915) 191 Ill. App. 150, the court held that express authority on the part of a secretary-treasurer of the defendant corporation, to contract for the rendering of services as an advertising agent by the plaintiff, was not necessary, where it was shown that the defendant, knowing of the contract, received and retained the benefits thereof, for by so doing it ratified the contract of its officer, making it valid ab initio.

Where it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation entered into a contract, without authority, to pay commissions to the plaintiff for his services in inducing patronage for the defendant, and it appeared further that the corporation, knowing of the unauthorized contract, nevertheless received and retained the benefits incident to the plaintiff's performance, the court held that the facts constituted a ratification of the unauthorized contract, saying: "Upon this appearing, even assuming that the president of the defendant was not authorized to make the contract with plaintiff, yet the corporation, in availing itself of plaintiff's services thereunder, has adopted and ratified the same, and should pay for the services according to the agreement." Smith v. Martin Anti-Fire Car Heater Co. (1892) 45 N. Y. S. R. 26, 19 N. Y. Supp. 285.

In Bertholf v. Fisk (1918) 182 Iowa, 1308, 166 N. W. 713, wherein it appeared that the manager of the defendant corporation hired the plaintiff as an automobile salesman, and the corporation, knowing of the contract of employment, accepted the benefit of a consideration paid by the plaintiff, for the agency, the court held that the retention of the benefits of the contract ratified the same, and the defendant was liable to the plaintiff under the agreement.

Where it appeared that an officer of a defendant corporation contracted, without authority, with the plaintiff, an insurance adjuster, for the services of the latter in adjusting claims against the corporation, and pursuant to this contract the plaintiff rendered his services in the matter and successfully adjusted certain claims for the corporation, which received and retained the benefits and fruits of the plaintiff's services, with knowledge of the character and extent of the unauthorized contract, the court held that the defendant ratified the unauthorized contract of its officer by receiving, with knowledge, the benefits derived from the contractual performance on the part of the plaintiff, saying: "Corporations engaged in as large a business as that of defendant cannot have all corporate action through directors, or the ordinary executive officers. They will not be permitted to take advantage of benefits accruing from the acts of officers, necessarily invested with large discretion and acting within the scope of their authority, and repudiate the obligations incurred in their acquisition, by denying the authority of the officers. Mere denial of authority will not be conclusive; and one undertaking to enforce his claims against the corporation may establish by circumstances an authority which exists in fact, though it may never have been conferred by any single affirmative act. Acquiescence and confirmation may also be established by circumstances." Bostwick v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. (1918) 168 C. C. A. 286, 251 Fed. 36.

In Rich v. State Nat. Bank (1878) 7 Neb. 201, 29 Am. Rep. 382, wherein it appeared that the president of a banking corporation contracted with the plaintiff, and the corporation, with knowledge of the transaction, received and retained the benefits of the contract in the nature of plaintiff's services as a director and the continued business of plaintiff's firm, the court held that the retention of the benefits of the contract constituted a ratification thereof, and created an estoppel, so that the defendant could not avail itself of its officer's lack of authority to contract.

See also Foster v. British Columbia F. Ins. Co. (1917) 3 West. Week. Rep. (Manitoba) 598, 37 D. L. R. 404, wherein, among other things, the court held that the question of an officer's authority to bind his corporation to an agreement to pay the plaintiff for his services in effecting a reinsurance transaction for it, was immaterial, in view of the fact that the company subsequently ratified the contract by accepting the benefits of the plaintiff's services.

In Southern Amusement Co. v. Ferrell-Bledsoe Furniture Co. (1919) — Va. —, 99 S. E. 716, it appeared that the manager of a theatrical corporation contracted with plaintiff for the purchase of furniture and theater equipment for the defendant corporation's theater building, then being remodeled and equipped. In this action to recover the contract price of the materials supplied under the agreement, the corporation contended that its manager had no authority to bind it. The court held that, having accepted the benefit of the contract made for it with knowledge of its terms, the defendant ratified the act of its officer-agent, and must assume the burdens incident to the same.

In Shook v. Levi (1918) 153 C. C. A. 157, 240 Fed. 121, affirming (1916; D. C.) 234 Fed. 118, it appeared that the defendant's president contracted for the purchase of a number of horses, which were received by the corporation pursuant to and with knowledge of the officer's transaction. The court held that the retention of the benefits of the contract amounted to a ratification of the acts of the president, and that the defendant was precluded from denying the authority of its officers so to act.

In Sprague Canning Machinery Co. v. Fuller (1908) 86 C. C. A. 46, 158 Fed. 588, reversing (1907) 155 Fed. 372, the court held that a corporation could not disclaim the authority of its officers to incur a debt for the purchase of machinery, and at the same time claim title to and use the property involved, for the retention of the benefits of the contract, with knowledge of its terms, amounted to a ratification of the corporate officer's unauthorized acts.

And in Reeves v. New York Engineering & S. Co. (1918) 161 C. C. A. 439, 249 Fed. 513, it was held that the installation of a machine bought by the president of the defendant corporation, and a part payment of the purchase price, amounted to a ratification of the officer's act in making the purchase.

Where it appeared that the bid of a corporation to furnish certain manufactured articles was received on the condition agreed on with one of its officers that the corporation would receive as part payment an account owing by the president of the corporation to the purchaser, and subsequently, the contract being performed and the corporation having received part payment on the same with knowledge of the conditional agreement with its officer, the court held that by accepting the benefits of the contract the corporation ratified the acts of the officer in executing it, saying, on rehearing: "The corporation cannot accept and ratify the contracts in so far as they are beneficial to it, and repudiate them in so far as they imposed any liability on its part. It accepted . . . money on the strength of these contracts, and cannot, while retaining the same, be heard to say that its officers had no authority to make the contracts under which it was received." Valley Lumber Co. v. McGilvery (1909) 16 Idaho, 338, 101 Pac. 94.

In Electrical Supply Co. v. Jersey City Electric Light Co. (1886) 4 N. Y. S. R. 516, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff supplied to the defendant corporation materials to be used in the construction of a building for it, and the materials were supplied on the credit of the corporation, at the instance of a director, who acted without authority, and who was also the contractor for the construction of the building, the court held that, it being shown that the corporation received and retained the materials with full knowledge of the alleged unauthorized contract, it must be held liable, as it thereby ratified the agreement entered into by its officer.

In Westcott v. Atlantic Silk Co. (1841) 3 Met. (Mass.) 282, wherein it appeared that a corporation received and retained certain machinery purchased in pursuance of a contract entered into by one acting as the president of the corporation, it was held that the acceptance and retention of the benefits of the officer's contract constituted a ratification thereof.

In Newhall v. Joseph Levy Bag Co. (1912) 19 Cal. App. 9, 124 Pac. 875, it appeared that the defendant's secretary entered into a contract for the sale of certain articles manufactured by the defendant, and pursuant thereto, and with knowledge of the terms of the contract, the corporation manufactured and delivered the articles and received payment therefor, which benefit it retained. The court held that by so doing the corporation ratified the alleged unauthorized act of its secretary, and was estopped from asserting the invalidity of the contract because of lack of authority on the part of its officer-agent to contract.

So, in Henningsen v. Tonopah & G. R. Co. (1910) 38 Nev. 208, 111 Pac. 36, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1008, rehearing denied in (1911) 38 Nev. 266, 119 Pac. 774, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1021, wherein it appeared that the general superintendent of the defendant corporation contracted with the plaintiff for the sale of certain personal property of the corporation, and the latter, with knowledge of the agreement, accepted and retained the benefits derived from the consummated sale, the court held that the facts stated authorized a presumption that the corporation ratified the contract.

In Scott v. Middletown, U. & W. C. R. Co. (1881) 86 N. Y. 200, it appeared that, pursuant to an unauthorized contract made by the defendant corporation's president with the plaintiff, the latter furnished and supplied materials which were accepted and used by the corporation, which had full knowledge of the contract. The court held that the acceptance of the benefits of the contract and their appropriation to the corporate uses, made by the company with knowledge, actual or implied, of the transaction from which these benefits emanated, amounted to a ratification and adoption of the act of the officer.

In Zearfoss v. Farmers' & M. Institute (1893) 154 Pa. 449, 26 Atl. 211, the court held that a corporation was liable for lumber and materials supplied and received by it pursuant to a contract executed by a de facto director, where it appeared that, although the officer contracted without authority, the corporation knowingly accepted the benefits of the contract, and was bound thereby.

Where it appeared that the general manager of a corporation contracted for the purchase of a claim held by the plaintiff against a third person, and the corporation, pursuant to the contract, accepted the claim and retained the benefits derived from a collection thereof, the court held that the corporation thereby ratified the contract made by its officer, saying: "It cannot keep the proceeds of the contract, and at the same time repudiate it." Clement, B. & Co. v. Michigan Clothing Co. (1896) 110 Mich. 458, 68 N. W. 224.

In Smith v. Hull Glass Co. (1852) 11 C. B. 897, 138 Eng. Reprint, 729, 7 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 287, 21 L. J. C. P. N. S. 106, 16 Jur. 595, wherein it appeared that the manager of a corporation contracted for the purchase of certain materials to be used by it in the business, and the same were delivered to and received by the corporation pursuant to the agreement, and with knowledge thereof, the court held that the receipt and use of the benefits of the contract on the part of the corporation, through its directors, constituted an adoption and ratification of the same.

In L. Scatena & Co. v. VanLoben Sels (1912) 19 Cal. App. 423, 126 Pac. 187, wherein it appeared that a corporation's president-manager had contracted for the sale by the corporation of certain produce of a third party, and that in consideration thereof the corporation would pay a rebate on its commissions, the court held that the payment of the rebate and the acceptance of commissions earned under the contract, by the corporation, with knowledge of the contract, constituted a ratification, and estopped the corporation from asserting lack of authority on the part of its officer to contract.

In Re National Piano Co. (1918) 252 Fed. 950, it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation agreed, in writing, to repurchase from the plaintiff several hundred shares of its preferred stock, deliveries being made in the course of the ensuing three years, and that the stock was accepted and paid for by the company with knowledge of the contract, and pursuant thereto. The court held that ratification of the contract was implied by the retention of the stock delivered under the agreement.

So, in Wisconsin Lumber Co. v. Greene & W. Teleph. Co. (1904) 127 Iowa, 350, 69 L.R.A. 968, 109 Am. St. Rep. 387, 101 N. W. 742, wherein it appeared that, pursuant to a contract executed by its president whereby the defendant corporation agreed to repurchase stock subscribed to by the plaintiffs, the corporation knowingly received the benefits of the sale of the stock under the agreement, the court held that it was estopped from asserting want of authority of its officer to make the contract, saying: "The corporation cannot accept and ratify the contracts in so far as they were beneficial to it, and repudiate them in so far as they imposed any liability on its part. It accepted plaintiff's money on the strength of these contracts, and cannot, while retaining the same, be heard to say that its officers had no authority to make the contracts under which it was received."

Churchill (1828) 6 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 428, 17 Am. Dec. 159, the court held that a corporation could not avoid a contract for the sale of stock entered into by two of its directors, where it appeared that the corporation, knowing of the agreement, received and retained the benefits thereof, saying: "The doctrine contended for by the corporation cannot be admitted. It cannot be privileged, by virtue of its invisible, intangible, and immaterial existence, to practise frauds by its agents, claim the benefit of the agreement and promise to itself, and yet deny the mutual and correlative promise and consideration held out by its visible agents. It is too late, after they, the company of individuals composing the corporate body, have received the money, with full notice of the condition, to say they are not bound by the condition. Such a privilege would indeed be transcendent, and would verify the complaint of long standing, and reiterated by wisdom and experience in many preceding generations, that it is difficult to obtain common justice in a dispute with a corporation."

And where it appeared that a corporation's president contracted for the purchase of certain stock by the corporation, and the contract was subsequently performed, with the knowledge of the directors of the transaction, and the corporation, as a result, received certain valuable benefits, which it retained, the court held that it could not question the authority of its president so to contract, for, by accepting and retaining the benefits of the contract with knowledge of its terms, the same was impliedly ratified. Hudson v. Seeley Specialties Co. (1912) 19 Cal. App. 213, 124 Pac. 1051.

In Elysville Mfg. Co. v. Okisko Co. (1849) 1 Md. Ch. 394, wherein it was contended that the action of the president of the defendant corporation in subscribing to the stock of another company was void, because he acted without authority, it appeared that, knowing of the transaction, the corporation received and retained the stock subscribed for, and also voted on the same. The court held that the retention of the benefits of the contract gave rise to a presumption of the authority of the defendant's president to execute the same, and therefore amounted to a ratification of the transaction.

In Fremont Carriage Mfg. Co. v. Thomsen (1902) 65 Neb. 370, 91 N. W. 376, wherein it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation contracted for the sale of certain of its stock, and pursuant thereto the plaintiff purchased the stock, and the corporation, with knowledge of the transaction, accepted and retained the proceeds thereof, the court held that it thereby ratified the contract of its officer, for it could not repudiate the transaction on the claim of lack of authority on his part to make the contract, and at the same time retain the benefits derived therefrom.

Where an officer of a corporation entered into a contract for the sale of capital stock of the company, without apparent authority so to do, and the corporation, with knowledge of the transaction, subsequently received and retained the purchase price of the stock sold, the court held that the company thereby ratified the act of its officer, and was estopped from asserting his lack of authority to contract. J. K. Siphon Ventilator Co. v. Hutton (1915) 116 Ark. 545, 175 S. W. 30.

In Western Homestead & Irrig. Co. v. First Nat. Bank (1897) 9 N. M. 1, 47 Pac. 721, it appeared that the general manager of a corporation entered into a contract with a third person by which the corporation agreed to buy certain stocks, and to employ the party. With the knowledge of its officers and directors, the corporation received and retained the stock sold, but failed to pay the purchase price, whereupon the action was brought by a judgment creditor of the third person, to enforce garnishment against the corporation. The court held that the corporation was liable despite the lack of authority of its officer to make the contract for it, having knowingly accepted the benefits of the transaction and thereby ratified and acquiesced in the same, saying: "It would be contrary to sound principles of law, and a travesty on justice, to hold that an officer of a corporation may enter into a contract in good faith with an individual for the transfer to it of valuable property, hold and keep it, and then decline to pay for it, because, forsooth, the officer so entering into the agreement did not have special authority to make and sign the contract conferred on him by the provisions of its secret by-laws."

In Cawthra v. Stewart (1908) 59 Misc. 38, 109 N. Y. Supp. 770, it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation, who was also a director and the sole owner thereof, induced the plaintiff, by fraudulent representations, to subscribe to the stock of the corporation, and the money paid by the plaintiff as the purchase price of the stock so subscribed for was accepted and retained by the corporation. The court held that the defense of lack of authority of its president to make the contract, and therefore lack of authority to make the false representations, was unavailing to the defendant corporation, for it had accepted and retained the money with knowledge of the facts, and therefore ratified the officer's acts as well as his representations.

Where under a contract executed by the secretary of a corporation with a purchaser of stock, the corporation had the benefit, with knowledge of the transaction, of the purchase price of the stock for a long period, the court held that it could not claim a lack of authority on the part of the secretary to enter into the contract, for the retention of the benefits and advantages accruing to the corporation thereunder created a ratification of the officer's contract. White Water Valley Canal Co. v. Hawkins (1858) 4 Ind. 474.

And in Higginbotham v. International Trust Co. (1910) 141 App. Div. 535, 126 N. Y. Supp. 366, the defendant corporation was held liable on a contract for the subscription of its stock, executed by its president with the plaintiff, wherein it appeared, among other things, that the defendant had received and retained, to its benefit, the subscription price paid by the plaintiff for the stock, pursuant to and with knowledge on the part of the corporation of the contract.

In Adam v. New England Invest. Co. (1911) 33 R. L. 193, 80 Atl. 426, wherein it appeared that the president and general manager of the defendant corporation contracted with the plaintiff to purchase certain stock owned by her, and it further appeared that the stock so purchased was accepted and retained by the corporation with knowledge of the transaction, the court held that, the facts showing that the corporation received and retained the benefits of the contract, it must be held to have ratified the same.

See also Hamilton Coal Co. v. Bernhard (1891) 61 Hun, 624, 40 N. Y. S. R. 875, 16 N. Y. Supp. 55, wherein it was held error to refuse to admit in evidence a contract executed by the plaintiff-corporation's secretary, whereby the corporation agreed to sell coal at a certain price to the defendant, it appearing that the corporation, with knowledge of the contract, had received and retained certain benefits in the nature of the purchase price of coal delivered, the court holding that the jury might reasonably have found that the contract was ratified, although unauthorized in its inception.

See also Braxmar v. Stanton (1905) 110 App. Div. 167, 96 N. Y. Supp. 1096, wherein there is dictum to the effect that a corporation could ratify the act of its superintendent in contracting for the purchase of certain material on its account, and a receipt of the material and its use by the corporation would be such a ratification.

In WEATHERSEY v. TEXAS & O. LUMBER Co. (reported herewith) ante, 1440, it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation executed a contract, without authority, by which, among other things, the corporation was to obtain a deed from the plaintiff of certain timberland, on which the latter had an option to purchase. Pursuant to this contract, and with knowledge of its terms, the corporation received the benefits thereof in the nature of the timberlands mentioned, but failed on its part to perform the consideration therefor, claiming, in this action to enforce the same, that the president had no authority to execute the contract. The court holds that by accepting and retaining the benefits of the contract the defendant corporation thereby affirmed the validity of and ratified the same.

In Canadian Long Distance Teleph. Co. v. Seiber (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 159 S. W. 897, wherein it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation contracted for the purchase of certain telephone property and issued a note of the corporation to bind the payment for the same, the court held that, conceding the officer acted without authority, very slight evidence was required to show a ratification of his acts by the corporation, where it appeared that the latter received and retained substantial benefits derived from the transaction, saying, in part, as follows: "Where the unauthorized act is beneficial to the corporation, and the directors have individual knowledge of it, slight evidence will be sufficient to establish ratification by acquiescence or failure to repudiate, and this upon the theory that a party who accepts benefits will be deemed to have done so with a knowledge of the conditions and circumstances surrounding the transaction out of which the act creating the benefit arose, and must take the burdens with the benefits."

In Washington Irrig. Co. v. Krutz (1902) 56 C. C. A. 1, 119 Fed. 279, it appeared that the officers of the defendant corporation, without authority, contracted with the plaintiff for the purchase of certain water rights, and the company, with full knowledge of the unauthorized contract, accepted and retained the benefits appurtenant to the same. The court held that by accepting the fruits of the transaction the corporation ratified the acts of its officers, saying: "The corporation could not accept the conveyance of the land upon which the consideration of the contract was based, and then deny the authority of its president to enter into the contract."

In Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Gilmer (1888) 85 Ala. 422, 5 So. 138, wherein it appeared that the president of a corporation, in a transaction for the purchase of land, executed certain covenants running with the land to the grantor, and pursuant to, and with knowledge of, the transaction, the defendant corporation received and used the lands conveyed by the deed, the court held that this amounted to a ratification, saying: "The acceptance of the deed with the benefits of the contract, and possession under it by the railroad, was a full ratification of the act of its agent, and estopped that corporation from denying the fact of the agent's lawful appointment, as well as his authority to act in the premises."

So, in McBride v. Western Pennsylvania Paper Co. (1919) 263 Pa. 345, 106 Atl. 720, it appeared that the vice president of the defendant corporation agreed with the plaintiff that the corporation would bid in certain real estate owned by the plaintiff, which was to be sold by the sheriff pursuant to an execution, and that subsequently, upon a resale of the property, the plaintiff and the corporation would divide the proceeds. Accordingly, the corporation, with knowledge of the agreement, bought the property and sold the same at a large profit. In this action brought by the plaintiff to recover under the contract with the defendant's officer, the corporation defended on the ground of the officer's lack of authority to execute such an agreement. The court held that the defendant accepted the benefit of the transaction, and thereby ratified or adopted the acts of its representative, and consequently was estopped from setting up a defense that the contract was entered into without authority.

Where the manager of a railway corporation, acting without authority, contracted for the sale of premises belonging to the corporation, and the latter, knowing of the agreement, evacuated the premises and the vendee moved thereon, and it further appeared that the corporation performed certain works for the vendee as required by the contract, it was held that by so doing the corporation ratified the contract made by its manager. Wilson v. West Hartlepool Harbour & R. Co. (1864) 34 Beav. 187, 55 Eng. Reprint, 606, affirmed in (1865) 2 De G. J. & S. 475, 46 Eng. Reprint, 459, 34 L. J. Ch. N. S. 241, 11 Jur. N. S. 124, 11 L. T. N. S. 692, 13 Week. Rep. 361.

In Perchmann v. Mt. Eagle Constr. Co. (1911) 128 La. 894, 55 So. 567, wherein it appeared that the directors of a corporation sold a lease held by the company on a sand pit, and the corporation, knowing of the sale, accepted the proceeds thereof, the court held that the acceptance and retention of the fruits of the sale constituted a ratification of the directors' act, regardless of their initial authority to make the contract.

In Davidson v. Cannabis Mfg. Co. (1906) 113 App. Div. 664, 99 N. Y. Supp. 1018, appeal dismissed for want of jurisdiction in (1907) 187 N. Y. 576, 80 N. E. 1108, the court granted a decree of specific performance of a contract entered into by the principal officers of the defendant corporation with the plaintiff, whereby the former agreed to sell, and the latter to purchase, certain real estate, and wherein it appeared that the corporation knowingly received and retained a part payment from the plaintiff pursuant to the contract, the court holding that it would be inequitable, under the circumstances, to allow the corporation to repudiate the contract on the ground that the officers who executed the same acted without authority.

In Shertzer v. Hillman Invest. Co. (1909) 52 Wash. 492, 100 Pac. 982, it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation, who was also a majority stockholder, made representations that a certain portion of a suburban building plan was to be created and used as a public park, and to this effect large posters, plats, and advertisements were circulated and posted in and about the company's offices. It further appeared that the plaintiff, among others, induced by these representations, bought of the corporation a plot of ground for the purpose of erecting thereon a dwelling house, and the corporation, knowing of the representations of its officer and agents, accepted the benefits of the sale induced and procured thereby. This action being brought to restrain the use of the land so represented as a public park for building purposes, the court held that the company was bound by the representations made by its officer, for, having accepted and retained the benefit of sales procured thereby, it ratified the same, and could not now be heard to assert his want of authority to make them.

So too in White v. Sheppard (1899) 41 App. Div. 113, 58 N. Y. Supp. 563, wherein it appeared that the president of a corporation, being authorized to sell an apartment house owned by the corporation, sold the same, but by the terms of the deed exceeded his authority in so doing, and it further appeared that the corporation received and retained the moneys paid by the grantee as the purchase price, with knowledge of the officer's acts, the court held that the corporation was estopped from impugning the transaction, as it ratified and confirmed the excess of authority of its president by its acceptance and retention of the money.

In Rowley v. Hager (1912) 63 Or. 246, 127 Pac. 36, wherein it appeared that the president and a salesman of the defendant corporation entered into a contract to sell a certain lot of real estate owned by the corporation, and the latter, with full knowledge of the agreement, received the purchase price thereof, the court held that, regardless of the authority of the corporate representatives to make the contract, the corporation ratified it by accepting and retaining the benefits derived therefrom with full knowledge of the transaction.

In Kessler v. Ensley Co. (1905) 141 Fed. 130, affirmed in (1906) 79 C. C. A. 534, 148 Fed. 1019, wherein it appeared that the property of a corporation was conveyed to trustees for the purpose of a sale by them of so much of the property as was needed to pay off the debts of the corporation, and it further appeared that the trustees sold a part of the property, and the proceeds of the sale were accepted by the corporation and applied to extinguish the corporate debts, and the property remaining in the trustees was reconveyed to the corporation, the court held that the acceptance of the benefits of their acts, on the part of the corporation, was a ratification of the same, and validated all the proceedings and transactions made under the trust.

In Goldbeck v. Kensington Nat. Bank (1891) 48 Phila. Leg. Int. (Pa.) 76, affirmed in (1892) 147 Pa. 267, 23 Atl. 565, wherein it appeared that the president of the plaintiff bank contracted with the defendant, whereby the bank agreed to bid in property owned by the latter at a sale in execution in order to diminish the loss, and it further appeared that the bank, having bid in the property, subsequently sold the same and received and retained the profits of the sale, the court held that it could not then question the authority of its officer to make the contract with the defendant, for by accepting and retaining the fruits of the transaction it ratified the same.

And in Poche v. New Orleans Home Invest. Co. (1900) 52 La. Ann. 1287, 27 So. 797, it was held that where a corporation received the benefits of notes held by it, pursuant to a sale of the corporate property made by its president in excess of authority, it thereby ratified the sale as made, and was estopped to seek avoidance of the contract on the ground of lack of authority of its officer so to act.

In Fudickar v. Glenn (1917) 151 C. C. A. 50, 237 Fed. 808, it appeared that the defendant's president renewed the lease of premises in which the corporation conducted its business, and the latter continued in occupancy pursuant to, and with full knowledge of, the renewal made by its officer. The court held that, assuming the act of the defendant's officer-agent was unauthorized, the corporation was bound by the contract, having, by implication, ratified the same by a retention of the benefits incidental thereto.

In Atlanta & St. A. B. R. Co. v.

Thomas (1910) 60 Fla. 412, 53 So. 510, wherein it appeared that an attorney of the defendant corporation contracted with the plaintiffs for the use of land owned by them for a right of way, and that in consideration thereof the company would build and maintain a railroad depot "to subserve the interests" of the plaintiff, and pursuant to this contract, and with knowledge of its terms, the defendant accepted the benefits thereunder, and went into possession of the right of way, the court held that the corporation, having accepted the benefits of a contract and entered on possession, could not raise the question of the authority of its officer who executed the contract in its name.

In Peterborough R. Co. v. Nashua & L. R. Co. (1879) 59 N. H. 385, wherein it appeared that the officers of the defendant railroad company entered into a contract with the plaintiff whereby the latter leased to the defendant corporation its railroad for a term of years, and with knowledge of the transaction the defendant entered upon and remained in possession of the railroad, using the same for the corporate purposes, the court held that by accepting the lease of the plaintiffs, and deriving all the advantages contemplated by the agreement, the defendant was estopped to deny the authority of its officers in making and executing the contract.

Where it appeared that the president of a corporation leased premises owned by himself for the benefit of the corporation, which, with knowledge of the transaction, maintained thereon a toll house for a period of fifteen years, accepting and retaining the benefits derived therefrom, the court held that, although the transaction was unauthorized, the corporation nevertheless ratified the same by retaining the benefits incident thereto. Herring v. Dix River & L. Turnp. Road Co. (1901) 23 Ky. L. Rep. 642, 63 S. W. 576.

But in Clement v. Young-McShea Amusement Co. (1905) 70 N. J. Eq. 677, 118 Am. St. Rep. 747, 67 Atl. 82, reversing (1905) 69 N. J. Eq. 347, 60 Atl. 419, it appeared that a manager of the defendant corporation executed, without written authority, a lease of premises owned by the corporation for a term exceeding three years, and subsequently the rental of the premises was received by him and credited to the account of the corporation. The court held, on the question of estoppel and ratification, that the authority to execute the contract was required to be in writing by the Statute of Frauds (2 Gen. Stat. p. 1602), and that, therefore, the doctrine of ratification by the retention of benefits could not apply, as the officer's authority was not in writing, saying: "It would be unreasonable to hold that an agent whose agency must, under a legislative rule of public policy like the Statute of Frauds, be created by writing, might be dealt with as if such writing existed without any effort to ascertain its existence. Equally unreasonable would it be to hold that an agent appearing to have merely unwritten authority to make leases, which under such a rule cannot, either at law or in equity, bind his principal for more than three years, may yet make a contract incidental, or ancillary to a lease, which in equity will bind the principal for a longer period, in the discretion of the agent. These considerations prevent us from adjudging that the complainants had a right to assume that Young had the authority necessary to maintain their contract against the company. . . . The claims of estoppel and ratification [therefore] are both barred by a single fact—that the company had no notice, either actual or constructive, that the complainants possessed, or believed they possessed, a lease for a longer term than Young's unwritten authority entitled him to give, or that its own rights, consistent with the proper exercise of his authority, were in any wise infringed." In so holding the court reversed the finding of the court below (69 N. J. Eq. 347), wherein it was said: "Having permitted the complainants to enter under an agreement made with its agent, and accepted payment of the rent agreed upon, it would be inequitable to now allow the defendants to shield themselves behind an informality in the execution of a lease both parties have acted under, and compel the complainants to suffer the loss of their investment . . . incurred in fitting up the property for the uses contemplated by the lease, or the agreement for a lease."

In Jacksonville, M. & P. R. & Nav. Co. v. Hooper (1896) 160 U. S. 514, 40 L. ed. 515, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379, it was held that where the president of a corporation, without express authority, entered into a lease of the plaintiff's premises for the use of the defendant, and the latter, with full knowledge of the terms of the lease, entered into possession and retained the benefits derived from the occupancy of the premises, the corporation thereby ratified the unauthorized act of its officer.

In West Side Auction House Co. v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1898) 76 Ill. App. 635, it was held that a corporation ratified a lease signed by the secretary, where it entered on and retained possession of the premises pursuant thereto.

Where it appeared that the president of a corporation, acting without authority, leased premises for the use of the corporation, and the latter, knowing of the transaction, accepted and retained the use of the premises, the court held that the corporation thereby ratified the lease, executed without authority by its officer-agent. Alexander v. Culbertson Irrig. & Water Power Co. (1901) 61 Neb. 383, 85 N. W. 288.

So too, in William Wicke Co. v. Kaldenberg Mfg. Co. (1897) 21 Misc. 79, 46 N. Y. Supp. 937, it appeared that the manager of the defendant corporation rented premises for its use, but without authority, and subsequently, and with notice of the agreement, the corporation entered upon the premises so hired, and retained and used the same for storage purposes. The court held that the corporation ratified the contract made by its manager, by accepting and retaining its benefits with knowledge thereof, and that it was now estopped to deny liability for rent of the premises by asserting lack of authority of its officer to make the contract.

In Fischer v. Motor Boat Club (1908) 61 Misc. 66, 113 N. Y. Supp. 56, wherein it appeared that a secretary of a membership corporation rented premises without authority, but with the knowledge of the corporation, for its benefit, and the corporation subsequently entered upon and made use of the premises, the court held that such action, the acceptance, with knowledge, and retention of the benefits of the secretary's act, constituted a ratification on the part of the corporation of the unauthorized contract.

Where it appeared that the general manager of the defendant corporation entered into a contract, without authority, with the plaintiff, whereby the latter agreed to rent, and the corporation to lease, certain lots belonging to the latter, and it further appeared that the plaintiff paid part of the consideration, which was accepted and retained by the corporation with knowledge of the transaction, the court held that the receipt and retention of the benefits of the contract by the corporation gave rise to the legal conclusion that it thereby ratified the contract executed, without authority, by its officer. West v. Washington & C. River R. Co. (1907) 49 Or. 436, 90 Pac. 666.

So, in Kincheloe Irrigating Co. v. Hahn Bros. (1912) 105 Tex. 231, 146 S. W. 1187, affirming (1910) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 132 S. W. 78, the court held that it was immaterial as a defense that the defendant corporation's general manager lacked authority to contract for a lease of the corporate lands, where it appeared that the corporation entered upon the execution of the contract, and received and retained benefits thereunder.

And in King v. West Coast Grocery Co. (1913) 72 Wash. 132, 129 Pac. 1081, it was held that the question of authority of an officer of a corporation to execute a lease of its property was immaterial, where it appeared that the corporation knowingly received the rental of the premises, for, conceding that the officer acted without authority, the subsequent receipt and retention by the corporation of the fruits of the transaction constituted a ratification of the same, and an estoppel to question its validity.

Where it appeared that a corporation accepted and retained the rents and profits derived from the leasing of property by its president, without authority, and it appeared further that the company had knowledge of the contract of leasing executed by its officer, the court held that the retention of the benefits constituted a ratification by the corporation of the unauthorized lease, saying: "Ratification may be inferred from the fact that the owner of real property, held under an unauthorized lease, with knowledge of the infirmity of the lease, recognizes the lessee as his tenant, and accepts and receives from the tenant the benefits of the lease." Anderson v. Conner (1904) 43 Misc. 384, 87 N. Y. Supp. 449.

In Jourdan v. Long Island R. Co. (1889) 115 N. Y. 380, 26 N. Y. S. R. 138, 22 N. E. 153, it appeared that the president and secretary of defendant, a railroad corporation, executed an agreement with another railroad corporation, by which each mutually agreed to allow the other the use of its tracks and depots. It further appeared that the defendant corporation, although alleging herein lack of authority of its officers to make the contract, had received and retained the profits and advantages derived from the performance of the transaction. The court held that the defendant could not escape liability for a breach of the contract, because its officers were unauthorized to execute the same, for by accepting and retaining the benefits of the transaction the corporation ratified it, saying, in part, that "if they intended to disavow it, it was their duty to be active in so doing."

See also Hayden v. Wheeler & T. Co. (1892) 66 Hun, 629, 49 N. Y. S. R. 240, 20 N. Y. Supp. 902, wherein it appeared that the secretary and treasurer of the defendant corporation executed, without authority, a lease of property for the corporate use, and the company, with knowledge on its part, entered on the premises and paid rent therefor. The court held that it was proper to submit the facts to the jury on the question whether the corporation had ratified the unauthorized contract made by its officer.

f. Contract to rent, transfer, or assign personal property.

In Ferguson v. Venice Transp. Co. (1899) 79 Mo. App. 352, it appeared that the president of a corporation, acting without authority, transferred and assigned an asset of the corporation, and the latter, knowing of the transaction, nevertheless received and retained the benefits thereof. The court held that the corporation could not question the validity of the assignment on the ground of lack of authority of its president to make the same, for by accepting the benefits of the transaction the corporation acquiesced in its making.

In Dill & C. Co. v. Morison (1913) 159 App. Div. 583, 144 N. Y. Supp. 894, it was held that an unauthorized assignment of corporate property by its officers was valid and binding, where it appeared that the corporation received and retained the benefits of the assignment, with knowledge of the same, and thereby ratified the acts of its officer-agents.

Where it appeared that the treasurer of the defendant corporation, without authority, chartered a steamboat belonging to the company, to the use of a third person, and the corporation, knowing of the transaction, accepted and retained the sum paid therefor, the court held that the contract of the officer was thereby ratified. Brown v. Winnisimmet Co. (1865) 11 Allen (Mass.) 326.

In Thompson v. Brantford Electric & Operating Co. (1898) 25 Ont. App. Rep. 340, wherein it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation, who was also the general manager, acting without the express assent of the board of directors, rented on behalf of the corporation a machine to be used in its business, and the corporation, knowing of the contract of renting, accepted and used the machine, the court held that, having received and retained the benefits of the

g. Contract to construct, repair, or maintain corporate property.

In Owyhee Land & Irrig. Co. v. Tautphas (1903) 57 C. C. A. 557, 121 Fed. 343, wherein it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation contracted for the construction by the plaintiff of a canal, and the latter fully performed the work required, and the benefit of his performance, with the knowledge of the shareholders of all the circumstances, was received and retained by the corporation, it was held that the defendant was estopped from questioning the authority of its officers to make the contract, as the defect was cured by the retention of the benefits derived from the unauthorized act.

In Southern Bitulithic Co. v. Hughton (1912) 177 Ala. 559, 58 So. 450, an action by a subcontractor against the defendant corporation for the performance of certain construction work pursuant to a contract made by the president of the corporation, wherein it appeared that the defendant had received and retained benefits arising from the performance of the contract, with full knowledge of its terms and character, the court held that the retention of the benefits of the contract amounted to a ratification by the defendant, and that it was estopped from denying the authority of its officer to enter into the contract.

And in Blanck v. Commonwealth Amusement Corp. (1912) 19 Cal. App. 720, 127 Pac. 805, wherein it appeared that the directors of the defendant corporation entered into several contracts for the building of a theater to be conducted by the corporation, and for the supply of materials therefor, and with knowledge of the transactions the corporation accepted and retained the work done and the materials furnished, the court held that the company thereby ratified the contracts made by its officers, and in an action to foreclose mechanic's liens for the materials and services rendered, the defendant was estopped from avoiding the contracts on the ground of lack of authority of its directors so to contract.

Where a corporation's president entered into a contract with a construction company for work, labor, and material to be furnished in the erection of a building in which the corporation was interested, and the latter, knowing of the act of its officer, accepted the full benefits of the performance of the contract, the court held that it thereby ratified the contract of its officer, and was estopped from questioning his authority, saying: "One cannot knowingly accept the benefits of a contract made in its behalf, or in which it is interested, and refuse to be bound by its terms and conditions." E. Aigeltinger v. Burke (1917) 176 Cal. 621, 169 Pac. 373.

So in Bingel v. Brown (1908) 43 Colo. 281, 96 Pac. 449, wherein it appeared that a director of the defendant corporation contracted, without authority, for the construction by the plaintiff of an irrigating ditch for the use of the corporation, and pursuant to the contract the plaintiff performed the work required, and the same was accepted by the defendant with knowledge of the contract made by its directors, the court held that the acceptance and retention of the benefits of the unauthorized transaction ratified the same, and validated the act of its director ab initio.

In Tryon v. White & C. Co. (1892) 62 Conn. 161, 20 L.R.A. 291, 25 Atl. 712, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, a subcontractor, performed certain extra work in the construction of a building for the defendant corporation on the promise of a director of the latter that he would be paid therefor, and the corporation, knowing of the transaction, accepted the benefits of the work done by the plaintiff, the court held that the corporation ratified the contract of its director, and was bound thereby, saying: "It must be true that the acceptance of the benefits of the transaction imposes an obligation to assume its burdens."

Where the president of a corporation contracted, without authority, but with the knowledge of his company, for the building of a railroad for the corporate use, and, bonds having been issued for the construction of the road, the company received and applied the proceeds of their sale, the court held that the unauthorized act of the officer was impliedly ratified by the retention of the benefits of the contract, saying: "When the president of a corporation does, in its behalf and within the scope of its charter, an official act which requires the concurrence of the board of directors, and the board, knowing that he has done so, does not dissent within a reasonable time, it will be presumed to have ratified his act; and when an official act is performed by the general agent of a corporation, in its behalf and for a purpose authorized by its charter, and within the scope of his ordinary powers, and the corporation knowingly receives the benefit of the act without objection, it may be presumed to have authorized or ratified the contract of its agent." Leroy & C. Valley Air-Line R. Co. v. Sidell (1895) 13 C. C. A. 308, 26 U. S. App. 656, 66 Fed. 27.

In Maxville, W. & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Barnes (1892) 14 Ky. L. Rep. 431, wherein it appeared that a contract to construct certain works for the defendant corporation was made by its officers with the plaintiff who performed the work required, which was accepted by the corporation with knowledge of the contract under which it was performed, the court held that the contract was ratified by the acceptance and retention of its benefits, and therefore it was binding on the corporation.

In Michigan C. R. Co. v. Chicago, K. & S. R. Co. (1903) 132 Mich. 324, 93 N. W. 882, wherein it appeared that, without authority, the president of a corporation entered into a contract with the plaintiff railroad company, by which the latter was to rebuild a sidetrack to the corporation's plant for the use of the latter, and the corporation, knowing of the agreement, accepted and retained the benefits of the plaintiff's performance, it was held that the retention of the advantages of the unauthorized contract gave rise to an implied ratification thereof, estopping the corporation from questioning the authority of the contracting officer.

So, in Belzoni Oil Co. v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. (1908) 94 Miss. 58, 47 So. 468, wherein it appeared that the president of a corporation, by written agreement, contracted with a railroad company for the construction and use by it of a spur-track line to connect with the former's plant, the court held that, the railroad company having performed the agreement and the corporation having received the benefits derived therefrom, the corporation could not assert that it did not authorize the making of the contract.

In Morrell v. Long Island R. Co. (1888) 1 N. Y. Supp. 65, it appeared that the superintendent of the defendant railroad company agreed with the plaintiff to fill in a certain part of the defendant's right of way, contiguous to plaintiff's land, the latter to supply the necessary sand and gravel, and it further appeared that the plaintiff did supply the needed filling, but the corporation removed and used the same on another part of its lines. The court held that by taking the benefit of the contract it ratified the same, and was estopped from setting up the lack of authority of its officer-agent to enter into the contract, and thereby bind it.

So, in Pannebaker v. Tuscarora Valley R. Co. (1907) 219 Pa. 60, 67 Atl. 923, it appeared that the president of the defendant railroad company agreed with the plaintiff to construct a siding from the company's lines to the plaintiff's property, in consideration that the latter erect and maintain a sawmill for the purpose of cutting up lumber to be shipped over the defendant's road; and it further appeared that this contract was entered into and executed by both parties, to their mutual benefit. The court held that the railroad company could not assert the lack of authority of its officer to bind it by the contract, for, having accepted and retained the benefits derived therefrom, it ratified the same.

Where it appeared that the president of a corporation contracted for the construction of a bridge, and after the same was completed it was received and used by the corporation with full knowledge of the terms of the contract, the court held that the act of the officer was thereby ratified, saying: "When a contract is made by any agent of a corporation in its behalf, and for a purpose authorized by its charter, and the corporation receives the benefit of the contract without objection, it may be presumed to have authorized or ratified the contract of its agent." Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Keokuk & H. Bridge Co. (1888) 131 U. S. 371, 38 L. ed. 157, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 770.

In Brown v. Wright (1887) 25 Mo. App. 54, wherein it appeared that services and material were furnished the defendant corporation pursuant to a contract to erect a hotel for it, executed by the corporate president, and, knowing of the terms and character of the contract, the corporation received and retained the services rendered, and the materials furnished pursuant thereto, the court held that the corporation was liable under the contract, having accepted its benefits, and would not be heard to assert that its officer contracted without authority.

In Moody & M. Co. v. Methodist Episcopal Church (1898) 99 Wis. 49, 74 N. W. 572, wherein it appeared that the pastor of the defendant, a religious corporation, contracted without express authority for the repair and remodeling of the church owned by the corporation, and it further appeared that the latter, knowing through its trustees of the work being done on the church, allowed the same to progress, the court held that it effectually ratified the contract made by the pastor, having accepted and retained the benefits incident to its performance.

In Hartford Deposit Co. v. Calkins (1903) 109 Ill. App. 579, it appeared that the secretary-attorney of a corporation entered into a contract with the owner of property adjoining a building being constructed for the defendant corporation, whereby the defendant would be allowed to make certain changes in the wall of plaintiff's building to enable the construction of its own building to be completed, and in consideration thereof the defendant would hold the plaintiff harmless from all damages incurred. The corporation, subject to this agreement and with knowledge of its terms, completed the construction of its building accordingly. The court held that, having accepted the benefits of the contract made by its officer, the corporation impliedly ratified his action, and could not contend lack of authority on the part of the officer to bind the corporation.

See also Omaha Consol. Vinegar Co. v. Burns (1896) 49 Neb. 229, 68 N. W. 492, wherein the court said, relative to an alleged unauthorized contract entered into by the president of the defendant corporation with the plaintiff: "The defendant went on the premises of the company with the necessary machinery and implements to perform his part of the contract, began it, and continued it almost without ceasing, night and day, during three months or more, and in the work was directed and consulted with by the different officers of the company, and by and for the company was notified, in the manner provided for in the contract, to stop the work which he was doing under it, and moreover the company is here in this suit claiming relief under and by virtue of the terms and provisions of the agreement. There is sufficient here to constitute the contract binding on the company, whether it was so in its inception or not, which we do not here decide."

h. Issue, indorsement, or acceptance of commercial paper.

In an action on certain promissory notes indorsed, without authority, by the treasurer of a corporation, wherein it appeared that the company, with knowledge of its officer's acts, had received the proceeds of the transactions, the court held that it thereby acquiesced in and ratified the contracts of its officer, and could not question his authority to bind it by the transactions. First Nat. Bank v. American Bangor Slate Co. (1910) 229 Pa. 27, 77 Atl. 1100.

In SCOUTON v. STONY BROOK LUMBER Co. (reported herewith) ante, 1433, wherein it appeared that the defendant corporation received the proceeds of a note issued by its president, and in this action asserted as a defense that he was not authorized to execute the same, the court held that the corporation received and retained the benefits of the transaction, with knowledge of the same, and could not, therefore, repudiate the agency by which it was secured, saying: "A party cannot avail himself of the benefit of his agent's act and repudiate his authority; in the application of which it is held that a corporation which has received the benefit of a note irregularly issued cannot escape liability thereon by showing it was not executed by the proper officers."

In Wayne Title & T. Co. v. Schuylkill Electric R. Co. (1899) 191 Pa. 90, 43 Atl. 135, wherein it appeared that the treasurer of the defendant corporation issued a check which was indorsed by the president, who deposited in the bank a sum of money to meet the same, and the corporation knowingly received the benefit of the transaction, the court held that, conceding the acts of the officers were unauthorized, nevertheless the acceptance and retention of the benefits of their acts amounted to a ratification on the part of the corporation.

In Re Eastman Oil Co. (1916) 238 Fed. 416, it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation borrowed money from himself for the use of the company, and issued the latter's promissory notes payable to him as evidences of the debt; and that the stockholders and directors of the corporation, knowing of the transactions, received and applied the moneys so obtained to the corporate use. It was held that although no authority existed to justify the acts of the officer, yet the retention and use of the benefits procured from the transactions amounted to a ratification of the unauthorized acts, and the corporation was therefore estopped from claiming want of authority on the part of its officer-agent so to act.

In Pacific State Bank v. Coats (1913) 123 C. C. A. 634, 205 Fed. 613, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 846, wherein it appeared that the president and secretary of the defendant corporation issued a note for the purpose of obtaining a loan, and the corporation, with knowledge of the transaction, received the proceeds thereof and used the same for corporate purposes, it was held that the acceptance of the benefits of the contract ratified the same, the court saying: "Where money is received and used for the benefit of a corporation by its executive officers, who are also its trustees, the corporation ratifies the contract under which the money was paid, and it is estopped to deny the authority of its agents to make the same."

Where a corporation retained the benefits derived from the execution of a promissory note by its president, with knowledge of the unauthorized act, the court held that it thereby ratified the transaction. Phillips v. Sanger Lumber Co. (1900) 130 Cal. 431, 62 Pac. 749.

In Jones v. Evans (1907) 6 Cal. App. 88, 91 Pac. 532; Hutchison v. Evans (1907) 6 Cal. App. XIII., 92 Pac. 1135, wherein it appeared that the vice president of an alleged corporation indorsed certain promissory notes which were discounted for the benefit of the corporation, which, with the knowledge of the unauthorized transaction of its officer, accepted and retained the benefits so received, the court held that by so doing the defendant ratified the act of its vice president, and could not assert want of authority to contract on the part of the officer to evade liability incurred thereby.

In Commercial Secur. Co. v. Modesto Drug Co. (1919) — Cal. App. —, 184 Pac. 964, where the president and manager of a corporation executed notes in connection with an advertising contract, without complying with the by-laws, which required the approval of the board of directors, but the person who, together with the president, owned practically all the stock, made no objection and recognized the contract after he had purchased the president's stock, it was held that even if there was not a technical ratification within the meaning of the code, the corporation was at least estopped, by accepting the benefits of the contract, to deny its binding force.

In Ocilla Southern R. Co. v. Morton (1913) 13 Ga. App. 504, 79 S. E. 480, it appeared that a corporation knowingly received the benefits of a draft executed by one signing as its president. The court held that the corporation thereby ratified the contract of its officer, and could not assert its lack of authority to issue the draft.

So where it appeared that a corporation, knowing of the unauthorized issuance of certain notes by its president, received the benefit of the proceeds thereof, the court held that it ratified the acts of its officer by accepting the fruits of his unauthorized contract, and it could not question his authority so to contract. Flodin v. W. H. Lutes Co. (1915) 191 Ill. App. 195.

In Marion Trust Co. v. Crescent Loan & Invest. Co. (1901) 27 Ind. App. 451, 87 Am. St. Rep. 257, 61 N. E. 688, wherein it appeared that the officers of the defendant corporation, acting without authority, gave notes of the corporation for the purpose of borrowing money, and the company, with full knowledge of the unauthorized contract, accepted and retained the benefits of the contract, the court held that by so doing it ratified the acts of its officers, and gave to the transactions the validity of contracts entered into pursuant to a vote of the board of directors.

It was held in Tilden v. Goldy Mach. Co. (1908) 9 Cal. App. 9, 98 Pac. 39, that a corporation, having received the benefits of a non-negotiable note indorsed, and therefore guaranteed, by its duly appointed executive committee, ratified the act of the committee, and was estopped from questioning its authority.

In Marbourg v. Lloyd (1879) 21 Kan. 545, the court held that the authority of a treasurer of a corporation to indorse and sell a note, the proceeds of which were accepted and retained by the corporation, could not be questioned, saying: "If there was any want of proof of his authority to make the transfer in the first instance, the subsequent acts of the corporation ratified all he did. The note was indorsed and discounted for the benefit of the corporation, and the proceeds thereof were used in the business of the company. We must assume that all of this was done with full knowledge of the action of the treasurer."

So, in First Nat. Bank v. G. V. B. Min. Co. (1898) 89 Fed. 439, modified in (1899) 36 C. C. A. 633, 95 Fed. 23, the court held that a corporation was estopped from denying the authority of its president, and thereby evading its contractual obligations, where it appeared that the officer issued notes of the corporation for the purpose of borrowing money for the corporate use, and the company, with knowledge of the transaction, accepted and used the moneys so obtained.

In Topeka Capital Co. v. March (1900) 10 Kan. App. 40, 61 Pac. 876, wherein it appeared that the manager of the defendant corporation issued without authority, but with the knowledge of the corporate officers, a promissory note, the proceeds of which were accepted and retained by the defendant, it was held that the corporation, having received the benefits of the contract made by its manager, could not deny his authority so to act, but by the retention of the fruits of the transaction it ratified and validated the same, and could not escape liability incurred by the contract.

In Paducah Wharfboat Co. v. Mechanics Trust & Sav. Bank (1915) 164 Ky. 729, 176 S. W. 190, it appeared that the plaintiff loaned money to the secretary of the defendant corporation on notes executed by that officer, and the money borrowed was deposited to the credit of the corporation, which thereby received the benefit of the alleged unauthorized act of its secretary. The court held that the corporation, having retained the money borrowed from the plaintiff, thereby ratified the execution of the notes by its officer, and was estopped from claiming his want of authority to act in order to evade payment to the plaintiff.

Where, in Patten v. Moses (1861) 49 Me. 255, it appeared that one acting as the president of a corporation indorsed a promissory note, the proceeds of which the corporation received and retained, knowing of the transaction, the court held that the acceptance of the benefits bound the corporation, which could not evade liability by asserting lack of its officer's authority to make the contract.

In Planters Bank v. Sharp (1844) 4 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 75, 43 Am. Dec. 470, wherein it appeared that a note was discounted by an insufficient number of directors of a bank, but the bank, with knowledge of the transaction, accepted and retained the benefits of the discount, the court held that the contract was thereby ratified, and became binding on all the parties.

In Watts Mercantile Co. v. Buchanan (1908) 92 Miss. 540, 46 So. 66, it appeared that the general manager of the defendant corporation issued certain promissory notes to secure the purchase price of stock bought and retained by the corporation with full knowledge of the transaction. The court held that the facts clearly constituted a ratification of the officer's contract, the corporation having knowingly received and retained the benefits of the transaction.

Where it appeared that the trustees of a Masonic lodge issued a promissory note, the proceeds of which were received knowingly by the corporation, the court held that, having received and retained the consideration of the contract, the lodge thereby ratified it. Note: It does not appear in the present case whether or not the lodge was incorporated, but, as stated by the court, it is not material to the holding. Mayer v. Old (1894) 57 Mo. App. 639.

In Moss v. Rossie Lead Min. Co. (1843) 5 Hill (N. Y.) 137, it was held that the defendant corporation ratified the act of its president and secretary in issuing the notes of the corporation without authority, by accepting and retaining the consideration for the notes.

So, in First Nat. Bank v. Badger Lumber Co. (1895) 60 Mo. App. 255, it appeared that the manager of the defendant corporation issued to the plaintiff a corporate note and sent the proceeds thereof to the defendant, to be applied on an account owing by him. Subsequently, finding out the terms and the nature of the transaction, the corporation still retained and applied the proceeds thereof to its own use. The court held that, by accepting and retaining the benefits of the contract, the corporation had ratified it, and could not escape liability by alleging want of authority on the part of its officers to act.

It was held in Magnolia Compress & Warehouse Co. v. St. Louis Cash Register Co. (1919) — Mo. App. —, 210 S. W. 125, that a corporation receiving and retaining the benefits of a note issued by its general manager could not deny his authority to issue the same, having full knowledge of the alleged unauthorized transaction.

In Parsons v. Guarantee Invest. Co. (1895) 64 Mo. App. 32, wherein it appeared that the defendant corporation received and retained, knowingly, the benefits of a note issued without authority by its president, the court held that it could not deny his authority to make the note, as his contract was ratified by the acceptance and retention of the benefits thereof, with knowledge of the unauthorized transaction.

Where, with the knowledge of the corporation's directors, its president and secretary had indorsed a multitude of commercial paper, the benefits of which were received by the corporation, the court held that not only must actual authority so to act on the part of the officers be implied, but also, the corporation having received and retained the fruits of the transactions, the contracts of indorsement, even though unauthorized, were ratified, and the corporation, therefore, must be held liable. Blake v. Domestic Mfg. Co. (1897) 64 N. J. Eq. 480, 38 Atl. 241.

In McKinley v. Mineral Hill Consol. Min. Co. (1907) 46 Wash. 162, 89 Pac. 495, wherein it appeared that the president and general manager of a corporation, with the knowledge of the other officers and directors, executed a promissory note signed in behalf of the company as maker, and in consideration of money loaned to the corporation, and services rendered in its behalf, the court held that, having received the consideration of the contract with knowledge of the source from which it came, the corporation ratified the act of its officer-agent, and would not be heard to claim his want of authority so to contract, in order to evade liability thereunder.

Where it appeared that a corporation received and accepted payments on a note accepted pursuant to a contract made without authority by its principal officer, the court held that it thereby ratified his act, it having been shown that the corporation received the benefits of the contract with knowledge of its character and terms. Emmet v. Reed (1853) 8 N. Y. 312.

In Sheridan Electric-Light Co. v. Chatham Nat. Bank (1889) 52 Hun, 575, 5 N. Y. Supp. 529, it appeared that a trustee, given a power of attorney by a corporation, indorsed for discount certain negotiable paper, and that, with knowledge of the transaction, the corporation received and retained the proceeds of the discount. The corporation claiming that the trustee acted without authority, the court held that the retention of the benefits flowing from the executed contract constituted a ratification of the same, saying: "The company, through the indorsements, received this sum of $10,000, and it was afterwards appropriated to its use and benefit; and it could not receive and dispose of this fund, knowing generally, as the trustees and the executive committee did, that it was obtained in this manner, and afterwards disaffirm the transactions through which the money was secured."

In Hubbard v. Syenite-Trap Rock Co. (1917) 178 App. Div. 531, 165 N. Y. Supp. 486, it was held error to refuse the admission, as evidence, of proof that a corporation had knowingly received the benefits of an unauthorized note issued by its treasurer, the court saying: "If this fact had been proven, under well-settled authority the corporation could not assert the lack of authority in the treasurer to sign the note."

Where it appeared that the president of a corporation issued without authority, and in a manner contrary to the corporate by-laws, negotiable notes, and proceeds thereof were received and retained by the company with knowledge of their source, the court held that the notes were valid, and that the president's authority to execute the same could not be attacked by the corporation, it having received and retained the fruits of the unauthorized transaction. Bigelow Co. v. Automatic Gas Producer Co. (1907) 56 Misc. 389, 107 N. Y. Supp. 894.

In Milbank v. De Riesthal (1894) 82 Hun, 537, 31 N. Y. Supp. 522, it was held that a corporation was liable on notes issued by its president, although the secretary did not join therein as required by the by-laws, where it appeared that the corporation received and retained the benefits of the notes so executed, with knowledge of the defect in the officer's act.

Where it appeared that the president and secretary of a corporation issued its promissory note under seal, and the corporation subsequently received the proceeds of the same with knowledge of its execution, the court held that it became bound thereby regardless of the lack of authority of its officers to enter into the transaction. Bullen v. Milwaukee Trading Co. (1901) 109 Wis. 41, 85 N. W. 115.

And in Phillips v. Interstate Land Co. (1918) 176 N. C. 514, 97 S. E. 417, wherein it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation, acting without authority, issued a promissory note for the payment of the purchase price of a new automobile to be used in the defendant's business, and the latter, with knowledge of the transaction, accepted and used the automobile for which the note had been given, the court held that it thereby ratified the contract of its officer, saying: "The defendant needed the new automobile in its business, and retained it. The law will not allow defendant to repudiate the act of its president, and at the same time retain the property for which the note was given."

So, it was held in Knox City Mill Co. v. Warren (1911) — Tex. Civ. App.

—, 141 S. W. 1007, that the acceptance and retention of the benefits of notes by a corporation, issued by its general manager, estopped it from evading liability on the ground that he had no authority to enter into the transactions and bind the company, as, under the circumstances, his authority so to act must be implied.

Where it appeared that a treasurer of a corporation received a draft of $1,000, with the knowledge of the company, as a part payment for the assignment of patent rights owned by the corporation, and applied the sum so received to the corporate purposes, the court held that the acceptance and retention of the money so received ratified the acts of the treasurer. New England Car-Spring Co. v. Union India Rubber Co. (1857) 4 Blatchf. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 10,153.

In Sesnon v. Lindeberg (1911) 66 Wash. 1, 118 Pac. 900, wherein it appeared that the secretary of a corporation executed its note to secure the purchase price of stock bought and retained by the corporation with knowledge of the transaction, the court held that the retention by the company of the stock so purchased constituted a ratification of the secretary's act.

So, in Williams v. S. M. Smith Ins. Agency (1916) 79 W. Va. 16, 90 S. E. 393, former appeal (1915) 75 W. Va. 494, 84 S. E. 235, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 813, it was held that, if the acts of an officer of a corporation in issuing its notes were done without authority, nevertheless the corporation was bound thereby, where it appeared that it received and retained the proceeds of the notes with knowledge of their execution.

In Third Nat. Bank v. Laboring-man's Mercantile & Mfg. Co. (1904) 56 W. Va. 446, 49 S. E. 544, wherein it appeared that the defendant corporation retained the proceeds of a note after receiving knowledge that the same were obtained from the execution by its president, without authority, of a promissory note discounted by the plaintiff bank, the court held that it thereby ratified and adopted as its own the act of its officer and agent, saying: "The directors of the defendant company had, or should have had, notice of the execution of the note in controversy, and of its disposition to the bank by Murphy [its president], by reason of the present action, brought upon that note. But the company, having then received the benefit of the transaction, repudiated it, and did not, when sued, nor since that time, return to the plaintiff the money thus received and used by it. The failure of the defendant to return the money so received, when its receipt had become known to its directors, was and is a confirmation of the transaction."

See also Hitchings v. St. Louis, N. O. & O. C. Transp. Co. (1893) 68 Hun, 33, 22 N. Y. Supp. 719, wherein the court held that where the president of a corporation, without authority, discounted a note, and that the corporation received the benefit thereof, a subsequent transfer of the note by the officer to a third party was valid and binding.

In Martin v. Inter-State Lumber Co. (1918) 260 Pa. 218, 103 Atl. 613, the court stated, as one of the circumstances under which a corporation may be held liable on notes executed by its officers without authority, the receipt by the corporation of the benefit of the proceeds of the notes. In the instant case, however, there was no ratification by the retention of benefits, no benefits having come to the corporation by reason of the transaction.

And see Ege v. Centerville Teleph. Co. (1914) 33 S. D. 648, 147 N. W. 70, wherein it is said: "But if the board had acted without authority in making the purchase of the telephone plant, and executing and delivering the company's note in part payment therefor, the retention and use of the telephone property for so long a period of time would amount to a ratification of the contract, and the plaintiff was entitled to judgment."

So, in Bridgewater Cheese Factory Co. v. Murphy (1894) 26 Can. S. C. 443, 26 Ont. Rep. 327, 23 Ont. App. Rep. 66, the court held that a corporation must affirm or disaffirm a note executed in its behalf, without authority, by its president, where it appeared that the proceeds thereof were credited to the company, stating that the corporation could not retain the benefits of the transaction and at the same time disaffirm the same on the ground that its officer had no authority to bind it.

i. Issue of mortgage or trust deed.

In Love v. Metropolitan Church Asso. (1913) 184 Ill. App. 102, wherein it appeared that the president and secretary of the defendant corporation mortgaged certain real estate owned by the company, and that the proceeds of the mortgage were accepted by the corporation, with knowledge of the transaction, and used to secure certain notes given for the purchase price of the real estate, the court held that the act of the officers of the corporation was ratified by the retention and use of the benefits derived therefrom.

So, in Doerr v. Fandango Lumber Co. (1916) 31 Cal. App. 318, 160 Pac. 406, the court held that a corporation ratified the unauthorized act of its president in executing a mortgage as security for a loan to the corporation, where it appeared that the company, knowing of the transaction of its officer, received the money so loaned to it and applied the same to the corporate uses, saying: "The defendant . . . company, having received, retained, and used for the purposes of its business the money, to secure the repayment of which the mortgage was given, is, and upon a familiar equitable principle should be, estopped from denying the validity of the obligation."

In Shafer v. Spruks (1913) 140 C. C. A. 504, 225 Fed. 480, wherein it appeared that corporate officers issued bonds and mortgages, with the knowledge of the directors and shareholders, for the purpose of securing loans of money for the use of the corporation, and the moneys so secured were received and retained by the corporation, the court held that the retention of the benefits of the transactions constituted a ratification of the officers' acts, and the company was estopped from denying their authority, saying that it could not "enjoy the fruit of the acts, and disavow that to which the fruit owes its existence."

In Frank v. Hicks (1894) 4 Wyo. 502, 35 Pac. 475, 1025, wherein it appeared that certain officers of a corporation executed a trust deed to secure the payment of bonds issued by the corporation, and the latter enjoyed the benefits and proceeds of this transaction with knowledge of its terms and nature, the court held that it thereby ratified the act of its officers and could not question their authority in order to evade liability under the deed.

In Clark v. Elmendorf (1904) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 78 S. W. 538, wherein it appeared that the president of a corporation executed, without authority, a deed of trust to secure the payment of certain promissory notes, and the corporation knowingly received and used the moneys for which the deed was executed, the court held that its action in so doing satisfied the officer's unauthorized contract.

In Bank of Garfield v. Clark (1912) 138 Ga. 798, 76 S. E. 95, it was held that where it appeared that officers of a corporation, without authority, procured money upon the transfer of a title to land to secure the loan, and the corporation received the money so procured, knowing of the transaction, it could not retain the benefits of the contract and avoid liability thereunder by setting up the invalidity of the transfer of title on the ground of lack of authority of its officer-agents so to act, as the retention of the benefits of the contract ratified the acts of the contracting officers.

So, in Murray v. Beal (1901) 23 Utah, 548, 65 Pac. 726, wherein it appeared that the directors of a corporation informally executed a trust deed as security for the loan of a sum of money, and the corporation, with knowledge of the transaction, accepted and used the money so obtained for corporate purposes, the court held that its action in so doing constituted a ratification of the transaction.

Where it appeared that the officers of a corporation, acting without express authority, executed a chattel mortgage on the corporate property, and, knowing of the transaction, the corporation received and retained the benefits of the mortgage, the court held that having received the full benefits of the transaction the corporation will be presumed to have authorized or ratified the acts of its officers. Edelhoff v. Horner-Miller Straw Goods Mfg. Co. (1898) 86 Md. 595, 39 Atl. 314.

So, in Currie v. Bowman (1894) 25 Or. 364, 35 Pac. 848, wherein it appeared that the president of a corporation executed, without authority, certain chattel mortgages on corporate property to secure moneys borrowed and used by the corporation, the court held that the use and retention of the benefits of the transaction by the corporation, after acquiring knowledge of its character and terms, effected a ratification of the unauthorized contract of its officer.

In American Nat. Bank v. Wheeler-Adams Auto Co. (1913) 31 S. D. 524, 141 N. W. 396, wherein it appeared that the president and secretary of the defendant corporation, who apparently exercised sole management of the corporate business, executed chattel mortgages covering certain property of the corporation, and the latter knowingly received and retained the proceeds of the transaction, the court held that the corporation could not deny the validity of the transactions, having accepted and retained the proceeds thereof.

In Dexter Horton & Co. v. Long (1891) 2 Wash. 435, 26 Am. St. Rep. 867, 27 Pac. 271, wherein it appeared that the president and secretary of a corporation, acting without formal authority, executed a mortgage on the corporate property to secure an advance of money to it, and it further appeared that the money was received and used by the corporation with full knowledge of its source, the court held that by accepting and retaining the benefits of the transaction the corporation indorsed the same, and thereby gave to the mortgage the same validity as though it had been authorized im-primis by a formal act of the board of trustees.

In Witter v. Grand Rapids Flouring Mill Co. (1891) 78 Wis. 543, 47 N. W. 729, wherein it appeared that certain officers of the defendant corporation executed a mortgage on the corporate property and delivered the same to the plaintiff to secure a sum of money borrowed in behalf of the corporation, and it further appeared that with knowledge of this transaction the corporation received and used the money so obtained, the court held that it could not question the authority of its officers to enter into the transaction, having accepted and retained the benefits of the same.

See also Simis v. Davidson (1887) 22 Jones & S. (N. Y.) 235, wherein it was held to be error to refuse to admit in evidence a mortgage executed by the president of the defendant corporation, where it appeared that the money obtained was used for the corporate purposes, the court holding that under the facts the jury might have found that the officer had implied authority so to contract.

j. Issue or receipt of bond, debenture, or certificate of deposit.

In McCormick v. Unity Co. (1908) 142 Ill. App. 159, affirmed in (1909) 239 Ill. 306, 87 N. E. 924, it was held that a corporation ratified the acts of its officers in issuing certain bonds, the proceeds of which were accepted and retained by the corporation with knowledge of the transactions, and therefore the company was estopped from asserting that the issuing of the bonds was unauthorized.

So, in Tyrell v. Cairo & St. L. R. Co. (1879) 7 Mo. App. 294, the court held that the stockholders of a corporation ratified the contracts of the directors of the company by receiving, with knowledge, the benefits of certain bonds issued by the directors, saying: "As other principals are held liable for the acts, even for the frauds, of their agents, done in the course of the principal's business, it is not easy to see why stockholders who stand by, as did the stockholders here, refusing to hold a meeting, and availing themselves of the benefits of the directors' actions, should be allowed to repudiate the corresponding burden. Ample time was given to the stockholders here concerned to meet and disown the action of the agents whom they had selected to carry on their business, and their ratification is not less effectual than if a meeting had been held and a formal vote taken. Upon them was imposed the legal obligation to act, and they refused to do so."

And in Pomeroy v. New York Smelting & Ref. Co. (1901) — N. J. Eq. —, 48 Atl. 395, wherein it appeared that the officers of a corporation, having been authorized to execute certain mortgages, incidentally issued bonds to secure the same, the court held that not only was the power to issue the bonds incidental to the execution of the mortgages, and therefore authorized, but also, conceding that the officers acted without authority, it must be held that the corporation ratified their acts by receiving knowingly the benefits incident thereto, saying: "The company received the consideration for the bonds (either money or property transferred), retained and used it, and paid interest on the bonds for over four years. The company having the power to execute the bonds, and its proper officers having actually executed and delivered them, the omission of a formal resolution authorizing their execution, if there was such omission, is, under the circumstances, no defense to the bond."

In Re Magdalena Steam Nav. Co. (1860) Johns. V. C. 690, 70 Eng. Reprint, 597, 29 L. J. Ch. N. S. 667, 6 Jur. (N. S.) 975, 8 Week. Rep. 329, wherein it appeared that directors of a corporation, acting without the requisite authority, issued debentures of the corporation to secure an advance of money, and the money so secured was received and used by the corporation, with knowledge of the directors' acts, the court held that the receipt and retention of the benefits of the transaction constituted a ratification of the directors' contract.

In Fidelity Ins. Co. v. German Sav. Bank (1905) 127 Iowa, 591, 103 N. W. 958, it appeared that the president and secretary of a corporation accepted, without authority, certain bank stock and certificates of deposit as payment of a debt owing to the corporation, and the latter, knowing of the transaction, its nature and terms, accepted the stock and certificates and treated them as part of its assets. The court held that the corporation ratified the unauthorized acts of its officers by receiving and retaining the benefits of the transaction.

In Love v. Export Storage Co. (1906) 74 C. C. A. 155, 143 Fed. 1, wherein it appeared that the defendant's president placed property of the corporation in a warehouse, and pledged the warehouse receipt as security for the discount of notes placed with the plaintiff, and the moneys so received were used by the company for the corporate purposes with full knowledge on the part of the shareholders of the transaction, the court held that the retention of the benefits implied a ratification of the president's transactions, and the corporation could not thereafter evade liability on the notes by disclaiming the authority of its officer-agent to act.

Where it appeared that an officer of a corporation pledged certain bonds for the purpose of securing a loan, and that the money so received was retained by the corporation with full knowledge of the transaction, the court held that by receiving and retaining the benefits of the pledge the corporation ratified the act of its officer. Prentiss Tool & Supply Co. v. Godchaux (1895) 13 C. C. A. 420, 30 U. S. App. 68, 66 Fed. 234.

In Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank v. Pacific R. Co. (1897) 117 Cal. 332, 49 Pac. 197, the court held that where a corporation received money obtained from the pledge of bonds by its president, who was authorized only to issue bonds, the corporation ratified the unauthorized transaction by the acceptance of the benefits, and that the officer must be presumed to have had the power to hypothecate the bonds as well as issue them.

In Darst v. Gale (1876) 83 Ill. 136, it appeared that the secretary of the defendant corporation, without authority, pledged certain bonds of the corporation, and the latter, with full knowledge of the transaction, received and applied the benefits thereof to the corporate uses. The court held that the defendant could not question the authority of its officer-agent, for by accepting the benefits it impliedly ratified the contract made by him.

In Bezou v. Pike (1871) 23 La. Ann. 788, wherein it appeared that the president of a corporation pledged the stock of the corporation as security for the discount of certain corporate notes, and the proceeds of the discounted notes were received and retained by the corporation with knowledge of the president's acts, it was held that the act of the corporation in knowingly receiving the benefits of the authorized contract of its officer ratified the same.

So, in Hubbard v. Camperdown Mills (1887) 26 S. C. 581, 2 S. E. 576, wherein it appeared that the president of a corporation pledged its bonds to secure an advance of money needed by the corporation, which was accepted and used by the latter with full cognizance of the transaction, the court held that under the circumstances the company was bound by the acts of its officer, having received the money obtained thereby.

In Hughes v. First Nat. Bank (1885) 110 Pa. 428, 1 Atl. 417, wherein it appeared that the cashier of the defendant bank pledged certain bonds in the bank's possession for the benefit and with the knowledge of the bank, and it further appeared that, the pledgee having forced a sale of the bonds and the bank being unable to account to the true owner for the same, this action was brought to recover the value of the bonds. The court held that the defendant corporation, having acquiesced in the act of its officer and accepted and retained the benefits of his fraudulent transaction, had thereby ratified the same and was liable thereon, saying: "The bank cannot retain the fruits of the crime and repudiate the fraud of its agent."

In McDougall v. Hazelton Tripod-Boiler Co. (1898) 31 C. C. A. 487, 60

U. S. App. 209, 88 Fed. 217, the court held that the defendant corporation could not question the authority of its president in borrowing sums of money for corporate purposes, on the ground that he exceeded his authority, where it appeared that the corporation, with knowledge of the transaction, accepted and retained the moneys so received, and by so doing ratified the alleged unauthorized act of its officer.

And in Fourth Nat. Bank v. Camden Lumber Co. (1905) 142 Fed. 257, it was held that a corporation could not repudiate an indebtedness created by its president on the ground that the instruments procuring the same were entered into without authority by the officer, where it appeared that the company, with full knowledge and acquiescence in the unauthorized act, accepted and retained its fruits and advantages.

In Garmire v. McDonough & Co. (1916) 197 Ill. App. 527, and Sargent v. McDonough & Co. (1916) 197 Ill. App. 523, the court held that a corporation was liable for money borrowed by an officer without authority, but applied to the corporate use with knowledge by the corporation of the transaction, for the receipt and retention of the benefits of the transaction constituted a ratification of the officer's acts.

So, in Bossert v. Geis (1914) 57 Ind. App. 384, 107 N. E. 95, it was held that a corporation could not question the authority of its president to borrow money for the corporate purposes, where it appeared that the company received the benefits of the alleged unauthorized contracts of its officer, and used the money so received for the corporate uses with full knowledge of the transaction, the court holding that the retention of the benefits of the contract ratified it.

Where it appeared that an officer of a corporation borrowed money for the payment of corporate debts, and the company, knowing the terms of its agent's contract, accepted the benefits thereof, the court held that the use and retention of the benefits of the contract constituted an adoption of the same, and precluded the claim on the part of the corporation that its officer was without authority to make the contract. Humphrey v. Patrons Mercantile Asso. (1879) 50 Iowa, 607.

In Halstead v. Dodge (1884) 1 How. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 170, a corporation was held liable on a contract executed without authority by its president, whereby the corporation borrowed and received money which was used by it, with knowledge of the transaction, for the corporate purposes.

In Mohrfeld v. Second German Bldg. Asso. (1900) 194 Pa. 488, 45 Atl. 335, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff loaned money to the defendant corporation, and the money so loaned was accepted by its secretary, who also made payments of interest thereon by orders, drawn by him, on the company, the court upheld a verdict of the jury finding that the corporation had acquiesced in and ratified the acts of its treasurer by receiving, retaining, and using for the corporate purposes the money so received by its officer.

And in Episcopal Charitable Soc. v. Episcopal Church (1823) 1 Pick. (Mass.) 372, it was held that where the officers of a religious corporation borrowed money on the note of the corporation, and the money so procured was received and used for the corporate purposes, an action would lie for the recovery of the money, for, having accepted the benefits of the transaction, the corporation could not evade liability thereunder by showing want of authority to make the contract on the part of its officers.

In Kirwin v. Washington Match Co. (1905) 37 Wash. 285, 79 Pac. 928, it was held that an allegation in a complaint was sufficient, which stated that money borrowed by agents of a corporation, acting without authority, was received and used by the corporation through the president and general manager, the court holding that the alleged unauthorized acts of the agents were ratified by the acceptance and retention of the benefits. It does not appear in the present case whether the agents who executed the contract were officers.

In Troup's Case (1860) 29 Beav.

353, 54 Eng. Reprint, 664, the court held that a bona fide lender of money could recover from a corporation money borrowed by its directors without authority, but received and used by the corporation for its benefit.

So, in Hoare's Case (1861) 30 Beav. 225, 54 Eng. Reprint, 874, 2 Johns. & H. 229, the court held, on the authority of the decision in Troup's Case (Eng.) supra, that a corporation was liable for money borrowed by its directors, acting without authority, and received by the corporation for its benefit.

In two recent cases (Armour & Co. v. R. Rosenberg & Sons Co. (1918) 36 Cal. App. 773, 173 Pac. 404, and Cudahy Packing Co. v. R. Rosenberg & Sons Co. (1918) 36 Cal. App. 818, 173 Pac. 406), wherein it appeared that the defendant's manager executed certain guaranties of payment of the debt of a third party, without the authority of the defendant corporation, which, however, knowingly received and retained a consideration for its contract of guaranty, the court held that, having received benefits under the contract, the defendant had ratified the act of its officer, and could not be permitted to repudiate the burdens resulting therefrom.

Where a contract of guaranty for the payment of a promissory note, executed by the president of a corporation without authority, was beneficial to the corporation, and it received and retained, knowingly, the benefits of the transaction, the court held that it would not be heard to assert the lack of authority of its president to execute the contract and thereby avoid liability, for by receiving and retaining the benefits of the unauthorized contract of its officer it impliedly ratified the same. Lake Street Elev. R. Co. v. Carmichael (1899) 82 Ill. App. 344, affirmed in (1900) 184 Ill. 348, 56 N. E. 872.

And in Hunt v. Northwestern Mortg. Trust Co. (1902) 16 S. D. 241, 92 N. W. 23, wherein it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation transferred to the plaintiff, and guaranteed payment of, a note owned by the corporation, and it further appeared that the company received and retained the benefits of the transaction, the court held that it was liable thereon, regardless of the officer's original lack of authority to execute the contract, as it had accepted and retained the proceeds derived therefrom, thus ratifying his unauthorized act.

Where it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation executed, without authority, a contract with the plaintiff, whereby it was agreed that the corporation should assume the debts of its predecessor, which were owing to the plaintiff, in consideration that the latter continue to purchase coal mined by the defendant, and, pursuant to this agreement, the plaintiff did continue to patronize the defendant, and the latter accepted, with knowledge of the agreement, the benefits of his patronage, the court held that it thereby ratified the contract made by its president, regardless of his original lack of authority to incur the liability. Curtis v. Natalie Anthracite Coal Co. (1903) 89 App. Div. 61, 85 N. Y. Supp. 413, affirmed in (1905) 181 N. Y. 543, 73 N. E. 1122.

n. Agreement to extend time of payment or stay execution.

In Pettengill v. Blackman (1917) 30 Idaho, 241, 164 Pac. 358, wherein it appeared that certain officer-directors of a banking institution gave to the holder of certificates of deposit a mortgage to secure the payment of the same, in consideration of an extension of time of payment, and, knowing of this transaction, the corporation received the benefits of the extension of time, and did not dissent from the contract, the court held that under the facts the corporation had ratified the unauthorized contract of its officers.

In Dedrick v. Ormsby Land & Mortg. Co. (1899) 12 S. D. 59, 80 N. W. 153, it appeared that the defendant corporation's secretary contracted for an extension of a mortgage held by the plaintiff on the corporate property, in consideration of a guaranty by the corporation of the payment of the principal; and it further appeared that the corporation, knowing of this agreement, accepted the benefits thereof, in the nature of the extension of time. The court held that the original authority, or lack of authority, of the secretary so to bind the company, was immaterial, as the latter ratified all that was done by accepting the benefits derived therefrom.

In Lyndon Sav. Bank v. International Co. (1905) 78 Vt. 169, 112 Am. St. Rep. 900, 62 Atl. 50, wherein it appeared that the president and general manager of the defendant corporation entered into an agreement for the extension of a corporate note, which at the time was due, and that the corporation subsequently, and with knowledge of the transaction, received the benefits of the extension of time, the court held that it could not question the authority of its officers to make the contract, having acquired and retained the benefits derived from the same, and thereby ratified it.

In St. Clair v. Rutledge (1902) 115 Wis. 583, 95 Am. St. Rep. 964, 92 N. W. 234, the court found (although it was not the controlling factor in determining the case) that the acceptance of the benefits accruing to a corporation from having its taxes paid on certain land, in consideration of an extension of time granted by its president to a purchaser of standing timber thereon, to cut and remove the same, constituted a ratification of the act and an estoppel to question his authority.

In Porter v. Farmers & M. Sav. Bank (1909) 143 Iowa, 629, 120 N. W. 633, it appeared that the plaintiff owed the defendant bank a debt which was secured by a mortgage on certain real property of the plaintiff. The latter, finding himself unable to pay the debt, entered into an agreement with the defendant bank's cashier, whereby he conveyed the property mortgaged, by a quitclaim deed, to the bank as a payment of the debt, with the understanding and agreement with the corporation's officer that he should have a year in which he might redeem the property by a cash payment of the amount owing, or the furnishing of a purchaser for the property. In accordance with this agreement, the bank accepted the deed and retained the property, but subsequently refused to reconvey in accordance therewith, when the plaintiff offered a money payment. In this action to compel the reconveyance of the property by the bank, the court held that the corporation could not deny the authority of the cashier to make the contract while receiving and retaining the benefits thereof, for by so doing it ratified the alleged unauthorized contract made by its officer-agent.

In Drescher v. Fulham (1898) 11 Colo. App. 62, 52 Pac. 685, it was held that, where a corporation accepted the benefits of a consideration for an extension of time of the payment of a note owing to the corporation, it could not assert the lack of authority of its secretary to grant the extension as an element constituting an invalid agreement.

In Burrill v. Nahant Bank (1840) 2 Met. (Mass.) 163, 35 Am. Dec. 395, it appeared that the directors of the defendant bank authorized two of their number to execute a conveyance to the plaintiff of the bank property, in consideration of which the plaintiff agreed not to put into circulation certain bank bills on which he had recovered judgment. In this action it was contended that the two directors appointed exceeded their authority, in that they mortgaged the property to the plaintiff instead of conveying, but it appearing that the corporation, knowing of the transaction, had accepted and acted upon a bond of defeasance which referred to the deed, the court held that the facts showed a ratification of the mortgage.

So also, in Simmons v. Shaw (1899) 172 Mass. 516, 52 N. E. 1087, wherein it appeared that the president of a corporation executed a supersedeas bond for the purpose of obtaining a stay of execution and a review of a proceeding in which the corporation was interested, the court held that the act of the corporation in availing itself of the stay of execution, and the prosecution, with knowledge of the officer's transaction, of the petition thereon for more than a year, constituted a ratification of the officer's act.

In Farmers' & Citizens' Bank v. Sherman (1860) 6 Bosw. (N. Y.) 181, affirmed in (1865) 38 N. Y. 69, wherein it appeared that several of the directors of a banking corporation executed a contract by which the bank agreed to return several notes held against the other party, in consideration of which he was to deliver certain quantities of lumber to a purchaser secured by the bank, and it appeared, further, that the bank, with knowledge of the contract, accepted the property when delivered, the court held that, equitably, the corporation was estopped to deny the authority of its officers to make the agreement, for the acceptance of the benefits of the contract constituted a ratification and adoption of their acts.

So, in Kneeland v. Gilman (1869) 24 Wis. 39, wherein it appeared that the attorney, comptroller, and treasurer of a municipal corporation executed a compromise agreement in its behalf, and it further appeared that pursuant to, and with knowledge of, this agreement the city accepted and retained its benefits, the court held that it thereby recognized the authority of its agents to make the agreement, and ratified the same, giving to it the same validity as though it had been authorized by the formal vote of the city council.

Where the attorney of a corporation effected a compromise in a pending litigation, and the proceeds thereof were received knowingly by the corporation, the court held that the acceptance of the sum in compromise ratified the act of the attorney. Wetherbee v. Fitch (1886) 117 Ill. 67, 7 N. E. 513.

And in Trenton Street R. Co. v. Lawlor (1908) 74 N. J. Eq. 828, 71 Atl. 234, 74 Atl. 668, the court held that where a general manager of a corporation entered into a compromise of a litigation, and the corporation accepted the benefits of the transaction, its action in so doing was tantamount to a ratification of the compromise.

Where it appeared that a corporation received a check, knowing the same to be the proceeds of a settlement effected by a committee composed of its officers and directors, the court held that the acceptance of the fruits of the transaction amounted to a ratification, and created an estoppel to deny the authority of the committee to make the settlement. Merchants' Union Barb Wire Co. v. Rice (1886) 70 Iowa, 14, 29 N. E. 784.

So, in Peterson v. Elholm (1906) 130 Wis. 1, 109 N. W. 76, rehearing denied in (1906) 130 Wis. 9, 109 N. W. 1034, wherein it appeared that one who was the president and general manager of a corporation settled a claim by the corporation against a third person, and that pursuant to this compromise agreement, and with knowledge thereof, the corporation accepted and retained the amount agreed upon as a settlement, the court held that the corporation was bound thereby, having received and retained the benefits of the transaction.

In Chatham v. Mecklenburg Realty Co. (1917) 174 N. C. 671, 94 S. E. 447, it appeared that the officers of the defendant corporation, being desirous to have a proposed car line run through property owned by the defendant as suburban home lots, contracted with the plaintiff to subscribe a sum of money toward the construction of the proposed line by him. It further appeared that the corporation, with the knowledge of its officers, accepted a change in the contract, by which it received and retained great benefits. The court held that the facts showed a ratification by the corporation of the unauthorized change in the contract by its officers by the receipt and retention of the benefits incident thereto, the court distinguishing the holding in Duke v. Markham (1890) 105 N. C. 181, 18 Am. St. Rep. 889, 10 S. E. 1017, infra, IV. b, saying: "That [decision] has no application in this case. This contract, as submitted to the jury, is between the original parties thereto, and was executed by the president and two directors. There was evidence that they were acting in behalf of the corporation as general agents, with the knowledge of the company, and that subsequently, when there was objection made, there were changes made in the work to the knowledge of the defendant company; that its officers saw the work in progress and under the amended agreement, and made no objection. There was ample evidence, if believed by the jury, that the president and the two directors, in making the contract, were acting within the scope of their authority, and that the subsequent change in the contract was ratified by the defendant, who has been benefited many times the value of the subscription by reason of the work done by virtue of this contract."

So, in Texas & G. R. Co. v. Whiteside (1909) 55 Tex. Civ. App. 593, 119 S. W. 126, wherein it appeared that the president of the defendant railroad company entered into an agreement with certain parties, whereby the corporation was obligated to extend its lines to a certain point, in consideration of the payment of donations by the other parties to the contract, and pursuant to this agreement, and with knowledge of it, the defendant company received and retained the proceeds of the donations, the court held that by accepting its benefits the corporation adopted and ratified the contract, although the same was not authorized in the first instance.

In Coney Island R. Co. v. McIntyre-Paxton Co. (1912) 119 C. C. A. 197, 200 Fed. 901, the court held that where a corporation received and retained for years the benefits derived from an unauthorized contract, not ultra vires, executed by its president, and had knowledge of the existence and character of the contract, it thereby ratified the act of its officer-agent, and was liable to the plaintiff for a breach of the contract.

Where a corporation retained the consideration of a modified contract executed by its officers, and for a considerable period of time failed to have the same ratified by its board of directors, the court held that the retention of the benefits and the failure to disaffirm or affirm within a reasonable time constituted an implied ratification. Dickinson v. Zubiate Min. Co. (1909) 11 Cal. App. 656, 106 Pac. 123.

In ED. SCHUSTER & Co. v. KURYER PUB. Co. (reported herewith) ante, 1437, wherein it appeared that the general advertising manager of the defendant corporation contracted with the plaintiff to accept the latter's advertising at a stipulated price for a term of years, and also gave to the plaintiff an option to renew the contract, the court held that the corporation ratified and adopted the contract in its entirety, although made without authority, where it appeared that, knowing of the transaction, the defendant corporation received the plaintiff's advertising thereunder, and retained the benefits derived therefrom.

In Kansas City Star Pub. Co. v. Standard Warehouse Co. (1907) 123 Mo. App. 13, 99 S. W. 765, wherein it appeared that the vice president of the defendant corporation contracted with the plaintiff for the insertion in its paper of an advertisement of the corporation, and it was shown that the other members and officers of the corporation knew of the contract and its terms, and received the benefit of the plaintiff's performance of the agreement, the court held that the facts showed a ratification of the vice president's act.

Where it appeared that one who owned ninety-eight shares of the stock of a corporation, and was also its general manager, contracted to supply a certain quantity of water for irrigation, on behalf of the corporation, and it appeared that the latter, with knowledge of the agreement, partly performed the same and received the contract price therefor, the court held that it thereby ratified the contract made by its officer-agent, having received and retained the benefits derived thereunder. Ulrich v. Pateros Water Ditch Co. (1912) 67 Wash. 328, 121 Pac. 818.

In Bensiek v. Thomas (1895) 13 C. C. A. 457, 27 U. S. App. 765, 66 Fed. 104, the court said: "A corporation should not be permitted to allege want of authority on the part of its directors to borrow money, when it has received a sum of money actually borrowed, and has used it to pay its debts, with full knowledge of the fact on the part of all of its directors, and many of its shareholders. A corporation, as well as an individual, is at least bound to act honestly; and it should not be allowed to say that an act done by its officers was unauthorized, when it has accepted the benefits accruing therefrom, and does not offer to restore what it has received." This action, however, did not involve the unauthorized contract of an officer with third parties, and the foregoing is in the nature of dictum only.

See also Jones v. New York Guaranty & Indemnity Co. (1879) 101 U. S. 622, 25 L. ed. 1030, wherein the court said: "Where money has been obtained by a corporation upon its securities, which were irregular and ultra vires, but the money was applied for the benefit of the company with the knowledge and acquiescence of the shareholders, the company and the shareholders are estopped from denying the liability of the company to repay it. And the same result follows where such securities are issued with the knowledge of the shareholders, so far as the money thus raised is applied for the benefit of the company."

And see Fitzgerald & M. Constr. Co. v. Fitzgerald (1890) 137 U. S. 98, 34 L. ed. 608, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 36, wherein the court sustained a charge to the jury in the following words: "If you find from the evidence that said notes were given for the purpose of paying off debts that were due by said construction company, and that the directors of said construction company had full knowledge of the same and assented to the transaction, to the signing and execution of the notes, you will find that said acts of the president have been fully confirmed, and you will find for the plaintiff the full amount of said notes, with interest, provided you find the plaintiff was the owner of the same and is now the lawful holder of them."

In Alabama Fidelity & C. Co. v. Jefferson County Sav. Bank (1917) 198 Ala. 557, 73 So. 918, in discussing the ratification of an unauthorized act of an agent not an officer, the court said: "A corporation which accepts the benefit of a contract made by an officer without authority is estopped from denying the authority of such agent or officer, if the contract is one within the charter powers of the corporation."

See also Argenti v. San Francisco (1860) 16 Cal. 255, wherein the court said: "It is well settled, in relation to the contracts of corporations, that where the question is one of capacity or authority to contract, arising either on a question of regularity of organization or of power conferred by the charter, a party who has had the benefit of the contract cannot be permitted, in an action founded upon it, to question its validity. 'It would be in the highest degree inequitable and unjust . . . to permit the defendant to repudiate a contract, the fruits of which he retains.'"

In San Francisco Gas Co. v. San Francisco (1858) 9 Cal. 453, there is dictum to the following effect: "Where the contract is executory, the corporation cannot be held bound unless the contract is made in pursuance of the provisions of its charter; but where the contract has been executed, and the corporation has enjoyed the benefit of the consideration, an implied assumpsit arises against it. It will be presumed, for the purposes of justice, that the authority exercised by the officers of the corporation was properly delegated to them, and that contracts made by them without authority have been ratified."

In Mulford v. Torrey Exploration Co. (1909) 45 Colo. 81, 100 Pac. 596, the court said, respecting the alleged unauthorized contract of a manager of a corporation: "Aside from the question of the antecedent authority of the manager, the company is not in a position to assert that he was not clothed with such authority. It appears that the president of the company was fully advised with respect to the contracts and their conditions. The company has elected to affirm the parts of such contracts relating to the sale of the stock by retaining the consideration therefor, but repudiates the conditions upon which such sale was made. A principal cannot affirm an alleged unauthorized contract in part, and disaffirm the remainder."

In Winscott v. Guarantee Invest. Co. (1895) 63 Mo. App. 367, evidence was received of a ratification by a corporation of an unauthorized contract entered into by its officer in receiving and retaining the consideration of the contract. But in that case the evidence was not essential, as the contract was prima facie valid.

In Imeson v. Newport Bridge Co. (1884) 5 Ky. L. Rep. 685, it was said: "A corporation may contract by an agent, or the acts and conduct of those in authority may evidence such an assent or acquiescence in the performance of work as would impose on the company deriving the benefits an obligation to pay for it."

See also Elk Valley Coal Co. v. Thompson (1912) 150 Ky. 614, 150 S. W. 817, wherein the court stated the general rule as follows: "Where the unauthorized act is beneficial to the corporation, and the directors have individual knowledge of it, slight evidence will be sufficient to establish ratification by acquiescence or failure to repudiate, and this upon the theory that a party who accepts benefits will be deemed to have done so with a knowledge of the conditions and circumstances surrounding the transaction out of which the act creating the benefit arose, and must take the burdens with the benefits. But where the corporation does not derive any benefit from an unauthorized act, or when it is doubtful if it has derived benefit, and no third party or innocent party has suffered a loss, evidence of ratification by mere individual acquiescence or failure to repudiate must be clearly shown, and this upon the ground that a party is not to be bound by an act that he did not authorize when he has received no benefits from it, and when the other party or an innocent party has not suffered any loss. It is a further well-settled rule that ratification by acquiescence can only arise when the party acquiescing has full knowledge of the facts relating to the act attempted to be ratified, or holds such relation to the thing that knowledge will be presumed, as a party will not be held to have ratified an act that he knew nothing about." But in the present case it did not appear that the corporation received any benefits from an unauthorized contract executed by its general manager.

In Ham & H. Lead & Zinc Invest. Co. v. Catherine Lead Co. (1913) 251 Mo. 721, 158 S. W. 369, there was dictum as follows: "In the law of agency there is a rule that if one accepts the benefits of an unauthorized contract, made in his behalf by another, he is bound by its terms the same as if he had entered into the contract in person, or had expressly ratified it, provided, of course, that he had full knowledge of all the facts, and he is thereby estopped from repudiating the contract without restoring the benefits and putting the other party in statu quo. This principle is applicable in its fullest sense to corporations which, from their nature, can act only through the instrumentality of agents. If, therefore, an officer of a corporation, or other person assuming to have power to bind the corporation by a given contract, enters into the contract for the corporation, and the corporation receives the fruits of the contract, and retains them after acquiring knowledge of the circumstances attending the making of the contract, it will thereby become estopped from afterwards rescinding or undoing the contract. In other words, by retaining the fruits of the unauthorized contract with knowledge of the circumstances which entitle it to its election either to affirm or disaffirm it, the corporation ratifies the contract and makes it good by adoption." Although, in this case, the court found no evidence showing ratification.

In Edwards v. Carson Water Co. (1893) 21 Nev. 469, 34 Pac. 381, it was said: "Before a corporation can be held responsible for the contracts of its officers or its agents, it must affirmatively appear that the officer or agent was authorized to enter into the contract by the company, or that the company received the benefits derived from the transaction;" but in this case it appeared that there was a failure of consideration, and hence no benefits were conferred upon or received by the corporation.

And see Bank of Vergennes v. Warren (1842) 7 Hill (N. Y.) 91, wherein, it appearing that a bank knowingly received payments made to its cashier, who received the same without authority, the court said: "But it is enough that the plaintiffs went to the banking house in business hours, and there made a payment to one of the principal agents of the corporation, who, by accepting the money, professed to have authority to receive it. His authority will be presumed until the contrary expressly appears. . . . Indeed, I think it would not defeat the purchase if it could be shown that the cashier had been forbidden by his principals to transact such business. A creditor, having the right to purchase from a corporation, must of necessity have the right to deal with the principal officer or agent of the company, who may be found at its place of business. To hold that the creditor must go to the board of directors would be to put it in their power, by refusing or neglecting to meet, to deprive him of a right secured to him by law."

In Seeber v. People's Bldg. Loan & Sav. Asso. (1899) 36 App. Div. 312, 55 N. Y. Supp. 364, affirmed in (1900) 54 App. Div. 626, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1144, which is affirmed in (1901) 165 N. Y. 670, 59 N. E. 1130, it was said by way of dictum: "A defendant corporation cannot avail itself of . . . subscriptions and, at the same time, avoid responsibility for the representations of the persons by whom they were obtained." The action was on a contract consummated by agents, not officers, of the corporation.

In Brooklyn Heights R. Co. v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1912) 151 App. Div. 465, 135 N. Y. Supp. 990, it was said: "The stockholders of a corporation may ratify an act which they or the corporation might avoid. The act of ratification must be founded upon knowledge of the situation, or upon acquiescence in the action after knowledge, or in the retention of benefits derived from the voidable action. This principle is well recognized."

In Cincinnati v. Cameron (1878) 33 Ohio St. 336, the court, with some hesitation, applied the doctrine of estoppel, and ratification of an unauthorized contract made by an officer of a corporation by the acceptance and retention of its benefits, to a contract made in behalf of a municipality by certain of its officers, saying: "The city has received and is enjoying the benefit of the work. We are fully aware of the difficulty and delicacy of applying the doctrine of estoppel on the ground of the city having had the consideration. It is by no means true that because a corporation accepts and makes use of the work done, that therefore it is estopped. The circumstances may be such that it cannot help itself. A railroad cannot forego the use of its entire track, because it has a dispute with some contractor about extras in some bridge. In such case the argument that the company has accepted and used the work has no force whatever. Upon this ground the doctrine of estoppel only applies in those cases where the corporation may accept or reject with equal convenience."

IV. Limitation of rule.

a. Retention of benefits without knowledge of contract.

The rule that a corporation ratifies an unauthorized contract executed by an officer, by the acceptance and retention of its benefits, is limited to those contracts of whose execution and terms the corporation has full knowledge, either actually or impliedly.

Thus, in Pennsylvania Taximeter Cab Co. v. Cressey (Fed.) supra, it appeared that an assistant secretary of the defendant company, being authorized to employ the plaintiff to place certain insurance on property of the corporation, entered into a contract with the plaintiff, whereby the corporation agreed to give the former all of its insurance business for a period of years, and pursuant thereto the corporation accepted certain policies secured by the plaintiff, but without knowledge of the existing unauthorized contract. The court held the acceptance of the policies did not create a ratification on the part of the corporation of its agent's unauthorized transaction, stating that the rule of ratification by acceptance of the benefits of an unauthorized transaction has a clear and explicit limitation that the ratification can only be implied where actual knowledge exists as to the character of the contract, or the circumstances are such that knowledge may be readily implied.

In Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works v. Smith (1907) 152 Cal. 507, 98 Pac. 85, an action against the estate of the former president of the plaintiff corporation to recover a loss sustained by his unauthorized act in receiving certain notes of a packing company, the court held that the receipt from the maker of the note of payments thereon did not constitute such a ratification as would preclude the plaintiff from recovering from its own agent for the loss occasioned by his unauthorized act, saying: "In many instances, the transaction is one which the principal could not rescind, because of the ostensible power of his agent. The innocent third party is thus fully protected. But can it with reason or justice be said that, because the principal is thus compelled to accept the consideration from the innocent third party, the agent himself must, of necessity, be held harmless for his violation of duty and breach of trust? If an agent with ostensible authority to sell his principal's wheat, but under instructions to sell it for not less than a dollar a bushel, shall sell and deliver it for 50 cents a bushel, there is no power in the principal to rescind the sale. Shall the principal, by accepting the 50 cents, be held to have exonerated his agent from liability for the other 50 cents per bushel? Such a doctrine certainly does not commend itself, and is not sustained. It is limited, so far as the agent is concerned, to those cases where there remains with the principal, after his first complete knowledge of the transaction, the power to rescind, and, failing so to do, he is properly charged with full acceptance of all the responsibilities of the contract, even to the exoneration of his agent, because, with the ability to rescind, if he had rescinded, the transaction would be at an end and nobody would be injured."

Where the president of a corporation, without authority, entered into a contract for the sale of a part of the corporate property, the court held that the acceptance of part of the purchase price by an unauthorized agent, without the knowledge of the directors of the corporation, did not constitute a ratification, and the corporation, upon learning of the facts, was not estopped from asserting the lack of authority of its officer to act. Black v. Harrison Home Co. (1909) 155 Cal. 121, 99 Pac. 494.

In Palo Alto Mut. Bldg. & L. Asso. v. First Nat. Bank (1917) 33 Cal. App. 214, 164 Pac. 1124, it appeared that the secretary of a corporation, without authority, indorsed a check made payable to the corporation, and the money realized from the same was applied to property upon which the corporation held a mortgage. The court held that a subsequent renewal of the mortgage, without notice of the secretary's act, did not amount to a ratification, as the benefits were not received with knowledge of the unauthorized transaction, and, further, that upon notice of the officer's act the company was not bound to disaffirm, quoting from 2 C. J. § 133, as follows: "Where . . . when the principal first acquires knowledge of the facts, conditions are such that he cannot in justice to himself repudiate the whole of the agent's acts, he may stand upon what he has authorized, and the third person must bear the loss resulting from the dealing with an agent without learning the extent of his authority."

Where it appeared that the secretary-treasurer of a corporation entered into a contract with the plaintiff to pay a commission for the sale of certain property, and, the latter having secured a purchaser, the corporation made a sale of the property, the court held that, the defendant having shown that it had no knowledge of the unauthorized contract of its officer the action taken in selling the property to the purchaser procured by the plaintiff did not constitute a ratification, as the company could not ratify a contract of which it had no knowledge, either actual or implied. Extension Gold Min. & Mill. Co. v. Skinner (1901) 28 Colo. 237, 64 Pac. 198.

And in Rizzuto v. R. W. English Lumber Co. (1908) 44 Colo. 413, 98 Pac. 728, wherein it appeared that the defendant corporation's manager, without authority, executed a note of the corporation to the plaintiff and placed the proceeds thereof to the account of the company, without the latter's knowledge, the court held that the deposit of the proceeds to the corporation's account and use, without its knowledge of the transaction, did not constitute a ratification, as a ratification of an unauthorized contract executed by an officer, by the retention of the benefits, could only arise where the corporation had knowledge of the transaction.

But compare Hireen v. R. W. English Lumber Co. (1909) 46 Colo. 216, 104 Pac. 84, subsequent appeal in (1913) 25 Colo. App. 199, 136 Pac. 475, wherein the court held that money so deposited by a manager to his employer's account could be recovered in an action on money had and received. This case, however, is distinguishable from the Rizzuto Case, supra, in that the action is not founded on a ratification of the unauthorized contract of a corporate officer.

So, in Tracy v. Guthrie County Agri. Soc. (1877) 47 Iowa, 27, the court held that a ratification of an unauthorized contract, entered into by an officer of a corporation, could only be effected by the corporation, acting with full knowledge of the defective transaction, and could not be inferred from the acts of a few of its members.

In Groeltz v. Armstrong Real Estate Co. (1902) 115 Iowa, 602, 89 N. W. 21, the court held that the acceptance of the purchase price of a sale of real property by a third party, pursuant to an unauthorized agreement with the company's president, did not constitute a ratification, where the corporation had no knowledge of the unauthorized agreement, saying: "It is well settled that the acceptance of the benefits of a contract, made by an agent acting without authority, will bind the principal to the terms and conditions of the contract, but the acceptance of the benefit of an unauthorized act will not bind the principal to an agreement made by the agent as to the same subject-matter, which was beyond the scope of his authority, and of which the principal, when accepting the benefit of the authorized act, had no knowledge. . . . In order that the principal may be bound by ratification of an agreement of the agent, made without authority, the principal must have knowledge of the unauthorized act."

So, in Thompson v. Des Moines Driving Park (1900) 112 Iowa, 628, 84 N. W. 678, it was held that the corporation must have knowledge of the unauthorized contract of its officer before its acts or the receipt of the benefits of the contract would amount to a ratification.

Also in Dedham Inst. of Sav. v. Slack (1850) 6 Cush. (Mass.) 408, it was held that the receipt and retention of payments, without knowledge of an assignment executed by the treasurer of a corporation without authority, did not constitute a ratification of the treasurer's act, as the corporation had no knowledge thereof at the time it received the payments.

In Bishop v. Burke (1910) 207 Mass. 133, 93 N. E. 254, it was held that where a corporation, acting blindly and without knowledge of its treasurer's unauthorized contract, accepted the purchase price of a sale of property made by him, such an acceptance, made without knowledge of the transaction, could not be held to constitute a ratification of the same.

In Danglade & R. Min. Co. v. Mexico-Joplin Land Co. (1916) — Mo. App. —, 190 S. W. 35, wherein it appeared that a director and treasurer of a corporation executed a chattel mortgage of the corporate property for the purpose of securing an extension of time from pressing creditors, and the extension of time was received by the corporation for its benefit, but without notice of the unauthorized acts of its officers, the court held that receipt and retention of the advantages of the unauthorized contract, without knowledge of the same, did not constitute a ratification of the officers' transactions, saying: "There is no doubt that the giving of this mortgage was a benefit to plaintiff in securing an extension of time to pay its debt, and it was likewise a detriment to defendant in that it was led to forbear taking action to compel payment. In such case, any knowledge by plaintiff of the mortgage being given by its unauthorized agent or officer would call for a prompt repudiation of such act, and any acquiescence therein, with knowledge, would be a ratification of the unauthorized act. . . . In such cases, however, knowledge must be shown, though it may be shown by circumstantial evidence, and such knowledge will not be presumed because known to the wrongdoing officer of agent."

In Yellow Jacket Silver Min. Co. v. Stevenson (1869) 5 Nev. 224, 3 Mor. Min. Rep. 545, it appeared that the president of a corporation, acting without authority, leased certain property of the corporation, and the latter accepted and retained money paid as rent for the property, but credited by the officer as money received for the sale of ores, the company having no knowledge, either actual or implied, of the unauthorized agreement made by its president. The court held that the facts did not show a ratification, as the corporation had no knowledge of the contract, saying: "Not knowing of such occupation, an assent to it could not, with any degree of consistency, be presumed to be given. Here, there is no evidence that the board of trustees, as such, knew of [defendant's] occupation; and the acceptance of the money paid by him could not raise a presumption of such knowledge, because it was returned as for ores sold, and as such it appears to have been accepted by the company. Were it returned as rent, and so accepted, a tenancy would be created, for that fact alone would be a sufficient notification to the company that [defendant] was occupying a portion of the mine, and the acceptance of the rent would be a sufficient assent to such occupancy. But the law does not force contracts upon persons by presumptions unnatural or improbable. Legal presumptions are natural and rational inferences drawn from known or admitted facts. As, for example, if one accepts rent from another in possession of his property, knowing it to be paid as rent, the natural presumption is that he assents to the possession, and such is the presumption of the law; but it would not be rational or natural to infer an assent to such possession if the money were accepted, the owner not knowing it was paid as rent; nor do we think the law raises it in such a case."

In Leggett v. New Jersey Mfg. & Bkg. Co. (1832) 1 N. J. Eq. 541, 23 Am. Dec. 728, the court held that, where the evidence failed to show knowledge on the part of a corporation of an unauthorized issue of a mortgage and bond by certain of its officers, the mere receipt of the proceeds thereof, standing alone, did not constitute a ratification.

And in Beach v. Palisade Realty & Amusement Co. (1914) 86 N. J. L. 238, 90 Atl. 1118, wherein it appeared that the vice president of a corporation exceeded his authority in contracting for the corporation for the purchase by it of its own stock and bonds, the court held that the acceptance of the benefits of the contract, without knowledge of its existence, did not constitute a ratification, saying: "Ratification will be implied from acquiescence, or acceptance of benefits, with knowledge of the facts. But there was no such implied ratification, because it appears that the other members of the board had no knowledge thereof."

In Camacho v. Hamilton Bank Note & Engraving Co. (1896) 2 App. Div. 369, 37 N. Y. Supp. 725, it appeared that the plaintiff was employed, without authority, by the vice president of the defendant corporation, and he rendered services to the corporation, which were received by it, but without knowledge of the unauthorized contract. It was held that the mere rendering of the services and the acceptance of the benefits thereof by the corporation, but without knowledge of the contract, did not constitute ratification; that in order to prove ratification of an unauthorized contract there must be proof of knowledge of its existence on the part of the corporation, or circumstances from which knowledge may be logically inferred.

In Caldwell v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. (1900) 58 App. Div. 245, 65 N. Y. Supp. 826, the court stated the qualification of the rule of ratification, in general, to be as follows: "There can be no such thing as ratification unless the one ratifying acts with full knowledge of what has been done," holding that an unauthorized contract of an executive committee of a corporation would not be deemed ratified by the part performance of the other party, to the benefit of the corporation, where it appeared that the latter's board of directors never knew of the transaction.

In Lord v. United States Transp. Co. (1911) 143 App. Div. 437, 128 N. Y. Supp. 451, wherein it appeared that the general manager of a corporation employed, under a contract, a broker to sublet property owned by the corporation, although he had no authority to do so, and it further appeared that the corporation accepted the benefits of the broker's services, but without knowledge, either actual or implied, of the unauthorized contract of employment, the court held that it could not be held liable thereon, for the acceptance and retention of the benefits of an unauthorized contract do not constitute a ratification where the same are received with no knowledge of the agreement, but the court said further, stating the theory of ratification: "[But] if the defendant, with knowledge that Scholz made a contract as claimed, accepted a customer produced by him and made the contract on a proposition which he was authorized to submit, it would be bound by the contract on the theory of ratification."

So, in Giebler Mfg. Co. v. Kranenberg (1905) 102 App. Div. 471, 92 N. Y. Supp. 843, wherein it was claimed that the application of money received from an unauthorized contract of sale of corporate property, executed by the corporation's president, constituted a ratification of the contract, the court held that it could not have that effect, as it appeared that the money was accepted and applied to the corporate debts without the knowledge and consent of the directors.

In McKibbin v. Hulton Dyeing & Finishing Co. (1910) 227 Pa. 153, 75 Atl. 1038, wherein it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation contracted for it, without authority, to purchase certain real property from the plaintiff, and it further appeared that the corporation entered upon and used the property in question, but under an independent contract of leasing and without knowledge of the contract to purchase, the court held that the facts disclosed no ratification of the unauthorized contract to purchase the property.

So, in Morgan v. Washburn Lumber Co. (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 180 S. W. 911, the court held that in the absence of evidence of knowledge on the part of the defendant corporation, of an unauthorized contract executed by its president, an issue as to its ratification of the contract did not arise.

In Kansas City, M. & O. R. Co. v. Sweetwater (1911) 104 Tex. 329, 137 S. W. 1117, reversing (1910) 62 Tex. Civ. App. 242, 131 S. W. 251, wherein it appeared that the vice president of a railway corporation, in order to secure for it a right to lay its tracks through the streets of a city, contracted, without authority, to bind the corporation to maintain its offices and shops in the city, and subsequently, and in view of the above agreement, an ordinance was passed giving the corporation the right to use the streets, and the latter availed itself of this benefit, but without knowledge of the officer's unauthorized agreement, the court held that such a receipt of the benefits, without knowledge of the transaction, did not constitute a ratification of the same.

So, in Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Logue (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 189 S. W. 11, affirmed in (1914) 106 Tex. 445, 167 S. W. 805, the court held, following the opinion in Kansas City, M. & O. R. Co. v. Sweetwater (Tex.) supra, that the acceptance of land by a corporation did not constitute a ratification by it of a secret agreement between its president and the grantor, whereby the corporation was to erect and maintain a railroad station, no evidence being shown from which knowledge, either actual or implied, on the part of the corporation, could be reasonably inferred.

In Hurlbut v. Gainor (1907) 45 Tex. Civ. App. 588, 103 S. W. 409, wherein it appeared that a corporation purchased by patent from the state certain railroad surveys, but without the knowledge that it was enabled so to do by reason of an unauthorized contract made by its president with a third person, enlisting his services in procuring the patents, and, as it appeared, pursuant to whose performance they were obtained, the court held that the purchase of the lands, and therefore the appropriation of the benefits of the unauthorized contract, did not constitute a ratification of the same, as it did not appear that the corporation had knowledge of the transaction.

In Lyndon Mill Co. v. Lyndon Literary & Biblical Inst. (1891) 68 Vt. 581, 25 Am. St. Rep. 783, 22 Atl. 575, it appeared that the president of the defendant corporation purchased a quantity of lumber to be used in mak-

Executor and administrator — expense of appeal from rejection of will.

An executor nominated in a will, though acting in good faith, is not entitled to reimbursement out of funds of the estate for his services, expenses, and attorney's fees, in an unsuccessful effort to sustain the will upon appeal against a contest by the widow and sole heir on the ground that the will is void under the statute.

APPEAL by the executor of the estate of Curtis H. Pettit, deceased, from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County (Steele, J.) affirming an order of the Probate Court disallowing reimbursement from the funds of said estate for his services, expenses, and counsel fees, and reversing an order allowing a certain amount for services in caring for the estate subsequent to the filing of the final decree. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Cobb, Wheelwright, & Dille and J. M. Martin for appellant.

Mr. James E. O'Brien, for respondents:

An executor, which is also the trustee, under certain invalid trust provisions in a will, is not entitled to reimbursements out of the funds of the estate for attorneys' fees paid and for executors' fees, and for printing and other charges incurred and made necessary in unsuccessful appeals from the decree of distribution, distributing said property to the rightful heirs.

Quinn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Curtis H. Pettit died intestate May 11, 1914, at his home in Hennepin county, leaving him surviving, his widow, Deborah M. Pettit, and their only child, Bessie P. Douglas, who had three minor children. He left a large estate, consisting of valuable stocks, bonds, real estate, and mineral interests in northern Minnesota, from which large royalties were derived. His will was dated January 22, 1908, in which appellant was nominated executor and trustee. By the terms of the will the entire estate, aside from household furniture, wearing apparel, and personal effects, $2,000 for the upkeep of the lots in the cemetery, and $1,000 to a servant, was bequeathed and devised to appellant in trust, to hold, manage, and control during the life of his wife, their daughter, her husband and their three children, and for twenty years after the death of the survivor of them, when the trustee was to turn over the property and net accumulations thereto to the children of the three children of Mrs. Douglas.

At the time of the execution of the will, Mrs. Pettit indorsed thereon her consent to the provisions thereof. On May 15, 1914, Mrs. Douglas presented the will to the probate court of Hennepin county, and asked that it be admitted to probate. The will was admitted to probate, appellant was appointed and duly qualified as executor, and thereafter entered upon the discharge of its duties. At the hearing to admit the will to probate Mrs. Douglas filed notice that she reserved the right to object and contest any provisions of the will.

On June 20, 1914, Mrs. Pettit filed with the probate court a rescission and withdrawal of her consent to the provisions of the will, and gave notice of her intention to take, in lieu of the provisions of the will, the share of her husband's estate to which she would have been entitled had there been no will. Appellant opposed this action on the part of Mrs. Pettit. A hearing was had thereon, which resulted in a decree of the probate court in favor of the widow, which was affirmed by this court upon certiorari. State ex rel. Minnesota Loan & T. Co. v. Probate Ct. 129 Minn. 442, L.R.A.1915E, 815, 152 N. W. 845.

The executor then proceeded to administer the estate in the usual manner, and on August 6, 1915, filed its final account, and asked that the estate be distributed. From such account it appeared that all of the debts, the legacy of $1,000, and the expenses of administration including $5,993.72 for attorneys' and executor's fees, had been paid in full, and that there remained in the hands of the executor for distribution personal property of the value of $148,038.68 and the real estate, including the mineral holdings.

On January 28, 1916, the probate court made a decree of distribution, adjudging and decreeing that the provisions of the will, except as to the legacy of $1,000, were invalid, inoperative, and void as a disposition of real and personal property under the laws of this state; that Deborah M. Pettit, widow of deceased, was entitled to an undivided one third of the real and personal property then in the hands of the executor, and that Bessie P. Douglas, a daughter of deceased, was entitled to two thirds thereof. The widow and heirs were satisfied with the decree of distribution. The debts and expenses of administration had all been paid. The estate had been fully administered, and the property was intact with the executor. The executor then appealed, from that part of the decree of distribution which gave the daughter two thirds of the estate, to the district court where an affirmance was had. Thereafter it appealed from the judgment of the district court to this court, and the judgment was affirmed. Minnesota Loan & T. Co. v. Douglas, 135 Minn. 413, 161 N. W. 158.

In February, 1917, the executor filed a supplement to its final account, setting forth the receipts and disbursements subsequent to the rendering of the final account, in which it asked credit for $5,000 as executor's fees, $4,900 for legal services, and $437.84 for transcripts and printing, all in connection with the two appeals following the decree of distribution.

The widow and daughter objected to the allowance of these items, upon the ground that they were charges for disbursements made by the executor and trustee under an invalid trust, in connection with unsuccessful appeals by it from the decrees of the probate and district courts. The probate court disallowed all of such claims, except that it allowed the executor $1,800 for services in caring for the estate subsequent to the filing of the final decree. Thereupon the executor appealed to the district court from that part of the decree of the probate court disallowing such items, and the widow and daughter appealed from the allowance of the item of $1,800.

In January, 1919, the district court filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, holding that all the items for which credit was asked were for disbursements in unsuccessful appeals by the executor from the decree of distribution, and affirmed the action of the probate court in disallowing the same and reversed the order allowing the item of $1,800. Judgment was entered accordingly, and the executor appealed. No question was raised as to the competency of the testator to make his will, nor as to the good faith of the executor throughout.

The question is presented: Is an executor nominated in a will entitled to reimbursement from the funds of the estate for services, expenses, and counsel fees in an unsuccessful appeal to sustain the will, the heirs contesting upon the ground that the will is void under the Statute of Trusts. The identical question, in principle, was passed upon by this court in the case of Kelly v. Ken- nedy, 133 Minn. 278, L.R.A.1917A, 448, 158 N. W. 395, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 164. There the executor was nominated in the will, he presented the same for probate, the sole heir contested upon the ground of want of testamentary capacity in the testatrix. The will was allowed in the probate court, and the allowance was affirmed in the district court. On appeal there was a reversal. Upon the second trial in district court the will was disallowed, and upon appeal there was an affirmance. The probate court allowed the executor for his services and disbursements for expenses and counsel fees in connection with the contest of the will. Upon appeal the district court reversed the probate court and disallowed the claims. Throughout the executor acted in good faith. In that case it was held that no legal duty rested upon the executor to procure probate of the will, and that he was not entitled to payment out of the funds of the estate for such disbursements. No different rule applies in this case because the contest is upon the ground that the will is void under the statute, and we see no distinction such as would tend to change the rule adopted in the case cited.

Affirmed.

Dibell, J., dissenting:

I am unable quite to agree with the result reached. The trust created by the will provided for an accumulation of rents and profits of land. At the expiration of twenty years after the death of the testator's wife and his daughter and her husband and their three children there was to be a distribution of the proceeds among the testator's three grandchildren and the children of any deceased grandchild by right of representation; and if it so happened that there was no living descendant of the testator's daughter at the expiration of the trust period the proceeds were to be distributed among the collateral blood relatives of the testator and his wife. This was the clearly stated purpose of the testator. Its consummation was happily prevented by Gen. Stat. 1913, §§ 6687, 6688. The will was probated without opposition, the trust company was nominated executor by the will, and was appointed by the court and discharged its duties as such. It was also the trustee in the trust created by the devise. In its efforts to uphold the trust it sought to bring about the result which the testator wished. The trust provision could not be disregarded. The daughter could not safely take her portion as heir, even if she were allowed to have it, without an adjudication of a competent court that the trust was invalid. The ultimate and uncertain beneficiaries contemplated by the trust, not born at the time of the death of the testator, could not participate or be represented in the determination of its validity. Still the testator wished, if there should be beneficiaries within the class defined by him, that they take. His purpose could not be given effect, nor the interests of the possible beneficiaries guarded, unless the executor undertook to maintain the will, for the others were opposed. Its undertaking was in good faith. Under the circumstances it seems to me that it was authorized to take at the expense of the estate the opinion of the highest court of the state upon the validity of the trust. The rule stated in Kelly v. Kennedy, 133 Minn. 278, L.R.A.1917A, 448, 158 N. W. 395, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 164, was advisedly adopted as one likely to work well, and it is to be followed. It does not seem to me that allowing the executor fees under the circumstances of this case is opposed to it.

The trust company, in its capacity as executor or trustee, cannot disassociate itself from itself as a private corporation. Whether the fact that the upholding of the trust would result in profit to itself through the long years of administration should affect the amount of the allowance is not for discussion in this dissent.

Hallam, J., dissenting:

I think the better rule is that when a will makes provision for beneficiaries not yet in being, the court may in its discretion make allowance out of the estate for the fees of an attorney who in good faith conducts litigation to sustain the will for their benefit. As a practical proposition this seems to be necessary. Otherwise the interests of such beneficiaries could not be protected at all.

Petition for rehearing denied.

ANNOTATION.

Right of executor to an allowance for expenses incurred in unsuccessful attempt to uphold particular provisions of will.

In the reported case (MINNESOTA LOAN & T. Co. v. PETTIT, ante, 1496) it will be observed that notwithstanding the executor's effort in good faith to carry out the testator's wish and sustain the trust for which he provided in his will, a majority of the court refused an allowance reimbursing the executor for the expenses and attorneys' fees incurred in unsuccessfully attempting to uphold the trust provisions of the will. It will be noticed that the dissenting opinion distinguishes the case from the ordinary case where an allowance is sought for expenses incurred in unsuccessfully attempting to uphold an entire will attacked on the ground of lack of testamentary capacity or similar ground, and where the executor by hypothesis is not furthering the testator's intention.

In some cases, however, an allowance has been made for expenses incurred in unsuccessfully attempting to uphold particular provisions of a will.

Thus, in Re Title Guaranty & T. Co. (1906) 114 App. Div. 778, 100 N. Y. Supp. 243, affirmed without opinion in (1907) 188 N. Y. 542, 80 N. E. 1121, an executor was held entitled to an allowance from the estate for counsel fees incurred in good faith in unsuccessfully seeking to uphold a provision of a codicil reducing the gift to one of testator's daughters in case she married a certain man, it appearing that after the daughter's marriage to such man she attacked the provision of the will and it was declared invalid in the lower court, and that on appeal by the executor to the appellate division it was unanimously reversed, but that on appeal from this decision it was unanimously reversed by the court of appeals. The court with respect to the disallowance of counsel fees said: "I know of no principle of law which can support this ruling. There is no claim of bad faith, or that the amount expended is excessive. The conduct of the executors is to be tested by the rule of good faith, and not by mere success. It was both their right and their duty to endeavor to uphold the will, so that the wishes of the deceased should be carried out if they lawfully might be. That the question at issue was a difficult one to solve is apparent from the conflicting decisions of the appellate division and the court of appeals. The executors were not compellable at their personal risk to acquiesce in the decision of the special term, and its reversal by the appellate division must be regarded as a complete justification of their course in taking an appeal. With that decision in their favor they could not, without violating their duty, have refused to defend it in the court of appeals. In view of the magnitude of the estate, they were justified in the employment of eminent counsel and in the employment of more than one, always assuming, as I have said, that their good faith in the transaction is not impugned."

And in Baldwin v. Barber (1912) 148 Ky. 370, 146 S. W. 1124, modified on other grounds in (1912) 151 Ky. 168, 151 S. W. 686, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 14, where the jury in an action contesting the will returned a verdict sustaining the will with the exception of certain items, and the executors prosecuted an unsuccessful appeal from the overruling of their motion for judgment probating the entire will, notwithstanding the verdict, it was held that they were entitled to an allowance for counsel fees incurred. The court said: "It was the duty of the executors to resist the contest and to use all legal and honorable means to sustain the will in all its parts. To this end they had authority to employ counsel and to agree on the payment of reasonable fees. Their duties did not cease with the trial in the lower court. In view of the peculiar verdict rendered by the jury, it was right and proper for them to prosecute an appeal to this court, and this without regard to whom the appeal might affect."

In Gilbert v. Bartlett (1872) 9 Bush (Ky.) 49, where the will created trusts and made it the duty of the executor to administer them, he was held entitled to costs incurred in attempting to uphold the will, although he was unsuccessful. The court said: "The ordinary costs incurred in the effort to probate the will of the decedent should not be charged against the appellee. The paper purporting to be Gilbert's will makes a devise to his executor of large sums of money, to be held and expended by him for certain persons therein named. Other trusts are also created by this paper, making it the duty of the executor to protect the interests of the beneficiaries therein named. This he could do in no other way than to offer the will for probate, and in such a case, where the executor acts in good faith, in order to probate the will, we see no reason why he should be compelled to pay the costs, although the paper offered for probate is rejected."

While not directly in point the case of Greenwood v. Zausch (1915) 190 Mo. App. 638, 176 S. W. 271, is of interest on the question here involved. In that case the executor was charged by the will with the duty of looking after the testatrix's real estate during administration, paying her debts, and paying a certain allowance monthly to her husband, and the executor was held entitled to an allowance of attorneys' fees incurred in successfully defending a suit brought by the testatrix's husband by which he claimed one half of his wife's real estate in lieu of the benefits given him under the will. The court said: "By the provisions of the will of Mary Jamison, the executor, who was a party to that suit, was directed to take possession of the real estate of which the testatrix died seised, as well as the personal property, and, out of such personalty and out of the net rents of such realty, pay the liabilities of the estate, etc.; and by a further provision the executor was required to hold and manage the real estate during the time of the administration, make all needful repairs, pay taxes, insurance, etc., thereon. It is entirely clear that the executor was made a trustee for the time under the will with respect to the real estate, and, indeed, the principal portion of the personal estate of Mary Jamison came into the hands of her executor through rents monthly collected on the real estate she owned at the time of her death.

It appearing that the executor was a party defendant to the suit instituted by Jesse T. Jamison by which it was sought to take one half of the real estate which yielded the income and constituted the principal part of the corpus of the personal estate, it was competent to charge the portion of the attorneys' fees, as was done, which accrued in defending such trust, against the estate of which he was executor. Obviously this provision of the will created a trust as therein suggested on the part of the executor to manage and control the real estate during the administration, collect the rents, and turn the net income into the personal estate. In protecting the real estate from assault, the executor protected the fount from which were supplied the coffers of the personal estate, and in this view it was well enough to charge such estate with the expense of defending the title to the realty, for such was defending the trust." Husband and wife — annulment of marriage for epilepsy.

1. In an action to annul a marriage contract upon the ground that one of the parties thereto was an epileptic at the time of the marriage, proof that the defendant was an epileptic at the time of such marriage is not, in the absence of a showing of fraud on the part of the afflicted party in concealing the epileptic condition, sufficient to warrant a decree of annulment.

— failure to recognize epilepsy as cause for annulling marriage.

2. The legislature not having prescribed epilepsy as a ground for annulment of marriage, and the courts of the state never having recognized that disease as a cause for nullifying a marriage contract, the judgment of the trial court denying such relief is justified, notwithstanding a finding of fact that the defendant was an epileptic at the time of the marriage.

[See 9 R. C. L. 269.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Steele County (Childress, J.) in favor of defendant in a suit for the annulment of a marriage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Moonan & Moonan, for appellant:

An epileptic cannot contract marriage.

Hively v. Golnick, 123 Minn. 498, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 757, 144 N. W. 213, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 295; State v. Yoder, 113 Minn. 503, L.R.A. 1916C, 686, 130 N. W. 10.

The concealment of the fact from plaintiff that defendant was epileptic was a fraud within the meaning of the statute.

Gould v. Gould, 78 Conn. 246, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 531, 61 Atl. 604.

Inasmuch as the public policy of the state forbids such marriages, it may be doubted whether the subsequent cohabitation, even with the knowledge of the epileptic condition, would validate the marriage.

Hall v. Industrial Commission, 165 Wis. 364, L.R.A. 1917D, 829, 162 N. W. 312, 16 N. C. C. A. 77; Williams v. Williams, 46 Wis. 464, 32 Am. Rep. 722, 1 N. W. 98; Spencer v. Plaintiff is within his rights in asking that the nullity of the marriage be judicially declared.

Messrs. A. W. Sawyer and F. W. Sawyer, for respondent:

Neither fraud nor concealment of epilepsy are in the case. Even if they were, they furnish no ground for annulment.

Lyon v. Lyon, 230 Ill. 366, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 996, 82 N. E. 850, 12 Ann. Cas. 25; Lewis v. Lewis, 44 Minn. 124, 9 L.R.A. 505, 20 Am. St. Rep. 559, 46 N. W. 323.

The existence of epilepsy at time of marriage is not ground for annulment.

343, 166 N. Y. Supp. 397; Elser v. Elser, 160 N. Y. Supp. 724.

Quinn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff and defendant have been residents of this state since their birth. They were married in June, 1907. They lived together as husband and wife until shortly prior to September, 1915, when the defendant, by reason of and as a result of epilepsy, was adjudged insane and committed to the hospital, where she has since been detained. There are three children, the issue of such marriage, of the ages of eight, five, and three years; but they do not appear to be afflicted with such malady.

An examination of the record as returned leads us to the conclusion that the trial court was right in denying the relief asked for in the complaint. The findings of the trial court are, in effect, that the parties were married on June 7, 1907; that the issue of such marriage is three children; that the defendant is and has been ever since she was two years of age an epileptic; that said disease continued to grow on the defendant until September 3, 1915, when she became insane and was committed to the hospital for the insane at Rochester; that the defendant is becoming more irrational and violent and is not expected to improve in her condition; that the plaintiff and defendant lived together as husband and wife until shortly before defendant became insane; that plaintiff did not know that the disease with which defendant was afflicted was epilepsy until about September 3, 1915; and that this action was commenced in November, 1918.

As conclusions of law the court found that plaintiff is not entitled to have said marriage annulled and set aside, but that he is entitled to the custody of said children.

Plaintiff brings this action to annul the marriage, alleging solely that at the time of such marriage, and long prior thereto, and ever since, defendant was an epileptic, all of which was unknown to plaintiff. There is no allegation or contention that the defendant, in any manner, attempted to conceal her real ailment from the plaintiff, nor that she knew or had any conception of the nature of the malady with which she was afflicted. The question then is whether a marriage is voidable upon the sole ground that one of the parties thereto was an epileptic at the time of the marriage, in the absence of any showing of fraud or concealment, and where it does not appear that the defendant ever knew that her trouble was epilepsy. Section 7090, Gen. Stat. 1915, provides that "no marriage shall be contracted while either of the parties has a husband or wife living; nor within six months after either has been divorced from a former spouse; nor between parties who are nearer of kin than second cousins, whether of the half or whole blood computed by the rules of the civil law; nor between persons either of whom is epileptic, imbecile, feeble-minded or insane."

Section 7106 of the statute provides that all marriages which are prohibited by law on account of consanguinity, or on account of either party having a former husband or wife then living, if solemnized within the state, shall be absolutely void, and § 7107 provides that when either party to a marriage is incapable of assenting thereto for want of age or understanding, or when the consent of either has been obtained by force or fraud, and there is no subsequent voluntary cohabitation of the parties, the marriage may be annulled and shall be void from the time its nullity is adjudged. It will be observed that the legislature has not prescribed epilepsy as a ground for annulment of marriage, nor have the courts of this state recognized that disease as cause for nullifying the marriage contract. Apparently, the defendant was in such state of health at and subsequent to the time of her marriage that plaintiff lived with her for eight years and raised a family of three children before discovering the nature of the malady under which she was laboring. She had concealed nothing from the plaintiff as to her ailments. We are of the opinion that the judgment should stand.

Husband and wife—failure to recognize epilepsy as cause for annulling marriage.

—annulment of marriage for epilepsy.

ANNOTATION.

Epilepsy as ground for avoiding marriage.

The decisions involving epilepsy as a ground for annulment of marriage are comparatively few in number, and are so divergent in their conclusions that no general rule on the subject can be formulated.

However, the cases readily resolve themselves into two classes, viz., those wherein the decision is influenced by the existence of a statute prohibiting marriage between persons either of whom is epileptic, and those decided in the absence of such a statute. In the latter class fall the decisions in Illinois and in New York. In Illinois it has been held that the concealment at the time of marriage of the fact that one of the contracting parties is an epileptic is not such a fraud as will support an action for annulment under the ordinary statute providing therefor. Lyon v. Lyon (1907) 230 Ill. 366, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 996, 82 N. E. 850, 12 Ann. Cas. 25. In that case it appeared that the parties were married in New York, and subsequent to the marriage the plaintiff learned that his wife was an epileptic, subject to fits occurring at irregular though frequent intervals, and covering a period of more than ten years immediately prior to their marriage. The husband had known of these attacks several years prior to the marriage, but it was alleged that his wife had falsely and fraudulently represented to him that she had been entirely cured of her epilepsy. Holding that no fraud sufficient to warrant a decree of annulment was shown, the court said: "The fraudulent representations for which a marriage may be annulled must be of something essential to the marriage relation,—of something making impossible the performance of the duties and obligations of that relation or rendering its assumption and continuance dangerous to health or life.

. . . The statute of New York mentioned in the bill merely declares the law as it exists in Illinois,—that a marriage procured by fraud may be annulled. The kind and degree of evidence required for such purpose must be determined by the court in which the suit is brought, according to the law of the forum. The bill proceeds on the theory that the appellant's consent to the marriage was obtained by fraud, and sets out the facts constituting the fraud. Whether those facts constitute fraud must be determined by the law of the forum, and the superior court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the bill."

In New York the two decisions on the subject are unsatisfactory and can hardly be said to establish any rule with respect to the concealment of epilepsy as a fraud for which a marriage may be annulled, since in both decisions the conclusion seems to be reached merely that there was no fraudulent concealment.

Thus, in Elser v. Elser (1916) 160 N. Y. Supp. 724, the husband sued to annul the marriage on the ground that he was induced to enter into the marriage contract by the fraud of his wife in concealing from him that she was an epileptic, and in leading him to believe that she was in good health. In a brief opinion dismissing the complaint, the court said: "As to the charge of fraud, I find there was none. I had a physician called to examine the wife, and he testified that the statistics show that in about 16 per cent of the epileptic cases covered by the records from which the statistics were compiled the taint was inherited. The plaintiff's counsel urges that public policy requires an annulment decree in order to prevent the coming into the world of progeny tainted by an epileptic strain, but we have not as yet come to that refinement of civilization."

In McGill v. McGill (1917) 179 App. Div. 343, 166 N. Y. Supp. 397, affirmed without opinion in (1917) 226 N. Y. 673, 123 N. E. 877, the husband sued for annulment because of the wife's alleged fraud in concealing from him the fact that at the time of the marriage she was suffering from epilepsy. It appeared that prior to the marriage the husband was acquainted with the fact that his future wife was subject to attacks which had been diagnosed as epilepsy. The husband consulted another physician, who assured him that the defendant was not suffering from epilepsy. Soon after the marriage of the parties it was found that the defendant was in fact epileptic. The plaintiff attended her during her frequent seizures, and with full knowledge of her trouble he lived and cohabited with her as husband and wife. The appellate court, after reviewing the evidence, said: "We are, therefore, of the opinion that the finding of the learned trial court that plaintiff was induced to marry defendant through any deception or misrepresentation on her part was clearly contrary to and against the weight of evidence. The legislature has not prescribed epilepsy as a ground for annulment of marriage, and so far as we know the courts of this state have never recognized that disease as cause for nullifying the marriage contract. That the defendant should suffer from a perhaps incurable malady, resulting in a severance of the marriage relations of the parties, is unfortunate. But the misfortune is not alone that of plaintiff. Doubly unfortunate is the lot of the defendant, who, though herself innocent of fault, must go through life a victim of a terrible malady and in constant dread of recurring seizures, of the approach of which she has no warning, necessitating her virtual imprisonment apart from those to whom she is bound by ties of family and friendship. That she should be forsaken in her distress by one in whose keeping she has confided all that she has, and who by the dictates of humanity should, of all others, sustain her in her suffering, cannot but add to the terrible burden under which she must struggle until a merciful death shall relieve her. That the great misfortune of this defendant should be invoked to relieve plaintiff from obligations which he should discharge with cheerfulness and affection for his afflicted wife does not appeal to our sense of human justice. . . . The evidence conclusively shows that plaintiff voluntarily cohabited with defendant as his wife with full knowledge of the facts constituting the alleged fraud upon him. Such voluntary cohabitation precludes any annulment of the marriage by reason of the alleged fraud."

In this connection it may be noted that the New York courts have not hesitated to annul a marriage for fraud consisting in the concealment of a venereal disease (see annotation in 5 A.L.R. 1022), and a similar ruling with respect to the concealment of epilepsy may reasonably be expected when, if ever, the question is squarely presented for decision.

In those jurisdictions wherein statutes exist which prohibit marriage by or with an epileptic, the decisions are not altogether harmonious as to the validity of a marriage entered into contrary to the provisions of the statute. While the courts apparently agree that such a marriage is voidable merely, and not void, they are not in accord as to the circumstances under which a decree of nullity should be entered. Thus, the Connecticut statute provides that "no man or woman, either of whom is epileptic, imbecile, or feeble-minded, shall intermarry, or live together as husband or wife, when the woman is under forty-five years of age." In Gould v. Gould (1905) 78 Conn. 242, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 531, 61 Atl. 604, it was held that while a marriage contracted in violation of the statute is not void, it is voidable on direct attack, and that concealment by one of the parties at the time of marriage of the fact that he or she is epileptic constitutes such fraud as will warrant annulment at the suit of the injured party. In that case it appeared that in 1899 the plaintiff, at the age of twenty-two, married the defendant, who was an epileptic. In 1908 a child was born, issue of the marriage, and soon afterwards the plaintiff, then first learning of the statute mentioned, left the defendant, and brought suit for a divorce or a decree that the marriage was null and void. In her complaint she alleged that the defendant, though an epileptic, falsely and fraudulently concealed this fact from her and represented that he had never had epilepsy, in consequence of which representations she, believing them to be true, had been induced to enter the contract of marriage. The court said: "The fraud which makes the contract of marriage fraudulent, as that word is used in the Statute of Divorce, is a fraud in law and upon the law. Such a fraud is accomplished whenever a person enters into that contract knowing that he is incapable of sexual intercourse, and yet, in order to induce the marriage, designedly and deceitfully concealing that fact from the other party, who is ignorant of it and has no reason to suppose it to exist. Whether such incapacity proceeds from a physical or a merely legal cause is immaterial. The prohibition of the Act of 1895 fastened upon the defendant an incapacity which, if unknown to the plaintiff and by him fraudulently concealed from her with the purpose thereby to induce a marriage, made his contract of marriage, in the eye of the law, fraudulent. Whether, on such a state of facts, he could ask for a divorce, or would be precluded from thus taking advantage of his own wrong, we have no occasion to determine. The plaintiff could. The superior court has power to pass a decree of divorce from the bonds of matrimony in favor of a party to a marriage, not an epileptic, who has been tricked into it by the other party, who was an epileptic, through his fraud in inducing a belief that he was legally and physically competent to enter into the marital relation and fulfil all its duties, when he knew that he was not."

In the case of Jansa's Estate (1919) 169 Wis. 220, 171 N. W. 947, it was alleged on collateral attack that a marriage with an epileptic was void under the Wisconsin statute, the provisions of which are very similar to those of the Connecticut statute. The attack on the marriage was made by the sisters of a decedent, who claimed his estate as against his widow. The trial court found that the widow did not know that her husband was an epileptic and that the marriage was entered into in good faith, without any intention on the part of either of the parties thereto to violate the laws of the state. On these facts, the appellate court held, citing with approval Gould v. Gould (Conn.) supra, that a marriage in violation of the statute was voidable, but not void, and that the intention of the legislature to that effect was further evidenced by the fact that another section of the Wisconsin statutes was amended in 1917, subsequent to this particular marriage, so as to make an epileptic incapable of contracting marriage. A judgment for the widow was, therefore, affirmed.

In the reported case (BEHSMAN v. BEHSMAN, ante, 1501) it is held that under the Minnesota statute, which declares that "no marriage shall be contracted . . . between persons either of whom is epileptic," a marriage is not voidable at the suit of the husband on the sole ground that the wife was an epileptic at the time of the marriage, in the absence of any showing of fraud or concealment, it not appearing that the wife ever knew that her trouble was epilepsy. It is perhaps fairly deducible from this decision that if fraud or concealment had been shown, as in the Connecticut case, a decree of annulment would have been granted.

The case of Kitzman v. Werner (1918) 167 Wis. 808, 166 N. W. 789, however, seems to take a somewhat different view of the Minnesota statute. In that case, the action was brought by a wife to have her marriage declared valid and asking a stay of proceedings instituted by the defendant to have the plaintiff's husband committed to an insane asylum. The defendant, who, prior to the marriage, had been appointed guardian to the plaintiff's husband, answered, alleging that the marriage was void under the statutes of Minnesota, where the marriage ceremony was performed. On the trial the fact was established that the plaintiff's husband had been subject to attacks of epilepsy. The court held that the marriage "must be considered under the laws of the state of Minnesota, where it was performed, as voidable merely, and not void," but declared that under the facts as shown a decree of annulment should be entered. The court said: "The general proposition that a marriage valid where contracted is valid everywhere (Hall v. Industrial Commission (1917) 165 Wis. 364, L.R.A.1917D, 829, 162 N. W. 312, 16 N. C. C. A. 77) carries with it as a necessary corollary the further proposition that such marriage comes into a sister jurisdiction with all its inherent infirmities as well as strength. It can acquire no greater sanctity or impregnability by such removal than it had where solemnized. When properly challenged here it can have acquired, by reason of the parties returning to this state to live, no more immunity from attack than it would have had if they, from the time of the ceremony, and thereafter, had lived in Minnesota and the action was there instituted. This marriage in Minnesota was solemnized contrary to the express prohibition of the statutes of that state and contrary to its public policy. It was solemnized there after a fraud upon the clerk of the district court, in his duty to ascertain and to be satisfied that there was no legal impediment to such marriage, had there been perpetrated, either by the concealment by or false statement of the defendant Kitzman as to his condition on a material and statutory requirement. It could not properly be held that the public policy of Minnesota, in prohibiting an epileptic from contracting a lawful marriage, was contrary or repugnant to the then public policy of this state, inasmuch as this state then prohibited the marriage of insane persons and idiots; for, although there is a distinction both in the legal and medical sciences between epilepsy and insanity (Oborn v. State (1910) 143 Wis. 249, 276, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 966, 126 N. W. 737), yet the court may properly take judicial notice that epilepsy is a serious mental disease and tends to weaken the power of the afflicted person and to injure his posterity. Gould v. Gould (1905) 78 Conn. 242, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 581, 61 Atl. 604. We should be loath to declare, if not indeed prevented from declaring, that such a prohibition by Minnesota was contrary to the public policy of this state.

. . . The marriage ceremony, therefore, which plaintiff has asked the courts of this state to confirm in this action, was, when performed, contrary to the public policy of the state resorted to by the plaintiff for the sole purpose of performing the ceremony, and we shall give it no higher value here than it had there."

It may well be doubted whether the decision in Kitzman v. Werner (Wis.) supra, is of any weight as a construction of the Minnesota statute. The declaration that a marriage with an epileptic, in violation of that statute, is against the public policy of Minnesota, even in the absence of fraud or concealment as between the parties, is hardly consistent with the holding of the reported case (BEHSMAN v. BEHSMAN, ante, 1501). H. N. G.

JAMES VAN EVERY, Appt.

(222 N. Y. 74, 118 N. E. 244.)

Indictment — amendment of void indictment.

1. An amendment of an indictment charging commission of a crime at a date subsequent to that of the indictment to conform to proof showing its commission before that date is not authorized by a statute charging that when a variance between indictment and proof with respect to time shall appear, the court may direct the indictment to be amended.

2. An indictment charging the commission of a crime at a date subsequent to that of the indictment does not charge a crime.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Chautauqua County Court (Ottaway, J.) convicting him of adultery, and an order disallowing a demurrer to the indictment. Reversed.

People v. Davey, supra.

Hogan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The grand jury of Chautauqua county on the 8th day of February, 1915, presented to the supreme court an indictment against the defendant, wherein he was charged with a misdemeanor; viz., a violation of § 100 of the Penal Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 40). The indictment alleged that the crime was committed on the 17th day of October, 1915, upwards of eight months subsequent to the finding of the indictment. Defendant was arraigned on the indictment, pleaded not guilty, and the indictment was sent to the county court. The stenographer's minutes of proceedings had before the county judge disclose that on June 28, 1915, the plea of not guilty was withdrawn. Counsel for defendant moved to dismiss the indictment on the ground that the crime charged therein is alleged to have been committed on the 17th day of October, 1915, an impossible date, the same being in the future, and that the indictment does not comply with the provisions of §§ 280-284 of the Criminal Code. The motion was denied and an exception granted defendant. Thereupon defendant interposed a demurrer to the indictment, that the same in manner, form, and substance was insufficient in law; that it does not comply with the requirements of §§ 275 and 276 of the Code of Criminal Procedure; that the facts stated therein do not constitute a crime, and the indictment contains matter which, if true, would constitute a legal justification or excuse for the acts charged or other legal bar to the prosecution. The demurrer was overruled. The court then permitted the indictment to be amended so as to charge the commission of the crime in 1914 instead of 1915. Defendant refused to plead and judgment was pronounced against him. The judgment and orders of the county judge were affirmed by the appellate division. Defendant appeals to this court.

The record in this case contains some unexplainable and contradictory details. Still the question so far as the sufficiency of the indictment, the rulings of the county judge upon the motion made to dismiss the indictment, upon the demurrer, and allowing an amendment to the indictment, sufficiently appear to enable us to pass upon the correctness of the proceedings had therein.

While the precise time at which a crime was committed need not be stated in an indictment, it is essential to the validity of the same that it disclose that the crime was committed before the finding of the indictment by the grand jury. Code Crim. Proc. §§ 280, 284, subd. 5.

An indictment which charges a defendant with the commission of a crime anterior to the time of the finding and presentment of the same by the grand jury, or on or about a certain date, the particular time being unknown to the grand jury, would be a valid indictment, and upon the trial, the day and date appearing by the evidence, the indictment might then be amended. In the present case, the crime was charged as having been committed months subsequent to the finding of the same by the grand jury, an impossible date, and as matter of law cannot be regarded as charging a crime.

In Indiana the statute provides: "No indictment . . . shall be deemed invalid, nor shall the same be set aside or quashed . . . for any of the following defects: . . . Eighth, For omitting to state the time at which the offense was committed in any case in which time is not the essence of the offense; nor for stating the time imperfectly, unless time is of the essence of the offense." Burns's Anno. Stat. 1901, § 1825; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1756.

The decisions in that state are numerous to the effect that an indictment like the one at bar is invalid and should be set aside on motion. Terrell v. State, 165 Ind. 443, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 251, 112 Am. St. Rep. 244, 75 N. E. 884, 6 Ann. Cas. 851; State v. Noland, 29 Ind. 212; State v. Windell, 60 Ind. 300; Murphy v. State, 106 Ind. 96, 55 Am. Rep. 722, 5 N. E. 767, 7 Am. Crim. Rep. 264. The same rule has been applied in Com. v. Doyle, 110 Mass. 103; State v. Smith, 108 Iowa, 440, 79 N. W.

115; McGehee v. State, 26 Ala. 154.

It is argued by the district attorney that the amendment allowed to be made charging that the crime was committed on the 17th day of February, 1914, instead of the same day, 1915, was sufficient to uphold the indictment.

At common law the court was powerless to order an indictment to be amended. In this state the statute (Code Crim. Proc. § 293) provides: "Upon the trial of an indictment, when a variance between the allegation therein and the proof, in respect to time, or in the name or description of any place, person or thing, shall appear, the court may, in its judgment, if the defendant cannot be thereby prejudiced in his defense on the merits, direct the indictment to be amended, according to the proof, on such terms as to the postponement of the trial, to be had before the same or another jury, as the court may deem reasonable."

The sections following refer to an amendment made upon a trial, indicating clearly the intention of the legislature to permit amendments when the form of the indictment is disclosed by the proof upon the trial to be at variance with the indictment.

In the case at bar the grand jury did not charge the defendant with the commission of a crime at any time prior to the finding of the indictment. Code Crim. Proc. §§ 280, 284, subd. 5. Such omission was not one of form, but of substance. The county judge, however, sought by an amendment of the indictment to make good an invalid indictment and thus exercise the functions of the grand jury, without legal proof that defendant had ever committed a crime, or that he committed a crime on the 17th day of October, 1914. Such practice cannot be sustained. People v. Bromwich, 200 N. Y. 385, 93 N. E. 938; People v. Geyer, 196 N. Y. 364, 90 N. E. 48; People v. Trank, 88

sion of crime in —amendment of

void indictment.

It follows that as the grand jury did not present an indictment against the defendant setting forth facts sufficient to constitute a crime, and the county judge was in error in amending the indictment by inserting therein a matter of substance which, if proven upon the trial, would show that the defendant had committed a crime, and as no conviction can be had upon the indictment presented by the grand jury, the judgment and order of the Appellate Division must be reversed and the defendant discharged.

NOTE.

The power of the court to amend an indictment is treated in the annotation following DODGE v. UNITED STATES, post, 1516, amendment as to date of offense being specifically considered in subdivisions II. d, and III. b, of that note, according to whether the amendment in that respect is regarded as a matter of form or substance.

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit — May 16, 1919.

(169 C. C. A. 316, 258 Fed. 300.)

Indictment — amendment — effect.

1. The striking out of portions of a count in the indictment in the absence of the grand jury deprives the court of jurisdiction to proceed upon such count, although the amendment was made with consent of counsel for accused.

Appeal — communication between judge and jury — absence of counsel.

2. A communication by the judge to the jury after it has retired to consider its verdict as to whether or not conviction could be had on a certain count in the indictment, made without counsel's knowledge of its contents, is not reversible error if no information is given to the jury which was not contained in the original charge.

Constitutional law — freedom of speech — Espionage Act.

3. The constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech does not extend to the protection of utterances in time of war which involve the integrity of the nation or injure or tend to injure it.

Appeal — veracity of witnesses.

4. The United States circuit court of appeals cannot pass upon the veracity of witnesses upon appeal from a conviction in the lower court.

Criminal law — excessive sentence — effect.

5. The imposition of a sentence in excess of what the law permits does not render the authorized portion of the sentence void.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of New York to review a judgment convicting defendant of violating the Espionage Act. Judgment on third count affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Rogers, Hough, and Manton, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Irving M. Weiss and Eustace Reynolds for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Stephen T. Lockwood and John H. O'Day, for defendant in error:

The impressions of the witnesses were derived from personal observations of defendant's acts and actual knowledge of the substance of his speech at the time and place alleged and were not based on opinions or hearsay.

1 Wigmore, Ev. § 650.

The words and acts of defendant at the time and place, and under the circumstances, had as their natural tendency and reasonably probable effect the obstruction of recruiting and enlistment and incitement of resistance to the United States.

Debs v. United States, 249 U. S. 211, 63 L. ed. 566, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 252.

It was a question for the jury as to defendant's intent, under all the circumstances.

Evidence of plaintiff's views as to the causes of the war was admissible as bearing on his intent.

Debs v. United States, supra.

In answering "Yes" to question propounded by foreman of the jury as to whether defendant could be convicted on the first count, the judge was merely reiterating his instructions given in open court, and defendant was not prejudiced.

Rogers, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, hereinafter called the defendant, comes into this court to reverse a conviction under Espionage Act June 15, 1917, chap. 30, 40 Stat. at L. 217, as amended by Act May 16, 1918, chap. 75, 40 Stat. at L. 553. The indictment was based upon § 3 of title 1 of the act (Comp. Stat. § 10,212c, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 122) which is found in the margin.<sup>1</sup>

The indictment contains four counts. The first count in substance states that the defendant on June 22, 1918, at Buffalo, while the United States was at war with Germany and Austria-Hungary, "did then and there knowingly, wrongfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and wilfully utter and publish language intended to incite, provoke, and encourage resistance to the United States and promote the 'cause of its enemies,' by appearing upon the public streets in the presence and within the hearing of a large crowd of men forming part of the military forces of the United States, and capable of bearing arms, and, with the intent that they should hear, did then and there give utterance to words in substance to the effect that the United States should not be at war; that on July 3, 1918, there

<sup>1</sup>"Sec. 3. Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall wilfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States, or to promote the success of its enemies, or shall wilfully make or convey false reports or false statements, or say or do anything except by way of bona fide and not disloyal advice to an investor or investors, with intent to obstruct the sale by the United States of bonds or other securities of the United States, or the making of loans by or to the United States, and whoever, when the United States is at war, shall wilfully cause, or attempt to cause, or incite or attempt to incite, insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty, in the military or naval forces of the United States, or shall wilfully obstruct or attempt to obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United would be a meeting at the corner of Spring and Genesee streets, behind closed doors, at which things would be told about the war, and that his hearers were all invited to attend, and by inflection, tone of voice, and innuendo he, the said William Dodge, did then and there convey to his hearers the impression that things would be disclosed at said meeting about the present war that would bring the form of the government of the United States and the military and naval forces of the United States into contempt, scorn, contumely, and disrepute; and he, the said William Dodge, did furthermore then and there wilfully utter, publish, and proclaim to the aforesaid crowd of men words and language in substance as follows: 'Let us organize and follow the leaders, the agitators. Now they call us agitators pro-Germans. What right has the government to call us such now? If there was anything for us to fight for, we would do so, every one of us; but what are we fighting for? Nothing to our advantage; nothing for our good; nothing for our benefit. This war is not worth fighting for.' And at the same time and place the said William Dodge did enter into an argument with one of the audience, who stated that he was enlisted in the Army of the United States, and

States, and whoever, when the United States is at war, shall wilfully utter, print, write, or publish any disloyal, profane, scurrilous, or abusive language about the form of government of the United States, or the Constitution of the United States, or the military or naval forces of the United States, or the flag of the United States, or the uniform of the Army or Navy of the United States, or any language intended to bring the form of government of the United States, or the Constitution of the United States, or the military or naval forces of the United States, or the flag of the United States, or the uniform of the Army or Navy of the United States, into contempt, scorn, contumely, or disrepute, or shall wilfully utter, print, write, or publish any language intended to incite, provoke, or encourage resistance to the United States, or to promote the cause of its enemies, or the said William Dodge did then and there by word of mouth publicly heap scorn and contumely upon the said person because of his enlistment in the said Army."

The second count states that "at the same time and place, and by the same means, the defendant did knowingly, wrongfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and wilfully attempt to cause and incite insubordination, disloyalty, and refusal of duty in the military and naval forces of the United States."

The third count states that "at the same time and place, and in the same manner and by the same means as set forth in the two previous counts, the defendant did . . . knowingly, wrongfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and wilfully attempt to obstruct the recruiting and enlistment service of the United States."

The fourth count states "the manner and means of alleged violation, and charges that under the same circumstances, and at the same time and place, the defendant did in the same way by word and act oppose the cause of the United States in the aforesaid war."

The defendant pleaded not guilty. After a trial which lasted for several days, the jury rendered a verdict acquitting him on the second and fourth counts, and convicting shall wilfully display the flag of any foreign enemy, or shall wilfully by utterance, writing, printing, publication, or language spoken, urge, incite, or advocate any curtailment of production in this country of any thing or things, product or products, necessary or essential to the prosecution of the war in which the United States may be engaged, with intent by such curtailment to cripple or hinder the United States in the prosecution of the war, and whoever shall wilfully advocate, teach, defend, or suggest the doing of any of the acts or things in this section enumerated, and whoever shall by word or act support or favor the cause of any country with which the United States is at war or by word or act oppose the cause of the United States therein, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than twenty years, or both."

him on the first and third counts. The defendant was sentenced to be imprisoned in the Maryland state penitentiary at Baltimore, Maryland, at hard labor for a term of six years.

The defendant's father was born in England and his mother in France. He himself was born in Buffalo, and he is a member of the Socialist Labor Party and of the Workers' International Industrial Union, which prior to 1915 had been called the I. W. W.

It appears that while the jury was deliberating on its verdict the bailiff in charge brought to the judge a communication from it. Upon its receipt he summoned the counsel for both sides to his chambers and informed them that he had received a communication from the jury, but that he did not think he should disclose its substance at that time. Thereupon counsel withdrew, and the judge returned an answer to the jury's communication by the bailiff in charge. After the verdict was received the judge informed counsel that what the jury had asked was whether defendant could be convicted on the first count, and that he replied, "Yes;" and he stated that he had not at the time apprised counsel of the contents of the note, or of the reply, as it did not seem to him to be of enough importance, especially as he had in his instructions informed them that the defendant could be found guilty of one or all counts, or none at all; and it has been assigned as error that the court communicated with and instructed the jury, not in open court, and not in the presence, and without the knowledge and consent, of the defendant or his counsel, after the jury had retired to deliberate on their verdict.

It has been held in a few cases that after a jury has retired the court may give an instruction on a question of law in the absence of counsel. Bassett v. Salisbury Mfg. Co. 28 N. H. 438; School Dist. v. Bragdon, 23 N. H. 507; Shapley v. White, 6 N. H. 172; Goldsmith v.

Solomons, 33 S. C. L. (2 Shrobb.) 296, 300. In the case last cited the court said: "The intercourse between the jury and the bench is, in many respects, very confidential. Often the communications from the jury are of that kind which ought not to be communicated to the bar."

These cases are contrary to the clear weight of authority. In 38 Cyc. 1859, it is said: "It is almost universally held that no communication ought to take place between the judge and the jury after the cause has been committed to them by the charge of the judge, unless in open court."

That is undoubtedly the law. The leading case on this subject is Sargent v. Roberts, 1 Pick. 337, 11 Am. Dec. 185, which was decided by the supreme court of Massachusetts in 1823. In that case, after a jury had been out for six hours, the foreman wrote to the judge at his chambers that they could not agree and that they waited for his directions. The judge replied in writing, saying that he was unwilling to permit them to separate, and gave such directions as would enable them to reconsider the cause in a more systematic manner. And he directed the jury to bring his letter into court with them in order that it might be filed with the papers in the case. A new trial was ordered. The opinion was written by Chief Justice Parker, who said: "As it is impossible, we think, to complain of the substance of the communication, the only question is whether any communication at all is proper, and, if it was not, the party against whom the verdict was is entitled to a new trial. And we are all of opinion, after considering the question maturely, that no communication whatever ought to take place between the judge and the jury, after the cause has been committed to them by the charge of the judge, unless in open court, and, where practicable, in presence of the counsel in the cause."

The courts are practically unanimous in holding that private communications between court and jury are improper, and that all communications should be made in public. They are not, however, unanimous in holding that a private communication between judge and jury will in any case in which it occurs nullify the verdict. In Moseley v. Washburn, 165 Mass. 417, 43 N. E. 182, the judge answered a written question from the jury as to the date from which to compute interest; it having been covered in the original instruction. This was held not to require reversal. In Whitney v. Com. 190 Mass. 531, 77 N. E. 516 (1906), a civil case, the judge communicated with the jury privately, the communication being a collateral direction as to the manner of using the papers supplied for the reception of a verdict, and the court held that this did not require the verdict to be set aside. The court said in the Whitney Case: "There are grave objections to any communication with a jury made as this was. . . . But the facts stated in this case make it certain that no miscarriage of justice has resulted."

In Buntin v. Danville, 93 Va. 200, 24 S. E. 830, the judge answered a question of the jury, both question and answer being in writing, without informing counsel, who were in court engaged in another case. The court declined on that account to reverse, and declared that, while the better practice is to inform the counsel of any question asked by the jury, the irregularity would not vitiate the verdict, as the answer correctly stated the law and the verdict was plainly right. In People v. Kelly, 94 N. Y. 526, the judge answered a written communication from the jury. It did not appear what the communication was. The court held that the question was not properly raised by affidavit, and implied that the harmful nature of such communication should be shown, saying that the presumption is that there was no violation of duty on the part of the court.

The only case in the Federal courts which has come to our attention is Fillipon v. Albion Vein Slate Co. 155 C. C. A. 98, 242 Fed. 258, decided by the circuit court of appeals in the third circuit. The court held that under the circumstances of the case a written communication between the court and the jury, after the jury had retired, is not ground for reversal in a civil case, where no harm results; the question and answer being preserved of record. The question in that case concerned the applicable rule of contributory negligence. The court found nothing to complain of in the answer, and the only question was whether there ought to be a reversal because the instruction was not given in open court. In its opinion the court said: "Is there a compelling reason of policy why a trial fairly and accurately conducted must be always set aside, where such an irregularity has crept in, although it has done no actual harm, and is unlikely to do harm? We do not see our way to answer this question in the affirmative, and must, therefore, affirm the judgment."

And see State use of Grabinsky v. Smit, 20 Mo. App. 50; State v. Nash, 51 S. C. 319, 28 S. E. 946.

In the instant case it is evident that no possible harm resulted or could result from the communication which passed between court and jury. The communication gave the jury no information which was not contained in the original charge. While the judge should not have done what he did, to reverse on that ground would, under the circumstances, be so extremely technical that it does not at all approve itself to our judgment.

At the close of the case counsel for the government moved to strike out as surplusage a portion of the first paragraph of the first count of the indictment, and the word "mutiny" from the first paragraph of the second count. Counsel for defendant at once said: "No objection." The court granted the motion. This is now assigned for error. That it was error of the most serious kind is not to be doubted. The rule is almost universally recognized, both in this country and in England, that an indictment cannot be amended by the court, and that an attempt to do so is fatal to a verdict upon the count.

The Supreme Court in Ex parte Bain, 121 U. S. 1, 30 L. ed. 849, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 781, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 122, declared that it was beyond question that in the English courts indictments could not be amended, and that no authority had been cited in the American courts which sustained the right of a court to amend any part of the body of an indictment without reassembling the grand jury, unless by virtue of a statute. In that case the trial court amended the indictment by striking out six words as being surplusage. The Supreme Court held that this deprived the court of power to try the prisoner. There was only one count in the indictment in that case. And the court said: "The power of the court to proceed to try the prisoner is as much arrested as if the indictment had been dismissed or a nolle prosequi had been entered."

* "Another subject has been suggested during the course of this trial, in reference to which I conceive that I should give you instructions. You should understand, gentlemen, that it is a constitutional provision that a person has the right of freedom of speech, and Congress, true enough, has no right to enact laws abridging the freedom of speech; but, gentlemen, this is a much-abused term, and I instruct you that the guaranty cannot be successfully resorted to as a protection in time of war, where things that are said or uttered involve the integrity of the nation, or injure or tend to injure the United States—in other words, a citizen would not be permitted to speak or write in the time of war in a way that would interfere with the successful ending of the war. While citizens may fairly criticize the laws of Congress, and even the acts of the President, or of the Army or Navy, yet such criticism must be honest and based upon truth, and not with the intent to violate the Sedition Act in question.

We therefore hold in the instant case that the amendment made in the first two counts <sup>Indictment—amendment—
effect.</sup> deprived the court of power to proceed upon those counts; but this did not affect the right to try the defendant upon the third and fourth counts. As the jury acquitted on the fourth count, the question is as to the validity of the third count. That count is well drawn, and the conviction under that count must be sustained unless the Espionage Act is unconstitutional.

It was claimed at the argument that the trial judge gave the impression to the jury that the defendant had no right to freedom of speech while the country was at war, and that Congress, in time of war, could enact laws in violation of the 1st Amendment, which provides that Congress shall make no law abridging freedom of speech. That portion of the charge complained of may be found in the margin.*

We see no error in the above instruction, which in effect amounted to what the Supreme Court said in the cases of Schenck v. United States, 249 U. S. 47, 63 L. ed. 470, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 247; Frohwerk v.

When the words uttered are accompanied by a wilful intent to disobey the statute, and to obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, or the purposes that the United States has in engaging in the war, or to induce disloyalty or insubordination, or attempt so to do, then, gentlemen, what was said becomes seditious and an infraction of the statute.

"In this respect, gentlemen, the Sedition Act, as amended in May, 1918, and under which this indictment is found, is very broad and comprehensive, and it will bear reading again. This is an extraordinary measure, limited to times when the United States is at war, and by that I mean to be understood as saying that very likely the things that are claimed to be said, if they were said, would not be a violation of the statute if we were not at war, but being at war, a different situation presents itself, and Congress has met the situation by enacting the statute to which am now calling your attention."

United States, 249 U. S. 204, 68 L. ed. 561, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 249, and Debs v. United States, 249 U. S. 211, 68 L. ed. 566, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 252. The act is constitutional and there is evidence which, if the jury believed it, justified the verdict. The evidence was very conflicting, and Dodge, who took the stand, denied flatly that he had said certain things which others stated he had said. But this court cannot pass upon the veracity of the witnesses, and determine whether Dodge or his accusers told the truth.

It appears that, in sentencing the defendant to imprisonment, the court sentenced him to imprisonment for "hard labor," and that those words are not found in the act for the violation of which the conviction was obtained. But where a court has jurisdiction of the person and the offense, the imposition of a sentence in excess of what the law permits does not render the authorized portion of the sentence void, but only the portion of it which is in excess. This annotation, in presenting those cases which discuss the power of the court to amend indictments, does so without regard to whether in each instance the power was exercised on the court's initiative or on the motion of counsel. But cases are excluded wherein it was apparent that the court acted with the consent of the grand jury; and likewise cases in which a discussion of the power of amendment arose in regard to a formal accusation, by information preferred in a jurisdiction possessing no grand jury system.

vigorous strictness in the framing of indictments arose in the courts of that country, from the humane tendency of the judges to seize on any flaw in the indictment when a life might thereby be saved. It was under these circumstances that the common-law doctrine, denying any power in the court to amend indictments, gained its force. But with the abolishment of capital punishment for all but a few offenses, the occasion for the strictness of the common-law courts no longer existed, and statutes were enacted giving the courts the power of amendment as to formal or technical defects which did not affect the substance of the indictment, but which might have afforded a means of escape to many criminals. But the rule was not changed in respect to amendments of substance, since to amend an indictment in matter of substance would, in effect, render it no longer the finding of the grand jury, and in the United States, at least, the constitutional right of an accused to be tried only on the presentment or indictment of a grand jury must be considered.

The present power of the courts to amend indictments in matters of form is generally based on statute, although there are a few cases apparently decided in the absence of statute, which have held that the court could amend an indictment in respect to its form. But owing to the relatively few cases in this classification, and because of the uncertainty of determining from the cases themselves whether there was a statute existent at the time, such cases have been set forth in conjunction with other cases affirmatively showing the existence of some statutory authority.

a. Caption.

The caption of an indictment has been defined as that part of the accusation showing where, when, and by what authority it has been taken, found, or executed, and is here taken in its broadest sense. While there is some divergence of opinion as to whether the caption is in law a part of the indictment, it is considered as such for the purposes of this note.

The court may properly allow an amendment to the caption of an indictment, and it seems that this authority could be exercised at common law as well as under statute, since the caption has not been considered as more than a formal statement of the proceedings attendant on the return of the accusation itself.

In Iowa, it has been held that the caption, not being a material part of an indictment, is the proper subject of amendment by direction of the court under the statute (Code Supp. 1913, § 5289). State v. Pelsner (1917) 182 Iowa, 1, 163 N. W. 600.

In Indiana, the right of the court to authorize the amendment of the caption of an indictment was early declared in Moody v. State (1845) 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 424.

And so in State v. Moore (1849) 1 Ind. 548, wherein an indictment read: "The grand jurors impaneled and sworn, ..... upon their ..... present," it was held that the state was properly given leave to amend by inserting the word "oath," the court characterizing the amendment as of no consequence.

In State v. Humphries (1883) 35 La. Ann. 966, it was held proper for the court to authorize the correction of a clerical error in the indictment as to the date of the term of court at which the indictment was found.

In the early case of State v. Jones (1827) 9 N. J. L. 2, it was held proper for the court to authorize an amendment of the caption of an indictment so as to make it conform to the facts.

And in State v. Norton (1850) 23 N. J. L. 33, it was held that a misnomer of one of the grand jurors in the caption of an indictment was a mere clerical error, which was the proper subject of amendment.

Similarly in State v. Society for Establishing Useful Manufactures (1880) 42 N. J. L. 504, wherein the defendant moved to quash an indictment on the ground that the caption thereof stated that the indictment had been presented in "the year of our Lord one ..... eight hundred and seventy-nine," the court held that the defect might be cured by amendment at common law, on the authority of State v. Jones (N. J.) supra.

But compare Cruiser v. State (1841) 18 N. J. L. 206, wherein the court stated that it had searched in vain for any authority to order an amendment to an indictment after a writ of error thereto, though the defect in the caption and various other mistakes in the indictment only extended to the form of the charge.

In State v. Jenkins (1887) 64 N. H. 375, 10 Atl. 699, it was said that the trial court was clearly authorized by statute (Gen. Laws, chap. 260, § 13) to direct an amendment curing a defect in the caption of an indictment.

And in Brown v. Com. (1875) 78 Pa. 122, wherein the caption of an indictment entitled as in the oyer and terminer was amended by direction of the court so as to be entitled as in the court of quarter sessions, this was held a proper amendment, the error being a technical one not prejudicial to the defendant.

In the early case of State v. Creight (1802) 3 S. C. L. (1 Brev.) 169, 2 Am. Dec. 656, it was held that the caption of an indictment could be amended by the court by the insertion of the phrase, "upon their oaths," referring to the method of presentment by the grand jury.

And in State v. Williams (1822) 13 S. C. L. (2 M'Cord) 301, it was said that the court had the right to amend the caption of an indictment at any time.

Likewise, in Vandyke v. Dare (1828) 17 S. C. L. (1 Bail.) 66, it was held that the caption of an indictment might be amended at any time by the journals of the court.

In State v. Moore (1886) 24 S. C. 150, 58 Am. Rep. 241, wherein an indictment alleged the county in which the court was holden, and then alleged that "the jurors of and for the county of ..... aforesaid," etc., it was held that this was a part of the caption of the indictment which might be amended at any time.

In Bosshard v. State (1860) 25 Tex. Supp. 207, wherein an indictment for gaming omitted the word "court" after the word "district," shewing in what court the indictment was presented, the trial court permitted an amendment remedying the omission, and the amendment was held proper as going to a defect which article 488 of the Code of Criminal Procedure expressly treated as a defect of form, which class of defects was amendable under article 508.

And in Mathews v. State (1874) 44 Tex. 376, where an indictment did not show on its face that it was found in the "district court" of the county, the court, remanding the cause for the act of the court below in overruling an exception to the defect, said: "The court does not now perceive any good reason why this defect of form could not have been amended by motion of the district attorney. When the exception to an indictment is merely on account of form, the same shall be amended, if decided to be defective, and the cause proceed upon such amended indictment.' Paschal's Dig. art. 2977. This was done in the case of Bosshard v. State (1860) 25 Tex. Supp. 210, which was sanctioned by this court."

In James v. State (1875) 44 Tex. 314, a bill of indictment as presented omitted the word "court," where it should have appeared in order to show that the indictment was presented in the criminal "court" of the city of Jefferson. The omission was corrected under direction of the court, and such amendment was held proper.

And see Long v. State (1876) 1 Tex. App. 466, wherein the court said, by way of dictum, that the omission of the word "court" in the allegation of an indictment purporting to show in what court the indictment was presented was a defect of form which might have been cured by amendment in the court below. Paschal's Dig. art. 2977.

In Hauck v. State (1876) 1 Tex. App. 357, the court refused to reverse a judgment of conviction because the indictment did not state the court in which it was presented, since the omission was "a mere matter of form, and could have been cured by amendment if the objection had been pointed out at the proper time." Code Crim. Proc. art. 488.

In Sharp v. State (1879) 6 Tex. App. 650, the court allowed an amendment correcting an allegation in the caption of an indictment that described the meeting of the court as in the year "one thousand, eighteen hundred and seventy-six," so as to read "one thousand, eight hundred and seventy-six," and this was held proper, the court saying: "By art. 508 it would seem that an indictment may be amended, so far as form is concerned, whether exception had been taken to it or not. The article is: 'When the exception to an indictment or information is merely on account of form, the same shall be amended, if decided to be defective, and the cause proceed upon such amended indictment or information.' The amendment was one of form merely, and the court did not err in permitting the amendment."

Where an indictment as originally drawn did not, on its face, show the court or term to which it was presented, it was held that the defect was one of form only, and properly amended under direction of the court. Banks v. State (1880) 7 Tex. App. 591.

Where the court permitted the amendment of the caption of an indictment by substituting "fourth Monday" for the words "first Monday," as to the time at which the term of court was being held when the indictment was found, the amendment was held proper under the authority of the statute. Code Crim. Proc. arts. 549, 550; Osborne v. State (1887) 23 Tex. App. 431, 5 S. W. 251, later appeal in (1887) 24 Tex. App. 398, 6 S. W. 538.

And where an indictment was defective since not showing that it was presented in the district court of the county where the grand jury was in session, the court held that the defect, being one of form, was a proper subject for amendment. Murphey v. State (1891) 29 Tex. App. 507, 16 S. W. 417.

Likewise, in Grayson v. State (1896) 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 629, 34 S. W. 901, it was held that an allegation in an indictment as to the term at which the grand jury was organized was surplusage which might be amended by the court at any time.

And in Murphy v. State (1896) 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 24, 35 S. W. 174, wherein the court allowed an amendment to an indictment by inserting the word "October," to show the date of the organization of the grand jury which found the indictment, it was held that, the entry of date being merely formal, the allowance of the amendment constituted no error.

It was held in Reys v. State (1908) 45 Tex. Crim. Rep. 463, 76 S. W. 467, 77 S. W. 213, that an indictment which showed that it was presented at the August term of the district court was properly amended by direction of the court, to show its presentation at the July term of the district court.

Likewise, where the court permitted the district attorney to amend an indictment by inserting the date of the term of court at which the grand jury was organized, it was held that the court committed no error, the amendment being surplusage and a mere matter of form, authorized by Code Crim. Proc. arts. 598, 599. Hightower v. State (1914) 73 Tex. Crim. Rep. 258, 165 S. W. 184.

In State v. McCarty (1850) 2 Pinney (Wis.) 518, 54 Am. Dec. 150, the court held that it was not error to allow amendments to the caption of an indictment by inserting therein a description of the term of the court at which the indictment was presented, and further describing the grand jurors, since the indictment was in all respects good before the amendments were allowed, and their allowance did not prejudice the defendant.

In Allen v. State (1856) 5 Wis. 329, wherein the circuit court permitted the caption of an indictment to be amended by the records of the court so as to show that the day of the actual presentment of the same into court by the grand jury was on a later date than that on which the offense therein charged was alleged to have been committed, the court held that the amendment was properly allowed.

And in State v. Emmett (1869) 23 Wis. 632, the court stated that the caption of an indictment was merely a formal statement of the proceedings describing the court before which the indictment was found, and as such might be amended to conform to the records of the term.

And see the early English case of Rex v. Darley (1803) 4 East, 174, 102 Eng. Reprint, 796, wherein it was held that the court might authorize an amendment to the caption of an indictment by inserting therein the time when, and the court where, the indictment was found, and the names of the grand jurors presenting it.

b. Name of accused.

Under a statute permitting amendment in matter of form, it is generally held that the court may allow an amendment to an indictment in correction of a misnomer therein as to the name of the accused, where no change of identity is involved, the defect being one of form only. In People v. Carroll (Cal.) supra, the court permitted the amendment of an indictment by striking out the name of a third person appearing therein, and inserting of the name of the defendant. The amendment was apparently but the correction of a typographical error, and was held to be clearly authorized by § 1008 of the Penal Code, which provides that an indictment may be amended in the discretion of the court at any time after the defendant has pleaded, where it can be done without prejudicing his substantial rights and without changing the offense charged.

In Burroughs v. State (Fla.) supra, an indictment was amended with the court's permission by striking out an erroneous middle initial of the defendant's name after his plea in abatement specifying the misnomer. On appeal, this was held a proper amendment under an act (Laws 1861, chap. 1107, § 3) providing substantially that at any time it shall appear on the application of the accused that there is a defect in the form of the indictment which may expose him to a new indictment, it shall be the duty of the court to obviate the objection.

In International Harvester Co. v. Com. (1907) 124 Ky. 543, 99 S. W. 637, where an indictment returned against the "International Harvester Machine Company" was, by order of the court, corrected by an entry of record, setting out the true corporate name of the defendant as the "International Harvester Company of America," this was held a proper change under the authority of § 125 of the Criminal Code.

In Russellville Home Teleph. Co. v. Com. (1908) 83 Ky. L. Rep. 132, 109 S. W. 340, an indictment having been brought against the Home Telephone Company, the trial court allowed an order entered of record, changing the name of the defendant to the Russellville Home Telephone Company, which was its true corporate name. Objection was made to this change, but the court held that it was authorized by a statute (Crim. Code, § 125) which provided as follows: "An error as to the name of the defendant shall not vitiate the indictment, nor proceedings thereon, and if his true name be discovered at any time before execution, an entry shall be made on the record of the court of his true name, referring to the fact of his being indicted by the name mentioned in the indictment, and the subsequent proceedings shall be in the true name."

In Louis v. Com. (1894) 16 Ky. L. Rep. 284, it was held that the defendant could not complain of the action of the court in sustaining a motion of the commonwealth's attorney that the description of the defendant in the indictment as "S. J. Lewis" should be corrected by an entry on the record, and the prosecution continued as against "Jo. Lewis."

And in Com. v. Jenkins (1903) 115 Ky. 62, 72 S. W. 363, it was held proper for the trial court to correct a mistake in an indictment as to the defendant's name, by changing the style of the prosecution from "Albert Jenkins" to "Jeff Jenkins," since it must be presumed that the grand jury intended to indict the Jenkins guilty of the crime named in the indictment, and such change was expressly authorized by statute. Crim. Code, § 125.

Under § 1047 of the Revised Statutes of Louisiana, it is proper for the court to order the amendment of an indictment by an insertion of the Christian name of the accused. State v. Matthews (1908) 111 La. 962, 36 So. 48.

In State v. Grimms (1918) 143 La. 421, 78 So. 661, a prosecution for murder, the trial court allowed an amendment to the indictment changing the name of the person accused from Eddie Graham to Eddie Grimms. The accused did not contend that any change was made thereby with reference to the identity of the person accused, and the court held that the amendment, being one as to name only, was proper (Rev. Stat. § 1047).

See, in this connection, the early case of Com. v. Phillipsburg (1818) 10 Mass. 78, wherein, the attorney general having moved for an amendment to an indictment against the town of Phillipsburg by changing the name of the defendant to Hollis in accordance with an alteration made by the legislature, the court held that in the absence of statute it could not authorize the change, although it plainly was an immaterial defect.

And compare Hammond v. State (1859) 14 Md. 135. The defendant herein had been indicted as a "free negress" for obtaining goods under false pretenses. At the trial it appeared that she was a slave, and the court directed an amendment to the indictment, describing the defendant as "the negro slave of Philip Hammon." The defendant excepted to the allowance of the amendment which the prosecutor sought to justify under the Act of 1852, chapter 176, which authorized an amendment as to the name of the accused when the misnomer was pleaded. The court held that the case was not within the purview of the statute, since the amendment was as to the degree or condition of the party charged. But, the amendment being surplusage, the judgment below was affirmed.

Where the accused pleaded a misnomer in one count of an indictment which designated him as Charles Dillard, instead of by his correct name as Charles Orr, it was held proper for the court to grant an amendment correcting the error, under the authority of § 1435 of the Code of 1892. Orr v. State (1902) 81 Miss. 130, 32 So. 998.

And see Wood v. State (1887) 64 Miss. 761, 2 So. 247, wherein the court stated that, under the provisions of § 3081 of the Code of 1880, the trial court could have ordered an amendment of an indictment to conform the Christian name of the accused therein to the evidence of such name on the trial, had the trial court considered the variance not material to the merits of the case. And in view of this amendatory authority, it was held that, since the defendant had failed to object to the variance in the court below, it would not be a ground for reversal here.

It was held in Smith v. State (1913) 103 Miss. 356, 60 So. 330, that the court, under the authority of § 1508, Code of 1906, might direct an amendment to an indictment, correcting a misnomer therein as to the Christian name of the accused.

Compare McGuire v. State (1857) 35 Miss. 366, 72 Am. Dec. 124, wherein it was held that the court had no power to authorize an amendment to an indictment, correcting a misnomer therein as to the Christian name of the accused, without the concurrence of the grand jury. This case arose previous to the adoption of the Revised Code of 1857, permitting such amendments.

In Missouri, it has been provided by statute (Rev. Code 1855, art. 4, § 25) as follows: "If a defendant be indicted by a wrong name, unless he declare his true name before pleading, he shall be proceeded against by the name in the indictment. If he allege that another name is his true name, it must be entered on the minutes of the court; and after such entry, the trial and all other proceedings on the indictment shall be had against him by that name, referring also to the name by which he is indicted, in the same manner in all respects, and with the same consequences, as if he had been indicted by his true name." Under the authority of this provision it has been held proper for the court to enter the name of an accused on the minutes of the court as William Schricker, and to proceed against him by that name, thus in effect amending the indictment which had been returned against him under the name of William Shuckler. State v. Schricker (1860) 29 Mo. 265.

In Re Hironymous (1915) 38 Nev. 194, 147 Pac. 459, the court expressed the opinion that the omission to insert the name of the defendant in a blank space in the indictment, where such omission evidently arose through inadvertence, was a defect in form only, which might have been remedied by the trial court under the provision of the statute permitting amendments. Rev. Laws, § 7060.

In State, Hubbard, Prosecutor, v. State (1898) 62 N. J. L. 628, 43 Atl. 699, wherein a misnomer appeared in an indictment as to the name of the defendant, it was held that the indictment should not be abated, on motion, for such misnomer, since under the statute (Gen. Stat. p. 1128, § 41) the court was authorized to amend the indictment so as to cure such a defect.

In Lasure v. State (1869) 19 Ohio St. 43, the defendant pleaded in abatement that his name was not Henry Lasure as it appeared in the indictment, but William H. Lasure, and in correction of the misnomer, the court entered his true name on the minutes of the court, the prosecution proceeding on the indictment, but under the corrected name. The defendant claimed that this action of the court was in contravention of the constitutional guaranty that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or infamous crime unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury; but he did not deny that he was the person accused in the indictment, and the court stated that, a name not being of the substance of an indictment, it could find no error in the action of the trial court.

In State v. Manning (1855) 14 Tex. 402, it was held that, on a plea in abatement setting forth a misnomer in an indictment as to the middle initial of the accused, the court should have allowed an amendment in correction thereof under the authority of the Act of February 9, 1854.

In Morris v. State (1878) 4 Tex. App. 589, it was held proper under the authority of article 469 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, for the court to direct an amendment to an indictment by inserting therein the names of the defendants as stated in their plea in abatement, in place of the names originally set out in the indictment.

And where the accused appeared on the first day of trial and urged that his true name was not set forth in the indictment, it was held proper for the court to direct an amendment to the indictment by inserting therein the true name of the defendant as suggested by himself, since such amendment was expressly authorized by the Penal Code. Sinclair v. State (1895) 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 453, 30 S. W. 1070.

In Colter v. State (1899) 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 78, 51 S. W. 945, the trial court allowed an amendment to an indictionment, changing the Christian name of the accused therein from "Isaiah" to "Isell," in accordance with the suggestion of the accused. The accused later requested an instruction to the jury to acquit on the ground that the court had authority to make the above change only in the formal portion of the indictment, and not in the charging portion thereof, but this court held that the change was properly authorized wherever the variance occurred, under the provision of article 549, Code of Criminal Procedure.

In Clark v. State (1903) 45 Tex. Crim. Rep. 456, 76 S. W. 573, an indictment was amended on the suggestion of the defendant, by changing his name therein from "J. C. Clark" to "Joseph Clark," and this was held to be proper practice although the jury was not resworn after the amendment, the middle initial being an immaterial matter, and the proper subject of amendment. Code Crim. Proc. art. 549.

Where a defendant moved to quash an indictment on the ground that it alleged his name as "J. W. Wood," when his true name was "J. W. Woods," it was held that the court properly directed that the record be changed in this respect, under the express provisions of the statute. Code Crim. Proc. 1911, art. 560. Woods v. State (1912) 67 Tex. Crim. Rep. 569, 150 S. W. 633.

Similarly, in Peters v. State (1913) 69 Tex. Crim. Rep. 403, 154 S. W. 563, wherein the defendant, who had been indicted under the name of "Pierce," suggested that his name was "Peters," it was held proper for the court to order an amendment in correction of the name.

In Thompson v. State (1913) 72 Tex. Crim. Rep. 6, 160 S. W. 685, the defendant suggested, after the reading of the indictment to the jury, that his name was not correctly set forth therein, whereupon the court directed an amendment in correction of the misnomer, and this was held proper.

And in Carter v. State (1916) 78 Tex. Crim. Rep. 240, 181 S. W. 473, wherein the defendant objected to being indicted and tried under an erroneous appellation, and the court directed an amendment to the indictment curing the misnomer, it was held that the action of the court was strictly in accordance with the statute. Code Crim. Proc. arts. 456, 559-561.

And the action of the court in directing an amendment to an indictment in correction of a misnomer therein as to the surname of the defendant, on his plea in abatement setting out the error, was held proper in Rios v. State (1916) 79 Tex. Crim. Rep. 89, 133 S. W. 151, under the provisions of the statute (Code Crim. Proc. art. 560).

In Roberts v. State (1918) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 201 S. W. 998, it was held that the defendant had a right to have an amendment directed in correction of a misnomer in the indictment as to his name.

And see Popinaw v. State (1908) 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 409, 107 S. W. 350, wherein it was held that the statute authorizing the amendment of an indictment by the correction of a misnomer therein as to the defendant's name was mandatory, and the failure of the court to comply with the defendant's suggestion as to the misnomer was reversible error.

In State v. Arnold (1878) 50 Vt. 731, it was held that an amendment to an indictment for adultery by inserting, after the description of the accused as "Roxcena Whitney," the words "otherwise called Rosa Whitney," could only be regarded as a formal alteration, and was properly allowed, although not within the provision of § 1, No. 5, Acts of 1870, permitting amendments in the correction of "formal defects apparent on the face of the indictment." The court said: "It is obvious, without illustration, that a defect that does not affect the merits of the case, or the evidence necessary to be given to maintain the indictment, as is true in the case before us, can be regarded as only formal."

In Shifflett v. Com. (1894) 90 Va. 386, 18 S. E. 838, wherein the court ordered the amendment of an indictment by striking out the name of Scott Crawford, and inserting in lieu thereof the name of Scott Chifflett, alias Scott Crawford, it was held that such amendment was proper under the authority of § 3999 of the Code, providing that "the court may, in case of a misnomer appearing before or in the course of a trial, forthwith cause the indictment or accusation to be amended according to the fact."

But compare Com. v. Buzzard (1848) 5 Gratt. (Va.) 694, wherein the attorney for the commonwealth moved for leave to amend an indictment by striking out the name of Benjamin Collins, and inserting in lieu thereof the name of Peter Buzzard, and the trial court, with the consent of Peter Buzzard, referred the question of its right to so amend, to this court, which held that the amendment was not authorized by chap. 20 of the Act of March 14, 1848, relative to proceedings in criminal cases.

And see Bradshaw v. Com. (1860) 16 Gratt. (Va.) 507, 86 Am. Dec. 722, wherein the dictum was expressed that an indictment "cannot be changed or altered in the slightest degree, by any power, after it has been returned into court and the grand jury is discharged. The Statutes of Jeofails which, in general terms, authorize corrections and amendments in process and pleadings, have never been held to apply to indictments."

In State v. Strayer (1906) 53 W. Va. 676, 52 S. E. 862, wherein the trial court permitted an indictment to be amended so as to state the true name of the defendant, it was held that such amendments were proper under the statute (Code 1899, chap. 158, § 10), authorizing the court, in the case of a misnomer appearing, to forthwith direct an amendment to the indictment in accord with the fact.

Under the authority of the early English statute (7 Geo. IV. chap. 64, § 19), it was held proper in Reg. v. Orchard (1838) 8 Car. & P. (Eng.) 565, for the court to direct an amendment to an indictment, changing the description of the defendant as "the wife of John Orchard" so as to read "the widow of John Orchard."

1. Victim of homicide.

Under statutory authority to amend in matter of form, it is held that the court may properly allow the amendment of an indictment in correction of a misnomer as to the name of the victim of a homicide, such error being considered a defect in form only. Distinction is to be made between a change in the name and a change in the identity of the victim, the latter being a matter of substance, and not the subject of amendment. See III. a, infra. State v. Peterson (1889) 41 La. Ann. 85, 6 So. 527; State v. Lee (1911) 127 La. 1077, 54 So. 356; State v. Grimms (1918) 143 La. 421, 78 So. 661; Miller v. State (1890) 68 Miss. 221, 8 So. 273; Wilkinson v. State (1900) 77 Miss. 705, 27 So. 639; Thurmond v. State (1908) 94 Miss. 1, 47 So. 434; State v. Tolla (1905) 72 N. J. L. 515, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 523, 62 Atl. 675.

In State v. Peterson (1889) 41 La. Ann. 85, 6 So. 527, it was held that the court properly directed the amendment of an indictment for murder by a correction of the Christian name of the deceased, under the authority of the statute (Rev. Stat. § 1047).

And in State v. Lee (1911) 127 La. 1077, 54 So. 356, wherein it appeared that before trial the court had permitted an amendment to an indictment for murder by changing the name of the person alleged to have been killed from John Williams to James Williams, it was held that such amendment was expressly authorized by statute (Rev. Stat. § 1047).

In State v. Grimms (1918) 143 La. 421, 78 So. 661, a prosecution for murder, the trial court allowed an amendment to the indictment, changing the name of the alleged victim of the homicide from that of Jake Graham to that of Jacob Grimms. The accused did not claim that any change was made with reference to the identity of the victim, and the court held that the amendment, being as to name only, was properly allowed under the authority of statute (Rev Stat. § 1047).

The court distinguished this holding from that in State v. Morgan (1888) 35 La. Ann. 1189 (see III. a, infra), since in the latter case the change was one of identity, and not alone as to name. The statement therein that § 1047 of the Revised Statutes "only authorized such a change in an indictment as to names as would correct formal errors or misdescriptions in names attempted or intended to be set forth properly therein, and not to make radical and material changes as to persons or things pertaining to the substance of the indictment, and by which the defendant might be prejudiced," applies equally to both cases.

In Miller v. State (1890) 68 Miss. 221, 8 So. 273, the direction of the trial court that an indictment for murder be amended so that the Christian name of the deceased, as it appeared therein, should conform to his real name as disclosed on the trial, was held proper.

Section 1485 of the Mississippi Code of 1892 provided for the amendment of indictments to remedy variances in the names or descriptions of any persons alleged therein to have been damaged as the result of the crime of the person indicted, and under the authority of this statute it was held in Wilkinson v. State (1900) 77 Miss. 705, 27 So. 639, that the court could properly have directed an amendment to an indictment for infanticide, which would have given the names of the parties slain, in amplification of the allegation in the indictment that the defendant had murdered "two certain human beings, the same being then and there her infant children."

And it was held proper, under the authority of § 1508 of the Code of 1906, for the court to authorize an amendment to an indictment for murder, which changed the designation of the decedent therein from that of "Will Johnson" to that of "Convict No. 12." Thurmond v. State (1908) 94 Miss. 1, 47 So. 434.

In State v. Tolla (1905) 72 N. J. L. 515, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 523, 62 Atl. 675, a variance arose between the allegation of an indictment for murder and the evidence as to the Christian name of the decedent, which variance was cured by an amendment under direction of the court. This was held proper under the authority of § 34 of the Criminal Procedure Act, as an amendment not changing the identity of the decedent, but only designating it in conformity to the facts developed.

2. Owner of property.

The allowance by the court of an amendment to an indictment as to the name of the person alleged therein to be the owner of the property which is the subject of the crime is generally authorized, as the correction of a defect in form.

Canada.—Reg. v. Jackson (1869) 19 U. C. C. P. 280.

Where the trial court permitted the county attorney to amend an indictment by averring therein the ownership of certain property alleged to have been obtained by false pretenses, it was held that since such amendment related to a matter of form, and not of substance, the court did not err. Code Supp. 1913, § 5289. State v. Kiefer (1915) 172 Iowa, 306, 151 N. W. 440.

In State v. Elder (1869) 21 La. Ann. 157, the trial court permitted the district attorney to amend an indictment for arson, by removing an ambiguity as to the ownership of the burned buildings. The defendant urged this amendment as a ground for reversal, but the court held that since the indictment was good before the amendment, and no real change was made, the defendant was not affected thereby. See Stat. 1855, § 137.

It was provided by § 1047, Revised Statutes of Louisiana, that indictments may be amended "on or before the trial when there shall appear to be any variance between the statement in the indictment and the testimony in the names of places, or of persons, or in setting forth the ownership of property, or in the name or description of any matter or thing whatsoever named or described in the indictment, if the court should be of opinion that the variance is not material and the amendment will not prejudice the defendant in his defense." So, where the trial court authorized an amendment to an indictment for larceny by correcting the name of the owner of the stolen property, the amendment was held proper. State v. Holmes (1871) 23 La. Ann. 604.

And where the defendant stood indicted for burglary and grand larceny, and the trial court permitted the district attorney to amend the indictment twice, over the defendant's objection, and such amendments were as to the names of the owners of the property alleged to have been stolen, the court held that the amendments were properly allowed, under the express terms of the statute (Rev. Stat. 1870, § 1047). And see § 18 of the Statute March 14, 1855. State v. Christian (1878) 30 La. Ann. 367.

In State v. Ware (1892) 44 La. Ann. 954, 11 So. 579, an indictment for horse stealing alleged that ownership of the horse was in one Dansby. During the trial, the court allowed an amendment of the indictment, the defendant not objecting, so that it averred that if the horse was not the property of Dansby, it was the property of one Brooks. On appeal, the court held that the allowance of the amendment was proper. Rev. Stat. § 1047.

And it has been held proper for the court to direct the amendment of an indictment for burglary by the insertion of the name of Jules Birotte for that of Claiborne Birotte, as the owner of the property alleged to have been burglarized. State v. Satterwhite (1900) 52 La. Ann. 499, 26 So. 1006.

In State v. Sweeney (1914) 135 La. 566, 65 So. 743, it was held that an amendment to an indictment for burglary and larceny, which changed the name of the owner of the premises burglarized, was not a material alteration, and did not tend to deprive the defendant of his constitutional right to be informed of the nature of the accusation brought against him, the court saying that such amendments of the names or descriptions of persons alleged in an indictment to be the owners of property forming the subject of any offense named therein were expressly authorized by the statute.

In Haywood v. State (1872) 47 Miss. 1, where it appeared that an indictment for larceny alleged the stolen goods to be the property of James Marshall, it was held proper for the trial court to authorize an amendment thereto, alleging the ownership to be in James Cicero Marshall, such amendment being in accordance with the statute.

Similarly, where an indictment for unlawfully marking an animal alleged the ownership of the animal to be in one John Barton, and on the trial it appeared that the animal belonged to John Thomas Barton, the allowance of an amendment to the indictment by inserting the middle name of Mr. Barton was held proper under the express provision of the statute. Rev. Code 1871, § 2799. Murrah v. State (1875) 51 Miss. 675.

And see Foster v. State (1876) 52 Miss. 695, wherein the accused, who had been indicted for larceny, moved for a new trial on the ground that he had discovered evidence which would show that the stolen property did not belong to the person alleged in the indictment as the owner thereof. The court held that the ground for the motion was insufficient, since, had the fact alleged been proved on the trial, the court would have been authorized to direct an amendment to the indictment, in correction of the mistake.

In Peebles v. State (1877) 55 Miss. 434, which was a prosecution on an indictment charging the theft of a hog belonging to "Margaret Majors," the evidence disclosed that the owner of the hog was "Clark Majors," and the trial court ordered the indictment amended to conform to the proof. The defendant excepted to the amendment, but the supreme court held that it was properly allowed.

And it was held proper in Knight v. State (1887) 64 Miss. 802, 2 So. 252, for the court to authorize the amendment of an indictment of one for going on the land of another, by correcting the name of the alleged owner of the land as therein stated. Such amendment was expressly authorized by the provision of a statute (Code 1880, § 3081), as follows: "Whenever, on the trial of an indictment for any offense, there shall appear to be any variance between the statement in such indictment, and the evidence offered in proof thereof, . . . in the name or description of any person, therein stated or alleged to be the owner of any property, real or personal, which shall form the subject of any offense charged therein, . . . it shall and may be lawful for the court, before which the trial shall be had, if it shall consider such variance not material to the merits of the case, and that the defendant cannot be prejudiced thereby in his defense on the merits, to order such indictment and the record and proceedings in said court to be amended, according to the proof."

In Richburger v. State (1907) 90 Miss. 806, 44 So. 772, wherein a variance appeared between the allegation of an indictment for embezzlement, and the evidence, as to the full name of the injured banking corporation, the trial court granted an amendment of the indictment correcting this erroneous recital, and the defendant took exception. On appeal, the court held that the variance was an immaterial one, and the amendment unnecessary, but having been made it was held harmless. Code 1892, § 1485.

But compare the earlier case of Unger v. State (1869) 42 Miss. 642, wherein the trial court permitted an amendment to be made to an indictment for larceny, by changing the middle initial in the name of the owner of the alleged stolen property, and the state maintained that this amendment was authorized by a statute (Code, art. 262, § 615) providing that a variance between the allegations of an indictment and the evidence, as to the name or description of any person therein, was a proper subject of amendment. The defendant maintained that the qualifying clause of this statute, that such amendment should be lawful only when the court considered the variance not material to the merits of the case, prevented an application of the statute in this case. The court held that the mistake in the name of the owner of the alleged stolen goods was a fatal defect, and the amendment, being one of substance, was improper. But the court added that the error should have been taken advantage of before verdict, since the defect was cured after verdict by the Statute of Jeofails.

In People v. Richards (1887) 44 Hun, 278, 5 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 355, the court permitted the district attorney to amend an indictment for burglary by correcting an erroneous recital therein as to the ownership of the burglarized property, and on the defendant's appeal from the refusal of the court to discharge him on motion because of the variance, it was held that the amendment was properly allowed under the authority of the Code of Criminal Procedure (§§ 281, 293, 294), providing for amendments in respect to the name or description of any person or thing, to obviate difficulties arising from a variance between the allegations of the indictment and the evidence. Reversed on other grounds in (1888) 108 N. Y. 137, 2 Am. St. Rep. 373, 15 N. E. 371.

Where, in a prosecution for larceny, the court allowed an amendment to the indictment in respect to the name of the owner of the stolen property, this was held to be a proper exercise of the court's authority. People v. Herman (1887) 45 Hun (N. Y.) 175.

And where, on the prosecution of an indictment for grand larceny, the court allowed an amendment correcting a misnomer therein as to the name of the owner of the alleged stolen property, the allowance of the amendment was held to be a proper exercise of the court's authority. People v. Dunn (1889) 53 Hun, 381, 7 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 173, 6 N. Y. Supp. 805.

Similarly, in People v. Hagan (1891) 60 Hun, 577, 37 N. Y. S. R. 660, 14 N. Y. Supp. 233, the allowance of an amendment to an indictment for burglary, correcting a misnomer therein as to the name of the owner of the burglarized premises, was held proper.

In Com. v. O'Brien (1869) 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 566, the court held that an amendment to an indictment for larceny, by striking out the name of the alleged owner of the stolen goods and inserting the words "of some person unknown," was properly allowed under § 13 of the Act of March 31, 1860.

In Com. v. Livingston (1895) 5 Pa. Dist. R. 666, the trial court allowed an amendment to an indictment for larceny, conforming the allegation therein that the ownership of the stolen property was in one Armstrong, to the proof which disclosed the owners to be Armstrong and Stohl. On the defendant's appeal from the allowance of the amendment, it was held that the amendment was specially authorized by § 18 of the Criminal Procedure Act of 1860, empowering the court to conform the allegations of an indictment to the proof in respect to the name or description of any person or persons therein alleged to be the owner or owners of any property forming the subject of an offense charged therein.

In Com. v. Hazlett (1900) 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 352, the trial court granted leave to amend an indictment for embezzlement by inserting after the description of the money deposited as "money of the said Thomas A. De Normandie," the words, "and of another person, being a partner and joint owner with him," so that there would be no variance as to the ownership of the deposit. This was held to be a proper exercise of the court's authority, since the variance was not material to the merits of the case.

And it was held proper in Rosenberger v. Com. (1888) 118 Pa. 77, 11 Atl. 782, for the court to authorize an amendment to an indictment for larceny, conforming an allegation therein that the stolen goods were the joint property of Alexander and Catherine Hill, to evidence that the goods were owned by Alexander and Catherine Hill individually, such amendments being expressly authorized by statute.

Similarly, in State v. Casavant (1892) 64 Vt. 405, 23 Atl. 636, it was held that the court under the authority of the statute (Acts 1882, No. 86) might properly allow an amendment to an indictment for larceny, changing the name of the person therein alleged to be the owner of the stolen property.

In Reg. v. Vincent (1852) 5 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 537, 16 Jur. 457, 3 Car. & K. 246, 2 Den. C. C. 464, 21 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 109, it was held that an indictment for theft might be amended at the trial by order of the court changing the name of the alleged owner of the stolen property, such amendment being authorized by 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 1.

And in Reg. v. Fullarton (1853) 6 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 194, wherein a misnomer appeared in the allegation of an indictment as to the ownership of certain property alleged to have been stolen by the defendant, it was held proper under statutory authority for the court to allow an amendment to the indictment in correction of the misnomer. The amendment herein was allowed after all the evidence was in, the court overruling Reg. v. Rymes (1850) 3 Car. & K. (Eng.) 326, wherein it was held that an indictment could not be amended after the counsel for the defense had addressed the jury.

In Reg. v. Marks (1866) 10 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 367, it was held that an indictment charging the secretary of a society with the embezzlement of moneys belonging to the society, and described therein as the property of Thomas Shean and others, might be amended by alleging in addition that Thomas Shean and others were trustees of the society.

And see Rex v. Murray [1906] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 385, 3 B. R. C. 775, 70 J. P. 297, 75 L. J. K. B. N. S. 593, 95 L. T. N. S. 295, 22 Times L. R. 596, 6 Ann. Cas. 161. In this prosecution, the counsel for the Crown moved for leave to amend an indictment for the larceny of a wife's separate property, which alleged the ownership of the property to be in the husband, by substituting the wife in place of the husband as the owner of the goods. The trial court refused to grant the leave, and on appeal the conviction was quashed for the variance, the court stating, however, that it regretted the necessity for quashing the conviction, since the court below should have granted leave to amend the indictment, the amendment asked being distinctly authorized by statute (14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 1).

In Reg. v. Jackson (1869) 18 U. C. C. P. 280, an indictment which charged the theft of cattle belonging to "Robert McKim," an infant, was amended by substituting the name of "Mary McKim, administratrix of Thomas McKim," as the owner of the cattle, and the court held that the amendment was properly allowed under the authority of the statute. Can. Consol. Stat. chap. 99, § 78.

3. Other injured person.

The allowance by the court of an amendment to an indictment in respect to a misnomer as to the name of an injured party other than the victim of homicide or the owner of property is generally authorized, as the correction of a defect of form only.

In State v. Johnson (La.) supra, it appeared that the indictment charging the defendants with attempt to murder, described the injured man as "Reins Centel." The district attorney moved for the court's permission to amend the indictment by substituting the name of "Remus Ducantel" as the injured man, and the court directed that the change be made. This was held proper, such amendment being authorized by Revised Statutes, § 1047.

Where an indictment charged an assault with intent to kill one Roan Blackman, and during the trial it appeared that the name of the person assaulted was Roan Blackburn, it was held proper under the statute (Code 1871, § 2799) for the court to authorize an amendment of the indictment, substituting "Blackburn" for "Blackman." "The statute," it was said, "allows the court, on trial of an indictment for any offense, to cause an amendment to be made, not to introduce another and distinct offense, but to accurately describe and particularly identify, as to names, the very offense charged, 'if it shall consider such variance' (as disclosed by evidence) 'not material to the merits of the case, and that the defendant cannot be prejudiced thereby in his defense on the merits.'" Miller v. State (Miss.) supra.

In Mackguire v. State (Miss.) supra, the court allowed an amendment to an indictment for forgery, striking out the name of William Foster as the party attempted to be defrauded, and inserting in its stead the name "American Express Company." This was held proper, apparently under the authority of § 1508 of the Code of 1906, since the identity of the offense was in no wise changed, and the defendant was not prejudiced thereby.

In People v. Johnson (N. Y.) supra, the court directed that an indictment for seduction be amended to conform to the proof, as to the name of the injured party, and this was held to be a proper exercise of the court's authority. Code Crim. Proc. §§ 281, 293-295.

And see People v. Castaldo (N. Y.) supra, wherein, on the prosecution of an indictment for felonious assault, the court stated that if there was a variance between the allegations of the indictment and the proof as to the description of the person whom the defendant intended to kill, the variance was such as might have been summarily cured by amendment.

Under § 18 of the Pennsylvania Criminal Procedure Act of March 31, 1860, providing that the court may conform allegations of an indictment to the proof in respect to the name or other description of any person named or described therein, it has been held proper for the court to direct an amendment to an indictment for perjury, substituting the name of the person authorized to administer the oath, at whose request it was given, for the name of the clerk who handed to the defendant the book on which the oath was taken. Com. v. O'Neill (1874) 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 209.

And the amendment of an indictment for selling liquor without a license, by the insertion of the name of the person to whom the liquor was sold, has been held proper. Rough v. Com. (1875) 78 Pa. 495.

In Hawthorn v. State (1881) 56 Md. 530, the court authorized the state's attorney to amend an indictment for forgery by striking out words charging that the forgery was committed with intent to defraud one Joseph Kausler, and leaving it as charging the act, without stating the name of the particular person intended to be defrauded. By the Act of 1862, chap. 80, it was provided that an indictment for forgery need not allege the intent of the defendant to defraud any particular person, and the court held that, since this act rendered the amendment surplusage, it was clearly an amendment in mere matter of form, and not of substance, and was properly authorized. In continuance, the court stated the rule as follows: "An indictment is a finding by a grand jury upon oath, and it cannot, except in cases where the law has specially authorized such proceeding, and in matters of form which are not matters of substance, be amended by a court without the concurrence of the grand inquest by whom it was presented."

In Reg. v. Frost (1855) 6 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 526, 1 Jur. N. S. 406, 3 C. L. R. 665, Dears. C. C. 474, 24 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 116, 3 Week. Rep. 401, it was said, by way of dictum, that the court below might, under the authority of 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 1, have directed an amendment to an indictment, striking out all but the words "Duke of Cambridge" in the description of the master of an assaulted gamekeeper, as "George William Frederick Charles, Duke of Cambridge."

In Reg. v. Welton (1862) 9 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 297, wherein an indictment charged the defendant with the intent to kill one Annie Welton, but the prosecution was unable to prove that the child had been known by such name, it was held proper to amend the indictment by striking out the words "Annie Welton," and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "a certain female child whose name is to the jurors unknown," the court saying: "The act which gives power of amendment (14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 1) states in the preamble that 'offenders frequently escape conviction on their trials by reason of the technical strictness of criminal proceedings in matters not material to the merits of the case.'

Here the amendment cannot prejudice the prisoner in her defense, and I consider the variance not 'material to the merits of the case.' A statute of this kind should have a wide construction, and I shall not interpret it in favor of technical strictness. Let the indictment be amended as proposed."

And in Reg. v. Titley (1880) 14 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 502, the court allowed an amendment to an indictment charging the defendant with unlawfully supplying drugs with the intent that they be used to procure the miscarriage of a certain woman, by inserting in lieu of the words, "a certain woman" the words, "a woman to the jurors unknown."

d. Date of offense.

The courts are generally authorized to amend indictments by the correction of erroneous allegations as to the time of the offense, when time is not of the essence of the crime. See III. b, infra.

In State v. Brooks (Iowa) supra, the action of the trial court in authorizing the amendment of an indictment by the correction of an impossible date, the insertion of which was a mere clerical error not fatal to the indictment, was held proper under a statute (Code, § 4538) requiring the court to render judgment without regard to technical errors or defects not affecting the substantial rights of the parties.

And where the defendant, on appeal from a conviction of larceny, presented an exception to a ruling of the trial court, permitting an amendment of the indictment so as to show that the offense was committed on a different date, and the date was not of the essence of the crime, it was held that the amendment was clearly within the discretion of the court. Rev. Stat. § 1047. State v. Johnson (1883) 35 La. Ann. 842.

It has been held that the court may authorize the correction of an impossible and immaterial date in an indictment at any time. State v. Pierre (1887) 39 La. Ann. 915, 3 So. 60.

And the court has said that since the date of the offense in an indictment for murder is immaterial, provided it is averred as falling prior to the return of the indictment, the court may direct an amendment in correction of such an erroneous date. State v. Cornelius (1907) 118 La. 146, 42 So. 754.

In State v. Anderson (1910) 125

La. 779, 51 So. 846, wherein the trial court allowed an amendment to an indictment for a violation of the Liquor Law, by the insertion of April 4th as the day of sale instead of June 15th, which latter date was subsequent to the return of the indictment, it was held that the amendment was properly allowed, even over the defendant's objection, being authorized by statute. Rev. Stat. §§ 1047, 1063, 1064.

And in State v. Lee (1911) 127 La. 1077, 54 So. 356, wherein it appeared that before trial the court had permitted an amendment to an indictment for murder by a changing of the alleged date of the crime from December 1, 1902, to December 1, 1901, it was held that such amendment was expressly authorized by § 1047, Revised Statute.

In State v. Anderson (1915) 137 La. 765, 69 So. 167, the trial court directed the district attorney to amend an indictment for burglary, by changing the alleged date of the offense from the 22d to the 21st of January, to conform to the proof. The court held that this was a proper amendment, not prejudicial to the accused in his defense.

And where the testimony in a prosecution for rape referred to only one occurrence on or about the 28th of November, 1917, and the indictment charged the commission of the offense on the 1st day of December, 1917, it was held proper for the court to direct an amendment to the indictment on the motion of the district attorney, conforming the date therein to the testimony, the amendment being an unimportant one. State v. Williams (1918) 143 La. 424, 78 So. 662.

Section 1064 of the Louisiana Revised Statutes provided as follows: "Every objection to any indictment for any formal defect apparent on the face thereof shall be taken by demurrer or motion to quash such indictment before the jury shall be sworn and not afterward, and every court before which any such objection shall be taken for any formal defect may, if it be thought necessary, cause the indictment to be forthwith amended in such particular, and thereupon the trial shall proceed as if no such defect had appeared." And on the authority of this statute it was held in State v. Fontenette (1886) 38 La. Ann. 61, that the court properly permitted an amendment of an indictment by filling in the blank for the year, of the commission of the offense, thus conforming the indictment to the proof.

And in State v. Hamilton (1896) 48 La. Ann. 1566, 21 So. 232, it was held proper for the trial court to direct an amendment of an indictment correcting an impossible date therein, which date was not of the essence of the crime.

It was held in State v. Hardaway (1898) 50 La. Ann. 1345, 24 So. 820, that an amendment of the date of a murder as set forth in an indictment was not necessary, since time was not of the essence of the crime, but even if it were necessary, the court held that it was proper for the trial court to direct such an amendment.

And where the date of the commission of the offense, as alleged in an indictment for perjury, was not an element of the crime and in no way material, it was held proper for the court to authorize an amendment conforming an erroneous date therein to the evidence. See Code 1906, §§ 1426, 1428. Saucier v. State (1909) 95 Miss. 226, 48 So. 840, 21 Ann. Cas. 1155.

A New Hampshire act (Gen. Stat. § 13, chap. 242) provided that no indictment should be quashed for errors or mistakes, where the person and case might be rightly understood by the court, or through any defect or want of form or addition; and courts were given the authority to order amendments on motion in any such case. In State v. Blaisdell (1869) 49 N. H. 81, wherein the indictment charged the commission of a burglary on a day subsequent to the return of the indictment, it was held that the error in date was a proper subject of amendment, the allegation being a matter of form, and not of the substance of the offense.

In Ketline v. State (1896) 58 N. J. L. 462, 37 Atl. 133, it was held to be proper for the court to authorize an amendment to an indictment, filling a blank space therein for the date of the commission of the offense, which by oversight had not been filled up.

In State v. Unsworth (1918) 85 N. J. L. 287, 88 Atl. 1097, wherein an indictment for conspiracy alleged the commission of the crime as of a date which would have permitted the running of the Statute of Limitations in the interim, and an amendment was made charging the offense as of a later date within the period of limitation, the court held that whether the amendment was legally permissible would depend on whether the date was material. And it appearing that there had been an overt act within the two years preceding the indictment, it was held that time was not of the essence of the crime, and that the amendment was properly allowed.

Under the provision of § 293 of the New York Code of Criminal Procedure, authorizing an amendment as to time when the defendant cannot thereby be prejudiced in his defense on the merits, it has been held proper for the court to authorize an amendment to an indictment for abandoning children, conforming the date of the offense as therein alleged, to the evidence thereof, it appearing that time was not an essential of the offense, and that the defendant could not be prejudiced thereby in his defense on the merits. People v. Lewis (1909) 132 App. Div. 256, 116 N. Y. Supp. 893.

See People v. Jackson (1888) 111 N. Y. 362, 6 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 393, 19 N. E. 54, wherein it was said by way of dictum that an indictment for murder might be amended by direction of the court so as to conform with the proof of an averment therein as to the date of the commission of the offense.

And see People v. Formosa (1892) 181 N. Y. 478, 27 Am. St. Rep. 612, 30 N. E. 492, wherein it was said that if the defendant had objected to the variance between the allegation of the indictment and the proof as to the date of the commission of the offense, the trial court could have allowed an amendment.

In People v. Jones (1909) 129 App.

Div. 772, 118 N. Y. Supp. 1097, affirmed in (1909) 195 N. Y. 547, 88 N. E. 1127, the trial court allowed an amendment to an indictment for keeping a disorderly house, changing the date on which the defendant was charged with keeping the house, and this act was held proper. The court cited the cases of People v. Jackson and People v. Formosa (N. Y.) supra, as authorities in support of this power of amendment.

In Myers v. Com. (1875) 79 Pa. 308, an amendment was allowed changing the time laid in an indictment for homicide, from October, 1874, to November, 1874, and this was held a proper exercise of the amendatory authority given the court by § 13 of the Act of March 31, 1860, especially when read in connection with the powers of amendment set forth in the 11th and 12th sections of that act.

And in Com. v. Tassone (1914) 246 Pa. 548, 92 Atl. 718, it was held that the trial court made no error in allowing an amendment to an indictment for murder, after trial, changing an allegation therein as to the date of the commission of the offense so as to allege the true date of the offense. This, the court held, was authorized.

But see Com. v. Seymour (1869) 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 567, wherein it was held that the act allowing amendments to indictments (Act March 31, 1860) would not extend to a case where the commonwealth sought to change the date of the offense alleged in the indictment as the year 1800, by inserting the word "sixty-eight" thereafter.

Where an indictment charged the commission of an offense "on the fifth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety ———," it was held proper for the court to allow an amendment filling in the blank with the correct date, under the following provision of § 57 of the Criminal Code: "If there be any defect in form in any indictment, it shall be competent for the court before which the case is tried to amend the said indictment: Provided, such amendment does not change the nature of the offense charged." State v. May (1895) 45 S. C. 509, 23 S. E. 513.

And where an indictment which charged that "defendant committed the offense on ——— day of December, 1907," was amended by inserting the 1st day of the month, it was held that the amendment was permissible under the authority of State v. May, supra, and within the provision of § 58 of the Criminal Code, the court adding: "Whenever it is not necessary to prove the precise time as alleged, it should be competent, under § 58, to amend the allegation as to time." State v. Richey (1911) 88 S. C. 239, 70 S. E. 729.

And see Schultz v. State (1908) 135 Wis. 644, 114 N. W. 505, 116 N. W. 259, 571, wherein it was held that the allowance of amendments to an indictment changing the date of threats alleged therein as the basis of the offense charged, and changing an allegation therein as to the business of the person threatened, was clearly justified by statute, and particularly because the amendments did not go to the substance of the indictment, and were not prejudicial to the defendant.

In an English decision (Reg. v. Price (1900) 17 Times L. R. (Eng.) 80), wherein the dates in an indictment were expressed in figures and not in words, it was held that the court might properly amend the indictment in this respect, the defect being one of form only, and within the provision of the statute relative to amendments.

And in Veronneau v. Rex (1916) Rap. Jud. Quebec 25 B. R. 275, 31 D. L. R. 332, 26 Can. Crim. Cas. 278, it was held that the court might properly direct an amendment to an indictment for perjury, by conforming the date of the offense as alleged therein, to the proof, under the authority of § 889 of the Criminal Code. The court distinguished its holding from that in Rex v. Lacelle (1905) 10 Can. Crim. Cas. 229, 11 Ont. L. Rep. 74, wherein it was held that the amendment of an indictment for seduction, as to the alleged date of the offense, would be tantamount to charging a new offense, since in the present case the offense charged was not one of that class as to which a change of date would substantially change the offense charged.

Under a statute permitting amendments in matters of form, the court may authorize the amendment of an indictment in respect to the description of the offense, when the amendment does not prejudice the defense of the accused on the merits. State v. Foxton (1914) 166 Iowa, 181, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 919, 147 N. W. 347, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 727; Rocco v. State (1859) 37 Miss. 357; Gamblin v. State (1871) 45 Miss. 658; Larison v. State (1887) 49 N. J. L. 256, 60 Am. Rep. 606, 9 Atl. 700; People v. Roof (1910) 188 App. Div. 633, 122 N. Y. Supp. 677, affirmed in (1910) 199 N. Y. 586, 93 N. E. 1128; Com. v. Parchem (1912) 21 Pa. Dist. R. 1129; Com. v. Gockley (1904) 14 Pa. Dist. R. 535; Reg. v. Cronin (1875) 36 U. C. Q. B. 342; Reg. v. Flynn (1878) 18 N. B. 321; Reg. v. Weir (1899) 3 Can. Crim. Cas. 262; Rex v. Mooney (1905) 11 Can. Crim. Cas. 333, Rap. Jud. Quebec 15 B. R. 57.

In State v. Foxton (1914) 166 Iowa, 181, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 919, 147 N. W. 347, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 727, wherein the defendant urged that the court had erred in allowing the county attorney to amend an indictment for obtaining money by false pretenses, by more particularly describing the manner in which the defendant received the money, it was held that the amendment was properly authorized under chapter 227 of the Laws of the 38d General Assembly, since it neither changed the nature or degree of the crime charged, nor did it prejudice the substantial rights of the defendant.

In Rocco v. State (1859) 37 Miss. 357, the court permitted an amendment to an indictment charging the defendant with unlawfully retailing liquors, by striking out the phrase, "and to divers other persons," which followed the name of the person to whom the illegal sale was charged to have been made, thus conforming the charge to the evidence, which showed a sale only to the person named. This amendment was held to be expressly authorized by the statute (Rev. Code, p. 615, art. 262), providing that when there shall be a variance between the statements in an indictment and the evidence, "in the Christian or surname, or both, or other description whatever, of any person whomsoever, therein named or described, or in the ownership of any property named or described therein," it shall be lawful for the court, "if it shall consider such variance not material to the merits of the case," to order such indictment amended to conform with the proof.

Where an indictment for a violation of the statutory prohibition against exhibiting a deadly weapon "in a rude, angry, or threatening manner," described the offense in these words, except that the word "manner" was omitted, the court held that the omission was a mere formal defect, and a proper subject of amendment under the authority of the Code. Gamblin v. State (1871) 45 Miss. 658.

And where an indictment was technically defective, since charging that the defendant did "send and convey" a certain insulting communication, instead of using the words of the statute, "send or convey," the court stated that the defect might have been cured by directing an amendment to the indictment. Rev. pp. 275, 277, §§ 43, 53. Larison v. State (1887) 49 N. J. L. 256, 60 Am. Rep. 606, 9 Atl. 700.

In People v. Roof (1910) 188 App. Div. 633, 122 N. Y. Supp. 677, affirmed in (1910) 199 N. Y. 586, 93 N. E. 1128, wherein the court allowed an amendment to an indictment for robbery, by the insertion after the words, "each of said persons being aided by an accomplice actually present," the following: "The said Myron Lamphere being then and there aided by an accomplice actually present, to wit, Fred Roof, and the said Fred Roof being then and there aided by an accomplice actually present, to wit, Myron Lamphere," it was held that no error was committed prejudicial to the accused. See §§ 285, 293, Code Crim. Proc.

In Com. v. Parchem (1912) 21 Pa. Dist. R. 1129, wherein an indictment for embezzlement alleged that the money was taken by virtue of the defendant's employment and on account of his "employment," instead of on account of his "employer," the court, directing an amendment curing the error, said that the defect, being a formal one, was amendable. March 31, 1860, P. L. 427, § 11.

And see Com. v. Gockley (1904) 14 Pa. Dist. R. 585, wherein an indictment for false pretense did not state whether the money obtained was given as a loan, gift, or otherwise, and the court, refusing a motion for a new trial, stated that this was at most, an amendable defect.

In Reg. v. Cronin (1875) 36 U. C. Q. B. 342, wherein an amendment was allowed to an indictment charging that the defendant feloniously set fire to a certain building, "with intent to defraud," by striking out the phrase quoted, the court held that the amendment was proper, there being no doubt as to the authority therefor, since the enactment of the statute. Can. Consol. Stat. chap. 99, § 78.

And see Reg. v. Flynn (1878) 18 N. B. 321, wherein the court said that an indictment for doing grievous bodily harm, which alleged that the accused did "feloniously stab, cut, and wound," instead of describing the offense in the terms of the statute, as that he "unlawfully and maliciously" stabbed, might be amended if considered defective, under the authority of § 32 of 32 & 33 Vict. chap. 29, relative to procedure in criminal cases.

In Reg. v. Weir (1899) 3 Can. Crim. Cas. 262, it was held that an amendment to an indictment for making a false bank return, by inserting the word "containing" before the words "a wilful, false, and deceptive statement," was properly allowed under the authority of § 723 of the Criminal Code, the court saying: "The correction in no way changes the character or nature of the offense, and as the defendant knew to the same extent before and after the amendment what he was accused of, he was neither misled nor prejudiced by it. The test whether a defendant can be prejudiced by such an amendment is whether a defense under an indictment as it originally stood would be equally available after the amendment is made, and whether any evidence the defendant might have would be equally applicable to the indictment in the one form as in the other. . . . In fine, if the transaction is not altered by the amendment, but remains precisely the same, the amendment ought to be allowed, but if the amendment would substitute a different transaction from that alleged, or would render a different plea necessary, it ought not to be made."

And where an indictment which charged "that Frank Mooney attempted to kill and murder constable Vicars" was amended so as to read, "That Frank Mooney, with intent to commit murder, shot at constable Vicars," it was held that such amendment was properly allowed. Rex v. Mooney (1905) 11 Can. Crim. Cas. 333, Rap. Jud. Quebec 15 B. R. 57.

1. Description of property.

The allowance by the court of an amendment to an indictment, in respect to the description of any property therein mentioned, is held to be proper under statutory authority to amend, as going to a defect of form only.

In State v. Mullen (1911) 151 Iowa, 392, 131 N. W. 679, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 399, it was held proper for the district attorney to amend an indictment with the court's permission, so as to correct a description of certain property alleged to have been falsely obtained, it being provided by statute (Laws of the 33d General Assembly, chap. 227, ¶ 7) that amendments in correction of errors in name or description of any person or thing might be made, when not prejudicial to substantial rights of the defendant, or charging a different crime or degree of crime.

Under § 1047 of the Louisiana Revised Statutes, it has been held that an indictment charging the larceny of "one lot of clothing valued at $1.50" may be amended by making the description of the goods read, "One lot of clothing, consisting of one pair of woolen pantaloons and one plaited-bosom shirt." State v. Carter (1890) — La. —, 9 So. 128.

And see State v. Perkins (1897) 49 La. Ann. 310, 21 So. 839, wherein the court said that had the defendant taken proper objection to the alleged insufficiency of an allegation in an indictment for larceny, which described the property stolen as "one beef of the cow kind," the trial court would have been authorized to amend the indictment.

In State v. Jacobs (1898) 50 La. Ann. 447, 23 So. 608, it was held proper for the court to authorize the district attorney to amend an allegation in an indictment for the larceny of a bale of cotton "in the lint," so as to conform to testimony that the cotton was "in the seed."

And where an indictment for burglary and larceny charged the theft, among other articles, of "six pairs of house, each paid of the value of 8 cents," it was held proper for the trial court to authorize an amendment changing the clause so as to read, "six pairs of hose, each pair of the value of 8 cents." The court, quoting Revised Statutes, § 1047, said: "This law, construed in connection with Revised Statutes, § 1064, has been held to authorize the amendment of defects in indictments, in matters of description, or that are merely formal and not substantial." State v. Gregg (1909) 122 La. 979, 48 So. 426.

Where, in a prosecution for stealing cattle, a variance arose between the testimony of the owner of some of the cattle and the description of the cattle in the indictment, as to the brand by which the cattle were marked, it was held proper for the trial court to authorize an amendment of the indictment to make the description therein conform to the testimony. State v. Lebleu (1915) 137 La. 1007, 69 So. 808.

And it was held in Freeman v. State (1914) 108 Miss. 818, 67 So. 460, that, where an indictment for receiving deposits in an insolvent bank alleged the receipt of $7.50 in lawful money, and the evidence showed the receipt of money, a check, and a warrant, with the total value of $7.50, the court properly directed an amendment conforming the indictment to the proof, under the authority of § 1508 of the Code of 1906.

In State v. Johnson (1918) 91 N. J. L. 611, 104 Atl. 593, the court held that an amendment to an indictment for fraudulent conversion, by inserting the word "moneys" between the statement of the amount converted and the words, "of the goods and chattels," was properly allowed, since the power of amendment, under § 44 of the Criminal Procedure Act, is applicable to that class of cases where a specific criminal charge can be perceived on the face of the indictment, which fails to be effective only by reason of an error which the court can clearly infer was a clerical oversight.

In People v. Langley (1906) 114 App. Div. 427, 20 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 281, 100 N. Y. Supp. 123, on the prosecution of an indictment for grand larceny, which contained a recital that the defendant had misrepresented himself to be in control of a corporation owning valuable land in Virginia, the court permitted an amendment inserting the word "West" before "Virginia." On the defendant's exception to the allowance of this amendment, it was held that there was no doubt as to the right of the court to amend the indictment by correcting the description of the property, under the authority of § 293 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. For New York authorities to the contrary, see III. e, infra.

And an amendment to an indictment for obstructing a public road, which merely made the description of the road more certain, was held proper in State v. Rodman (1910) 86 S. C. 154, 68 S. E. 343, under the authority of § 58 of the Criminal Code, providing that the court may amend indictments as to any defect in form, or in conformance to the proof, in all cases where such amendment does not change the nature of the offense charged.

But see Schenck v. State (1915) 76 Tex. Crim. Rep. 235, 174 S. W. 357, where on the prosecution of an indictment charging the theft of various articles, including "one distributor leather belt," a variance arose between the proof and the allegation of the indictment as to the description of the belt alleged to have been stolen, and it was held that the court had no authority to strike the item from the indictment.

Where an indictment charged the defendant with perjury while testifying in a prosecution against certain parties for setting fire to a barn, and it appeared from evidence introduced on the trial that the prosecution in question had been for setting fire to a stack of barley, which offense was in fact the same, it was held that the variance might be corrected by amending the indictment, under the authority of 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 1. Reg. v. Neville (1852) 6 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 69.

And in Reg. v. Sturge (1854) 18 Jur. 1052, 3 El. & Bl. 734, 118 Eng. Reprint, 1816, 23 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 172, 2 Week. Rep. 477, wherein a variance arose between the evidence and the allegation of an indictment for obstructing a footway, as to the description of the footway, the court held that the misdescription might be corrected by amending the indictment, under the authority vested in the court by 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 1.

It was held in Reg. v. Gumble (1872) 12 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 248, 27 L. T. N. S. 692, 21 Week. Rep. 299, 42 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 7, L. R. 2 C. C. 1, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 396, that the court had power under 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 1, to amend an indictment alleging the theft of 19 shillings and 6 pence, by conforming it to evidence that the amount stolen was a sovereign.

And it has been held that a variance between the allegation of an indictment and the proof, as to the occupation of the land on which the indictment charged that the defendants had been poaching, should, if necessary, be corrected by the allowance of an amendment, where the defendants would not thereby be misled. Reg. v. Sutton (1877) 13 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 648.

Where an indictment charged the defendant with obtaining two checks by the false pretense that there was then "a large quantity of beans, to wit, 2,680 bushels of beans," in his warehouse, and it appeared from the evidence that the pretense was that there were "2,680 bushels of beans" in the warehouse, the court held that it was proper to allow an amendment striking out the words "a large quantity of beans, to wit," such amendment being authorized by § 773 of the Criminal Code. Reg. v. Patterson (1895) 2 Can. Crim. Cas. 339.

And see Reg. v. Carleton County (1882) 1 Ont. Rep. 277, wherein the court said that a misdescription as to the location of a bridge, in an indictment charging a failure to repair the same, was a defect which might have been corrected by amendment at the trial, but could not be so altered on a motion for a new trial after the return of a verdict.

g. Miscellaneous defects of form.

Under a statute vesting the courts with power to amend indictments as to matters of form, it has been held that any amendment not prejudicial to the rights of the accused may be allowed.

In State v. Sullivan (La.) supra, it was held proper for the court to permit an amendment to an indictment for forgery, by substituting the word "oblige" for the word "charge."

And the action of the trial court in permitting the district attorney to amend the indictment on the trial, by annexing his signature thereto, was held proper in State v. Crenshaw (1893) 45 La. Ann. 496, 12 So. 628, evidently under the authority of § 1064 of the Revised Statutes, since the supreme court stated in State v. Terrebonne (1893) 45 La. Ann. 25, 12 So. 315, that indictments could not be amended in the absence of statutory authority, except on process issued to the grand jury for that purpose.

In State v. Williams (1895) 47 La. Ann. 1609, 18 So. 647, wherein it appeared that an indictment had mistakenly been indorsed "a thru bill," when the indorsement was intended to read "a true bill," it was held that the trial court properly permitted an amendment in rectification of the error, such amendment being one of form and not of substance, and authorized by § 1064, Rev. Stat.

It has been held proper for the court to direct an amendment to an indictment for burglary, changing the description of the place burglarized by substituting the word "store" for the word "dwelling." State v. Satterwhite (1900) 52 La. Ann. 499, 26 So. 1006.

In State v. Gibson (1908) 120 La. 343, 45 So. 271, it was held proper for the trial court to authorize an amendment of an indictment for felonious assault, by the insertion of the word "him" following the word "at," in the phrase, "wilfully shooting at him," such amendment being within the terms of the statute (Rev. Stat. §§ 1047, 1063, 1064).

In Com. v. Holley (1855) 3 Gray (Mass.) 458, in which case the defendant was indicted for being a common seller of spirituous liquors, the trial court allowed an amendment to the indictment, more perfectly setting out the description of a previous conviction for the same crime. The defendant excepted to the allowance of the amendment, but the court affirmed the action of the trial court, saying: "The amendment of an indictment by order of court certainly strikes a person familiar with the practice and principles of the common law with surprise. But in this class of prosecutions, it is expressly provided for by statute (Stat. 1852, chap. 322, § 18), which provides that in any complaint or indictment, or other proceeding for any violation of this act, other than the first offense, it shall not be requisite to set forth particularly the record of a former conviction, but it shall be sufficient to allege briefly that the defendant has been convicted of a single sale, or of being a manufacturer, or a common seller, as the case may be; 'and such allegation, in any civil or criminal process, in any stage of the proceedings, before final judgment, may be amended without terms and as a matter of right.' And it was held that the statute did not violate the direction of the Declaration of Rights that no subject shall be held to answer for any offense until the same has been fully and formally described to him.

In Keys v. State (1916) 110 Miss. 433, 70 So. 457, it was held that the court properly authorized an amendment to an indictment for selling intoxicating liquors, by the insertion of the word "liquors," after the words "spirituous and intoxicating," such amendment not prejudicing the accused in his defense, and being authorized by § 1426 of the Code of 1906.

See Moore v. State (1850) 13 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 259, wherein it was held that an indictment defective since lacking an indorsement by the prosecutor could not be amended after trial, the law of amendments not applying to criminal cases. This case arose before the adoption of the Revised Code of 1857.

In State v. Kern (1889) 51 N. J. L. 259, 17 Atl. 114, an indictment charging certain public officials with having awarded a contract without advertising for bids contained a statement ostensibly inserted to negative an exception in the statute under which the indictment was found, but which, through clerical error in omitting the word "not," was in effect an affirmative statement apparently vitiating the indictment. The court held that correction of the error by amendment was proper, since § 53 of the Criminal Procedure Act, authorizing amendments to indictments, would apply to that class of cases where a specific criminal charge can be perceived on the face of an indictment, which fails to be effective only by means of a clerical error.

In State v. Minford (1900) 64 N. J. L. 518, 45 Atl. 817, the court held that the conclusion to an indictment was a matter of form, and so where the conclusion ran "against the peace of this state and the dignity thereof," instead of "against the peace of this state, the government and dignity of the same," as prescribed by the Constitution, it was proper for the court to direct an amendment correcting the error, under the authority of the statute. Pamph. Laws 1898, p. 881, § 44.

In People v. Clegg (1890) 57 Hun, 591, 10 N. Y. Supp. 675, the defendant maintained that he had been prejudiced by the action of the trial court in allowing an amendment to an indictment for libel, by the insertion of three words which had been inadvertently omitted from the indictment, but the court held that the amendment conforming the indictment to the proof in a matter not prejudicial to the defendant was properly authorized by § 293 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

It was held proper in People v. Scanlon (1909) 132 App. Div. 523, 117 N. Y. Supp. 57, for the court to direct an amendment to an indictment for manslaughter, changing the name of the village where the crime was alleged to have occurred, where there was no claim of surprise or embarrassment by the defendants. The amendment was held to be authorized by § 293 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, providing for the correction of variances between the allegations of an indictment and the proof in respect to the name or description of any place, where such amendment will not be prejudicial to the defendant in his defense on the merits.

In Com. v. Lambrecht (1885) 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 323, wherein an indictment for violating regulations of the board of health by doing unauthorized plumbing did not specify with reasonable certainty the places where such work was done, the court held that the defects were amendable under § 13 of the Criminal Procedure Act of March 31, 1860, permitting amendments in an indictment, of the name of any place, the name and description of persons and property, or any matter therein named or described.

And it has been held that the omission of the word "foreman" from the signature of the foreman of the grand jury, on the return of an indictment, is a defect of form only, which is properly amended by direction of the court, under the authority of the Criminal Procedure Act. Com. v. Ferguson (1897) 8 Pa. Dist. R. 120.

In Com. v. Boyd (1914) 246 Pa. 529, 92 Atl. 705, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 201, wherein an amendment was allowed to an indictment charging the killing of a woman, naming her, by a man, also named, which simply transposed the pronouns "him" and "her," where, as used in referring to the defendant and the deceased, the pronouns were each in the wrong gender, the court held that the amendment was properly allowed under statutory provision. Act of March 31, 1860, P. L. 427, § 11.

In Com. v. Miller (1903) 13 Pa. Dist. R. 147, it was said that, on motion therefor, the court might permit any formal defects in an indictment to be corrected by amendment.

And see McKinley v. State (1847) 8 Humph. (Tenn.) 72, wherein it was said, by way of dictum, that the court might properly authorize amendments to indictments in matters of form only.

But see State v. Hughes (1851) 1 Swan (Tenn.) 261, wherein the accused, in an indictment for false imprisonment, pleaded in abatement that his name was William B. Hughes, and not William H. Hughes as stated in the indictment, the court stated that in the absence of statute it was unaware of any practice by which the indictment could be amended in this respect, without recommitment to the grand jury. The court herein did not consider the dictum in McKinley v. State (Tenn.) supra.

It was held in Flores v. State (1917) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 198 S. W. 575, that an indictment for the sale of intoxicating liquor in territory where the sale was prohibited, which failed to allege when the prohibition election was held in the county, and when prohibition went into effect, might properly be amended in these respects by direction of the court, such defects being in matter of form only.

And see Johnson v. State (1913) 70 Tex. Crim. Rep. 583, 157 S. W. 1196, wherein an indictment charging the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors after an election putting prohibition in force failed to allege when the election was held, or when prohibition went into effect, and it was held that the omission was a matter of form which might properly be amended by the court.

In State v. Amidon (1885) 58 Vt. 524, 2 Atl. 154, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 41, it was held proper to allow an amendment to a count in an indictment by inserting the words, "contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state," at the close of the count, the court saying: "It . . . cannot be seriously contended that the words allowed to be added to the first count of the indictment, by the county court, contain an averment of any fact necessary to constitute the crime charged an assault, or that was required to be proved or disproved to establish the crime charged, or to defend against the same. We conclude, therefore, that the amendment allowed was not matter of substance, but matter of form, and within the jurisdiction of the county court to allow." No mention of any statute was made herein.

And in State v. Donovan (1903) 75 Vt. 308, 55 Atl. 611, it was held proper for the trial court to authorize the amendment of an indictment for forgery by setting out the forged instrument therein with greater accuracy, such amendment not prejudicing the defendant in his defense on the merits.

See Cain v. State (1888) 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 512, wherein, an indictment not concluding, "against the peace and dignity of the state," as required by the Constitution, the trial judge authorized an amendment correcting the omission. The court held that such an amendment was proper, since the grand jury had nothing to do with the finding of that conclusion, and the amendment did not embarrass the defendant nor deprive him of any just means of defense. No statute is referred to in the opinion.

And see McCorkle v. State (1859) 14 Ind. 39, wherein the defendant consented in open court to an amendment to an indictment as to the date of the offense charged, and it was held that he could not subsequently object to the authorization of such correction.

On the prosecution of an indictment for perjury, it has been held that the court may properly amend the indictment as to the description of an act of Parliament referred to therein. Reg. v. Westley (1859) 8 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 244, 5 Jur. N. S. 1862, 8 Week. Rep. 63, Bell, C. C. 193, 29 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 35.

And where an indictment charged the defendant with the commission of perjury on the hearing of a complaint before certain justices "assigned to keep the peace in and for the said county, and acting in and for the borough of Tiverton," and it appeared that such justices were assigned to the borough only, and not to the county, the court held that the judge had power to correct the variance by way of amendment, under 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 1. Reg. v. Western (1868) 11 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 93, 18 L. T. N. S. 299, 87 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 81, L. R. 1 C. C. 122, 16 Week. Rep. 730.

And similarly, where the defendant was charged with perjury alleged to have been committed at the hearing of a summons charging a certain woman with being drunk, and it appeared that the summons had been for being "drunk and disorderly," it was held that the court was empowered by 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 1, to amend the indictment by adding the words, "and disorderly," in correction of the variance. Reg. v. Tymms (1870) 11 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 645.

Where an indictment charged the obtaining of money by the false pretense that the defendant had made funeral arrangements and paid the undertaker for the burial of a certain child, and it appeared from the evidence that the funeral arrangements had been made for the burial of a different child, it was held that the court might properly amend the indictment in correction of the variance. Rex v. Byers (1907) 71 J. P. (Eng.) 205.

It has been held that the court may authorize the amendment of an indictment in respect to the venue as alleged therein. But see III. c, infra, for Texas cases holding that such amendments are of the substance of the indictment, and unauthorized. Welty v. Ward (1905) 164 Ind. 457, 73 N. E. 889, 8 Ann. Cas. 556; Winston v. State (1912) 101 Miss. 101, 57 So. 545; People v. Bromwich (1909) 135 App. Div. 67, 119 N. Y. Supp. 833, affirmed in (1911) 200 N. Y. 385, 93 N. E. 933.

Under statutes of Indiana (Burns's Anno. Stat. 1901, § 1900, Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1831, and Horner's Anno. Stat. 1901) it has been held proper for the court to amend an indictment by directing a correction of the venue as laid therein. Welty v. Ward (Ind.) supra.

And under the provisions of § 1508 of the Mississippi Code of 1906, authorizing the allowance of amendments to indictments to conform allegations therein as to the name of any place, to the proof thereof, it was held proper for the court to permit the insertion of the words, "and district," in the venue of an indictment, to make it read, "in the county and district aforesaid." Winston v. State (1912) 101 Miss. 101, 57 So. 545.

Similarly, in People v. Bromwich (N. Y.) supra, it was held proper under the provision of § 293 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, for the court to direct an amendment to an indictment for false registration, by correcting a clerical error therein as to the district in which the offense was committed, the amendment not prejudicing the accused in his defense on the merits.

III. Amendment of substance.

a. Identity of injured person.

The amendment of an indictment by substituting therein the name of another person as the one injured, when working a change of identity, is an amendment in substance which the courts are not authorized to make. State v. Morgan (1888) 35 La. Ann. 1139; State v. Taylor (1897) 49 La. Ann. 319, 21 So. 516; Blumenberg v. State (1878) 55 Miss. 528, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 284.

In State v. Morgan (La.) supra, wherein the trial court permitted an amendment of an indictment for rape, by the substitution of the name of a different person than the one originally alleged, as the victim of the offense, it was held that since such an amendment effected a change in the identity of the person assaulted, it necessarily worked prejudice to the accused, and constituted reversible error.

And where an amendment to an indictment was asked for the purpose of substituting another person therein for the person injured, it was held that such an amendment was one of substance, which the court could not authorize. State v. Taylor (1897) 49 La. Ann. 319, 21 So. 516.

Where the defendant was indicted for unlawfully selling liquor to J. T. Middlebrook, and the trial court allowed an amendment of the indictment to conform it to proof that the liquor was sold to A. T. Middlebrook, the court held that this was not an amendment of a mere mistake in name, which might be authorized by § 2799 of the Code of 1871, but, since it appeared that there were in the county both a J. T. and an A. T. Middlebrook, the amendment worked a change of identity which was an essential of the crime, which could be changed only by a new finding of the grand jury. Blumenberg v. State (Miss.) supra.

And see Watts v. State (1904) 99 Md. 30, 57 Atl. 542. The trial court herein permitted the state's attorney to amend an indictment for murder by conforming the name of the deceased as it appeared in the first count, to the name of the deceased as set forth in the second count. The court held that this amendment was unauthorized, the name of the defendant being a matter of substance, which could only be changed with the consent of the grand jury in the absence of some statutory provision. And the court added that the only statutory provisions for amendment of an indictment in case of misnomer were §§ 283 and 284 of article 27 of the Code. By § 283, a misnomer of the defendant in an indictment could be corrected only where the misnomer had been pleaded in abatement, and § 284 provided for the correction of errors in setting forth the names of persons other than the defendant, only after a jury had been sworn on the indictment.

See also State v. Lyon (1867) 47 N. H. 416, wherein the court stated that under the Statute of July 8, 1863, matters of form in an indictment could be amended, but not matters of substance. And it was held that the name of the owner of the goods, alleged to be stolen in an indictment for larceny, was a matter of substance which could not be made the subject of amendment.

While the time of the commission of an offense is ordinarily a matter of form, there are instances in which time becomes a matter of substance, in which event it cannot be made the subject of amendment by the court. Dickson v. State (1884) 20 Fla. 800, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 297; People v. Van Every (1917) 222 N. Y. 74, 118 N. E. 244; Com. v. Seymour (1869) 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 567; Com. v. Kaas (1868) 3 Brewst. (Pa.) 422; State v. Sowell (1909) 85 S. C. 278, 67 S. E. 316; Sanders v. State (1861) 26 Tex. 119; State v. Davidson (1871) 36 Tex. 325; Kirkendall v. State (1915) 78 Tex. Crim. Rep. 168, 180 S. W. 676; Johnson v. State (1918) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 206 S. W. 527; Drummond v. State (1878) 4 Tex. App. 150; Clement v. State (1886) 22 Tex. App. 28, 2 S. W. 379; Rex v. Lacelle (1905) 10 Can. Crim. Cas. 229, 11 Ont. L. Rep. 74.

Where, on the argument of a demurrer to an indictment for being accessory to a burglary, it appeared that the indictment did not allege that the offense was committed in the nighttime, as required in the statutory definition of the offense, the court held that the omission was a fatal defect, which it was not authorized to remedy by amendment, the Act of March 31, 1860, § 11, confining the power of amendment to "formal defects." Com. v. Kaas (1868) 3 Brewst. (Pa.) 422.

And see State v. Johnson (1888) 85 La. Ann. 842, wherein it was held that an amendment might properly be allowed to an indictment for burglary as to the time of the offense under article 1047 of the Revised Statutes, when the allegation of time was as to the date of the week, month, or year, but the court stated that when the distinction of time was as between day and night, time, in the latter instance, being of the essence of the crime, would not be the subject of amendment.

In People v. Van Every (1917) 222 N. Y. 74, 118 N. E. 244, it appeared that on the 8th day of February, 1915, an indictment was returned by the grand jury, charging the defendant with the commission of a misdemeanor on the 17th day of October, 1915. The defendant demurred to the indictment, whereon the court permitted an amendment so as to charge the commission of the crime in 1914. On this appeal from the court's ruling, it was held that since by the statute (Code Crim. Proc. §§ 280, 284, subd. 5) it is essential to the validity of an indictment that it disclose a crime committed prior to the finding of the indictment, the amendment by the court was one of substance, and not of form, and therefore constituted reversible error. And see § 293 of the Criminal Code, which authorizes an amendment as to time, only when the defendant will not thereby be prejudiced in his defense on the merits.

In State v. Sexton (1824) 10 N. C. (3 Hawks) 184, 18 Am. Dec. 584, the court said: "It is a familiar rule that the indictment should state that the defendant committed the offense on a specific day and year, but it is unnecessary to prove, in any case, the precise day or year, except where the time enters into the nature of the offense. But if the indictment lay the offense to have been committed on an impossible day, or on a future day, the objection is as fatal as if no time at all had been inserted."

In State v. Sowell (1909) 85 S. C. 287, 67 S. E. 316, it was held that the amendment of an indictment for house-breaking and larceny, by conforming an allegation that the offense was committed in the daytime to proof that the breaking occurred in the night, was a material amendment, changing the nature of the offense charged, and not authorized by § 58 of the Criminal Code.

See Com. v. Seymour (1869) 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 567, wherein it was held that the statute allowing the amendment of indictments (Act March 31, 1860) would not permit the amendment of an allegation that the offense was committed in the year 1800, so as to charge the commission of the offense as in the year 1868.

And see Dickson v. State (1884) 20 Fla. 800, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 297, wherein an indictment alleged the commission of the offense on a day subsequent to the return of the indictment, and the court held that the date of the offense was a matter of substance, which could not be changed by amendment.

In Texas, the courts are even more strict in the protection of the rights of the accused, holding in almost every case that the allegation in an indictment as to the time of an offense is a matter of substance, which the court is not authorized to amend. In Sanders v. State (1861) 26 Tex. 119, it was held to be error to allow the district attorney to amend an indictment by correcting a mistake therein as to the time of the commission of the alleged offense, the court saying: "No part of an indictment can be more matter of substance, as distinguished from matter of form, than the part which states the time of the commission of the offense. An indictment may be amended when it is defective on account of form, but where an indictment is defective in substance, the defect cannot be cured by amendment; and the reason is that the substance of the indictment is the finding of the grand jury, and must be taken as it comes from them, whereas the formal part of the bill is supposed to be wholly the work of the officer of the law, and may be amended by him under the direction of the court."

In State v. Elliot (1870) 24 Tex. 148, the court held that the allegation of the time of commission of an offense was a matter of form only, and in this respect an indictment could properly be amended by the court, under the authority of the statute (Paschal's Dig. art. 2977) providing for amendments in matters of form. But the court did not consider the earlier cases to the contrary, and when the same question arose in the case of Drummond v. State (1878) 4 Tex. App. 150, the court, on the authority of Sanders v. State (Tex.) supra, reversed the holding in State v. Elliot, saying: "The substance of the ruling in that case was 'that the averment of time in an indictment is quite uniformly held, in this country, to be a matter of form, and not generally material; and that under our statute (Paschal's Dig. art. 2977) it is to be regarded as matter of form, and amendable as such.' In this latter case, the court seems to have overlooked, or paid no regard to, the decision in Sanders v. State above quoted, but predicated the opinion upon the common law and decisions of other states. Our opinion is that Sanders v. State enunciates the correct doctrine, and that the allegation of time in an indictment is matter of substance, and not amendable."

It appeared in Drummond v. State (Tex.) supra, that the lower court had allowed an amendment to an indictment as to the time of the commission of the alleged offense, and although it was apparent that the error in date was entirely a clerical one, the court, in reversal, held that "the principle involved is too important to be made to yield, even in so palpable a case of error as this."

And in Clement v. State (1886) 22 Tex. App. 23, 2 S. W. 379, wherein a discrepancy appeared between the allegation of an indictment and the proof as to the date of the commission of the offense, so that the alleged date was not anterior to the date of the presentment of the indictment, it was held that this error was one of substance, which was beyond the power of the court to correct or avoid.

In State v. Davidson (1871) 36 Tex. 325, wherein an indictment charged the commission of an offense some ten months after the indictment was found, it was held that the error occurred in a material portion of the charge, and could not, therefore, be made the subject of amendment by the court.

And in Kirkendall v. State (1915) 78 Tex. Crim. Rep. 168, 180 S. W. 676, it was held that the failure to allege the date on or about which the defendant abandoned his wife, as required by statute in an indictment for abandonment, was a defect in substance which could not be cured by amendment.

And where an indictment for perjury alleged that the defendant appeared before the grand jury on February 6th, 1918, and swore falsely as to something that did not occur until the following March 3d, and it appeared that the true date of his appearance before the grand jury was March 6th, the court held that the trial judge erred in treating the mistake in date as a clerical error, the date herein being not a matter of form, but of substance, which could not have been amended by the court. Johnson v. State (1918) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 206 S. W. 527.

In Rex v. Lacelle (1905) 10 Can. Crim. Cas. 229, 11 Ont. L. Rep. 74, it was held that the allowance of an amendment to an indictment for seduction, changing the alleged date of the offense, would be tantamount to charging a new offense, and improper except when made subject to the right of the defendant to elect on the charge as amended.

c. Nature of offense.

The courts may not authorize amendments to an indictment which in effect change the nature or grade of the offense charged. Such amendments, going to the substance of the indictment, would be highly prejudicial to the accused and, it seems, would infringe his constitutional right to a presentment or indictment only by a grand jury.

In Com. v. Adams (Ky.) supra, it appeared that in the consideration of the defendant's demurrer to an indictment for forgery, the court had expressed its doubt of the sufficiency of the indictment to support a conviction for that offense, but stated it was of the opinion that the facts were sufficient to constitute the offense of obtaining goods under false pretenses. Thereupon the defendant agreed to an amendment of the indictment so as to make the latter charge, and this was done by order of the court. On appeal, it was held that the amendment was void, the court saying: "It is the sole province of the grand jury, under our law, to find an indictment. It, and not the court, must say upon what charge the party shall be arraigned. The grand jury had not accused the defendant of obtaining goods under false pretenses, but with the crime of forgery, and the judge had no power to assume its duties and alter the charge as fixed by it. There is a total want of power to thus act.

. . . If the judge could, with the consent of the defendant, thus alter this charge, there is no reason why a judge may not, in any case, usurp the functions of the grand jury and change the nature of any offense, as fixed by its presentment, provided the party accused consents to the alteration. Such a practice would be contrary to good policy."

In Wilburn v. State (Miss.) supra, the defendant was charged by indictment with the sale of spirituous liquors in violation of § 5032 of the Code of 1906. This section was repealed before the trial of the charge, and the court thereafter permitted an amendment striking out part of the indictment so as to charge a different offense. This was held reversible error, since the repeal of the statute, for the alleged violation of which the indictment was found, rendered the indictment void, and charging no offense at all, and the court was without power to allow an amendment, which in effect usurped the power of the grand jury.

In State v. Goodrich (N. H.) supra, it was held that the statement of the value of the articles stolen, in an indictment for larceny, was material and a matter of substance, which could not be corrected by the direction of an amendment thereto, since the insertion of the value would change the indictment either to one for simple larceny or for grand larceny.

In State v. De Lorenzo (N. J.) supra, the defendant attacked the validity of a ruling of the trial court, permitting an amendment to an indictment charging the offense of keeping a disorderly house, which changed the period during which the nuisance was alleged to have run and in effect put the defendant on trial for an offense other than the one charged by the grand jury. This was held reversible error, the amendment being one of substance, and not within the discretion of the court.

Where an indictment charging the abandonment of a child under the age of fourteen was returned at a time when it was not a crime to abandon a child over the age of six years, it was held that the court had no authority, under the Code, to direct an amendment to the indictment inserting the word six in lieu of the word fourteen, so that the indictment charged the abandonment of a child under six years of age. The court said: "The question is presented whether, when the facts stated in the indictment do not constitute any crime, the trial court may amend it by inserting therein further and other facts which, if proven, would show that the defendants have committed a crime. I am of the opinion that such an amendment cannot be allowed. The indictment must be found by a grand jury, and if the one which it presents does not state any act of the defendant which constitutes a crime, then no conviction can be had thereon." People v. Trank (1903) 88 App. Div. 294, 85 N. Y. Supp. 55.

And where an amendment had been allowed to a common-law indictment for murder, by striking out the words "malice aforethought" from the charge that the crime had been committed "wilfully, feloniously, and of malice aforethought," the court held that the allowance of the amendment was error, for, since the words stricken out were essential to a common-law charge of murder, the amendment would change the crime charged to that of manslaughter, and the indictment no longer being that of the grand jury, a prosecution thereon would violate the 5th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. People v. Motello (1913) 157 App. Div. 510, 142 N. Y. Supp. 622.

In State v. Jones (1888) 101 N. C. 719, 8 S. E. 147, wherein the court, with the defendant's consent, allowed an amendment to an indictment for arson, which changed the charge from "an attempt to burn a dwelling house" to "an attempt to burn a store," it was held that the court was without authority to amend the indictment so as to charge a different grade of crime.

And where, in the prosecution of an indictment for house-breaking and larceny, the court permitted an amendment changing an allegation that the crime was committed in the daytime so as to conform to proof that the breaking occurred in the nighttime, it was held that the amendment was a material one, changing the nature of the offense charged, and not authorized by § 58 of the Criminal Code, permitting the amendment of certain defects in form. State v. Sowell (1910) 85 S. C. 278, 67 S. E. 316.

In Duty v. State (1908) 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 613, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 469, 114 S. W. 817, wherein the trial court successively quashed all the allegations of an indictment but one, so that the indictment presented an entirely different pleading, it was held that the alteration was fatal, the court saying: "The action of the court in eliminating the averments on the motion to quash so changed the entire indictment that it was no longer the act of the grand jury. The appellant was tried upon a pleading and an indictment not authorized by the grand jury, and not presented by it. As we understand the law to be, this is fatal to the conviction and fatal to the case."

By the English statute (14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 1), a broad power of amendment was given the court, the statute providing that "whenever on the trial of any felony or misdemeanor there shall appear to be any variance between the statement in such indictment and the evidence offered in proof thereof . . . or in the name or description of any matter or thing whatsoever therein named or described, . . . it shall be lawful for the court before which the trial shall be had, if it shall consider such variance not material to the merits of the case, and that the defendant cannot be prejudiced thereby in his defense on such merits, to order such indictment to be amended." But in Reg. v. Wright (1860) 2 Fost. & F. (Eng.) 320, it was held that the statute would not authorize an amendment of an indictment charging a "felonious" forging, by striking out the word "felonious," since such an amendment would change the nature of the crime charged from a felony to a misdemeanor.

In Rex v. Cohen (1912) 26 Ont. L. Rep. 497, 22 Ont. Week. Rep. 456, 3 Ont. Week. N. 1409, 5 D. L. R. 437, the trial court amended an indictment which charged the offense of obtaining "money" by false pretenses, by striking out the word "money" and substituting therefor the word "credit." The two charges were not substantially the same offense, and the court held that the amendment, being one of substance and substituting a different transaction from that alleged by the grand jury, was not within the power of the court, as defined by the statute (Crim. Code, § 889).

But it has been held that the court may amend an indictment by striking out a part of the crimes therein alleged, since such an amendment would not prejudice the accused. State v. Clement (1910) 80 N. J. L. 669, 77 Atl. 1067; State v. Lamb (1911) 81 N. J. L. 234, 80 Atl. 111; Com. v. Smith (1914) 24 Pa. Dist. R. 936.

In State v. Clement (N. J.) supra, where the defect of an indictment was not that it did not charge any crime, but that it charged too many, it was held proper for the court to authorize an amendment of the indictment striking out a part of the crimes charged, and leaving but one, since such an amendment would present no violation of his constitutional rights, and was authorized by § 44 of the Criminal Procedure Act.

In State v. Lamb (1911) 81 N. J. L. 234, 80 Atl. 111, it was held that the court might properly direct an amendment of an indictment striking out one of two charges therein, under the authority of the statute (Crim. Proc. Act, § 44). But the court added that, under the provision of this statute authorizing the court to amend indictments either in form or substance where the defect is apparent on the face of the indictment, the amendment must not be of such character as to make the indictment charge a crime when, as presented by the grand jury, it fails so to do.

And in Com. v. Smith (Pa.) supra, wherein an indictment had been returned charging both the offense of assault and battery, and of false imprisonment, it was held proper for the court to direct an amendment of the indictment so as to charge only the offense of assault and battery, the amendment not prejudicing the rights of the accused.

An indictment which has omitted an allegation, proof of which is necessary to a conviction, is fatally defective, and the court cannot authorize an amendment curing the defect.

Canada.—Reg. v. Carr (1872) 26 Lower Can. Jur. 61; Reg. v. Morrison (1879) 18 N. B. 682.

In State v. Durbin (La.) supra, it appeared that an indictment charging the defendant with robbery did not contain the word "feloniously" before the word "rob." The intention of the party committing the offense was a necessary ingredient of the crime, and the trial court allowed the district attorney to amend the indictment by making the necessary insertion. The court held that the amendment was ground for reversal, since the defect was not merely formal, but material, and prejudicial to the accused.

Where an indictment for prosecuting secular business on Sunday, in violation of statute, failed to negative an exception in the statute in favor of "druggists and apothecaries," the court held that the allowance of an amendment remedying the defect was a material change not authorized by the following provision of the statute (Rev. Code, p. 615, art. 257): "The indictment may, with consent of the grand jury or of the court, be amended at any time during the term of court at which it was found, or afterwards by the consent of defendant, with permission of the court." The authority therein granted extends only to amendments in matters of form. Kline v. State (Miss.) supra.

It was held in State v. Cannon (Miss.) supra, on the prosecution of an indictment for a violation of the statute against liquors shipped into the state under a fictitious name, that the omission to charge that the liquor ordered was to be shipped to the defendant was a fatal defect, and as such the court could not remedy the omission by amending the indictment.

Section 43 of the New Jersey Act of 1875, regulating proceedings in criminal cases, provided that amendments might be authorized on the trial of any indictment where there appeared to be a variance in the name of any place, person owning property, or person, property, or thing named therein or in the manner of describing the offense, or in case any error in form appeared in the indictment. And it was further provided by § 53 of the same act that on objection to the indictment, before the jury was sworn, for any defect of form or substance apparent on its face, the court might authorize an amendment curing such defects. In State v. Start-up (1877) 39 N. J. L. 423, it appeared that an indictment charging the defendants as members of the board of public works of Jersey City, with having unlawfully entered into a contract for work and materials without advertising for proposals, failed to allege a criminal intent in the failure to advertise. This was an essential element of the crime, and it was held that the omission could not be supplied by amendment under the sections above cited, since, while the expression "defect of substance" contained in § 53 might well cover the special points named in § 43, "it is plain that the legislature cannot constitutionally authorize an amendment in substance, which will change an indictment found by a grand jury so as to substitute one crime for another charged therein; nor, if the indictment fail to set out any crime, can the court so amend it as to charge the crime which it is supposed they intended."

And since in an indictment for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, the place of sale is of the essence of the crime, it has been held reversible error for the trial court to authorize an amendment thereto, substituting another locality for that designated by the grand jury, the court saying: "It will be perceived that the right to direct an amendment of the character specified in the statute [Crim. Proc. Act, § 34] is limited to those cases in which the variance is not material to the merits. In the present case, the variance seems to us to be vital. The sale of liquor is not of itself criminal; it only becomes so when it is made without a license. Consequently, as a license to sell liquor is limited by its terms to a particular place, the existence or nonexistence of the offense may depend altogether upon the place where the sale is made." State v. Ham (1905) 72 N. J. L. 4, 60 Atl. 41.

In State v. Twining (1904) 71 N. J. L. 388, 58 Atl. 1098, wherein it appeared that an indictment charged the conversion by the defendants of property belonging to a corporation as executor and trustee, for the use of the defendants and the corporation, and an amendment was allowed so as to charge that the defendants converted the property to their own use, it was held that the amendment was not authorized by § 44 of the Criminal Procedure Act, providing that defects of form or substance apparent on the face of an indictment might be amended by the court after demurrer or motion to quash, and before a jury was sworn. Further, the court said: "To convert the corporation's property to the corporation's own use, clearly, is not a criminal offense. . . . The indictment failed, therefore, to charge a crime. The amendment by which it was made to charge a crime was in violation of the constitutional right of the defendants not to be held to answer to a criminal offense, unless on the indictment of a grand jury."

In State v. Moyer (1915) 76 Or. 396, 149 Pac. 84, the trial court permitted an amendment to be made to an indictment for arson, by setting out therein the name of the owner of the property burned, which was a necessary part of the description of the offense. On this appeal the court held that in the absence of legislative authority the amendment, being one of substance, was unauthorized, and ground for reversal.

And where the description of the offense, in an indictment for adultery, was not equivalent to or synonymous with the statutory definitions of adultery, the court held that the indictment, being insufficient in a matter of substance, was not amendable. Edwards v. State (1881) 10 Tex. App. 25.

In Reg. v. Larkin (1854) 6 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 377, 2 C. L. R. 775, Dears. C. C. 365, 23 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 125, 18 Jur. 539, it was held that the court had no authority, after verdict, to direct an amendment to an indictment for receiving stolen goods, in correction of an erroneous allegation therein that the prosecutor, instead of the accused, knew that the goods were stolen, since the indictment was clearly bad as not alleging "scienter."

And an indictment for larceny and receiving stolen goods, which failed to allege the person to whom the goods belonged, was held defective in substance, and not amendable by the court, under the statute (14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 8) applying to formal defects. Reg. v. Ward (1857) 7 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 421.

And see Sill v. Reg. (1853) 17 Jur. 207, Dears. C. C. 132, 1 El. & Bl. 553, 118 Eng. Reprint, 542, 22 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 41, 1 Week. Rep. 147, wherein it was said that the omission to state, in an indictment for obtaining property by false pretenses, to whom the property belonged, was not a formal defect such as might have been amended by the court under the authority of the state.

In Reg. v. James (1871) 12 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 127, it was held that the words, "with intent to defraud," were a material part of an indictment for obtaining money through false pretenses, and when omitted they could not be supplied by amendment, under the authority vested in the court by statute.

Similarly, in Reg. v. Carr (1872) 26 Lower Can. Jur. 61, it was held that the omission of the words, "of malice aforethought," in an indictment for wounding with intent to kill, was a defect of substance, and that such defects could not be remedied by amendment, under the Criminal Procedure Act.

In Reg. v. Oliver (1877) 13 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 588, 36 L. T. N. S. 114, 25 Week. Rep. 323, wherein it appeared, after verdict, that an indictment did not substantially show an offense under the statute, and that it would be necessary for the court to amend it in a material averment to make it good and complete, it was held that the statute did not authorize the allowance of such an amendment.

And in Rex v. Benson [1908] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 270, 21 Cox, C. C. 631, 72 J. P. 286, 77 L. J. K. B. N. S. 644, 98 L. T. N. S. 933, 24 Times L. R. 557, 52 Sol. Jo. 516, wherein an amendment was allowed to an indictment for obtaining goods by false pretenses, striking out certain words and inserting the words, "by means of fraud," it was held that this was an amendment as to substance which was not authorized by common law or statute.

In Reg. v. Morrison (1879) 18 N. B. 662, an indictment charging that the defendant "did steal, take, and carry away" certain property, but which omitted the word "feloniously," was amended by the trial court, in correction of the defect. On appeal, the attorney for the Crown maintained that such amendment was properly allowed under the authority of § 32 of the Act 32 & 33 Vict. chap. 29, which provided that "every objection to any indictment for any defect apparent on the face thereof," etc., "must be taken by demurrer or motion to quash . . . and every court before which such objection is taken may, if it be thought necessary, cause the indictment to be forthwith amended in such particular." But the court held that the statute did not authorize the amendment of a defect of substance, such as this, saying: "When we consider the extent to which such an unlimited power of amendment might be carried, and the consequences of it, I doubt whether the Parliament of the Dominion intended to give a greater power of amendment in such cases than is given by the Imperial Act 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 25, that is, to amend formal defects only. If such a construction was given to the section as has been contended for on the part of the Crown, a person might be tried for an offense for which the grand jury had never found a bill. In the present case, no doubt, the objection is purely technical, and no injustice could possibly have been done to the prisoner by the amendment, but, on principle, I cannot see how we can avoid deciding in her favor."

It has been held that an indictment which does not show the jurisdiction of the court is fatally defective, and that the court cannot cure the defect by amendment. State v. Armstrong (1860) 4 Minn. 335, Gil. 251; State v. Chamberlain (1871) 6 Nev. 257; State v. Kelley (1891) 66 N. H. 577, 29 Atl. 843; State v. Blakeney (1890) 33 S. C. 111, 11 S. E. 637.

In State v. Armstrong (Minn.) supra, an indictment charging the defendant with adultery failed to aver that the crime was committed within the jurisdiction of the court. The trial court subsequently directed an amendment to the indictment, supplying the defect. On appeal, an attempt was made to justify the amendment, under the provisions of a statute (Comp. Stat. p. 765, § 7) conferring on the courts the right to amend an indictment on demurrer, in those cases in which "the defendant will not be unjustly prejudiced thereby." But the court, in reversal, said: "To supply an averment by amendment, which is necessary to perfect the charge, is in effect to 'hold the defendant to answer for a criminal offense' in a manner other than 'on the indictment of a grand jury,' and is, in a high degree, unjustly prejudicial to his rights as a citizen. Courts are bound to give effect to statutes, if possible, and this one, allowing an indictment to be amended, may be satisfied by permitting it to operate upon mere matters of form, as, for instance, the date or place of the finding; or the court in which found, if omitted, might be supplied by amendment when actually within the knowledge of the court; but matters of substance can never be inserted in an indictment, as the statutes now stand, by any other tribunal than the grand jury."

In State v. Chamberlain (1871) 6 Nev. 257, an indictment charging the defendant with murder contained no allegation as to the locus of the crime. The trial court, on motion, allowed an amendment to the indictment supplying the omission, after which the trial proceeded to a verdict of guilty. On appeal, the defendant claimed that the trial court had erred in allowing the amendment, and the court said: "This point we think well taken. An allegation of the county wherein a crime is committed is manifestly material, as much so as any fact constituting the body of the offense itself.

... Such allegation being a material and essential part of the indictment, it is clear the court could not amend it by the addition of such allegation, for the obvious reason that the Constitution of this state (art. 1, § 8) prohibits the trial of any person for a 'capital or other infamous crime ... except on presentment or indictment of a grand jury.' There can be no difference of opinion as to what is meant by the expression, 'indictment of a grand jury.' It manifestly means a written accusation made and presented by the inquisition known as a grand jury. But if, after being presented to the court, an indictment so found be in any particular materially modified or altered, if anything of substance be added to or taken therefrom by the court, it cannot with any degree of propriety be denominated an indictment of a grand jury."

In State v. Kelley (1891) 66 N. H. 577, 29 Atl. 843, on the prosecution of an indictment for housebreaking, it appeared that the crime had been committed in the town of Hudson, county of Hillsborough. The indictment alleged the commission of the offense in the town of Nashua, same county, and the trial court permitted the state to amend the indictment so as to conform the allegation therein to the evidence. This was held error, the court saying that the words "there situate," referring to the locality described in the indictment, constituted a material part of its description, and that an amendment thereto was not authorized by the statute (Gen. Laws, chap. 260, § 13).

And it was held in State v. Blakeney (1890) 33 S. C. 111, 11 S. E. 637, that an indictment for homicide which failed to state the place of death was fatally defective, and such omission could not be cured by amendment, the court saying: "Much of the useless phraseology which characterized indictments in former times may be dispensed with, and omissions of mere form may be cured by amendment; but this act [Act of 1887, p. 830, § 5] has neither dispensed with essential allegations, nor has it attempted to cure their omission by allowing amendments to that end."

c. Miscellaneous defects of substance.

"In indictments, matters of form may be amended; matters of substance may not be. It may be difficult to express in exact language that will be applicable to every case, what constitutes the substance of an indictment, and what is merely formal. In general, I think it may be laid down that the statement of every fact necessary to be proven to make the act complained of a crime is matter of substance in an indictment, and that all beyond the order of arrangement, the precise words, unless particular words alone will convey the proper meaning, is formal." State v. Amidon (1885) 58 Vt. 524, 2 Atl. 154, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 41. See to the same effect:

England.—Reg. v. Bailey (1852) 6 Cox, C. C. 29; Reg. v. — (1853) 6 Cox, C. C. 391.

In Hall v. State (Miss.) supra, it was held that an indictment charging that the defendants "wilfully, feloniously, of their malice aforethought, kill and murder one Joe Mizelle," could not be amended by the court's permission to insert the word "did," since its omission, on the authority of Cook v. State (1895) 72 Miss. 517, 17 So. 228, was a fatal defect.

In State v. Squire (N. H.) supra, wherein an indictment was returned into court without the signature of the foreman of the grand jury, it was held that the indictment could not thereafter be amended by permitting the foreman to affix his signature, the court saying: "An indictment once found is unalterable; or, if it be amended, can only be done by recommitment to the grand jury."

In State v. Johnson (N. J.) supra, the court said: "The well-recognized rule is that under § 44 of the Criminal Procedure Act the court cannot, by amendment, make the indictment charge a crime when none is presented, or charge a crime different from that presented by the grand jury." But this appears to be the only restriction under the New Jersey act, authorizing the court to amend indictments in its discretion in matters of substance as well as of form.

And in People v. Campbell (1859) 4 Park. Crim. Rep. (N. Y.) 386, it was said that the power of the court, in the absence of statute, did not extend to the addition or expunging of substantial allegations of an indictment.

Section 293 of the New York Code of Criminal Procedure lodged with the court the power of authorizing amendments to indictments in cases where a variance arose between the allegations therein and the proof, as to the time, or in the name or description of any place, person, or thing. In apparent accord therewith, the trial court in People v. Poucher (1883) 30 Hun (N. Y.) 576, appeal dismissed in (1885) 99 N. Y. 610, 1 N. E. 151, permitted an amendment to an indictment for grand larceny by striking out the description of the things stolen as gold and silver coin, and inserting therein a description of currency. But it was held that this was error, the court saying: "We do not see how one thing named, to wit, coin, can be stricken out and another thing, to wit, currency, be substituted in place of the thing stricken out, under the guise of amending the description of the thing named. In short, we are of the opinion that the section does not authorize an amendment of an indictment which charges the larceny of coin enumerated, by inserting an allegation of currency or of 'bank bills, lawful money of the United States, of a kind, number, and denomination unknown, and upon a bank unknown.' Therefore, we say the amendment was not warranted by § 293 of the Criminal Code, and its allowance was error, prejudicial to the defendant."

In People v. Geyer (1909) 196 N. Y. 364, 90 N. E. 48, reversing (1909) 132 App. Div. 790, 117 N. Y. Supp. 662, the appellant, having been convicted of grand larceny, urged an exception to the ruling of the trial court permitting an amendment to the indictment, conforming the charge that he had stolen a check for $500 on one date, with evidence that he had stolen "$500, good and lawful money of the United States," on a different date. The court held that the allowance of the amendment was error, not authorized by § 293 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, providing for amendments in correction of variances between the allegations of an indictment and the proof, in respect to the time, or the name or description of any place, person, or thing, when not prejudicial to the defendant in his defense on the merits. The court said: "The appellant was charged with stealing a check on a given date. He was convicted of misappropriating at a different date the proceeds of a check which he had a perfect right to receive and procure to be cashed. The property set forth in the indictment, and that for the alleged larceny of which he has been convicted, were entirely distinct and distinguishable. The check mentioned in the indictment . . . for the purposes of this discussion is not to be regarded at all as the same thing as bills or coin. The variation between indicting a man for stealing a horse, and convicting him for stealing articles of household furniture, would not be any more pronounced in principle than the variation between the indictment and proof in the present case."

But compare People v. Langley (1906) 114 App. Div. 427, 100 N. Y. Supp. 123, 20 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 281, wherein it was held that the amendment of an indictment in respect to a description of certain property, by inserting the word "West" before "Virginia" as the location thereof, was a proper exercise of the authority vested in the court by the statute.

In State v. Chamberlain (1871) 6 Nev. 257, in a discussion of the right of the court to amend indictments, it was said that "the courts have no more authority to add any material charge, accusation, or allegation to it than they have to find the bill in the first instance."

And see State v. Joseph (1888) 40 La. Ann. 5, 3 So. 405, wherein the supreme court held that it could not remand a case to permit an amendment of the indictment in essential particulars, since amendments must be made during the trial.

By § 4, chap. 243, of the Public Statutes of Rhode Island, it was provided that every defect and want of substance in any indictment could be cured by amendment, with the consent of the accused. In State v. McCarthy (1891) 17 R. I. 370, 22 Atl.

282, the trial court allowed an amendment to an indictment for house-breaking, in correction of a variance between an allegation therein and the proof as to the Christian name of the owner of the house in question, but the court held that the amendment was one of substance, which could not be amended without the consent of the accused or the concurrence of the grand jury.

In Calvin v. State (1860) 25 Tex. 789, wherein the district attorney and the attorneys for the defendant had agreed to an amendment of an indictment charging the defendant with the murder of one Vina, a slave described as "the property of the heirs of the said Robert Smith, deceased," by striking out the said description, the court held that the amendment was one of substance, and contrary to law, saying: "The question is whether or not the counsel, or the district attorney, and the prisoner, or even the court, can make an alteration in an indictment in a material respect. We think not. The indictment is the sworn declaration of the grand jury, and what they in substance 'do say' must stand as they have said it. The law prescribes the extent to which their finding may be amended. The amendments which are allowed relate to matters of form only, and to the name of the party who is accused. There can be no amendment as to any declaration of a fact by the grand jury."

And in Wade v. State (1908) 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 619, 108 S. W. 677, it was held that no indictment could be amended in a matter of substance, and where the court had permitted the amendment of an allegation in an indictment for a violation of the local option law, as to the particular election and the publication in the newspaper under it, the allowance of the amendment was held reversible error, as going to a matter of substance prohibited by § 567 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

In Rutherford v. State (1914) 74 Tex. Crim. Rep. 617, 168 S. W. 1157, on the prosecution of an indictment charging the defendant with the illegal practice of medicine, the word physician, in an allegation that the defendant "followed the occupation of a physician," was spelled "physicial." The defendant moved to quash the indictment on the ground that there was no such occupation as "physicial," whereupon the court directed an amendment to the indictment, correcting the error. This was held to be improper, the word in question being a matter of substance which the court had no power to amend.

And see Stinson v. State (1915) 76 Tex. Crim. Rep. 169, 178 S. W. 1039, wherein the action of the trial court in permitting the district attorney to amend an allegation in an indictment, by inserting the letter "t" which had been omitted from the end of the word "intent," was held improper and unauthorized, although not sufficient ground for reversal.

Where an indictment for obtaining money by false pretenses alleged that the defendant had pretended that he had served a certain order personally, and was entitled to a certain fee therefor, and the evidence was that the defendant said that he had left the order with a third person to serve for him, it was held that, the variance not being "in the name or description of any matter or thing named or described in the indictment," the court had no power to order an amendment under 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 1, in correction of the variance. Reg. v. Bailey (1852) 6 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 29.

And where an indictment for concealing the birth of a child averred that the body of the child had been concealed in and among a certain heap of carrots, and the evidence was that the body had been laid in back of the heap of carrots so that it was concealed by the height of the pile, it was held that the variance between the indictment and the proof was not such as could be corrected by amendment, under the authority of 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, § 1. Reg. v. — (1853) 6 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 291.

It has been held in Texas that the amendment of an allegation in an indictment, in respect to the venue, is one of substance and not authorized. But see other jurisdictions to the contrary in subd. II. g. supra. Collins v. State (1879) 6 Tex. App. 647; Robins v. State (1880) 9 Tex. App. 666; Patterson v. State (1918) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 205 S. W. 986.

In Collins v. State (Tex.) supra, the trial court permitted an amendment to an allegation as to the venue that the grand jurors were charged to inquire "in and for the body of the county of six," by striking out the word "six" and inserting the word "Morris," the name of the county. Without this amendment it appeared that the venue would not have been laid, and the court held that the amendment, directly affecting the validity of the indictment, and not merely its form, was beyond the province of the court.

In Robins v. State (1880) 9 Tex. App. 666, wherein an indictment failed to aver the venue of the offense, it was held that the defect was a fatal one, which could not be made the subject of amendment by the court.

And in Patterson v. State (Tex.) supra, it was held that, an allegation in an indictment as to the county in which the offense was committed being a matter of substance, the allowance of an amendment thereof by the court was reversible error, § 598 of the Code of Criminal Procedure forbidding amendments in matters of substance.

IV. Doctrine of no amendment.

There are a few jurisdictions wherein it is held that indictments cannot be amended by the court. But the cases so holding have arisen in the absence of statute, and hence are, in effect, a reiteration of the early common-law doctrine. See supra, I.; Ex parte Bain (1886) 121 U. S. 1, 30 L. ed. 849, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 781, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 122; United States v. Dembowski (1918) 252 Fed. 894; State v. Springer (1884) 43 Ark. 91; Henderson v. State (1909) 91 Ark. 224, 120 S. W. 966; Patrick v. People (1896) 132 Ill. 529, 24 N. E. 619. And see the reported case (DODGE v. UNITED STATES, ante, 1516).

In Ex parte Bain (1886) 121 U. S. 1, 30 L. ed. 849, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 781, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 122, the defendant was convicted on an indictment which, as returned by the grand jury, charged him with returning false statements as cashier of a banking association, "with intent to deceive the comptroller of the currency and the agent appointed to examine the affairs of said association," but which indictment had been amended by order of the court by striking out the words, "the comptroller of the currency and." The defendant made application for a writ of habeas corpus to release him from the custody of the United States marshal, on the ground that the indictment as amended was void, and the court, granting the writ, said: "The proposition that in the courts of the United States any part of the body of an indictment can be amended after it has been found and presented by a grand jury, either by order of the court or on the request of the prosecuting attorney, without being resubmitted to them for their approval, is one requiring serious consideration. Whatever judicial precedents there may have been for such action in other courts, we are at once confronted with the 5th of those articles of amendment adopted early after the Constitution itself was formed, and which were manifestly intended mainly for the security of personal rights. This article begins its enumeration of these rights by declaring that 'no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous, crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury,' except in a class of cases of which this is not one. . . . After the indictment was changed it was no longer the indictment of the grand jury which presented it. Any other doctrine would place the rights of the citizen, which were intended to be protected by the constitutional provision, at the mercy or control of the court or prosecuting attorney; for, if it be once held that changes can be made by the consent or the order of the court, in the body of the indictment as presented by the grand jury, and the prisoner can be called upon to answer to the indictment as thus changed, the restriction which the Constitution places upon the power of the court in regard to the prerequisite of an indictment, in reality, no longer exists." And it was held that the fact that the court, in striking out the surplus words, may have deemed the change an immaterial one, would make no difference in the principle.

In United States v. Dembowski (1918) 252 Fed. 894, the court, quoting Ex parte Bain (U. S.) supra, said that it was well established that, "in view of the 5th Amendment to the United States Constitution, which provides that no person shall be held to answer for . . . an infamous crime unless on the presentment of the indictment of a grand jury, except in certain military cases, an indictment returned by a Federal grand jury cannot be amended without being first resubmitted to the grand jury for that purpose."

And in the reported case (DODGE v. UNITED STATES, ante, 1510) the court holds that an indictment cannot be amended by the court, and characterizes an attempt to do so as a serious error which will be fatal to a conviction on the count.

In State v. Springer (1884) 43 Ark. 91, it was said that, when an indictment was returned into court by the grand jury and filed, it could not thereafter be withdrawn for amendment, and, further, the court said: "If the indictment was supposed to be insufficient, either for uncertainty or for want of proper legal words, the proper practice was to enter a nolle prosequi and have the grand jury find a second indictment on the original evidence. But there is no such thing known to our law as the amendment of an indictment. . . . In fact, there are constitutional objections to such amendments."

In Henderson v. State (1909) 91 Ark. 224, 120 S. W. 966, the court stated that to secure a conviction the proof, in a prosecution on an indictment, must correspond with the allegations of the indictment, since the indictment could not be amended to conform to the proof.

See Com. v. Child (1832) 18 Pick. (Mass.) 198, wherein Shaw, Ch. J., said: "It is a well-settled rule of law that the statute respecting amendments does not extend to indictments, that a defective indictment cannot be aided by a verdict, and that an indictment, bad on demurrer, must be held insufficient upon a motion in arrest of judgment." Justice Miller in Ex parte Bain (1886) 121 U. S. 1, 30 L. ed. 849, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 781, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 122, set out the foregoing statement of Shaw, Ch. J., as authority against the right of a court to amend any part of the body of an indictment, without reassembling the grand jury.

And see Com. v. Mahar (1834) 16 Pick. (Mass.) 120, wherein it was held that under the common law an indictment for arson could not be amended by inserting therein the name of the owner of the dwelling set on fire, even with the consent of the accused.

See also Com. v. Drew (1849) 3 Cush. (Mass.) 279, wherein the court said: "Where it is found that there is some mistake in an indictment, as a wrong name, or addition, or the like, and the grand jury can be again appealed to, as there can be no amendment of an indictment by the court, the proper course is for the grand jury to return a new indictment, avoiding the defects in the first." But the common-law rule has since been changed by statute.

In Patrick v. People (1890) 132 Ill. 529, 24 N. E. 619, the court held that it was reversible error on the part of the trial court to allow the amendment of an indictment which charged an attempt to "set at liberty and rescue a prisoner," by striking out the words "and rescue," saying: "There is nothing in our statute that purports to authorize anyone to change or modify the language of an indictment as presented by the grand jury."

And see State v. Sexton (1824) 10 N. C. (3 Hawks.) 184, 14 Am. Dec. 584, wherein it was said: "Nor are indictments within the operation of the Statutes of Jeofails, and cannot, therefore, be amended; being the finding of a jury upon oath, the court cannot amend without the concurrence of the grand jury by whom the bill is found."

V. Distinctive rules.*a. Rule in Alabama.

In Alabama, it is provided by statute that an indictment may be amended "with the consent of the defendant," and this is construed to mean that the court shall not allow any amendment to an indictment without the consent of the accused. Gregory v. State (1871) 46 Ala. 151; Johnson v. State (1871) 46 Ala. 212; Shiff v. State (1887) 84 Ala. 454, 4 So. 419, 7 Am. Crim. Rep. 240; Dix v. State (1913) 8 Ala. App. 338, 62 So. 1007.

Thus, it has been held that while the insertion of the words "of Montgomery county," after the words "city court" in the caption of an indictment, might appear immaterial, it constituted reversible error. Gregory v. State, supra.

And on the authority of Gregory v. State, supra, it was held in Johnson v. State (1871) 46 Ala. 212, that the insertion of the words "of Montgomery" after the word "court," etc., in the caption of an indictment, without the consent of the defendant, was reversible error.

In Shiff v. State (1887) 84 Ala. 454, 4 So. 419, 7 Am. Crim. Rep. 240, wherein it did not affirmatively appear that the defendant had given his consent to an amendment of the indictment as to his Christian name, the court held that it was reversible error so to amend the charge, saying: "Mere silence, or failure to object, ought not to operate as a forfeiture of the defendant's right to be tried on the indictment in the form it has been framed by the grand jury."

And where the trial court had, in effect, permitted an amendment of an indictment without the consent of the accused, it was held error to overrule a demurrer to the indictment, saying: "An indictment is the act of the grand jury, and cannot be amended, even as to immaterial matter, without the defendant's consent." Dix v. State (1913) 8 Ala. App. 338, 62 So. 1007.

But see Ross v. State (1876) 55 Ala. 177, wherein it appeared that the defendant, on trial for larceny, had given his consent to an amendment in the indictment as to the Christian name of the person to whom the goods belonged, and the court held that such amendment was proper.

And where an indictment charged the theft of three $1 bills and two $5 bills, and the proof showed the theft of two $5 bills and three $10 bills, but no $1 bills, the court held that it was proper to allow an amendment in correction of the misdescription, with the defendant's consent. Reynolds v. State (1891) 92 Ala. 44, 9 So. 398.

b. Rule in Hawaii.

In Hawaii, it has been provided by statute (Compiled Laws, § 33, p. 347) that every objection to an indictment for a defect apparent on the face thereof shall be taken by demurrer or motion to quash such indictment, and that in such cases the court may, if it be thought necessary, cause an amendment of the indictment in such particular. Rex v. Ho Fon (1889) 7 Haw. 757; Reg. v. Bush (1891) 8 Haw. 274.

Thus, in Rex v. Ho Fon, supra, wherein an indictment for conspiracy alleged that the defendant had conspired "to commit the crime of treason," the court held that the indictment was insufficient, as not setting out a statutory description of the crime, but said: "We will not order judgment to be entered in his favor, as under § 33 of the 'Act To Regulate the Practice and Procedure in Criminal Cases,' we have authority to cause the indictment to be amended."

And in Reg. v. Bush, supra, it was held that under the statute the court had authority to order an amendment so as to make an indictment good and sufficient, and that the authority of the court was not limited by the statute as to the character of the amendment.

METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

Kansas Supreme Court—December 6, 1919.

(105 Kan. 669, 185 Pac. 1051.)

Insurance — forfeiture without notice — industrial policy.

1. The provision of § 1, chap. 212, Laws of 1913 (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 5292), making it unlawful for any life insurance company, other than fraternal, doing business in the state, to forfeit or cancel a policy on account of the nonpayment of premiums without first giving notice in writing to the holder of any such policy of its intention to forfeit or cancel the same, is held to include industrial policies issued upon the payment of monthly or weekly premiums.

— provision for waiver of notice — validity.

2. The policy of insurance sued on was an industrial policy, which made it the duty of the company's agent to call upon the insured on Monday of each week to collect a weekly premium of 25 cents. Printed upon the policy with a rubber stamp was a provision as follows: "The insured under this policy, by the acceptance thereof, expressly waives, both for himself and for any other person who has now, or who may subsequently acquire any interest herein, the giving of any notice provided for by chapter 212 of the Laws of 1913 of the state of Kansas, and consents that said policy may be lapsed or forfeited for nonpayment of premium as herein provided." Held, that this provision of the policy was void.

— abandonment of policy.

3. On the facts stated in the opinion, it is held that the insured and the insurance company had not by mutual agreement abandoned and canceled the policy, and that it was in full force and effect at the time of the death of the insured.

Headnotes by PORTER, J.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Clay County (Smith, J.) sustaining a demurrer to the answer in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a life insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Robert Stone, E. H. Gamble, George T. McDermott, Robert L. Webb, William J. Tully, and H. O. Caster, for appellant:

If chapter 212 of the Laws of 1913 ever had any application to this class of policy, the force and effect of that statute has been waived and set aside by the original contract of the parties.

Mr. C. Vincent Jones for appellee.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is upon a policy of life insurance. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to its answer, the insurance company appeals.

In May, 1915, the appellant issued an industrial policy upon the life of Alice M. McCollum, and agreed in case of her death to pay to her executor or administrator the sum of $200. The particular kind of policy made it the duty of the company's agent to call upon the insured on Monday of each week and collect a weekly premium of 25 cents. It was provided in the policy that "if any premium shall not be paid when due, this policy shall be void." After the first premium, a grace of four weeks was granted for the payment of premiums, "during which time the insurance shall continue in force." In the same clause there was a provision that "if death occur within the days of grace, the overdue premiums shall be deducted from the amount payable hereunder, but neither this concession nor the acceptance of any overdue premiums shall create an obligation on the part of the company to receive premiums which are in arrears over four weeks."

The insured died on May 22, 1917. The last payment of premiums was made March 19, 1917, and the next payment was due on the 26th of that month. At the time the policy was written, chapter 212, Laws of 1913, was in force, with this provision: "It shall be unlawful for any life insurance company other than fraternal doing business in the state of Kansas to forfeit or cancel any life insurance policy on account of the nonpayment of any premium thereon, without first giving notice in writing to the holder of any such policy of its intention to forfeit or cancel the same." Gen. Stat. 1915, § 5292.

In the petition it was alleged that, for the purpose of avoiding the effect of this statute, the appellant, in violation of the laws of the state and against the public policy of the state, had stamped upon the insurance policy, with a rubber stamp, the following: "The insured under this policy, by the acceptance hereof, expressly waives, both for himself and for any other person who has now, or who may subsequently acquire any interest herein, the giving of any notice provided for by chapter 212 of the Laws of 1913 of the state of Kansas, and consents that said policy may be lapsed or forfeited for nonpayment of premium as herein provided."

The petition was drawn upon the theory that this provision of the policy was void. The appellee therefore contended that the four weeks of grace carried the policy to and including April 23d, and that the earliest date the appellant could have mailed a written notice was April 24th, and that under the statute the earliest date it could have forfeited the policy was thirty days thereafter, which was May 25, 1917, and that, the death of the insured having occurred three days before May 25th, the policy was still in force.

The appellant makes the following contentions:

"I. That chapter 212, Session Laws of 1913, being §§ 5292 and 5293 of the General Statutes of 1915 for the state of Kansas, does not apply to industrial policies—the class of policy upon which this suit is based.

"II. That if chapter 212, Session Laws of 1913, ever had any application to this class of policy, the force and effect of that statute has been waived and set aside by the original contract of the parties.

"III. The parties by their own acts and by mutual agreement have abandoned and canceled the policy."

The principal contention is that the Statute of 1913 does not apply to industrial policies. The argument is that the ordinary life insurance policy provides for a premium payable annually, semiannually, or quarterly, and that under any one of these three methods it often happens that the exact date when payment is due escapes the memory of a policyholder, the notice being often laid aside and forgotten, and the time allowed to slip by without making the payment; that the holder has a vested interest in an ordinary policy, and, because of the great importance to him that it should not lapse, the statute was enacted requiring thirty days' notice after the payment becomes due before the policy can be lawfully canceled by the company; and that, by reason of the peculiar character of industrial policies, the legislature could not have had them in mind when the law was passed. It is said: "The assured's attention was called every week to the fact that premium was due; and this was done by the representatives of the insurance company in person."

In this connection it is urged that the appellant alone has in force in this state more than 118,000 policies of this peculiar kind, and that a very large percentage of the policyholders are in the habit of getting in arrears in the payment of their premiums. It is urged that the application of the statute to this class of policies might require the company to mail fifty-two written notices a year advising a policyholder of its intention to cancel his policy, and that this would be unreasonable and extremely burdensome. It is said that the industrial policyholder already pays in his premium for the service of a personal collector calling every week to remind him that his premium is due and to collect the premium; that this personal service, more efficacious than any written or printed notice sent by mail, is already included in the present cost of the policy; and that to add the unnecessary expense of sending written notices by mail would not benefit the policyholder, but, on the contrary, would be reflected in the decreased earnings of the industrial insurance companies, and in the end return upon the policyholder himself. While these considerations furnish a forcible argument against the expediency of a law that would require industrial insurance policies to give such a notice, they furnish no assistance to the court in arriving at the true interpretation of the plain language of the statute. The statute is broad and sweeping. The title reads: "An Act to Prevent the Cancellation or Forfeiture of Life Insurance Policies, without Notice."

The language of the first section, that "it shall be unlawful for any life insurance company, other than fraternal, doing business in the state, etc.," shows that the legislature had in mind the exclusion of certain kinds of life insurance; and the fact that it expressly excludes from its provisions "fraternal" life insurance companies, and fails to exclude "industrial" policies, is an argument against the construction that it was the intention to exclude from its operation any other than "fraternal" insurance companies.

In Priest v. Bankers Life Asso. 99 Kan. 298, 161 Pac. 683, the conclusion was reached that the Kansas statute was based on the New York statute, "only in the sense that the same general legislative subject is dealt with, and New York acted first." (p. 300). It is, perhaps, of some significance, however, that the New York statute expressly excludes from its operation life insurance policies "issued upon the payment of monthly or weekly premiums," and there is some force to the contention of the appellee that, with the New York statute before it, our legislature appears to have acted with deliberation in leaving out the exception of "industrial" policies, although its attention was directed to the matter of the difference in the character of insurance policies, as appears by its express exclusion of "fraternal" insurance companies.

The conclusion we have reached is that, notwithstanding the obvious hardships imposed upon industrial policies of insurance by the provisions of the statute, the statute itself can bear but the one interpretation, and that to follow appellant's interpretation would require the court to depart from its judicial functions and to place an exception into the statute which the legislature did not see fit to do.

The second contention, that the force and effect of the statute has forfeiture without notice—industrial policy.

been waived and set aside by the original contract of the parties, does not seem to be insisted upon very strenuously by the appellant. It is sufficient answer to the contention to say that the broad terms of the statute would seem to forbid the parties to the contract from stipulating upon a clause in the policy in contravention of the statute. So far as the statute is indicative of a public policy, its provisions must be regarded as mandatory, and as not subject to waiver by reason of any provision in the policy itself. To hold otherwise would make the efficacy of the statute depend entirely upon the terms of the policy of insurance, and, manifestly, the insurance companies would refuse to issue contracts of life insurance that did not contain a provision in evasion of the statute. The legislature could not have —provision for waiver of notice

—validity.

intended that the public policy, which is the primary purpose of the act, should be made to depend upon the contract between the parties.

The third contention is that the parties by their own acts and by mutual agreement have abandoned and canceled the policy. This defense was set out in the answer, in substance, as follows:

After the insured quit paying premiums, appellant's agent called upon her each Monday for four consecutive weeks seeking to collect the premium, and orally notified her and her sister, who was her agent, that the policy would lapse unless the premiums were paid, and that, upon the day when the policy would lapse by its terms for the nonpayment of premiums, the agent orally notified them that unless the premium was paid the policy would lapse at midnight of that day; that thereafter he called upon the insured and her sister and sought to have the policy reinstated by the payment of the premiums, and they both replied that they did not wish longer to carry the insurance;

whereupon the policy was lapsed by the mutual agreement of the insured and the agent of the appellant. We have examined the cases cited in support of the contention. In our opinion, none of them apply to the situation presented by the facts in this case, for the reason that the four weeks of grace kept the policy in force to and including April 23d, and therefore the earliest date the appellant could have mailed a written notice was April 24th, and, since the insured died three days before the expiration of the thirty days from the time notice under the statute must have been mailed, it was in force at the time of her death.

No notice had been given under the statute, and the policy had not, in fact, lapsed. Besides, the statement of the insured that she did not wish longer to carry the insurance, made at a time when she still had an interest in it, and still retained the policy itself, must be construed to mean that she did not intend to make further payments of premiums but retained whatever interest she had in it according to its terms, which, regardless of what she may have believed, included a provision requiring the giving of thirty days' notice of an intention on the part of the appellant to forfeit the policy. It is clear, too, that the statement in the answer, that upon the date the policy would lapse by its terms for the nonpayment of premiums the agent orally notified the insured that the policy would lapse at midnight of that day, was predicated upon the appellant's interpretation of the policy. The statute requiring the giving of a written notice was a part of the policy, and the oral notice given the insured could not change the terms of the policy. The oral notice was given upon the mistaken theory of the appellant that the statute did not apply.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Applicability to industrial life insurance of statutory provision making notice a condition of forfeiture or cancelation of insurance for nonpayment of premiums.

An extended search has disclosed no decision other than the reported case (REYNOLDS v. METROPOLITAN L. INS. CO. ante, 1558) discussing the applicability to industrial life insurance of a statutory provision making notice a condition of forfeiture or cancelation of insurance for nonpayment of premiums. An industrial policy has been defined as "a small policy issued in consideration of weekly payments, in contradistinction to the ordinary insurance, where premiums are payable annually, semiannually, or quarterly." See Ann. Cas. 1918B, 1186. Such a policy is held in the reported case to be within the provision of a statute making it unlawful for any life insurance company other than a fraternal insurance company doing business within the state to forfeit or cancel any life insurance policy on account of the nonpayment of any premium thereon, without first giving notice in writing to the holder of the policy of its intention to forfeit or cancel the same. It appeared that the insurer had issued a policy in the sum of $200 to the plaintiff's intestate, conditional on the weekly payment of 25 cents. The last payment of premiums was made on March 19 and the insured died May 22. The plaintiff contended that the policy was still in force and effect as the thirty days of grace provided for by the policy, added to the thirty days' notice of forfeiture provided for by the statute, would bring the date of actual forfeiture to May 25, three days after the insured's death. The court holds that the statute applied to the policy, as the legislature, in enacting the statute, expressly excluded fraternal insurance companies, but made no reference to policies such as the one involved in the case, and to follow the insurer's interpretation would require the court to usurp legislative functions by placing an exception in the statute which the legislature did not see fit to make.

While the question does not appear to have arisen in any other jurisdiction where a statute requiring notice of forfeiture has been enacted, the New York statute (Insurance Law, § 92; 27 McKinney, Consol. Laws, 144) recognizes the peculiar nature of industrial policies by providing that when issued on the payment of monthly or weekly premiums, the notice is not required. Thus, in Baldwin v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. (1897) 23 App. Div. 5, 48 N. Y. Supp. 463, affirmed in (1900) 162 N. Y. 636, 57 N. E. 1103, the court said: "The plaintiff's counsel also contends that the notice or call for the payment of the mortuary premiums is not a sufficient compliance with § 92 of the Insurance Law (2 Rev. Stat. 9th ed. p. 1174), because it does not contain a reference to the right of the assured to a surrender value or paid-up policy. The policy, however, falls within the exception of the section, that is, it is either a policy issued upon the payment of a monthly premium, or it is a term insurance contract for a year or less, in which case no notice is necessary."

v.

A. L. PATTERSON.

(145 La. —, 83 So. 218.)

Louisiana Supreme Court — June 2, 1919.

Bills and notes — consideration — other note.

1. One promissory note is a good and sufficient consideration for another given in exchange therefor.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1569.]

— use for payment of indebtedness.

2. The holder and owner of a negotiable promissory note, acquired for good and sufficient consideration, may use it for the extinguishment of his obligations, and when so used his transferee is entitled to recover the amount thereby called for, as is also the transferee of his transferee, even though the latter acquires the instrument after maturity.

— demand note — delay — effect.

3. Seven months is an unreasonable time for a national bank in a failing condition to delay demanding payment of a demand note, and another bank which, after such delay, takes over its assets and agrees to pay its debts, is not a holder in due course of the note so acquired.

Headnotes by MONROE, Ch. J.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans, Division "B" (King, J.), in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

Statement by Monroe, Ch. J.:

Plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from a judgment rejecting its claim as holder for value before maturity of defendant's note, reading (in part):
"$10,000.

Macon, Georgia, 1—4—1914.

"On demand, after date, I, we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of the Commercial National Bank of Macon, Georgia, $10,000.

"For value received, payable at said bank, with interest from date, at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, with all costs of collection, including 10 per cent attorney's fees."

And then follow certain waivers and a stipulation which are not involved in this controversy, and the signature of the defendant, as the maker of the note.

Defendant, in an answer setting forth a good many details, pleads want of consideration, and denies that plaintiff has full ownership of the note.

The facts of the case, as we interpret the evidence, are as follows:

Defendant resided and was engaged in business in New Orleans. His uncle, J. J. Cobb, resided in Macon, Georgia, and was vice president of the Commercial National Bank and cashier of the Commercial Savings Bank of that city. Cobb's brother-in-law, Mallary, was president of both of those institutions, and Mallary's stepson, Lewis, was cashier of the one and assistant cashier of the other. For some years prior to the transaction out of which this litigation has arisen, defendant and Cobb had frequently exchanged notes for their mutual accommodation, and shortly before January 4, 1914, Cobb wrote to defendant, requesting him to make such an exchange, saying that he did not wish to put his own note in the bank (meaning the bank of which he was an officer), that he hoped to return the note which defendant might furnish within a short time, and that he would have the president and cashier of the bank (meaning the Commercial National) guarantee the note that he would furnish, to which request defendant gave his assent, and the exchange was effected; he forwarding to Cobb the note sued on, and Cobb forwarding to him his (Cobb's) note for a like amount, payable on demand to the order of A. L. Patterson & Co., after which, on January 12th, Mallary and Lewis mailed to defendant a guaranty reading: "We hereby guarantee the note of J. J. Cobb, held by you, in the sum of $10,000, for which you have given your demand note of like amount in favor of the Commercial National Bank. We have received from J. J. Cobb certificates of stock to the value of $10,000, which we likewise hold for your security."

The certificates thus referred to represented stock in the two banks of which Mallary, Lewis, and Cobb were officers, and somewhat later (prior to August 1st) they were withdrawn by Cobb and bonds of an Alaska Mining Company, of the par value of $10,000, were substituted in their stead; the explanation thereof, as given by Lewis, in his testimony, being as follows: "In the early summer of 1914 the Commercial National Bank had received some severe criticism as to its condition by the bank examiner, and Mr. Cobb became somewhat worried about the value of the security he had behind his note of Patterson, and he took those bonds [certificates?], and put in their stead $10,000 worth of first mortgage bonds of the Eagle River Mining Company."

As the Commercial National Bank failed on or about August 1st following, it is evident that the exchange of collaterals was made in the interest of the defendant, and, though he was not consulted about it at the time, he accepted the bonds after the failure of the bank, and states, in his answer, that he now has them in his possession; but that they have no market value, and that he is willing to surrender them in the event of his being discharged from liability with respect to the claim here set up.

Concerning the disposition that was made of the proceeds of the note here sued on, we have only the testimony of the three bank officers:

Mallary, the president, was able to testify that Cobb came to him one day and stated that he had a note of Mr. Patterson that he would like the bank (Commercial National) to discount, and that, after discussing the matter with him and Lewis, he agreed to the discount. He goes on to say that the note ~~was discounted~~ by the bank, and that he understood that Cobb received the proceeds; but his subsequent examination shows that, save as to his consent to the discount, he knew nothing about the matter except what he was told—by Lewis or Cobb.

Cobb gives the following, with other testimony, to wit:

Q. Were you indebted to the Commercial National Bank? If so, in what way?

A. I suppose the money was turned over—

Q. Tell us what you know. . . .

Q. Do you know whether or not it was applied to any obligation of yours with the Commercial National Bank?

A. I did not have any that it could have been applied to, as far as I can recall now. . . . I had obligations that Mr. Lewis was looking after for me, and I wanted to put them in better shape and relieve him of that.

Q. To whom were these obligations due?

A. I think in the Commercial Savings Bank—I said obligations—they were things that I felt that I was more responsible for, and I wanted to relieve him of carrying them in the shape they were.

Q. Do you know they were not Commercial National obligations?

A. I think so—I am not sure—I think so.

Q. What kind of obligations were they?

A. They were some that I felt responsible for, occasioned by a loss of a former employee of my insurance agency, or bond agency, and some indebtedness for carrying life insurance premiums.

Q. Whose were they?

A. Mr. E. Y. Mallary's and my own, principally; they were for the benefit of the bank; and some obligations in connection with the Eagle River mine, and there were others I do not recall now.

Q. Did not Mr. Patterson's note liquidate all those obligations, or did you raise some other money in addition to that?

A. Some other money.

Q. Did that have anything to do with the fact that you cannot recall definitely what were paid from the proceeds of this note and what were paid from other sources?

A. My recollection is that I simply had Mr. Mallary O. K. the note and left it with Mr. Lewis to use as he saw best.

Q. In caring for those obligations you speak of?

A. Yes, sir.

Lewis, after testifying, categorically, that he discounted the note for Cobb, and paid him $10,000 in cash, that the Commercial National Bank had no interest in the matter (not being the creditor of Cobb), except to buy the note from him, that it paid him full value therefor, and that the note was sold by the bank, with its other assets, gives the following further testimony, on his cross-examination:

Q. This money, the $10,000 which Mr. Patterson's note was discounted for, how was that paid to Mr. Cobb?

A. Mr. Cobb, I think, used that money in the Commercial Savings Bank.

Q. It was not put in the Commercial National Bank and checked out by Cobb for any other purpose, for all you know?

A. No, sir. . . . My impression is that Mr. Cobb used that money and took up some papers on which he considered himself morally, and not legally, bound.

Q. They were taken up in the Savings Bank, of which you were an officer?

A. Yes, sir. . . .

Q. You don't know what these obligations were that were taken up in the Commercial Savings Bank?

A. No, sir; I have no doubt but what I knew at the time, but I don't know now.

Q. Was the money immediately applied to the taking up of the obligations, or did it stay in the Commercial National Bank for any length of time?

A. I think it was immediately applied.

Q. Do you know who applied it—Mr. Mallary or Mr. Cobb?

A. Very probably I did.

Q. You applied the money yourself to the obligations in the Commercial Savings Bank?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Mr. Cobb had no charge of the money, individually, except in so far as you applied it to those obligations?

A. He handed me the note.

Q. He handed you the note, and you took the money and paid those obligations to the Commercial Savings Bank?

A. Yes, sir. . . . He owed the Commercial National nothing. . . .

Q. This paper of Patterson went along with the other assets of the Commercial National Bank, when the American National Bank took over the assets?

A. Yes, sir. . . .

Q. The consideration of the transfer of those assets was that the American National Bank should pay the debts of the Commercial National Bank and repay itself out of the assets of the Commercial National Bank—practically so?

A. Yes, sir. . . .

Q. Were the papers that were paid to the Commercial Savings Bank obligations upon which Mr. Cobb was either maker, indorser, surety, or how was it?

A. He did not appear in any of these capacities.

Q. What were those papers?

A. I cannot recall what they were.

Q. What sort of papers were they?

A. They were loans held by the bank on which it was stated Mr. Cobb was not directly liable, either as maker, indorser, guaranty, or surety; but they were papers with some doubt as to their collection, and for which Mr. Cobb felt a sense of moral responsibility and wanted to take up.

It seems to be conceded that no demand was made for the payment of the note here sued on until after it had come into the possession of the plaintiff, or say some eight months after its date.

Monroe, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Negotiable Instruments Law (as enacted in this state) declares that where a negotiable instrument is payable on demand, presentment must be made within a reasonable time after its issue (an exception being made in the matter of the presentment for payment of bills of exchange), that, if it is negotiated an unreasonable time after its issue, the holder is not deemed a holder in due course; and that, "in determining what is a 'reasonable time,' or an 'unreasonable time,' regard is to be had to the nature of the instrument, the usage of trade, or the business (if any) with respect to such instruments, and the facts of the particular case." Act No. 64 of 1904, §§ 53, 71, and 193. There is no evidence before us as to the usages of trade; but, considering the nature of the instrument here in question, the fact that it was held by a national bank for seven months, while the bank was drifting towards failure, and that plaintiff acquired it after the bank had failed, without having made demand for its payment, we are of opinion that plaintiff cannot be regarded as a holder in due course, and hence that, as to its right of recovery, it stands in the shoes of the Commercial National Bank, from which the instrument was acquired.

Counsel for defendant admitted, in their first brief, that there was "a technical consideration" for the note, as between Cobb and Patterson, but argued that this is not a suit by Cobb; that he has no interest in it; that he did not indorse the note to the Commercial National Bank; and that the party in interest is the plaintiff, by which it was acquired after maturity, and which, therefore, has only such rights as the payee might have had. In their "second, or reply," brief the learned counsel announced the discovery that, as the note which the defendant received from Cobb was made payable to the order of A. L. Patterson & Co., and not to the order of A. L. Patterson, the defendant, A. L. Patterson, did not receive even a technical consideration for the note which he gave in exchange.

The question of the exchange of notes was, however, the subject of a correspondence between defendant and Cobb, and, as Cobb apparently wanted defendant's note to be made payable to the order of the Commercial National Bank, it is fair to assume that defendant preferred to have Cobb's note made payable to A. L. Patterson & Co. At all events, he accepted the note in that form; he has retained it up to the present time without complaint on that score; and it is not now suggested that it is any the less available to him, personally, because so drawn. The fact that the notes were made as they were, with the full knowledge and approval of the parties to the exchange, in no wise, therefore, affects the question of the consideration; and, whilst it appears to us that "technical consideration" is about all that is required for the purposes of the case, the authorities are agreed that one —consideration —other note. promissory note is a good and sufficient consideration for another, given in exchange. Joyce, Defenses to Com. Paper, § 227; Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 479, 480; Selover, Neg. Inst. p. 103, § 66; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, p. 286, § 172a; Greenwood v. Lowe, 7 La. Ann. 197; Rice v. Grange, 131 N. Y. 149, 80 N. E. 46; Crampton v. Newton, 132 Mich. 149, 93 N. W. 250; Franklin Nat. Bank v. Roberts

Bros. Co. 168 N. C. 473, 84 S. E. 706.

Having, then, acquired defendant's note for a good and sufficient consideration, Cobb was at liberty to make of it the use that he had in view when he acquired it, and of which the defendant was fairly advised, since the note was made payable to the order of the Commercial National Bank, and it was obvious that it was intended for negotiation through that bank. The learned counsel argue that it was not "discounted" by the bank, since the date of its maturity was not fixed, and, according to the testimony of Lewis, no discount was deducted, to which it may be added that the proceeds were not credited to Cobb in the ordinary way, and were not checked out by him.

Notwithstanding, however, that the testimony of Lewis is not as frank as it should have been, and inspires no great confidence, we are satisfied, all the circumstances considered, that, in consideration of the receipt of the note, the funds of the Commercial National Bank, to the amount called for upon the face of the note, were used, at the instance of Cobb, in the extinguishment of his obligation, and as it must have entered into defendant's contemplation, when he executed and delivered it, that it would or might be used in some such way, he has no just cause of complaint in the fact that, having served its purpose, he is now called on to pay it.

It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, and that there now be judgment in favor of the American National Bank, plaintiff herein, and against the defendant, Andrew L. Patterson, in the sum of $10,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from January 4, 1914, until paid, together with 10 per cent as attorney's fees, upon the aggregate amount of said principal and interest, and all the costs of this suit.

A petition for rehearing having been granted, Dawkins, J., on November 8, 1919, handed down the following additional opinion:

In disposing of this case on rehearing, we find it unnecessary to further discuss the legal questions involved, as we feel that they have been fully and properly determined in our former opinion. The matter, in our opinion, has resolved itself to a question of fact as to whether or not the Commercial National Bank, payee of the note, paid to Cobb, or to other persons at his request, the amount thereof, to wit, $10,000. If it did, it makes no difference whether it or the present plaintiff be a third holder, in a legal sense, or not. Defendant evidently intended that the note might be so used, if Cobb saw fit, and if he received the money, or if others received it for his benefit, or at his instance, the Commercial National Bank could have enforced payment in full, and its transferee can do likewise, regardless of what may have been paid therefor. The note would represent a debt owed by defendant, and he would not be concerned as to what consideration the original payee may have been willing to receive for it.

The witness Lewis, who was cashier of the Commercial National Bank, and assistant cashier of the Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, testified that he received from the Commercial National Bank the amount of this note and applied the same to the discharge of obligations in which Cobb was interested at the bank of which he was assistant cashier, all as requested by Cobb. This testimony is corroborated by that of Mallery, who was president of the payee bank, who swore that he approved the loan, and by Cobb, who says that he discussed and concluded such an arrangement with Mallery. It is true that Lewis and Cobb were unable, or at least failed, to give the details with regard to the obligations which were so discharged at Cobb's request; but shall we, on that account, hold that the main fact of the Commercial National Bank's having parted with its money had not been established, when defendant was afforded every opportunity for cross-examination, and when he had the right to call for and have produced the books and records, not alone of the Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, but also of the Commercial National Bank, or to take the testimony of those now having the custody of same, which was not done? It does seem that it would have been a very easy matter to have proven, by the note register and cash account of the payee bank of the date of the alleged loan, whether or not it had been made. There is no proof to the contrary in the record, other than the inference to be drawn from the failure or inability of Lewis and Cobb to detail the items to which the proceeds of the note were applied, at a bank other than that at which the loan was made, and in which the lender bank had no concern.

We conclude that the preponderance of the evidence shows that the loan was made, and for this reason our former decree is reinstated and made the final judgment of this court.

ANNOTATION.

Cross notes, bills, or checks as consideration for each other.

- I. In general, 1569..
- II. Nonpayment of one of the notes or bills, 1571.
- III. Exchange as a question of intent of the parties, 1571.

I. In general.

The present annotation deals with the question of consideration where cross notes, bills, or checks are exchanged by the makers thereof. It does not include in general cases where a note or other commercial paper of a third party is given in exchange.

In the annotation the term "cross notes" is used in the sense employed generally in the cases; i. e., notes given for mutual accommodation of the parties thereto, or of one of them, in which the maker and the payee of one note are respectively the payee and maker of the other note. A similar relationship exists as between acceptors of cross bills of exchange or the makers of cross checks.

It is well settled that cross notes, bills, or checks, though made for the accommodation of the parties, are not accommodation, but business, paper, provided there is no restriction on use or negotiation, the one note, bill, or check being a good consideration for the other received in exchange.

The rule above indicated is also approved, on facts not within the scope of the annotation, in Cameron v. Chappell (1840) 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 94, and Davis v. McCready (1858) 17 N. Y. 232, 72 Am. Dec. 461.

The fact that an exchange of notes is made not for mutual accommodation, but for the accommodation of one of the parties only, will not affect the rule that cross notes are a consideration the one for the other, if there is no restriction as to the use to be made of either note. Odell v. Greenly (1855) 4 Duer (N. Y.) 358.

It is well settled, it was said in Higginson v. Gray (1843) 6 Met. (Mass.) 212, that exchange notes, though made for the accommodation of the parties, are not what is known and recognized as accommodation paper, there being a mutuality in the former transaction which does not exist in the latter, on account of which the exchange is in law a good consideration between the parties, each for the other.

"An exchange of notes may have been accommodating, but such a transaction constitutes none of the elements of accommodation paper in the mercantile sense of that term. A mutual independent promise, in writing, is a good consideration to uphold the contract of each, and it may be enforced, even by the original party." Dockray v. Dunn (1854) 37 Me. 442.

And, referring to an exchange of notes, the court in Coburn v. Baker (1857) 6 Duer (N. Y.) 532, said: "The settled doctrine would seem to be that any indorsee of such a note, before its maturity, has the same rights against the maker of it as if each note had its origin in a distinct and independent transaction, and the consideration of it was property sold and delivered to the maker."

Also in Whittier v. Eager (1861) 1 Allen (Mass.) 499, the court said: "Nothing is better settled than that a promissory note given by the maker in exchange for a note given to him by the payee is for a good consideration, and is in no proper sense an accommodation note, although made for the mutual convenience of the parties. . . . Being a valid note on which the defendant was liable, it was wholly immaterial whether the plaintiff, as indorsee, took it for value."

Where there is an exchange of notes without restriction as to use, the transaction is the same, so far as consideration is concerned, as though value had been received in goods or money. Wooster v. Jenkins (1846) 3 Denio (N. Y.) 187. In this case it was held that each party to an exchange of notes was bound to pay his own note, and that where the plaintiff and the defendant had exchanged notes, and the former had paid both notes, the defendant having failed and the plaintiff having paid the defendant's note as an indorser, the plaintiff could not recover for money paid on his own note, but his action should have been on the note of the defendant.

It was contended in Wooster v. Jenkins (N. Y.) supra, that as between the original parties, cross notes should be regarded as accommodation paper, in contradistinction to business securities; but the court stated that the rule was settled to the contrary; that each party may prove the debt against the other under a commission of bankruptcy; and that while as long as the notes remained in the hands of the original parties they balanced each other, this was only by way of set-off.

An exchange of notes, without any limitation upon the use of the same, vests the title to the respective notes in the holder, the one being a consideration for the other, and when discounted the proceeds can be applied as the holder may direct. Lord v. Graveson (1904) 26 Ohio C. C. 371.

Although the annotation does not include in general cases involving notes or checks of third parties, attention is called to Luke v. Fisher (1852) 10 Cush. (Mass.) 271, holding that the plaintiff's indorsement of a note of a third party was a good consideration for the defendant's note to him.

II. Nonpayment of one of the notes or bills.

It follows from the rules above stated that, the transaction being complete at the time of the exchange, the question of original consideration is not affected by subsequent events, such as a failure of one of the parties to pay his note when due or the surrender and cancelation of one of the notes without payment. Farber v. National Forge & Iron Co. (1894) 140 Ind. 54, 39 N. E. 249; Iowa College v. Hill (1861) 12 Iowa, 462; Wooster v. Jenkins (1846) 3 Denio (N. Y.) 187; Coburn v. Baker (1857) 6 Duer (N. Y.) 532; Milius v. Kauffmann (1905) 104 App. Div. 442, 98 N. Y. Supp. 669; Franklin Nat. Bank v. Roberts Bros. Co. (1915) 168 N. C. 473, 84 S. E. 706; Lord v. Graveson (1904) 26 Ohio C. C. 371; see also Rice v. Grange (1892) 131 N. Y. 149, 30 N. E. 46, which applies the rule in the case of an exchange of a note of a third party.

Where there is an exchange of notes, failure of consideration is not shown, so as to prevent recovery in an action by a transferee of one of the notes against the maker, by evidence that after the transfer the defendant canceled and surrendered to the maker the note received by him in exchange. Iowa College v. Hill (1861) 12 Iowa, 462, supra.

If one of the parties to an exchange of cross notes out of proceeds of the note of the other makes a payment to the latter on account, it constitutes a final payment thereon, although he fails to pay his own note, given in exchange therefor. Lord v. Graveson (1904) 26 Ohio C. C. 371, supra.

And in Newmarket Sav. Bank v. Hanson (1893) 67 N. H. 501, 32 Atl. 774, it was held that where there is an exchange of notes, the one being a consideration for the other, either party can recover against the other without paying his own note, the defendant having the right to avail himself of the plaintiff's note only by way of set-off.

As to right to set-off as between original parties, see also Wooster v. Jenkins (N. Y.) supra, I.

A promissory note given by the maker in exchange for a promissory note given by the payee is for a good consideration, although made for the mutual accommodation of the parties, and although the note given in exchange by such payee is worthless. Farber v. National Forge & Iron Co. (1894) 140 Ind. 54, 39 N. E. 249, supra.

Of course, the fact that the check or note given in exchange for the one in suit is not paid will not be a defense as against a bona fide holder for value. This was the situation in Crescent City Bank v. Hernandez (1873) 25 La. Ann. 43.

III. Exchange as a question of intent of the parties.

The cases holding that cross notes are a good consideration the one for the other are based on the assumption or determination that the one was given and received in exchange for the other, that they are both valid notes, unrestricted as to use, and that neither of them is, by the understanding of the parties, a mere memorandum, receipt, or security. And if the understanding was that there should not be such an exchange of securities, this fact may be shown, and will affect the question of consideration.

Ordinarily, on an exchange of cross notes, without restriction as to use, the maker of one of the notes cannot defend an action against him thereon on the theory that the other note was given to him merely as a receipt and that, therefore, there was no consideration for his own note. Eaton v. Carey (1831) 10 Pick. (Mass.) 211.

But whether an exchange of notes is intended to make one a consideration for the other is a question of the intent of the parties; and so where a married woman, in exchange for her note given for the accommodation of the payee, received a note of the latter for the same amount, with the understanding that it was not to be used, it was held that she had not received value within the meaning of the enabling act relating to married women, which provided that nothing therein contained should enable a married woman to become a guarantor or surety unless she received money, property, or other thing of value, for her own use, on the faith of her contract. Vliet v. Eastburn (1899) 63 N. J. L. 450, 43 Atl. 741.

The note received with the understanding that it was not to be used was said, in Vliet v. Eastburn (N. J.) supra, to be in effect a memorandum; the agreement that it should not be used, though oral, was valid and admissible in evidence in an action on the note; and the fact that such an action was brought by the payee, it was held, would not render valid the note given in exchange therefor.

For the rule to apply that cross notes given in exchange are for sufficient consideration, it must appear that it was the intention of the parties to make a mutual exchange of paper, and whether this was their design will depend on the particular circumstances of each case. Williams v. Banks (1857) 11 Md. 198. In this case it was held that the evidence was insufficient to show that a grandparent had given the note in question to her grandson in exchange for the latter's note bearing the same date and for twice the amount, found among her papers after her death, where it appeared that the grandson was known to the maker of the note as a spendthrift, totally insolvent, who was relying on money furnished him by his grandparent for his maintenance, and there was no proof that he had ever paid to her any of the many notes he received from her. Under these circumstances the court said it could not for a moment suppose that she gave her note in consideration for his, or that she intended the transaction between them should be what the law regarded as a mutual exchange of notes.

The rule that the intent of the parties will determine whether there has been an exchange of notes so as to constitute the one a consideration for the other is supported also by the case of Wooster v. Jenkins (1846) 3 Denio (N. Y.) 187, in which the court, although holding that there had been an exchange of notes in this instance so as to constitute a valid consideration, stated that if a party lends his note or acceptance, and takes a counter security of the same kind, by way of indemnity merely, the lent note or bill will not have inception as a valid security until it passes into the hands of a bona fide holder.

An exchange of notes constituting a consideration the one for the other does not arise where a blank note is left by the payee with the maker of the other note merely as a receipt to indemnify him in case of misuse of funds raised on his note; and if the note of the latter is returned to him without being used, but he fills out the blank note received as indemnity, the latter is without consideration in his hands. Iowa College v. Hill (1861) 12 Iowa, 462.

And where an exchange of checks is made for accommodation, but the evidence shows that one of the checks is merely loaned, and the other is given merely as a memorandum or guaranty for the protection of the payee, the latter, if he has not paid or been called upon to pay his own check, cannot enforce payment of the check given him as a guaranty, since he stands in the position of a surety who, without discharging the debt, cannot sue his principal. Burdsall & Co. v. Chrisfield, (1855) 1 Disney (Ohio) 51.

A presumption of an exchange of notes between parties thereto, so as to constitute the one a consideration for the other, arises from similarity in date, amount, and terms of the notes; but this presumption is rebuttable. Mutual Loan Asso. v. Brandt (1901) 35 Misc. 270, 71 N. Y. Supp. 770.

To rebut such presumption, the maker of one of the notes, who defends an action on it on the ground that it was given without consideration and was discounted with the plaintiff at a usurious rate, may show what occurred at the time of the alleged exchange. Ibid.

The fact that the payee, for whose accommodation only the defendant exchanged notes, promised to protect the note of the defendant, was held in Odell v. Greenly (1855) 4 Duer (N. Y.) 358, not to require submission to the jury of the question whether there was in fact an exchange of notes within the rule that on such an exchange one note is a good consideration for the other, where there was no evidence of any restriction in the use of the notes.

An allegation in a pleading that a note was given "in consideration" of an acceptance by the payee of a bill of exchange drawn by the maker of the note was held in Farley Nat. Bank v. Henderson (1897) 118 Ala. 441, 24 So. 428, not a sufficient allegation that the note was given in exchange for the acceptance, and not merely as security therefor, so as to preclude the bill from being merely accommodation paper.

But the acceptor of the bill was held estopped to assert that it was given merely for accommodation, where, before the maturity of the acceptance, he attempted to enforce the note against the maker by legal proceedings, since the attempt was consistent only with the theory that the note was given in exchange for the acceptance, and not merely as security therefor. Ibid.

Where there is an exchange of checks for the accommodation of one of the parties, the fact that the latter's check is not used, but is retained by the other party to the transaction, who produces it in evidence when sued on his own check by a third party, does not sustain the defense of failure of consideration, on the theory that the check he received in exchange was a mere memorandum and was not to be used, even if this was the expectation of the parties, provided there was no agreement to this effect. Rankin v. Knight (1871) 1 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. (Ohio) 515. R. E. H.

Fixtures — ranges and beds.

1. Where the holder of a ground lease erects an apartment building and installs a gas range and a door bed in each flat and thereafter forfeits his lease, these articles will pass as fixtures to the owner of the realty if no rights of third parties are infringed and there be no agreement to the contrary.

— ease of removal — effect.

3. An article annexed to the freehold, but which can be removed without substantial injury to the realty, may remain a chattel if the circumstances show that such was the intention.

5. Where the holder of the ground lease purchased these ranges and beds under a conditional contract of sale by which title and right of removal remained in the vendors, and, after defaulting in his payments, transferred all his rights in them to a third party, not concerned in the real estate, whom the vendors accepted as the purchaser in his stead, he never had the right to make them a part of the realty, and such third party is entitled to them as against the landowner.

8. If an article is annexed to the freehold, the manner in which it is annexed may convert it into realty regardless of other considerations, but ordinarily the manner of annexation is not decisive, but is only one of several facts to be taken into account in determining the question.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County (Fisk, J.) denying a new trial in an action of replevin brought to recover possession of certain property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. George S. Grimes, for appellant:

The property in suit was personal property, and plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the same.

If plaintiff was not entitled to a directed verdict, he was at least entitled to have the question of title and right of possession submitted to the jury.

Mr. William B. McIntyre, for respondents:

Plaintiff was not entitled to the possession of the property in suit, even if it were personal property, at the time of the commencement of the action, or at the trial.

There was an abandonment of the property in question at the termination of the lease.

Erickson v. Jones, 37 Minn. 459, 35 N. W. 267; Wood, Land. & T. p. 908.

Taylor, C., filed the following opinion:

Replevin to obtain possession of nineteen Murphy door beds, nineteen gas ranges, and two laundry stoves. The court directed a verdict for defendant and plaintiff appealed from an order denying a new trial.

Defendant Vose, who will be designated as defendant hereafter, leased a parcel of land in the city of Minneapolis to Harold N. Falk for a term of one hundred years at a specified annual rental payable quarterly. The lease required Falk to erect a brick apartment building on the property "divided into flats and all complete and ready to live therein and to rent," and provided for the execution of a mortgage on the building and land for a part of the cost of the building. Falk erected a building divided into nineteen flats and installed a Murphy door bed and a gas range in each flat and two gas laundry stoves in the basement. He purchased the ranges and stoves from the Minneapolis Gaslight Company under a contract which provided for payment of the purchase price in monthly instalments, and further provided that the company retained ownership of them, with the right to take possession of and remove them in case of default in such payments. He purchased the beds from the New England Furniture & Carpet Company under a similar contract. These contracts were duly filed in the office of the city clerk. After making the stipulated payments for a considerable time, Falk defaulted therein, and on account of such default the Gas Company was about to reclaim and remove the ranges and stoves, and the Furniture Company was about to remove the beds. Falk was also indebted to A. R. Chesnut in the sum of $4,000. He and Chesnut made an arrangement with plaintiff by which he conveyed to plaintiff by bill of sale all his interest in the ranges, stoves, and beds, and plaintiff agreed to make the remaining payments to the companies as they accrued, and to sell the ranges, stoves, and beds as soon as they were fully paid for, and, after deducting his advances with interest from the proceeds, to pay the balance thereof to Chesnut, to be applied on Falk's indebtedness to Chesnut. Falk assigned to plaintiff his contract with the Furniture Company, and that company assented thereto. Falk's contract with the Gas Company was surrendered and canceled and in lieu thereof a new contract was executed by that company directly to plaintiff. Plaintiff made the payments to the companies as they accrued until the amounts unpaid were reduced to the sums of $35 and $20 respectively.

In the meantime defendant had canceled Falk's ground lease of the land for nonpayment of rent, and took possession of the building and the ranges, stoves, and beds, claiming them as a part of the realty. About five weeks later, and after an unsuccessful attempt to adjust the matter, plaintiff brought this action.

The question presented is whether the court erred in ruling as a matter of law that the ranges, stoves, and beds had become a part of the realty.

While there are well-settled general rules for determining whether an article, originally personal property, has become a fixture, that is, a part of the realty, it is frequently difficult to determine whether, under the peculiar facts of a particular case, a particular article has become a part of the realty or still remains personal property.

To become a fixture the article must be physically or constructively attached to the freehold. If not attached to the freehold, and not an essential or component part of some structure or appliance which is attached to it, the article remains a chattel, although intended for permanent use on the premises. If annexed to the freehold, the manner in which it is annexed may convert it into realty regardless of other considerations, as where brick or other material has been incorporated into a permanent building, or where an article, otherwise a severable chattel, cannot be removed without leaving the freehold in a substantially worse condition than before the annexation. Usually, however, the manner of annexation is not decisive, but only one of several facts to be taken into account in determining whether the article has become realty or remains personalty as between the parties concerned. In the present case the ranges and stoves were annexed to the building only by the ordinary plumbing fixtures, and could be unscrewed from the gas pipes and removed without injury to the building itself. The door beds were arranged to swing back into closets when not in use. In order to receive them the closets were constructed of a greater size and with wider doors than ordinary closets. Each bed rested on a pedestal which was fastened to the floor by screws and served as a pivot on which the bed was swung from the room into the closet or from the closet into the room. There was also an appliance for holding the bed in position which was fastened to the door casing by screws. These beds could be removed without material injury to the building. Both the ranges and stoves and the beds were annexed to the building sufficiently to constitute them fixtures under some circumstances. So far as annexation is concerned they are in about the same situation as the radiators and office desk held to be fixtures as between mortgagor and mortgagee in Capehart v. Foster, 61 Minn. 132, 52 Am. St. Rep. 582, 63 N. W. 257.

Falk took possession of the land as lessee for a term of one hundred years under a lease which required him to erect an apartment building, divide it into flats, and fit them ready to rent. In completing the building he placed a gas range and door bed in each flat for the use of those who should rent the flats. These articles were adapted to the purpose for which the building was constructed, and enhanced its rental value, and were intended to be rented with the flats as a part thereof. Under such circumstances Falk's position was different from that of an ordinary tenant who rents a building and installs conveniences therein for his own use, and these articles would clearly be fixtures as between him and defendant if no rights of third parties were involved. But Falk purchased these articles under a conditional sale contract by which they were to remain chattels, with the title and right of removal in the vendors. They never became Falk's property and he never acquired the right to make them a part of the realty. He defaulted in the stipulated payments, and when the vendors were about to retake their property, he made an agreement with the vendors and the plaintiff by which the plaintiff was substituted in his stead as purchaser, and was to become the owner of these articles on completing the payments as provided in the contracts. Plaintiff had no interest in the real estate, either as tenant or otherwise; neither had Chesnut, for whose benefit plaintiff seems to have taken over the contracts. Plaintiff dealt with these articles as chattels, and intended that they should remain chattels. This clearly appears from the fact that if they became a part of the realty in which he had no interest, he would acquire nothing by his payments and would be unable to carry out his contract with Chesnut. He clearly had the right, as against Falk, to remove these articles from the building, and the question here is whether he also had that right as against defendant.

The rule that articles so annexed to the freehold as to appear to be fixtures pass to a subsequent purchaser who buys the land, without notice of the rights of third parties in such articles, does not aid defendant, for she is not a subsequent purchaser, but acquired all her rights in the land before the articles in controversy were annexed to it. As against plaintiff, she is in substantially the same position as a subsequent purchaser with notice of his rights, and has no better claim to these articles than a prior mortgagee of the realty would have. Such a mortgagee cannot hold as a part of the realty articles annexed to it by the mortgagor, but to which the mortgagor never acquired title. Belvin v. Raleigh Paper Co. 123 N. C. 138, 31 S. E. 655.

In Medicke v. Sauer, 61 Minn. 15, 63 N. W. 110, trade fixtures purchased under a conditional contract of sale were installed by the vendee in a leased building, and were subsequently surrendered with the building to the landlord, who thereafter claimed them as part of the realty, and leased the building with the fixtures therein to other parties.

It was held that the landlord had no better title to the fixtures than the vendee in the conditional contract of sale, and that the vendor was entitled to recover their value from him on his refusal to surrender them.

In Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. George, 77 Minn. 319, 97 N. W. 1028, 1064, a refrigerating plant purchased under a conditional contract of sale was installed in a cold storage warehouse owned and operated by the vendee. The action was between an assignee of the vendor and the holder of a mortgage on the realty, executed and recorded prior to the installation of the refrigerating plant. It was held that the vendee had no conveyable title in the refrigerating plant which he could vest in another so as to defeat the rights of the vendor, and that the vendor was entitled to the property as against the mortgagee of the real estate.

In Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Stanton, 55 Minn. 211, 43 Am. St. Rep. 491, 56 N. W. 821, an oatmeal mill was erected and equipped with appropriate machinery by one Dobson on land belonging to Stanton, and in which Dobson had no interest other than that of a mere licensee. The court said that in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the building and machinery would become a part of the realty; that having been placed on the land with Stanton's permission, they were personal property as between him and Dobson; and that the plaintiff, claiming under a mortgage of the real estate, executed by Stanton prior to the erection of the mill, had "no better or greater right to these annexations than Stanton would have."

In Pioneer Sav. & L. Co. v. Fuller, 57 Minn. 60, 58 N. W. 831, the owner of a lot with an uncompleted dwelling house thereon mortgaged it under a promise to complete the building, and, among other things, agreed to complete the fireplace by putting in a mantel, grate, and tiling. Instead of doing so, he leased the building under an agreement by which the tenant installed the mantel, grate, and tiling, with the right to remove them. It was held, following Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Stanton, supra, that, although the mortgagee was not a party to the agreement with the tenant, and these articles would be a part of the realty except for that agreement, the tenant had the right to remove them.

In Pabst v. Ferch, 126 Minn. 58, L.R.A.1915E, 822, 147 N. W. 714, it was held in effect that a purchaser of real estate without notice of the rights of third parties in articles which appear to be fixtures is entitled to such articles as a part of the realty, but that a purchaser with notice of the rights of third parties is not entitled to them as against such third party.

The question as to whether the holder of a chattel mortgage on an article annexed to the freehold is entitled to such article as against the owner of the real estate, or the holder of a mortgage or other lien thereon, has been answered in favor of the holder of the chattel mortgage by several courts. Edwards & B. Lumber Co. v. Rank, 57 Neb. 323, 73 Am. St. Rep. 514, 77 N. W. 765; Ames v. Trenton Brewing Co. 56 N. J. Eq. 309, 38 Atl. 858; Sisson v. Hibbard, 75 N. Y. 542; *Manwaring v. E. 655.

The case of Best Mfg. Co. v. Cohn, 3 Cal. App. 657, 86 Pac. 829, is much like the present case in its facts. There the lessee under a lease which provided for the construction of a mining plant equipped with machinery, and that the land with all improvements thereon should revert to the lessor if the lease should be forfeited for breach of its covenants, purchased the machinery under a conditional contract of sale and annexed it to the realty. He forfeited his lease and failed to pay for the machinery. The lessor took possession of the land and also of the machinery, claiming it as a part of the realty. It was held that the vendor of the machinery was entitled to it as against the lessor of the real estate. See, to the same effect, Wetherill v. Gallagher, 217 Pa. 635, 66 Atl. 849.

As already stated, defendant occupied no better position in respect to the articles in controversy than a subsequent purchaser of the real estate with notice, or the holder of a prior mortgage on it, and we have reached the conclusion that she was <sup>—conditional sale to lessee.</sup> not entitled to them as against plaintiff, and that plaintiff had the right to remove them.

The rule requiring a tenant to remove what are frequently termed removable fixtures <sup>—removal by tenant.</sup> at or before the end of his term does not apply where the duration of the term is uncertain (Ray v. Young, 160 Iowa, 613, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 947, 142 N. W. 393, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 258, and note attached to the L.R.A.(N.S.) report); nor to a person in the position of the plaintiff herein (*Medicke v. ### Gas range as fixture.

The rule adopted in a majority of the decisions is that a gas range, when installed in a dwelling and connected with a supply pipe, does not thereby become a fixture, although it may become such by agreement between the parties. Hook v. Bolton (1908) 199 Mass. 244, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 699, 127 Am. St. Rep. 487, 85 N. E. 175; Cosgrove v. Troesch (1901) 62 App.

Div. 123, 70 N. Y. Supp. 764; Wynne v. Friedman (1905) 49 Misc. 616, 96 N. Y. Supp. 838; Central Union Gas Co. v. Browning (1913) 210 N. Y. 10, 103 N. E. 822, reversing (1911) 146 App. Div. 783, 131 N. Y. Supp. 464. See also Vaughen v. Haldeman (1859) 33 Pa. 522, 75 Am. Dec. 622. Compare the reported case (HANSON v. VOSE, ante, 1573) and Lyle v. Rosenberg (1915) 192 Ill. App. 378.

In Hook v. Bolton (Mass.) supra, an action for the conversion of certain articles, including a gas stove, alleged by the plaintiff to be chattels, but claimed by the defendants to be fixtures and a part of the realty, the court said: "The gas stove and the window shades, running on rollers, stand differently. It may be that certain apartment houses, or other dwelling houses designed for occupation by tenants, are constructed in some of our cities and intended to be used in such a way that the introduction of such gas stoves and window shades by the owner, to go with the house as a part of it, for use by the tenants, may hereafter be proved at a trial. . . . In the present case we discover no evidence to warrant the jury in finding that the gas stove and window shades were a part of the realty. So far as appears, the building in question was an ordinary dwelling house for a single family, and there is nothing to show that it was intended to be occupied or used differently from common-dwelling houses. These were ordinary articles of merchandise, not peculiarly fitted for use in this house, were of a standard pattern, loosely affixed and easily removed, and were of the nature of personal property. They were put into the house by the mortgagor, and were of a kind of articles which usually are carried away by an outgoing occupant. There was nothing to show that the owner intended to annex them as a permanent addition to the real estate. We think, upon the evidence, the judge was wrong in submitting to the jury the question whether they were a part of the realty."

In Cosgrove v. Troescher (1901) 62 App. Div. 123, 70 N. Y. Supp. 764, an action for conversion, it appeared that the plaintiff's assignor constructed three apartment houses and placed in the kitchen of each apartment a gas range resting on four legs on a concrete hearth, and attached to the supply pipe and connected with a flue. After the construction of the house, the plaintiff's assignor mortgaged the premises to the defendant. On the foreclosure of the mortgage the plaintiff demanded the ranges on the ground that they were personal property. It was held that the property was not part of the realty, the court saying: "We are also of opinion that the ranges were movable as matter of law. They were not set in any place specially constructed for them. They stood out on the floor, wholly disconnected from the walls, floor, or ceiling, except that they rested on feet which were not attached, and were connected with the flues as stoves are generally connected. Their connecting pipes were screwed onto the gas supply pipes, but this was similar to the connection between an ordinary stove and a permanent boiler, and in no material respect differs from the attachment of gas fixtures."

Central Union Gas Co. v. Browning (1913) 210 N. Y. 10, 103 N. E. 822, reversing (1911) 146 App. Div. 783, 131 N. Y. Supp. 464, was an action for the alleged conversion of one hundred gas ranges which the plaintiff installed in certain housekeeping apartments under a contract with the owner of the premises. It appeared that the defendant was a bona fide purchaser at a foreclosure sale of the premises. In holding that the ranges were personal property, the court said: "We have to decide the naked question whether the defendant, as a bona fide purchaser at a foreclosure sale of the premises in which the ranges were installed, acquired any title to the ranges. Upon the facts in the record we think he did not. According to our view of the evidence, these ranges were not so 'attached' to the building that, as matter of law, they became part of it. They were connected with the building by the usual service gas pipe and a stovepipe flue. The one could be severed by simply unscrewing a coupling and the other by lifting it out of the aperture made for it. This is not such an attachment to the building as would give a mortgagee any right of ownership as against his mortgagor, and we do not see how a purchaser at a foreclosure sale could acquire any greater right. We think that these ranges, situated as they were, lost none of their characteristics as personal property."

In Wynne v. Friedman (1905) 49 Misc. 616, 96 N. Y. Supp. 838, it appeared that the defendant agreed to sell a parcel of land, with the buildings and improvements thereon, and for a sum certain to execute and deliver a proper deed, containing full covenants and warranty for conveying the premises, expressly adding: "The chandeliers, gas fixtures, ranges, heating and hot water apparatus, water-closets, bathtubs, and other plumbing are to be included in the sale and in the warranty above set forth." No mention of these things was made in the deed proffered and accepted on passing the title. Not long after the title was taken a gas company showed that it owned the ranges, and took them away. In an action to recover for the value of the ranges, the court held that, while movable, they were so of kin to fixtures that the parties might, by agreement, treat them as of the realty, so as to make it unnecessary to mention them in the conveyance in order to pass with the land and appurtenances, and as the covenant of sale did not merge in the conveyance, the vendor was held liable for their value.

In Vaughen v. Haldeman (1859) 33 Pa. 522, 75 Am. Dec. 622, a case involving the ownership of gas chandeliers and side brackets, the court, in comparing gas stoves with other fixtures, said: "Gas stoves are largely used for bath and other rooms, and are necessarily connected with gas pipes in the same way; but no one would think of saying that they were fixtures, which it would be waste to remove. It is, therefore, more simple to consider all these gas fixtures, whether stoves, chandeliers, hall and entry lamps, droplights, or table lamps, as governed by the same rule as the articles for which they are substituted."

In at least one case, it seems to have been held squarely that a gas range or stove of the style used in modern apartments is to be regarded as a fixture. In Lyle v. Rosenberg (1915) 192 Ill. App. 378, an action brought to foreclose a mortgage deed of trust made by the defendant, and conveying certain real estate, including an apartment house, an intervening petition was filed by a corporation, alleging that it had furnished the defendant with gas ranges and laundry stoves, and had installed the same in the dwelling in question. It was sought by the petition to establish a mechanics' lien on the property so furnished. The statute (Mechanics' Lien Act 1903, § 1) provided as follows: "Any person who shall by any contract . . . with the owner of a lot . . . of land . . . furnish material, fixtures, apparatus or machinery for the purpose of or in the building, altering, repairing or ornamenting any house or other building . . . shall have a lien upon the whole of such lot . . . for the amount due to him for such material, fixtures, apparatus, machinery. . . ." The court held that the gas ranges and stoves came within the term "fixtures, apparatus, or machinery," and were the subject of a mechanics' lien.

In the reported case (HANSON v. VOSE, ante, 1573) it appeared that the defendant leased certain lands to the plaintiff's assignor, under an agreement by which the lessee erected an apartment building and installed a gas range in each apartment. Subsequently the lessor canceled the lease for nonpayment of rent, and refused to surrender the gas ranges and other property, whereupon an action of replevin was brought. It is held that, as between the lessor and the lessee, the ranges would be fixtures, but as they were purchased under a conditional contract of sale, and the rights of the lessee therein were transferred to the plaintiff, the defendant was not entitled to them as against the plaintiff. APPEAL by defendant Befarrah from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wake County (Allen, J.) in favor of plaintiff, against him, in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due for goods sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant Tempelos. Reversed.

Statement by Walker, J.:

The plaintiff alleged that the defendant James Tempelos, who owned and conducted an ordinary restaurant in the city of Raleigh, at No. 225 South Wilmington street, known as the "Busy Bee Café," was, at the commencement of this action, indebted to it, for goods sold and delivered, in the sum of $755.90, which has been due since November 12, 1917, and that, while that amount was still due to it, the defendant sold and conveyed to his codefendant, J. E. Befarrah, all the property in said restaurant, consisting of canned goods and other groceries and food supplies, and the furniture and fixtures used in connection with the business, for $2,300, and that the sale was made in bulk, contrary to the Bulk Sales Law (Gregory's Supp. to Pell's Revisal, § 964a), which reads as follows: "The sale in bulk of a large part or the whole of a stock of merchandise, otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade and in regular and usual prosecution of the seller's business, shall be prima facie evidence of fraud, and void as against the creditors of the seller, unless the seller," etc.

Plaintiff therefore alleges that, as the requirements of that act were not complied with by the parties to the sale, it is void and of no effect against the creditors of the defendant James Tempelos. Plaintiff prays judgment for the debt, and that the property be seized and applied to its payment.

Defendant answered and denied the material allegations, except as to the debt due the plaintiff and the sale of the goods.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Is the defendant Tempelos indebted to the plaintiff, and, if so, in what amount? Answer: Seven hundred, fifty-five dollars and ninety cents ($755.90), and interest from November 12, 1917.

"(2) What was the value of the goods purchased from Tempelos by the defendant Befarra, other than the fixtures, that is to say:

"1. What was the value of the eggs? Answer: Two hundred dollars ($200).

"2. What was the value of all including the eggs? Answer: Four hundred fifty dollars ($450)."

The court gave judgment against J. E. Befarra for $450, and directed that the $200, the value of the eggs, which had been attached, be applied to it, as a credit thereon. It also adjudged that the property which was sold by Tempelos to Befarra be seized under execution, or other legal process, and sold, for the satisfaction of the balance of the judgment. There seems to have been no judgment for the debt of $755.90 against James Tempelos, but that may not be material in the view taken of the case, and may yet be entered below if desired, when the case is remanded for judgment there.

Defendant James Befarra appealed from the judgment.

Messrs. J. C. Little and Manning, Kitchin, & Mebane, for appellant:

A café or restaurant keeper, where people are fed and nothing sold in same condition as when bought, but where such condition is materially and frequently changed by the labor of the café, is not a merchant and has no stock of merchandise within the meaning of the act, and does not come within the evil intended to be remedied.

Mr. J. M. Broughton, for appellee:
The sale of a café or restaurant comes within the provisions of the Bulk Sales Act.

The phrase "a stock of merchandise," as used in the act, is sufficiently broad and inclusive to include within its provisions the stock and equipment of a café.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

field Shoe Co. v. Olds, 176 Ind. 526, 96 N. E. 592; Cooney v. Sweat, 133 Ga. 511, 512, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 758, 66 S. E. 257; Taylor v. Folds, 2 Ga. App. 453, 58 S. E. 683; 9 Current Law, 1511.

It is said that the word "merchandise" is usually, if not almost universally, limited to things which are ordinarily bought and sold in the way of merchants, and as the subjects of commerce and traffic. Van Patten v. Leonard, 55 Iowa, 520, 8 N. W. 384; Burwell's Law Dict. The word came into use as a term descriptive of the goods and wares exposed to sale in fairs and markets. Passaic Mfg. Co. v. Hoffman, 3 Daly, 495-512. Speaking of an innkeeper, it is said in Toxaway Hotel Co. v. Smathers, 216 U. S. 439-446, 54 L. ed. 558, 561, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 264, and it may be affirmed with great force and significance of a restaurateur: "To say that he buys and sells articles of food and drink is only true in a limited sense. Such articles are not bought to be sold, nor are they sold again, as in ordinary commerce. They are bought to be served as food or drink, and the price includes rent, service, heat, light, etc. To say that such a business is that of a 'trader' or a 'mercantile pursuit' is giving those words an elasticity of meaning not according to common usage."

The specific subject is treated with closer reference to our facts, and more at large, in the case of Re Wentworth Lunch Co. 86 C. C. A.

393, 159 Fed. 413, where it is held at pages 394, 395, of 86 C. C. A.:

"The specific categories of the section are corporations engaged principally in printing, publishing, and mining, under which, clearly, a restaurant company does not fall. It remains to inquire whether it falls within the general categories of the section, viz., corporations engaged principally in manufacturing, trading, or in mercantile pursuits. In one sense of the word transformation of raw provisions into cooked dishes is manufacturing; but no one would ever speak of a cook as a manufacturer, and that category may be excluded. A trader is one who buys to sell again, a definition which might apply to a saloon, but not to a restaurant where the proprietor does not sell the provisions he buys in the form in which he buys them, but changed by combination and cooking into edible dishes. The word 'mercantile,' though including trade, is larger, being extended to all commercial operations, so that we speak of shipping merchants, commission merchants, and forwarding merchants. Still we do not think that the dishes of a restaurant would ever be described as merchandise, or the proprietor as a merchant, or as engaged in mercantile pursuits. Printing and publishing companies were specified, presumably because they did not fall within the general categories, and we think the same reasoning applies to a restaurant company."

See also Re Chesapeake Oyster & Fish Co. (D. C.) 112 Fed. 960, and Re Excelsior Café Co. (D. C.) 175 Fed. 294, where it is said: "'A trader is one who buys to sell again, a definition which might apply to a saloon, but not to a restaurant;' and, further, the circuit court of appeals in that opinion [Re Wentworth Lunch Co., supra] holds that the word 'mercantile' is not broad enough to cover the business of keeping a restaurant for the cooking and selling of food. . . . This case is the latest and the controlling decision upon the question."

The supreme court of Iowa had this question before it, and held that "the permission [in a contract] to use the building for 'any mercantile purpose,' granted pursuant to plaintiff's application, does not authorize the use for a restaurant, which is not a mercantile purpose. The word 'mercantile' means 'pertaining to merchants, or the business of merchants; having to do with trade, or the buying and selling of commodities; commerce.' Webster. The business of keeping a restaurant is in no sense commerce. If a restaurant be a mercantile establishment, the term is equally applicable to taverns, boarding houses, and the like, which cannot be admitted. The point demands no further attention. Permission to use a building for 'any commercial purpose' does not authorize its use as a restaurant." Garretson v. Merchants' & B. Ins. Co. 81 Iowa, 727-729, 45 N. W. 1047.

This case was approved in Garretson v. Merchants' & B. Ins. Co. 92 Iowa, 293, 60 N. W. 540.

The Federal cases cited above arose under the Bankrupt Act (Act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544, Comp. Stat. § 9585, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 509), but this fact did not in any degree influence the decisions of the courts. They considered the question as one of general law, and construed the statute according to the ordinary, natural, and popular meaning of its language, and as understood among merchants and traders. Re Kingston Realty Co. 87 C. C. A. 406, 160 Fed. 445; Re New York & W. Water Co. (D. C.) 98 Fed. 711-713; Re United States Hotel Co. 68 L.R.A. 588, 67 C. C. A. 153, 134 Fed. 225. Referring to the business of the tavern keeper, and quoting from Newton v. Trigg, 1 Showers, 96, 89 Eng. Reprint, 474, Justice Lurton says in the United States Hotel Co. Case: "He doth not get by buying and selling, he gets by the price and hire of his lodging, also by the profit or use of his kitchen. The profits from the stables do not arise from hay alone, but from the standing." Gallagher v. De Lancey Stables Co. (D. C.) 158 Fed. 381.

In that case the court said: "I think it so clear that the corporation [engaged in keeping a boarding stable] was principally engaged neither in trading nor in mercantile pursuits that discussion is unnecessary. It is well settled that a trader or a merchant is a person who is engaged in the business of buying and selling, one who buys in order to sell; and I think it must be conceded that the foregoing facts do not bring the bankrupt within either class,—if, indeed, the two classes should be distinguished."

And finally in the case of Re Willis Cab & Automobile Co. (D. C.) 178 Fed. 113, 114, it was said: "It was carefully pointed out [in the Wentworth Lunch Co. Case, supra] that the preparation of food by cooking was not manufacturing, and that the sale of the food so prepared by an incorporated restaurant keeper in small quantities to the ultimate customer was not a mercantile or trading occupation. Preparing pies by the thousand and biscuits by the ton might perhaps savor of manufacturing; but it is obvious that the vending thereof to the consumer on the premises is something not to be performed by one engaged in mercantile or trading pursuits. . . . It is plainly impossible to draw any practical distinction between feeding men and feeding horses."

The words "stock of merchandise," in our statute, are used in the common and ordinary acceptance of those terms, and mean the goods or chattels which a merchant holds for sale, and are equivalent to "stock in trade" as ordinarily used and understood among merchants and tradesmen. Off v. Morehead, 235 Ill. 40, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 167, 126 Am. St. Rep. 184, 85 N. E. 264, 14 Ann. Cas. 434.

But it is contended that it was held in Plass v. Morgan, 36 Wash. 160, 78 Pac. 784, that a restaurant or café comes within the meaning and operation of the Bulk Sales Law; but a careful reading of that case leads us to believe, without much hesitation, that the learned court based its decision entirely upon the peculiar and "comprehensive" language of their statute, and it appears that, if it had not been for this feature of the case, the result would have been different. And we say so, because counsel for the respondent there contended that the law uses the special term "stock of merchandise," which, according to accepted English definitions, relates to the business of merchandising alone, and was clearly so intended by the legislature; that courts will not so construe the language of the statute as to make it include that which its plain and usual meaning will not import, or render its application absurd or ridiculous in its operation. In answer to this suggestion, the court, after repeating the contention, stated that the learned counsel, however, did not strictly quote the language of their statute: "It does not use the special term 'stock of merchandise,' but uses the term 'any stock of goods, wares, or merchandise in bulk.' The word 'any' is comprehensive and so is the word 'stock.' There is no limit placed by the legislature on the meaning of the word 'stock.'"

The court laid great stress upon the use of the words "any stock of goods and wares," which are not in our statute, and seemed to think, when replying to counsel's argument, that a "stock of merchandise," by itself, would be too restricted and not be sufficient in its scope to include a restaurant or café, and, if this be not so, why suggest to counsel the difference between his language and that of the statute, if the two were synonymous, one not embracing any more, in meaning, than the other. And it was said in Johnson v. Kelly, 32 N. D. 116, 155 N. W. 683, that the Washington court, in the later cases of Albrecht v. Cudihee, 37 Wash. 206, 79 Pac. 628, and Everett Produce Co. v. Smith Bros. 40 Wash. 566, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 331, 111 Am. St. Rep. 979, 82 Pac. 905, 5 Ann. Cas. 798, had practically receded from its holding in the earlier case. We need not express an opinion as to whether this be correct or not.

The court said in Johnson v. Kelly, supra: "The decision in Plass v. Morgan is based upon the terms of their Bulk Sales Statute voiding sales of 'any stock of goods, wares, and merchandise.' The word 'any' was held to broaden the statute, making it apply to 'any stock,' which therefore covered restaurant stocks. Our statute does not so read, but by its plain terms applies only to stocks of merchandise or goods a part of 'mercantile stock or supply which is kept for sale.'"

It also is true that the court distinguished that case from one like ours by directing attention to the special words of the local statute, emphasizing the use of the word "any," and laid stress upon the use of the other words "goods and wares," so that the case, when properly considered, lends strong support to our conclusion.

The statute was evidently intended to apply to a stock of merchandise, in the sense of a stock of goods which have been bought for resale in a substantially unchanged condition, and not to a stock of provisions on shelves, or in a pantry or store-room, kept for no other purpose than to supply the tables, and provide meals for the patrons and customers of the restaurateur. This is not selling articles kept in stock, but furnishing meals to those who come for them, at a stated price. The groceries are not bought by him in the raw state, and some of them have completely lost their identity when prepared for the table. The customer buys only a meal to satisfy his hunger. This is not selling at retail, according to our common understanding. The statute contemplates a stock which is itself kept for sale, and when there is a sale out of the ordinary and regular course of business, it is fraudulent if, in other respects, it violates the provisions of the statute.

Learned counsel for the plaintiff has cited us to several cases which, he contends, are analogous to this one, where it was held that the sales of the stocks were governed by the statute; but we do not see the similarity, and we think they can easily be distinguished, such as the stocks of drug stores, saloon keepers, retailers of crackers and biscuits, butchers who sell meat products, stock of a garage (Gallup & Co. v. Rozier, 172 N. C. 283, 90 S. E. 209), and others, perhaps, of like kind could be mentioned, but they are not parallel cases.

If we should hold that this stock was within the Bulk Sales Statute, it would seem that it should be extended also to a stock of supplies or provisions kept by a boarding house proprietor, and we would long hesitate before coming to such a conclusion. As said in one of the cases cited by us (216 U. S. 439, 54 L. ed. 558, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 263), such a view of the law would be utterly inadmissible, and, we may add, indefensible.

As to the furniture and fixtures used in the business of the keeper of the café, they are not kept for sale, and are not within the provisions of the statute. Now, if this stock itself is within it, it may be that, when the furniture and fixtures are sold with it, so as to be, in fact, a "clean-up" sale of the whole business, the appellee's position might, perhaps, be correct; but we do not decide or intimate any opinion as to such a question. Our view coincides with that of the court which decided Gallus v. Elmer, 193 Mass. 106, 78 N. E. 772, 8 Ann. Cas. 1067, and, as it is clearly expressed in that case, we state it in the language there used: "The plaintiff still further insists that the statute does not apply to the fixtures, and this view seems correct. The phrase 'stock of merchandise,' as used in the statute, properly and naturally describes articles which the seller keeps for sale in the usual course of his business. It does not naturally describe fixtures. It would hardly be within the usual course of business for a storekeeper at any time to sell his fixtures, and it is not to be presumed that the legislature intended to prohibit the sale of a fixture, unless such intent is clearly expressed. The natural reading of the statute makes it applicable, as has been said, only to the articles which, in the ordinary course of his business, the seller keeps for sale, and that must be taken to be its legal meaning," citing Albrecht v. Cudihee, 37 Wash. 206, 79 Pac. 628.

We are constrained to think that the learned judge was in error, when he held that the sale of the café stock was governed by the Bulk Sales Statute, and therefore was fraudulent and void within the meaning and intent of the same; the defendants not having complied with its terms. This being so, the evidence fails to establish any cause of action under the statute, and none is stated in the complaint against J. E. Befarrah. This suit should therefore be dismissed as to him, and judgment to that effect will accordingly be entered below. Plaintiff may have judgment, upon the verdict, against James Tempelos, its debtor, if so advised.

ANNOTATION.

Applicability of Bulk Sales Act to hotel, restaurant, boarding house, saloon, pool hall, or livery stable.

- I. Hotel, 1587.
- II. Restaurant or boarding house, 1587.
- III. Saloon, 1588.
- IV. Pool hall, 1589.
- V. Livery stable, 1589.

I. Hotel.

It has been held that a Bulk Sales Act is not applicable to the sale of the furniture and fixtures of a hotel. Thus, in Stewart v. Sulger (1916) 174 App. Div. 838, 161 N. Y. Supp. 489, it was held that the provisions of the New York Sales in Bulk Act (40 McKinney, Consol. Laws, p. 88, § 44) had no application to the sale of the "furniture and fixtures of a hotel, with a half interest in an automobile."

In Charles J. Off & Co. v. Morehead (1908) 235 Ill. 40, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 167, 126 Am. St. Rep. 184, 85 N. E. 264, 14 Ann. Cas. 434, the Illinois supreme court, in holding a bulk sales act confined to the sale of a stock of merchandise unconstitutional, observed arguendo that the law would not apply to a sale by a hotel keeper of his entire business and all the property therein. This, however, was obiter, no such question being involved.

In Barthels, S. & Co. v. Peterson (1914) 24 Manitoba L. R. 794, 6 West. Week. Rep. 396, 27 West. L. R. 734, 16 D. L. R. 465, the question of law was submitted for decision whether a hotel keeper who was licensed under the Liquor License Act was within the provisions of the Manitoba Bulk Sales Act, which extended to "persons who, as their ostensible occupation, buy and sell goods, wares, and merchandise ordinarily the subject of trade and commerce." The court ruled that the act was not so applicable, saying: "The description 'hotel keeper' is a well-known one in this country, and has a meaning distinct from that of a merchant or trader; and if the legislature intended the Bulk Sales Act to extend to hotel keepers, the act would have been explicit."

While the decision in the case last cited apparently extends to a sale of the stock in trade as well as a sale of fixtures, a distinction was made under the Saskatchewan act in Barthels, S. & Co. v. Sloane (1914) 7 Sask. L. R. 376, wherein the court said: "The Bulk Sales Act, chap. 38 of the Acts of 1910-11, applies to sales in bulk of 'any stock of goods, wares, and merchandise.' It does not, therefore, apply to the sale of the hotel premises, nor to the fixtures and furniture therein, as the furniture of an hotel cannot be considered 'goods, wares, or merchandise ordinarily the subject of trade and commerce,' as provided by § 6. The part of the property affected by the Bulk Sales Act would, therefore, be confined to the stock of goods for sale in the bar, the liquor license (§ 6), and probably the provisions, etc., used for sale to the guests at their meals."

II. Restaurant or boarding house.

There is at least one case in addition to the reported case (SWIFT & Co. v. TEMPELOS) which holds that a bulk sales act is not applicable to the sale of the fixtures and furniture of a restaurant or boarding house.

Johnson v. Kelly (1915) 32 N. D. 116, 155 N. W. 683, wherein the court, discussing the North Dakota Bulk Sales Act, said: "This drastic measure is leveled only at sales, transfers, or assignments in bulk 'of any part or the whole of a stock of merchandise or merchandise and fixtures pertaining to the conducting of said business otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade and in the regular prosecution of the business of the seller.'" In that case the goods levied on under the act were the utensils and equipment used in a restaurant business and the court held that the act was not applicable.

And in Lewis, H. & Co. v. Loughran (1919) — W. Va. —, 101 S. E. 465, the statute, which is directed against the sale in bulk of any part or the whole of a stock of merchandise otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade was held not to embrace the sale of a lunch wagon with its equipment and supplies on hand.

But in Sakelos v. Hutchinson Bros. (1916) 129 Md. 300, 99 Atl. 357, the court held that the steam tables, ovens, kitchen utensils, and similar articles used in a restaurant, although not intended for resale, were within the category of "goods, wares, and merchandise," and thus within the purview of the Maryland Bulk Sales Act.

In Plass v. Morgan (1904) 36 Wash. 160, 78 Pac. 784, it was held that the Sales in Bulk Act of Washington was applicable to a sale of goods, wares, and merchandise of a person engaged in the business of conducting a boarding house and restaurant, the court evidently proceeding on the theory that the intent of the legislature was to prevent the perpetration of fraud on the creditors of persons engaged in business without qualification. But in Everett Produce Co. v. Smith Bros. (Wash.) infra, V., the court confined the application of the Washington statute to sales of the fixtures of a business consisting in the sale of merchandise in some form, and refused to extend the holding in Plass v. Morgan.

III. Saloon.

In two jurisdictions the courts have distinguished between the fixtures and the stock in trade of a saloon keeper, holding that a sale of the latter is within a bulk sales law, but a sale of the former is not. Kolander v. Dunn (1905) 95 Minn. 422, 104 N. W. 371, rehearing denied in (1905) 95 Minn. 424, 104 N. W. 483; Marshon v. Toohey (1915) 38 Nev. 248, 148 Pac. 357.

In Kolander v. Dunn (Minn.) supra, wherein a sale of the fixtures and stock of merchandise of a saloon was attacked as within the purview of the Minnesota Bulk Sales Act, it appeared that the sale of the fixtures had been made on one day, and that of the merchandise shortly afterward, and the court ruled that the statute did not apply to the sale of the fixtures, but that the sale of the stock of merchandise was within the statute and presumptively fraudulent.

In Marshon v. Toohey (Nev.) supra, wherein it appeared that a sale in bulk was made of the bar fixtures, stock of liquor, and furnishings of a saloon and dance hall, the court held that the sale was within the provisions of the Nevada Sales in Bulk Act as to the stock of liquors sold, but that the bar fixtures and furnishings did not constitute a stock or a "portion of a stock of merchandise" within the meaning of the statute.

But it was held in Pritz v. Jones (1907) 117 App. Div. 643, 102 N. Y. Supp. 549, that the sale of his business and stock of liquors by the proprietor of a saloon, who was a lessee of the premises from one who owned the building and fixtures, was not a sale within the provision of the New York Sales in Bulk Act. 40 McKinney, Consol. Laws, p. 88, § 44.

Other jurisdictions have held that both the fixtures and the stock in trade of a saloon keeper, when sold together, are within the purview of a bulk sales act. Parham v. Potts-Thompson Co. (1907) 127 Ga. 303, 56 S. E. 460; Seattle Brewing Co. v. Donofrio (1904) 34 Wash. 18, 74 Pac. 823.

In Parham v. Potts-Thompson Co. (Ga.) supra, it was said that bar fixtures, a stock of liquor, cigar cases, pool tables, and the like, used in a business to which they were appropriate, were, when included in a sale with other goods, within the Georgia Bulk Sales Act, as part of the "stock of goods, wares, and merchandise."

So in Seattle Brewing Co. v. Donofrio (Wash.) supra, it was held that the purchaser of the entire stock of goods and fixtures used in a saloon business was justified in refusing to carry out the agreement when the vendor had failed to comply with the Sales in Bulk Act of Washington.

But in Albrecht v. Cudihee (1905) 37 Wash. 206, 79 Pac. 628, the court held that a statute regulating the sale of a "stock of goods, wares, or merchandise," did not apply to the sale of a cash register used in a saloon business, saying: "We think the legislature intended the provisions of the statute to apply only to goods belonging to the mercantile stock or supply which is kept for sale."

IV. Pool hall.

A bulk sales act is not applicable to a sale of the fixtures and paraphernalia used in a pool hall. Ferrat v. Adamson (1917) 53 Mont. 172, 163 Pac. 112; Independent Breweries Co. v. Lawton (1918) 200 Mo. App. 238, 204 S. W. 730.

In Independent Breweries Co. v. Lawton (Mo.) supra, it was held that the Missouri Bulk Sales Act did not apply to the sale of a billiard and pool-hall business, including the billiard and pool tables, racks, cues, etc., since the purpose of the act was to protect creditors who sold articles of merchandise for resale.

So, in Ferrat v. Adamson (Mont.) supra, the court held that the Montana Bulk Sales Act did not apply to a sale of the tables, cues, and balls used in a pool room, saying: "The scope of these acts has been considered in many cases, and the decided weight of authority and the better reasoning justify the conclusion that it was the legislative purpose to regulate the sale in bulk of such articles only as the merchant keeps for sale in the ordinary course of his business."

But see Parham v. Potts-Thompson Liquor Co. (1906) 127 Ga. 303, 56 S. E. 460, wherein it was held that the sale of pool tables and the like, when included in a sale of other fixtures in a saloon, was within the meaning of the Bulk Sales Law of Georgia as a part of a "stock of goods, wares, and merchandise."

V. Livery stable.

A bulk sales act is not applicable to a sale of the personal property used in the operation of a livery stable. Balter v. Crum (1918) 199 Mo. App. 380, 203 S. W. 506; Everett Produce Co. v. Smith Bros. (1905) 40 Wash. 566, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 331, 111 Am. St. Rep. 979, 82 Pac. 905, 5 Ann. Cas. 798; Brown v. McLeod (1915) 8 West. Week. Rep. (Can.) 110.

In Balter v. Crum (Mo.) supra, the court said: "While Bulk Sales Statutes are now common, most of them seem to apply only to sales of a 'stock of merchandise' or a 'stock of goods, wares, merchandise, or stock of merchandise and fixtures;' but the Missouri statute applies to the 'sale, trade or other disposition of the major part in value, or the whole of a stock of merchandise, or merchandise, fixtures and equipment or equipment pertaining to the vendor's business.' . . . It is clear that the intent of the law-makers was to regulate the sale, trade, or disposition of stocks of merchandise and in connection with any such stock of merchandise, the fixtures or equipment or both pertaining thereto. The words 'stock of merchandise' are here used in the common and ordinary acceptance of those terms, and are intended to mean goods or chattels which a merchant has for sale, such as is often referred to by the phrase 'stock in trade,' and the words fixtures and equipment mean fixtures and equipment or either one, pertaining to the vendor's business of merchandising. In view of the language of the statute itself we hold that this last has no application to the sale of the wagons, horses, harness, etc., of one whose business is that of owning and operating a livery and boarding stable."

In Everett Produce Co. v. Smith Bros. (1905) 40 Wash. 566, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 331, 111 Am. St. Rep. 979, 82 Pac. 905, 5 Ann. Cas. 798, it was held that the Washington statute relative to the sale of "any stock of goods, wares, or merchandise in bulk," was not applicable to a sale of the horses, wagons, and harness which were used in the operation of a livery stable. The court, construing the statute and reconciling the decision with the ruling in Plass v. Morgan (Wash.) supra, II., said: "The construction of this statute has been before this court frequently, and it is insisted by the appellant here that this cause falls within the decision of this court in Plass v. Morgan (1904) 36 Wash. 160, 78 Pac. 784. In that case it was held that the buying of all goods, wares, and merchandise in a restaurant was a purchase, within the contemplation of the statute. . . . It may be a little difficult to distinguish that case from the case at bar, and yet we think that there is in reality a distinction, and that the goods, wares, and merchandise necessarily used by a restaurant keeper can more appropriately be termed a 'stock of merchandise,' than the horses and carriages in a livery stable. It is true that a restaurant keeper, when he buys a ton of flour, does not buy it for the purpose of selling the article again in the same condition that it was in when he bought it, as does the ordinary merchant; but he does dispose of the same goods in a changed condition, and it is a business which from necessity calls for constant and continued purchases from the wholesale dealers. While, on the other hand, there is no sale of horses or carriages contemplated at all in the conducting of a livery business, and the stock, when once obtained, outside of the feed required for the feeding the horses, is less mutable. In any event, we do not see our way clear to extend the doctrine announced in Plass v. Morgan."

In Brown v. McLeod (1915) 8 West Week. Rep. (Can.) 110, the court held that the provisions of a bulk sales act relative to a "sale or transfer of a stock of goods, wares or merchandise" were not applicable to the transfer of the horses, wagons, harness, and fixtures of a livery stable.

In Tupper v. Barrett (1919) 233 Mass. 565, 124 N. E. 427, a statute directed against the sale of "merchandise" was held to embrace the sale of five tip wagons, one show wagon and six sets of double harness by one who maintained a stable where he sold horses, wagons, and harnesses, and also did some transient livery business,—some of his horses, wagons, carts, and harnesses being used at the time of the sale in doing a certain excavating job.

APPEAL by the surviving trustees under the will of Frederick T. Adams, deceased, from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, modifying and affirming a decree of the Surrogate Court for Greene County (Tallmadge, S.) judicially settling the accounts of the said trustees and the deceased trustee. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Osborn, Bloodgood, & Wilbur, for appellants:

It was error for the appellate division to hold that the representatives of the deceased trustee were entitled, as matter of law, to statutory commissions.

Mr. Fred P. Harrington, with Mr. Thomas H. Low, for respondents:

The order of the appellate division modifying the decree of the surrogate's court so as to award to the estate of Alpheus C. Dwight one half of the full statutory commissions for receiving so much of the principal and income of the estate of Adams as were received during said Dwight's lifetime, and also one half of the full statutory commissions on such amounts as were paid out of principal and income to the date of Dwight's death, is correct and should be affirmed.

Crane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On December 21, 1910, letters testamentary upon the last will and testament of Frederick T. Adams, of the town of Coxsackie, Greene county, New York, deceased, were issued to Eugene L. Bushe, Edward P. Dwyer, and Alpheus C. Dwight. The three executors subsequently filed an account of their proceeding to December 31, 1912, and by a decree judicially settling their accounts they paid over to themselves as trustees about $800,000 of personal property, after having been granted $32,297.76 for commissions and allowances. The three trustees continued to act until August 5, 1914, when Alpheus C. Dwight died, and thereafter the remaining two trustees carried on the work of the trust. In January of 1917, Bushe and Dwyer, the surviving trustees, filed their accounts from December 31, 1912, to December 31, 1915, and cited Harriet M. Dwight and Thomas H. Low, as executors of the last will and testament of Alpheus C. Dwight, as parties to the proceeding.

The surrogate decided that the estate of Alpheus C. Dwight was not entitled to full commissions for receiving the amount above stated, and that he had a discretionary power to fix this trustee's compensation according to the value of the services which he had performed. In his memorandum opinion he said: "The legal representatives of the estate of Alpheus C. Dwight, deceased, are entitled to an allowance for services actually performed for the benefit of the estate by the deceased executor and trustee of Frederick T. Adams, not by way of commissions, but as payment for such services. . . . I have not computed the value of services of the deceased executor and trustee at full one-half commissions for receiving, where the amount has not been paid out, for the reason that the law does not contemplate that an executor or trustee shall be entitled to commissions for the mere act of receiving property. Such commissions are allowed for the services of legal representatives in taking care of, investing, and reinvesting such property, and for the responsibility connected therewith. He having served after the accounting in 1913 to the time of his death, approximately one half the time that the surviving executors and trustees have served to the time of the accounting, I have computed such services to be of the value of one half the legal commissions due the surviving executors and trustees, believing this to be the fair and just compensation for such receiving."

On appeal the appellate division reversed the surrogate regarding these commissions and held that as a matter of law the estate of Alpheus C. Dwight was entitled to receive one-half commissions on all the principal received and on all the principal paid out and on the income received and paid out during his lifetime. The order of the appellate division states that this modification is made as a matter of law, and not in the exercise of the court's discretion. The trustees of the Adams estate having appealed to this court, we must decide what right the estate of a testamentary trustee dying before a judicial settlement of his accounts has to compensation.

It is urged that such a trustee who does not continue until judicial accounting is entitled to no compensation, that commissions are a matter of statute, and that no provision has been made by the law for such a case. Section 2753 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended by chapter 443 of the Laws of 1914 and by chapter 596 of the Laws of 1916, reads: "On the settlement of the account of any executor, administrator, guardian or testamentary trustee the surrogate must allow to him" the rates of commissions therein fixed.

These words indicate that commissions as a matter of right can only be allowed to an accounting testamentary trustee. There is nothing in the Code provisions fixing the compensation of a testamentary trustee who dies before a judicial settlement of his accounts, or whose estate, he having died, is made a party to the accounting proceedings of a substituted or surviving trustee. As it has been held that a trustee is not entitled to any commissions until allowed by the court (Re Worthington, 141 N. Y. 9, 23 L.R.A. 97, 35 N. E. 929; Beard v. Beard, 140 N. Y. 260, 35 N. E. 488; Re Ziegler, 168 App. Div. 735, 154 N. Y. Supp. 652; s. c., 218 N. Y. 544, 113 N. E. 553), and the statute gives the surrogate power to allow commissions only on the settlement of the account of a testamentary trustee, there may be some force in this view that the estate of Alpheus C. Dwight, under these circumstances, was entitled to no commissions.

On the other hand, it is said that where a testamentary trustee dies after having received the estate and before final accounting his estate is entitled as a matter of right to one half the statutory commissions fixed for receiving, but nothing for turning over, the property to his successor or survivor. This reasoning is based upon that line of authorities which hold that executors, administrators, and trustees are entitled to one-half commissions for receiving funds and the other half for paying them out (Re Willets, 112 N. Y. 289, 665, 19 N. E. 690), and to a practice, which is said to exist, of allowing such half commissions for receiving where the executor or trustee has died before an accounting (Palmer v. Dunham, 53 Hun, 637, 3 Silv. Sup. Ct. 159, 6 N. Y. Supp. 262, affirmed in 125 N. Y. 68, 25 N. E. 1081).

Still another view is that the surrogate or supreme court has discretionary power and may award or withhold commissions in certain cases; and under circumstances such as here existing may allow such sum as is reasonable for the services of a deceased trustee, not exceeding the statutory percentage.

Trust—right of testamentary
trustee to commissions—death before accounting.

The reasoning to sustain this view is that the testator in selecting a trustee intended to pay him, and that he is entitled to compensation, and that commissions are allowed for the care and management of the estate, and not for the simple act of receiving and paying out. Wagstaff v. Lowerre, 23 Barb. 209.

All of these views have some reason to support them and perhaps some authorities, but the latter view, in our opinion, has been the general practice adopted by the courts, and finds support in the decisions.

It is fully established that a surrogate may, in his discretion, refuse commissions altogether by reason of an executor's or trustee's misconduct (Re Rutledge, 162 N. Y. 31, 47 L.R.A. 721, 56 N. E. 511), and yet no such power is given by statute.

In Re Allen, 96 N. Y. 327, 330, a testamentary trustee had resigned and his successor had been appointed. A dispute arose over his right to compensation. This court said: "The testator thought proper not only to create the trust but to require for its execution three trustees, and the law now permits compensation to persons placed in that situation, and who serve to the end of the trust without regard to the actual trouble or labor to which they have been put. Collier v. Munn, 41 N. Y. 143. It is true the petitioner cannot claim on that ground. He does not intend to continue. For reasons involving no blame, he resigns, leaving the trust still existing and to be further executed by another person. Compensation, therefore, cannot be claimed as of course, and if allowed must also be measured by a different rule from that which the law applies when the trusts created by the terms of a will, or otherwise, have been fully executed. He takes it, if at all, as one of the terms or conditions of his discharge. The court has power to award it, and within the statutory limit by which fees are allowed to executors and trustees, its amount is discretionary."

In Re Welling, 51 App. Div. 355, 358, 64 N. Y. Supp. 1027, it was said: "In Re Rutledge, 162 N. Y. 31, 47 L.R.A. 721, 56 N. E. 511, the court of appeals held that the language of § 2730 of the Code of Civil Procedure is 'not necessarily exclusive of all discretion in the surrogate, and that its exercise should be left to him upon all the facts, in the review of which by the appellate division ample opportunity for correction is afforded.' These executors stand in the shoes of their testator. Re Wiley, 119 N. Y. 642, 23 N. E. 1054; Code Civ. Proc. § 2606. Commissions are allowed to trustees as compensation for services in the execution of a trust, and in the case of gross neglect and unfaithfulness the court may properly disallow them." Section 2730 referred to is now § 2753.

Re Douglas, 60 App. Div. 64, 68, 69 N. Y. Supp. 690, determined the right of an executor to compensation where he was discharged upon his own motion before the complete execution of his trust. The court said this: "As to commissions, we are of the opinion that the surrogate was right in holding that the executor was not entitled to full commissions. Upon his own motion he was discharged before the final completion of the trust created in the will. Under such circumstances, he ought not to have full commissions, that is, commissions for receiving and disbursing the money which came into his hands. The surrogate allowed him one-half commissions, and this is all he was entitled to. In any view, the amount to be awarded, he having asked to be discharged before the final completion of the trust, was in the discretion of the surrogate."

Whitehead v. Draper, 132 App. Div. 799, 801, 117 N. Y. Supp. 540, determined that, a substituted trustee having died, his estate was entitled to reasonable compensation: "The law does not contemplate that an estate is to be charged with full commissions by every person who shall be called in to administer a trust, nor that such persons are to perform their part of the duties without any compensation whatever; but §§ 2730, 2802, and 3320 of the Code of Civil Procedure clearly contemplate that an estate shall be charged certain fees for the receiving and paying out of moneys coming into the hands of persons administering a trust. . . . Upon the death of the original trustees the execution of the trust devolved upon the supreme court, and thereafter it became its duty to appoint someone to execute the trust and invest the appointee with all or any of the powers and duties of the original trustee. . . . The court appointed Jarvis, and he thereupon became its agent to execute the trust so far as it then remained unexecuted. Wetmore v. Wetmore, 44 App. Div. 52, 60 N. Y. Supp. 437. He died before the trust was fully executed, and then he had received neither commissions on receiving the property nor on paying it out. The court having appointed him as its agent, he should be allowed some compensation for the services, which it is conceded were faithfully and efficiently rendered."

No distinction should be made between the powers of the supreme court and those of the surrogate in dealing with the compensation of a testamentary trustee. It was held in Re Runk, 200 N. Y. 447, 94 N. E. 363, that a surrogate's court has power to entertain a proceeding for the judicial settlement of the accounts of a trustee appointed by the supreme court as the successor of a deceased testamentary trustee, and that any trustee appointed by will or other competent authority is now authorized by express legislative enactment to render his accounts to that court.

Courts—power of surrogate to grant commissions.

Section 2490 of the Code of Civil Procedure says of the incidental powers of the surrogate that he may proceed in all matters subject to the cognizance of his court according to the course and practice of a court having by the common law jurisdiction of such matters.

If, therefore, the supreme court may, in its discretion, fix the compensation of a substituted testamentary trustee, such discretion must also rest with the surrogate.

There is no apparent reason for a discretionary power existing for a substituted testamentary trustee, and not for a testamentary trustee who has died before completing his work and judicial accounting. In this particular executors, administrators, testamentary trustees, and substituted trustees must all be treated alike. If the law is to approximate a science it must be uniform in similar cases.

Re Barker, 186 App. Div. 317, 325, 174 N. Y. Supp. 235, has recently passed upon this very point. After giving the authorities it is stated: "There has, however, grown up in this state the judicial rule that, when a trustee ceases the performance of his duties as such, prior to complete administration of the trust estate, he is, in the discretion of the court, entitled to reasonable compensation for the services performed."

We do not consider Re Todd, 64 App. Div. 435, 72 N. Y. Supp. 277, Linsly v. Bogert, 87 Hun, 137, 33 N. Y. Supp. 975, and Olcott v. Baldwin, 190 N. Y. 99, 82 N. E. 748, as authorities to the contrary of the proposition we are here stating. The question of the surrogate's authority to allow less than the statutory compensation was not up for decision. The fact that the statutory allowance in these and other cases was given is not the same as holding that the surrogate had no authority to allow a less amount in a proper case.

In this matter before us we do not say that it would have been improper for the surrogate to have allowed in his discretion all that has been given by the appellate division.

The facts are not before us, and we could not pass upon them if they were. We do hold, however, that as to the compensation to the estate of Alpheus C. Dwight the surrogate had a discretion to be reasonably exercised, in view of all the circumstances and the services rendered by the said Dwight, and that having fixed the amount within the statutory limits he did not err as a matter of law.

The order of the Appellate Division should therefore be reversed, and the decree of the surrogate affirmed, with costs to the appellant in this court and in the Appellate Division.

ANNOTATION.

Death of trustee, executor, administrator, or guardian as affecting right to compensation.

Although commissions, as a matter of right, do not accrue until accounting, the courts have adopted the judicial rule that although an executor, administrator, or trustee may have died prior to a complete administration of the trust estate, his estate is, in the discretion of the court, entitled to reasonable compensation for the services performed.

In Young v. Hughes (1901) 39 Or. 586, 65 Pac. 987, 66 Pac. 272, where a trustee who had received the proceeds of the sale of the property of a corporation to distribute to the shareholders, and who was to have a specified sum for his entire services, did not live fully to discharge the trust, it was held that his estate was entitled to such a proportion of the sum promised him as his disbursements bore to the sum required to be paid to the stockholders.

The rule that, in the case of a continuing trust, the trustee cannot diminish the fund which is to create the income during the life of the trust, does not preclude the allowance of a commission on the corpus of the estate to the representatives of a trustee who had died before the termination of the trust. Lloyd's Estate (1900) 23 Pa. Co. Ct. 267.

The discretion to be exercised by the surrogate in fixing the compensation, when any at all is allowed, of executors, or administrators, upon their death, follows the standard of the percentage upon receipts and disbursements fixed by the statute as allowable upon accounting. Re McCormick (1905) 46 Misc. 386, 94 N. Y. Supp. 1071.

Where one of two joint executors dies, the commission allowed upon the passing of an account by the surviving executor may be apportioned between him and the estate of the deceased executor. Crothers v. Crothers (1914) 123 Md. 603, 91 Atl. 691.

In Scroggs v. Stevenson (1888) 100 N. C. 364, 5 S. E. 111, where in consequence of the death of the original executor an administrator d. b. n. was appointed, it was held that where an estate passes through several hands, whatever sum is allowed by way of commissions, within the limit fixed by the statute, should be apportioned among the representatives according to their respective merits and services rendered.

Although a statute fixes the minimum percentage which may be allowed as compensation to the administrator of a decedent's estate, the court has the power, where the administrator dies before completion of the administration and there is a further administrator to be paid for services, to allow such compensation, though less than the statutory minimum, as the services performed actually merit. McPherson v. Israel (1832) 5 Gill & J. (Md.) 60.

See also, to the same effect, Re Baxley (1877) 47 Md. 555, a case involving the right of an administrator pendente lite to commission.

Basis of allowance.

Although the compensation of testamentary trustees is given for the care and management of the estate, and not for the simple act of receiving and paying out, full commissions are not deemed to be earned until the trustee has both received and paid out the sum upon which the commission is to be computed; hence the estate of a deceased trustee is properly awarded one half of the commission allowed by law to trustees for receiving and paying out money. Palmer v. Dunham (1889) 53 Hun, 637, 3 Silv. Sup. Ct. 159, 6 N. Y. Supp. 262, affirmed on another point in (1890) 125 N. Y. 68, 25 N. E. 1081; Linsly v. Bogert (1895) 87 Hun, 137, 33 N. Y. Supp. 975; Pflug's Estate, N. Y. L. J. May 25, 1915.

The estate of a deceased executor may be awarded compensation on the same basis, and, in addition, commissions should be computed on the cash amount paid out during the life of the deceased executor. Re McCormick (1905) 46 Misc. 386, 94 N. Y. Supp. 1071.

The transfer of the property to a new trustee, which was rendered necessary by the death of the prior trustee, is such a payment as to entitle the deceased trustee's estate to commissions on account of such payment. Palmer v. Dunham (1889) 53 Hun, 687, 3 Silv. Sup. Ct. 159, 6 N. Y. Supp. 262; Re Todd (1901) 64 App. Div. 435, 72 N. Y. Supp. 277; Re Fisk (1904) 45 Misc. 298, 92 N. Y. Supp. 394; Whitehead v. Draper (1909) 132 App. Div. 799, 117 N. Y. Supp. 539; Re Silliman (1910) 67 Misc. 27, 124 N. Y. Supp. 622; Re Naylor (1917) 164 N. Y. Supp. 462; Pflug's Estate (N. Y.) supra.

The reason for this is that the property passes by operation of law to the new trustee upon his due appointment. Re Silliman (1910) 67 Misc. 27, 124 N. Y. Supp. 622.

So, also, the administrator of a deceased executor, upon accounting to his decedent's coexecutor, is not entitled, on behalf of his decedent, to commissions on the amount turned over to the coexecutor, such money not being paid out in the course of his decedent's administration, but as a debt due by his decedent. Griffin v. Bonham (1856) 30 S. C. Eq. (9 Rich.) 71.

In Re Wilcox (1908) 125 App. Div. 152, 109 N. Y. Supp. 564, reversed on another point in (1909) 194 N. Y. 288, 87 N. E. 497, where a life beneficiary entitled to the income of a trust fund was appointed trustee and died with the fund in her possession, it was held that as the commission, though allowed in name for receiving and paying out the fund, is really for its care and management, and as the beneficiary was properly made trustee and performed the service of caring for the fund, and her executor would have to distribute and pay it over to the parties entitled thereto, her estate was entitled to the full commission for receiving and paying out the fund.

The allowance to be made for services of a testamentary trustee who has died prior to a complete administration of the trust estate cannot lawfully exceed one-half commissions upon the value of the property. Re Barker (1919) 186 App. Div. 317, 174 N. Y. Supp. 230.

A trustee appointed by the supreme court to execute a testamentary trust, who by statute is "entitled to such compensation for his services as the court appointing him shall determine, which shall in no case exceed that now allowed by law to executors and administrators," and who died before the trust was fully executed, is properly allowed commissions of half the statutory rates, not only upon the moneys which came into his hands originally, but also upon the moneys which he received in the course of his administration in the liquidation of securities which he originally received, and which, as principal of the fund, he was bound to reinvest. Whitehead v. Draper (1909) 132 App. Div. 799, 117 N. Y. Supp. 539.

In Re Newland (1894) 7 Misc. 723, 28 N. Y. Supp. 496, where two executors had acted together in administering the estate, during a period of sixteen months, during which time they had collected, paid out, and distributed a considerable portion of the estate, and the size of the estate was such that each would, under the statute, have been entitled to a full commission upon final settlement, it was held by the surrogate that the executor of the estate of the deceased coexecutor was entitled to full compensation for commissions allowed by law upon all the property of the estate actually received, paid out, and distributed to legatees and others, by both of the executors up to the time of the death of said coexecutor, and also to one half the commissions allowed by law upon all the property of the estate held by both executors and remaining undistributed at the time of his death.

Under a statute fixing compensation on the basis of money received and paid out, the estate of a deceased executor may be allowed commissions only upon such sums as were received and paid out during the lifetime of such executor. Re Whipple (1903) 81 App. Div. 589, 81 N. Y. Supp. 393.

Payments directed to be made by a decree signed and entered after the death of an executor will not justify the allowance to the estate of a deceased executor who died after a determination by the surrogate of the questions presented on the accounting but before the decree was signed, of commissions for making such payments. Re Ziegler (1916) 218 N. Y. 544, 113 N. E. 550, affirming (1915) 168 App. Div. 735, 154 N. Y. Supp. 652, which reversed (1914) 85 Misc. 673, 148 N. Y. Supp. 1055.

The representatives of a deceased executor are not entitled to commissions for paying out where the executor died before any payment was actually made by him. Re Naylor (1917) 164 N. Y. Supp. 462.

In Bates v. Creed (1915) 15 Ohio C. C. N. S. 433, 2 Ohio App. 59, it is held that as in contemplation of law the commissions fixed by statute (General Code, § 10,837) for executors and administrators are to be received by them in full compensation for all their ordinary services, when, by reason of the death of the original executor, it becomes necessary to have an administrator de bonis non succeed him, it is not intended that the cost of administration should thereby be increased, but the statutory commissions should be equitably apportioned between or divided among the successive executors and administrators in proportion to the value of the services rendered by them respectively in such administration; and that the ordinary rule is that where there are two such successive officers, the funds allowable for compensation shall be equally divided unless the work performed is unequal, and the one claiming more than such equal proportion must show the reason for such allowance.

Where testator has fixed the amount of compensation.

Where a testator directs that each of his executors shall receive a certain sum "in lieu of all commissions" and one of them dies before the settlement of the estate is completed, his estate is entitled to such sum in full, the testator having, by determining the sum that he should receive, assumed the risk of his executor's illness or death. Sweetman's Estate (1909) 223 Pa. 552, 72 Atl. 895. E. S. O.

(— Ind. —, 125 N. E. 453.)

Principal and surety — extension of time of warranty — release of surety.

1. The extension of time of the warranty of a stallion and its final release in consideration of surrender of a portion of the note given for the purchase price without consent of the surety will release an uncompensated surety who signed the note upon faith of the warranty.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1605.]

Appeal — error in overruling demurrer — effect of instructions.

2. Error in overruling a demurrer to a paragraph of an answer is not available if the court instructed the jury that in their deliberations, they should consider only other paragraphs of the answer.

[See 2 R. C. L. 244.]

Contract — sale and warranty as one.

3. A contract of sale and a warranty of the chattel sold, executed at the same time, constitute one contract.

[See 24 R. C. L. 153.]

Principal and surety — discharging surety — varying terms of contract.

4. Sureties are not to be made liable beyond their contract, and any agreement with the creditor which varies essentially the terms of the contract, without the assent of the surety, will discharge him from responsibility.

[See 21 R. C. L. 1004.]

Appeal — overruling demurrer to cross complaint — failure to secure judgment.

5. The overruling of a demurrer to a cross complaint presents no reversible error, if no judgment was rendered in favor of the cross complaint. [See 2 R. C. L. 244.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Johnson County (Wickens, Special J.) in their favor in part only in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. De Witt C. Wilson and White & Owens, for appellants:

The remedy of the parties is not a release from payment of purchase money, but an action in damages for actual loss caused by plaintiffs not complying with the contract of warranty.

Crouch v. Fahl, 63 Ind. App. 257, 113 N. E. 1009; Nave v. Powell, 52 Ind. App. 496, 96 N. E. 395; Walters v. Akers, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 259, 101 S. W. 1179; Oltmanns Bros. v. Poland, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 142 S. W. 653.

A plea of failure of consideration can be made only by a party to the contract.

Lasher v. Williamson, 55 N. Y. 619; Gillespie v. Torrance, 25 N. Y. 306, 82 Am. Dec. 355; Cunningham v. Potter's Sons, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 847, 64 S. W. 493.

The contract of warranty was not executed by appellee, and she is not a party thereto; hence, has no right to assert any defense based on it, or resulting from its breach.

Gillespie v. Torrance, 25 N. Y. 306, 82 Am. Dec. 355; Newton v. Lee, 139 N. Y. 332, 34 N. E. 905; Kinzie v. Rieley, 100 Va. 709, 42 S. E. 872; Elliott v. Brady, 192 N. Y. 221, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 600, 127 Am. St. Rep. 898, 85 N. E. 69; Stockton Sav. & L. Soc. v. Giddings, 96 Cal. 84, 21 L.R.A. 406, 31 Am. St. Rep. 181, 30 Pac. 1016.

Appellee Hannah Parker cannot, as surety on said note, avail herself of a defense for breach of warranty given by plaintiffs to her principal, which the principal has surrendered and which he is estopped to assert.

McCabe v. Raney, 32 Ind. 309; Van Kirk v. Adler, 111 Ala. 104, 20 So. 336; Hiner v. Newton, 30 Wis. 640; Brown v. Wright, 23 Ky. 396, 18 Am. Dec. 190; Boone County v. Jones, 54 Iowa, 699, 37 Am. Rep. 229, 2 N. W. 987, 7 N. W. 155; Griswold v. Hazard, 28 Fed. 597; Patterson's Appeal, 48 Pa. 342; Young v. Perry, 187 Ala. 122, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1146, 65 So. 817.

Unless the surety or her principal show that they have complied with the contract themselves, they nor either of them can recover thereon.

Armstrong v. Rockwood, 53 Ind. 506; Walker v. Sawyer, 34 Ind. App. 239, 70 N. E. 540; Home Ins. Co. v. Gagen, 38 Ind. App. 680, 76 N. E. 927.

Messrs. William Featherngill and Ivory J. Drybread, for appellee:

The memoranda attached to the demurrers of plaintiffs to the second, third, and fourth paragraphs of the separate answer of Hannah Parker are so indefinite, uncertain, and ambiguous that no specific objection to the sufficiency of either of said paragraphs of answer or cross complaint was pointed out to the trial court thereby, and for that reason no available error can be predicated upon the action of the trial court in overruling said demurrers.

State ex rel. Devening v. Bartholomew, 176 Ind. 182, 95 N. E. 417, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 91; Stiles v. Hasler, 56 Ind. App. 88, 104 N. E. 878; Gillisspie v. Darroch, 57 Ind. App. 482, 107 N. E. 183.

No available error can be predicated upon the action of the trial court in overruling appellants' motion for a new trial.

Prescott v. Haughey, 152 Ind. 517, 51 N. E. 1051, 53 N. E. 766; Crouch v. Shantz, 62 Ind. App. 476, 113 N. E. 13; Kendel v. Judah, 63 Ind. 291.

No judgment was rendered against the appellants, Crouch & Son, on the cross complaint of appellee, and for this reason the fourth assignment of error, based on the overruling of the demurrer to the third paragraph of her cross complaint, presents no available error.

Winnemucca Water & Light Co. v.

Model Gas Engine Works, 179 Ind. 542, 101 N. E. 1007; Royse v. Turnbaugh, 117 Ind. 589, 20 N. E. 485.

The surety on a promissory note given for the purchase price of a warranted article may plead as a defense thereto a breach of the warranty, although the principal does not avail himself of this remedy.

Springfield Engine & Thresher Co. v. Park, 3 Ind. App. 173, 29 N. E. 444.

The notes, executed by Robert H. Parker as principal, and the appellee as surety, as evidence of the purchase price of the stallion and the written guaranty thereon executed by plaintiffs and accepted by Robert H. Parker, with the full knowledge of the appellee, constitute the sale contract of the horse and are as much one contract as if all of the writings had been embodied in one instrument.

Any material alteration of the sale contract without the surety's consent will release the surety.

Judah v. Zimmerman, 22 Ind. 388; Campbell v. Gates, 17 Ind. 126; Sprigg v. Bank of Mt. Pleasant, 14 Pet. 419, 10 L. ed. 419; Bailey v. Boyd, 75 Ind. 125; Weir Plow Co. v. Walmsley, 110 Ind. 242, 11 N. E. 232.

When a surety has been once discharged his liability cannot be renewed without his consent.

Leggett v. Humphreys, 21 How. 66, 16 L. ed. 50.

The promise to pay the notes was based upon the corresponding promises of the appellants to make good the horse as a satisfactory breeder.

Rosenthal v. Rambo, supra.

When appellants failed to furnish a horse of equal value in exchange, and thus comply with their said agreement, there was a total failure of consideration between appellants and appellee.

Plaintiffs refused to comply with their part of the guaranty, and no formal delivery of the horse to them at La Fayette, Indiana, was necessary to complete the breach of contract.

Blair v. Hamilton, 48 Ind. 32; House v. Alexander, 105 Ind. 109, 55 Am. Rep. 189, 4 N. E. 891; 38 Cyc. 131, note 1; Ohio Thresher & Engine Co. v. Hensel, 9 Ind. App. 323, 36 N. E. 716.

Willoughby, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On December 29, 1908, Crouch & Son, appellants, sold and delivered to Robert H. Parker, also named as appellant, a certain stallion at the agreed price of $1,950; for which sum the said Robert H. Parker and his mother, Hanna Parker, appellee, executed their three several promissory notes each calling for $650 and interest. As a part of the contract of sale, and contemporaneously with the execution and delivery of said notes, the said Crouch & Son, hereinafter designated as appellants, executed and delivered to said Robert H. Parker their written contract, by which they warranted said stallion to be a "satisfactory sure breeder," and agreed that, if said horse should not be as warranted, they would, on or before April 1, 1910, take him back, if delivered to them at La Fayette, Indiana, and give in exchange another stallion of equal value and of the same breed.

The horse did not prove to be as warranted, and appellants were so notified prior to April 1, 1910, whereupon appellants, without the knowledge or consent of appellee, extended said warranty for a period of one year, at the expiration of which time, and on April 13, 1911, appellants entered into a new agreement with Robert H. Parker, by the terms of which appellants surrendered to said Parker the note due April 1, 1910, on which there was a balance due in the sum of $324.34, and said Robert H. Parker released said appellants from all liability on said warranty. Thereafter the last of the three $650 notes became due, was unpaid, and this action was begun by appellants against Robert H. Parker and appellee to collect said note. Appellee filed four affirmative paragraphs of answer designated as the second, third, fourth, and fifth paragraphs; also, a cross complaint against appellants. Separate demurrers for want of facts were filed to these answers and to the cross complaints, which demurrers were overruled, except the demurrer to the fifth paragraph of answer, which was sustained. Appellants' reply in denial to the several paragraphs of answer, and their answer in denial to the cross complaint, closed the issues, and the cause was submitted to a jury, resulting in a verdict and judgment against Robert H. Parker for the full amount of the note, and a verdict in favor of appellee. Appellants' motion for a new trial was overruled. The errors relied on for reversal are: (1) The rulings of the court on the demurrers to the three affirmative paragraphs of answer and the ruling of the court on the demurrer to the third paragraph of the cross complaint of appellee; and (2) the overruling of the motion for a new trial.

The court having specially instructed the jury that in their deliberations they should consider only of instructions.

the third and fourth paragraphs of appellee's answer,
there is no available error in the action of the court in overruling appellants' demurrer to the second paragraph of answer. Life Assur. Co. v. Haughton, 31 Ind. App. 626, 628, 67 N. E. 950.

The third and fourth paragraphs of answer each aver that the note sued on and the warranty given by appellants were contemporaneously executed and delivered; that the execution and delivery of the warranty was a consideration for appellee's execution of the note as surety; that the stallion was not as warranted; and that the extension of the warranty was without her knowledge and consent, as was the new agreement of April 13, 1911. The only objection to these paragraphs of answer which appellants specified in their memorandum to the demurrers thereto is that appellee "had not executed the warranty, was not a party to it, and therefore has no right to base a defense thereon." The question thus presented for our consideration is whether or not the changes in the original contract, which changes were made by agreement between the principal on the note and the appellants, without the knowledge of appellee, discharged appellee as surety. Appellants concede that, if appellee had been a party named in the warranty, the extension and surrender of that instrument without her consent would have released her from liability on the note; but they contend that, inasmuch as her name does not appear in the warranty, she is not released.

A contract of sale and the warranty of the chattel sold, executed at the same time, constitute one contract. La Grange v. Coyle, 50 Ind. App. 140, 98 N. E. 75; McCarty v. Williams, 58 Ind. App. 440, 108 N. E. 370; Shordan v. Kyler, 87 Ind. 38, 41.

Contract—sale and warranty
as one.

In Allen v. Nofsinger, 13 Ind. 494, it is held that a promissory note, and the contract in writing out of which it arises, if both are executed at the same time, constitute but one agreement.

In Cunningham v. Gwinn, 4 Blackf. 342, it is held that, if a title bond be executed in such case bearing the same date with the note, they constitute one contract, and the note is subject to the same defense as if it showed, on its face, the consideration for which it was given.

In Wood v. Ridgeville College, 114 Ind. 320, 16 N. E. 619, it is held that when, at the time a promissory note was executed to a college for a scholarship therein, a certificate of scholarship was issued to the maker, to which was appended an agreement that the note was to be returned if $10,000 worth of scholarships were not sold within a given time, the note and the agreement constitute one contract.

In Woodward v. Mathews, 15 Ind. 339, it is held that a written contemporaneous agreement showing the consideration and conditions upon which a promissory note was given, may, in a suit upon the note, be given in evidence as part of the same contract.

In McDonald v. Huestis, 1 Ind. App. 275, 27 N. E. 509, it is held that an agreement in writing, executed at the same time a promissory note is executed, with reference thereto, becomes a part of the contract, and it and the note must be construed together in ascertaining the liability of the maker of such note and his surety.

In Rosenthal v. Rambo, 165 Ind. 584, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 678, 76 N. E. 404, the court, in construing a contract similar to the one at bar, said the promise to pay the notes was based on the corresponding promise of Crouch & Son to make good the horse as a satisfactory breeder, and the duty to pay, in whole or in part, remained inchoate during the breeding test, and until performance or default by the sellers. So blended were the transactions that no assignment of the notes, which carried upon their face notice of probable or possible defenses, could separate these equities from the terms of the contract.

The case of Hickman v. Rayl, 55 Ind. 552, was an action founded on a promissory note, and an answer to the complaint alleges that the note was executed by the defendant Silas Hickman as principal, and by the defendant George W. Hickman as surety for the said Silas, in consideration of the rent of a farm owned by the plaintiff, which he rented to the defendant Silas Hickman by articles of agreement made between the said plaintiff and said Silas, on the same day the note was executed, and as a part of the same agreement, by which articles the plaintiff, in consideration of the obligation of the defendant Silas, thereafter named, agreed to rent to the said Silas the farm then owned by the plaintiff; that the note was given for the rent of the place. It is further alleged in the answer that plaintiff never delivered the premises to the said Silas Hickman as provided for in the contract.

The court in that case says the making of the note sued on and the execution of the agreement set up in the answer were simultaneous acts, done by the same parties, about the same subject-matter; the note and the agreement, therefore, belong to the same transaction, and, taken together, constitute but one contract, as much as if they were written on the same piece of paper.

In the case of Zimmerman v. Judah, 13 Ind. 286, which was a suit by the appellee against the appellant on a promissory note, it appears by the answer of defendant, appellant, that, at the same time that the note sued on was executed, Judah and Brown entered into a contract by which Brown was to erect for Judah a certain building, to be wholly completed ready for occupancy by the 1st day of November, 1856. The agreement fixes the amount to be paid, the time of payment, etc. The last clause of the agreement is as follows:

"(5) As to the balance, 2,000 dollars, it is agreed as follows: Said Judah herewith advances to said Brown, as and for a loan on a note payable one day after date, the said sum of 2,000 dollars, which note shall be satisfied by the completion of said building as in this contract is provided; and which note, also, shall not become or be payable so long as said Brown shall progress with the preparation of materials, and with the erection of said building, so as to warrant the said superintendent in the reasonable expectation of the progress and completion of the work, as is hereinbefore provided." Dated October 13, 1855, which is the same date as the note, and signed by Brown, Zimmerman, and Judah.

The answer further shows that on the 5th day of June, 1856, the following further agreement was made without the knowledge or consent of Zimmerman, by which said Brown and one Stokes should, by the 1st day of November, 1856, put an additional story on the building then under contract between Brown and Judah, for the further consideration of $1,700, to be paid on the completion thereof.

It was held that the second contract was such an alteration of the original agreement that it discharged Zimmerman, the surety.

Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat. 680, 6 L. ed. 189, holds that the contract of the surety is to be strictly construed, and is not to be extended beyond the scope of its terms.

Under the facts shown by the undisputed evidence in the instant case, the note sued upon and the written guaranty of appellant constitute the sale contract of the horse, and are as much one contract as if all of the writings had been embodied in one instrument.

In Judah v. Zimmerman, 22 Ind. 388, it is held that any material alteration of a contract, without the consent of the surety, will discharge him. The liability of a surety cannot be extended beyond the terms of his contract. To the extent, and in the manner, and under the circumstances, pointed out in his obligation, he is bound, and no further. It is not sufficient that he may sustain no injury by a change, or that it may even be for his benefit. He has a right to stand upon the very terms of his contract; and if he does not assent to any variation of it, and a variation is made, it is fatal. Chitty, Contr. 529; Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat. 680, 6 L. ed. 189.

In Campbell v. Gates, 17 Ind. 126, the court says, ordinarily a surety is liable to the creditor in the same manner, and to the same extent, as the principal debtor; but as an exception to this rule the surety is allowed to set up in defense any matter which ought, in equity, to go to his personal exoneration. If the contract of suretyship is, as between the creditor and the surety, subject to a condition, the surety is discharged if the condition be not performed. Burge, Suretyship, pp. 115, 116. Indeed, we perceive no valid reason why the engagement of the surety, who, as such, executes a written contract, may not be founded upon a consideration variant from that which induces its execution by his principal. And if, as in the case at bar, such consideration be a condition subsequent, to be performed by the creditor, his failure to perform it would evidently operate as a fraud upon the surety, and, upon that ground, release him from all liability upon his engagement. 2 Am. Lead. Cas. p. 262; Pidcock v. Bishop, 3 Barn. & C. 605, 107 Eng. Reprint, 857, 5 Dowl. & R. 505, 3 L. J. K. B. 109, 27 Revised Rep. 430. And it is plainly competent for the surety to set up and prove such failure of consideration, because it has been often adjudged that such defense is not in conflict with the legal effect of the contract.

It is a sound and well-settled principle of law that sureties are not to be made liable beyond their contract, and any agreement with the creditor, which varies essentially the terms of the contract, without the assent of the surety, will discharge him from responsibility. Sprigg v. Bank of Mt. Pleasant, 14 Pet. 201, 10 L. ed. 419.

In Bailey v. Boyd, 75 Ind. 125, it is held that if a creditor holding a composition bond, by an agreement with the debtor, for a valuable consideration, without the knowledge or consent of the surety, materially change the terms of the contract of indebtedness, he thereby releases the surety.

In the Weir Plow Co. v. Walmsley, 110 Ind. 242, 11 N. E. 232, the court holds a surety is not bound beyond the terms of his contract, reasonably interpreted. In that case, on page 246 of 110 Ind., the court says: "‘Nothing,’ says Judge Story, ‘can be clearer, both upon principle and authority, than the doctrine that the liability of a surety is not to be extended, by implication, beyond the terms of his contract. To the extent, and in the manner, and under the circumstances, pointed out in his obligation, he is bound, and no further. It is not sufficient that he may sustain no injury by a change in the contract, or that it may even be for his benefit. He has a right to stand upon the very terms of his contract; and if he does not assent to any variation of it, and a variation is made, it is fatal.' Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat. 680, 6 L. ed. 189. Such has always been the doctrine of this court. Judah v. Zimmerman, 22 Ind. 388; Markland, Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Kimmel, 87 Ind. 560; Lafayette v. James, 92 Ind. 240, 47 Am. Rep. 140; Weed Sewing Mach. Co. v. Winchel, 107 Ind. 260, 7 N. E. 881."

A surety is "a favored debtor." The slightest fraud on the part of the creditor touching the contract annuls it. Any alteration after it is made, though beneficial to the surety, has the same effect. His contract, exactly as made, is the measure of his liability. Magee v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. 92 U. S. 93, 23 L. ed. 699.

In Jeffries v. Lamb, 73 Ind. 202, the court holds, where the payee of a note induces another to become surety thereon, by agreeing that he would deliver to the maker a previous note and chattel mortgage for cancelation, so that such surety might indemnify himself by obtaining a first mortgage on the property mortgaged, a failure and refusal to comply with such agreement constitute a failure of consideration as between such payee and surety.

In Trentman v. Fletcher, 100 Ind. 105, the court says, on page 109, where a surety signs a note, in consideration of an agreement with the payee that the latter should do something in the future, if the agreement is sufficiently certain and of such a character that the surety has a right to rely on its performance, and such agreement is not a contradiction of the note, or some of its terms, we perceive no reason why a failure on the part of the payee to perform should not be held a failure of the consideration as between the payee and surety.

In judging of the character of sufficiency of the defense of the appellee, there should be taken as a guide the rule, which is perhaps without an exception, that sureties not for hire are never held responsible beyond the clear and absolute terms and meaning of their undertakings. Presumptions of equities are never allowed to enlarge or in any degree to change their legal obligations. This rule is thus forcibly put by Chancellor Kent in Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 124, where he says: "When the contract of a guarantor or surety is duly ascertained and understood by a fair and liberal construction of the instrument, the principle is well settled that the case must be brought strictly within the terms of the guaranty, and the liability of the surety cannot be extended by implication." Leggett v. Humphreys, 21 How. 66, 16 L. ed. 50.

The case at bar was a suit by the payees of the note against the makers. No equities of third parties have intervened. The contract of the appellee was one of surety for the purchase price of the horse. She was induced to enter into the contract of suretyship by the warranty of the appellants, which was read to her by appellants' agent before she signed the note sued on. The maturities of the notes were so arranged that the breeding test could be completed before any note became due. At or about the time the first note became due, the original contract was, without the knowledge or consent of appellee, changed, in this, that on April 1, 1910, the warranty was extended for one year, and that on April 13, 1911, the note due April 10, 1910, on which there was at that time an unpaid balance of $324.34, was canceled by appellants Crouch & Crouch, and appellants were released from all liability on the warranty.

Any agreement or dealing between the creditor and principal which materially varies the terms of the contract by which the surety is to be bound, without the consent of the surety, will release the surety from his obligation. Bailey v. Boyd, 75 Ind. 125; Weed Sewing Mach. Co. v. Winchel, 107 Ind. 260, 7 N. E. 881; Post v. Losey, 111 Ind. 74, 60 Am. Rep. 677, 12 N. E. 121; Weir Plow Co. v. Walmsley, 110 Ind. 242, 11 N. E. 232; Glenn County v. Jones, 146 Cal. 518, 80 Pac. 695, 2 Ann. Cas. 764.

The court did not err in overruling the demurrers to the third and fourth paragraphs of answer.

No judgment was rendered against appellants on the cross complaint of appellee. Therefore the overruling of the demurrer to the third paragraph thereof presents no available error.

Winnemucca Water & Light Co. v. Model Gas Engine Works, 179 Ind. 542, 544, 101 N. E. 1007; Royse v. Turnbaugh, 117 Ind. 539, 20 N. E. 485.

The appellants claim that instruction No. 2 required the plaintiff to prove the execution of the note in suit; that instruction No. 3 does not correctly state the material averments of each of the third and fourth paragraphs of answer; and that instruction No. 3 embodies a wrong conception of the law.

These instructions are not subject to the infirmities claimed by appellants. The instructions, taken as a whole, state the law of the case correctly, and the verdict is sustained by sufficient evidence.

No error appearing in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal—overruling demurrer to cross-complaint—failure to secure judgment.

ANNOTATION.

Release of payee from warranty constituting a part of the consideration for a note as releasing a surety.

An extensive search has failed to disclose any case other than the reported case (CROUCH v. PARKER, ante, 1598) passing upon the question therein involved as to whether the release of the payee of a note from a warranty, thus making the principal's obligation absolute, releases a surety on the note. It is a general principle of the law of suretyship that the surety is released by any material change in the contract between the principal and the creditor. In fact, the rule seems to be laid down in some cases that any change in the contract releases the surety. 21 R. C. L. pp. 1004 et seq. The change made in the contract involved in the reported case seems to satisfy the requirements of the rule that the change must be material, for thereafter an obligation of the principal debtor against which he might have defended by showing a breach of the warranty was rendered an absolute one not open to such defense.

MARY A. PHILLIPS

v.

FARMERS' MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY of Kalamazoo County, Plff. in Err.Michigan Supreme Court — December 22, 1919.

(— Mich. —, 175 N. W. 144.)

Insurance — change of title — deed to broker.

1. The execution and delivery by a property owner of a warranty deed of it to a broker to facilitate the transfer of title to a purchaser should one be found is not a change of title within the provision of a fire insurance policy avoiding the policy if the title to the property should be in any way changed.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1608.]

Deed — delivery — placing in hands of broker.

2. No delivery of the deed occurred sufficient to effect a change in the title to the property by placing a warranty deed in the hands of a broker who is named as grantee merely to aid him in transferring title to a purchaser should one be found.

Appeal — raising question waived below.

3. A party who in arguing a motion for directed verdict concedes that there is no disputed question of fact for the jury cannot insist on appeal that there were questions of fact which should have been submitted to the jury.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County (Weimer, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. E. M. Irish for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Charles L. Dibble for defendant in error.

Sharpe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The following statement of facts is taken from the brief of counsel for appellant:

"The defendant is a mutual fire insurance company. On the 17th day of January, 1916, the plaintiff took out a policy on some buildings in the amount of $2,500. On the 2d of February, 1917, the buildings were burned. The loss was total. Defendant refused to pay the loss on the ground that plaintiff had violated the conditions of the policy by a change of the title without consent of the company.

"The conditions of the policy contained this clause: 'If the title to said property shall be in any way changed, or a failure of the assured to show ownership or interest, . . .

the risk hereon shall cease and terminate and the policy be null and void.' The by-laws were a part of the policy, and by-law 11 repeated the above condition. On November 22, 1916, the plaintiff executed and delivered to one Stephen Chilson, a Michigan warranty deed of the property in question, the warranty being subject to a mortgage, and took a promissory note from him for $2,500. The deed was not placed on record. This deed was absolute on its face. The evidence in the record consists of a detail of the circumstances under which it was given."

It also appears that the plaintiff had theretofore entered into a land contract with one Lanning for the sale of the property to him. This contract was also assigned by her to Chilson. It is the claim of the defendant that the execution and delivery of the deed to Chilson was such a change of title, within the language of the policy and by-law, as rendered the policy void, and that a verdict should have been directed in its favor. This claim is denied by the plaintiff, who claims the deed was executed and delivered under such circumstances as show that the parties did not intend it to operate as a conveyance. Plaintiff also claims that, if defendant's contention stated above should be sustained, it then devolved on defendant to show that it had been injured by such breach, under § 9481, Comp. Laws 1915, which reads as follows:

"(9481) Section 1. No policy of fire insurance shall hereafter be declared void by the insurer for the breach of any condition of the policy if the insurer has not been injured by such breach, or where a loss has not occurred during such breach, and by reason of such breach of condition."

To this defendant replies that this statute was repealed by Act No. 256, Public Acts 1917.

At the close of the proofs, both parties moved for a directed verdict. It seems to have been conceded that there was no disputed question of fact to submit to the jury except the question of plaintiff's damages. This question the court submitted, instructing the jury that there was no change of title such as would affect the policy. The defendant afterwards, and before judgment was entered on the verdict, moved for a judgment for defendant non obstante veredicto, the right to do so having apparently been reserved under the provisions of Act No. 217, Public Acts 1915. In denying the motion, the trial judge said:

"If the court is to determine the intent with which the deed was executed and delivered, then it would seem possible to reach but one result. In my opinion, under the undisputed testimony, it was clearly not the intention of either the plaintiff or Chilson to vest the latter with any right, title, or interest in or to the property or any ownership of the same. Certainly Mrs. Phillips had no thought of relinquishing proprietorship over the property to Chilson. She was dealing with him as a real estate broker. He was acting as her agent in the transaction for the purpose of finding a purchaser, and that alone. She may have been, and probably was, improperly induced to execute and deliver a writing in such form that in the hands of an unscrupulous agent it might have caused her serious embarrassment, but that could in no way affect her intention in the matter. Whatever suspicion may have been aroused afterwards regarding Chilson's conduct as shown by the bill in chancery, the record in this case fails to disclose that he entertained any other or different intention in the transaction than she. Everything in the testimony of plaintiff, Chilson, and the attorney, Goembel, who drafted the deed, shows beyond doubt that it was the contemplation of the parties that Chilson was to act as the agent of plaintiff in handling, looking after, and negotiating a sale of her property.

"It is my conclusion, therefore, that the execution and delivery of the writing, in form of warranty deed, under the particular circumstances shown, did not constitute a transfer of the title within the meaning of the policy."

Counsel for defendant relies on the case of Western Massachusetts Ins. Co. v. Riker, 10 Mich. 279, and kindred cases, in which it is held that a deed absolute on its face, though given as a security, avoids the policy. It also holds that a conveyance intended to create a secret trust in the grantee for the use of the grantor creates a change of title within the language of the policy.

The distinction between the Riker Case and the one at bar lies in the fact that, as found by the trial judge, there was no present intention on the part of the parties to pass any title to Chilson. While it was in his power, in fraud of his duty to plaintiff and her rights, to have conveyed this property independent of his agreement with her that it should only be done if he secured a purchaser thereof, such power on his part, not having been exercised, should not be held to have created such an interest in the property in him as in any way changed the title thereto. The arrangement was in effect the same as though plaintiff had given Chilson a power of attorney to convey the property for her when a purchaser was secured.

We are also of the opinion that the trial judge might well have found that there was no such delivery of the deed from plaintiff to Chilson as would pass title to him. The plaintiff testified that at the time the deed was prepared she said to Mr. Goembel, the attorney who drew it, "I am giving Mr. Chilson a deed of this property so he can sell it for me." Mr. Goembel testified that at that time the plaintiff said to him, "Well, Mr. Chilson is going to sell this property." Chilson testified: "The deed was simply held by me. The deed wasn't mine."

As was said by Mr. Justice Os-trander in Pollock v. McCarty, 198 Mich. 66, 164 N. W. 391: "The test is whether it can be said that delivery of the deed was such as to convey a present interest in the land."

Many Michigan cases are cited by him in its support, to which reference is here made. Applying this test, in view of the finding of the trial judge, in which we concur, that "it was clearly not the intention of either the plaintiff or Chilson to vest the latter with any right, title, or interest in or to the property or any ownership of the same,"—it must be held that there was no such delivery of the deed to Chilson as conveyed "a present interest in the land."

"The whole object of a delivery is to indicate an intent upon the part of the grantor to give effect to the instrument." Thatcher v. St. Andrew's Church, 37 Mich. 264, 269.

Counsel for defendant now insists that the intent with which the deed was executed and delivered should have been submitted to the jury. In view of the concession made by him at the time the motions to direct were argued, we think he is foreclosed from raising this question.

The conclusion reached renders it unnecessary to pass upon the effect of the repealing statute.

The judgment will stand affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Insurance: provision against change in interest, title, or possession as affected by a deed or other instrument which was merely colorable or has not been delivered.

As indicated in the title this annotation is confined to cases where there was no real intention to pass the title or affect any interest in the property. It does not include cases of delivery of deeds in escrow.

The object of the provision of a policy avoiding it in case of change of title, interest, or possession is that the insured shall have no greater motive to destroy the property, or less interest in guarding it, and it is held that such provision is not violated by the execution of an instrument which was not intended to affect the title.

Texas.—New Orleans Ins. Co. v. Gordon (1887) 68 Tex. 144, 3 S. W. 718.

It will be observed that in the reported case (PHILLIPS v. FARMERS' MUT. F. INS. CO. ante, 1606) there was held to be no change of title which avoided an insurance policy where the insured, who wished to sell the property covered by the policy, executed and gave a warranty deed to a real estate dealer and assigned a land contract for the sale of the property to him, and took his promissory note, it appearing that the deed was not recorded and that it was not the intention of the parties to vest the agent with any title or interest.

And it has been held that there is no violation of the provision against change in the interest, title, or possession where the insured delivered a deed of the insured property to another in which the name of the grantee was left blank, although another instrument was executed and attached to the deed by which the one to whom they were delivered was authorized to fill in the name of the grantee, which he never did. Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Jennings (1897) 70 Ill. App. 539. The court said: "The deed from Jennings and wife was a nullity and conveyed no interest whatever in the property insured. It lacked one of the essentials to a valid grant, viz., a grantee, and was therefore void. . . . Even the authority to Burnham to insert the name of a grantee was never exercised, but the deed when offered in evidence was without the name of any grantee. It would seem to require no argument to show that such a paper executed by Jennings and wife did not divest the title of Jennings, nor deprive him of the ownership and right of possession. Burnham had no contract in relation to the property which could have been enforced in any court either at law or in equity. There was, therefore, no legal change of title or interest, and Jennings could at any time have recovered possession of the property."

And in New Orleans Ins. Co. v. Gordon (1887) 68 Tex. 144, 3 S. W. 718, where the insured gave a deed to another for the sole purpose of securing a loan in an association of which the grantee was a member, but no loan was ever secured, there was held to be no violation of the provision for forfeiture in case of change in interest, title, or possession.

And the provision against change of interest, title, or possession is not violated where the owner of property, to avoid having it attached for a debt, executed a deed to a friend and simultaneously took one from her, the one to the friend being recorded, but the other remaining in the possession of the insured's attorney, there being nothing more than a colorable or nominal transfer, and there being no consideration, or change of possession. Wiley v. London & L. F. Ins. Co. (1914) 89 Conn. 85, 66 Atl. 678.

And it has been held that there was no change or diminution in the interest, title, or possession where the insured to escape a possible lien on the insured property made a mere colorable deed to another which was recorded, but never delivered, and which was made subject to a colorable mortgage, which he executed to a bank without its knowledge, it appearing that he also simultaneously took a reconveyance of the property. Cone v. Century F. Ins. Co. (1908) 139 Iowa, 205, 117 N. W. 307.

And where the insured to frighten off his creditors made a deed of property to his wife and left it for recording, but never delivered it to the grantee, and did not intend that the title should pass by the transaction, it was held that there was no violation of the provision against a change of title or ownership. Hogadone v.

And in Forward v. Continental Ins. Co. (1894) 142 N. Y. 382, 25 L.R.A. 637, 37 N. E. 615, a mere colorable bill of sale of the insured personal property, without consideration, and without delivery of possession of the property, although it was recorded, was held not to constitute a change of title. The court said: "When the transfer or encumbrance is merely colorable or nominal, and not real or effective, the reasons that induced the stipulation do not apply. Was there any real sale or transfer of this property, within the meaning of the policy? Nothing was done, except to execute and file a paper. There was no intention, in fact, to transfer the title, or vest any beneficial interest in the nominal vendee. There was no debt to be enforced, no consideration passed, and the use and possession remained unchanged. The filing of the paper added nothing to its validity. It was not a mortgage, nor intended as security for any debt. It was a mere paper transfer, without consideration, and without delivery of possession; and while it had the form, it had none of the legal elements, necessary, even between the parties, to constitute a valid contract of sale. In legal effect, it was, I think, the same as an unexecuted gift. The worst that can be said of it is that it was intended to defraud creditors; but, if that be true, still the moral hazard which was the basis of the condition of the policy would still be absent, since the plaintiff's interest in the property at the time of the insurance was in fact the same as before the paper was executed."

And a bill of sale without delivery does not effect a change of interest. Omaha F. Ins. Co. v. Thompson (1897) 50 Neb. 580, 70 N. W. 30.

And there was held to be no change of ownership within the meaning of a policy where a deed was executed by the insured as a result of certain negotiations, but was never delivered. Whitney v. American Ins. Co. (1900) 127 Cal. 464, 59 Pac. 897.

And in Schaeffer v. Anchor Mut. F.

Ins. Co. (1900) 113 Iowa, 652, 85 N. W. 985, there was held to be no change of title within the meaning of the policy by reason of a deed executed to his wife by the insured which was never delivered before his death, and of which the wife knew nothing prior to that event.

And in Bemis v. Harborecreek Mut. F. Ins. Co. (1900) 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 528, there was held to have been no violation of a provision for forfeiture if any change should take place in the interest or title, where the insured, for the purpose of barring his wife's dower, together with his wife, executed a deed to another, which was recorded, it appearing that there was no change of possession, and no intent to change the title, and there having been a reconveyance to the insured. The court said: "The conveyance by the insured to Morse passed no interest to the latter. All of the interest, which was absolute ownership, remained in the insured. The property was as much his after, as it was before, the making of the deed. While a deed in form, it, in substance, as between the parties, differed in nothing from a power of attorney to convey upon the request of the grantor. The reconveyance by Morse to the plaintiff operated as a revocation of the power. It certainly passed no interest. There was, therefore, no change of interest by the transaction within a fair construction of the language of the clause. It is strongly urged, however, that there was a change of 'title.' There undoubtedly was a recorded conveyance by the insured to Morse. A deed to an innocent purchaser by Morse would have estopped any claim of title by the insured. But the rights of third parties are not for determination here. They are governed by principles not involved in this discussion. The grantee had power to convey away the title of the grantor. This, if done in violation of the agreement proven in the case, would have been an act of fraud. The position of Morse was, as between the original parties, simply that of a vehicle for the passage of title, should it become necessary to convey. As between the two parties he held no more 'title' than if he had been given a deed signed and acknowledged with the name of the grantee omitted, but to be filled in and delivered in accordance with the instructions of the grantor. If it be said that Morse had power to make a good deed to a stranger, it may be answered that the grantor of a power loses nothing of his title until the execution of the power. Here, there was no execution of the power, but a surrender of it before the loss covered by the insurance in dispute. 'Title,' by the old definitions, was said to be the means whereby a man holdeth land. It means, as modern attempts at definition have shown, much more than this. We need here, however, no technical definition. 'Title,' in its accepted daily untechnical use, means 'ownership.' The deed held by Morse was not 'title.' It was evidence of title. It was in form a muniment of title. But between the original parties it conveyed no more than it was intended to convey, which was nothing. Not one tittle of interest passed; not one vestige of actual ownership vested."

And it has been held that a contract of sale in the nature of an option, which was abandoned, and under which title never passed, does not constitute a breach of the condition against change of interest, title, or possession. Mackintosh v. Agricultural F. Ins. Co. (1907) 150 Cal. 440, 119 Am. St. Rep. 234, 89 Pac. 102; House v. Security F. Ins. Co. (1909) 145 Iowa, 462, 121 N. W. 509; Terminal Ice & P. Co. v. American F. Ins. Co. (1917) 196 Mo. App. 241, 194 S. W. 722, former appeal (1916) — Mo. App. —, 187 S. W. 564, reversed on other grounds in (1916) 269 Mo. 410, 190 S. W. 879.

But where the insured and his wife in order to place his real estate so that a judgment could not be enforced against it executed a warranty deed to his son and had it recorded, and it appeared that the son had had the deed in his possession, it was held that there was a breach of the condition of a policy on the property that it should be void if any change should take place in the interest, title, or possession, although the parties testified that it was not intended that the transfer should be effective. Rosenstein v. Traders' Ins. Co. (1903) 79 App. Div. 481, 79 N. Y. Supp. 736, subsequent appeal in (1905) 102 App. Div. 147, 92 N. Y. Supp. 326. The court distinguished the case of Forward v. Continental Ins. Co. (1894) 142 N. Y. 382, 25 L.R.A. 637, 37 N. E. 615, supra, on the ground that the property in that case was personalty, and that a change of possession was necessary to transfer title to such property.

Definition — accidental injury.

2. The words "accidental injury," as used in the Illinois Workmen's Compensation Act, were meant to include every injury suffered in the course of employment for which there was an existing right of action, and to extend the liability of the employer to make compensation to injuries for which he was not previously liable.

3. Any injury which is traceable to a definite time, place, and cause, and which occurs in the course of employment, is accidental within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

4. The court cannot, upon certiorari to review the action of the Industrial Commission in awarding compensation for injury to an employee, order execution, but, in case of affirmance, it must remand the case to the Commission for further proceedings.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Cook County (Torrison, J.) to review a judgment affirming an award of the Industrial Commission in favor of claimant in a proceeding by her under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for the death of her decedent. Reversed with directions.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Ralph F. Potter and Kenneth B. Hawkins for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Philip Sultan for defendants in error.

Thompson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error sued out by the E. Baggot Company to review a judgment of the circuit court of Cook county, affirming an award of the Industrial Commission in favor of Mary C. Cripps, administratrix of the estate of Joseph C. Cripps, deceased; the circuit court having certified that the cause is one proper to be reviewed by this court.

Joseph C. Cripps, deceased, was a plumber employed by plaintiff in error. On September 26, 1917, deceased, with Michael Brodie, was engaged in his regular work upon a building under construction where plaintiff in error was the plumbing contractor. A part of the work consisted of lifting pipe from the ground to the sixth floor, where these men were working. The pipe was lifted by a hand derrick of the usual type, equipped with an arm over the end of which passed a rope attached to a windlass. At each end of the windlass was a handle, by means of which the rope was rolled upon the drum, lifting the pipe attached at the other end of the rope. The windlass was operated by the two men, deceased turning one handle and Brodie the other. The last load of pipe hauled up by these men weighed between 250 and 300 pounds. After the pipe was landed on the sixth floor, and while Brodie was untying the rope, deceased started to walk away from the windless and was seen to be spitting blood. Brodie asked him what was the matter, but deceased was unable to talk. The latter then proceeded to the construction office of plaintiff in error, on the first floor of the building, where he requested the foreman, Edwin Schutz, to get a doctor. While in the office he had two hemorrhages and coughed up blood. When deceased first came into the office, the foreman noticed that he held over his mouth a handkerchief saturated with blood and was coughing. Schutz asked deceased if he was hurt, to which deceased made no reply in words, but shook his head in the negative. Nothing unusual happened while the work of lifting this last load of pipe was in progress. The work was heavy, but it was the same kind of work that the two men had been doing for a couple of days. The hemorrhages recurred from time to time until October 8th, when deceased died. A post mortem examination disclosed a large longitudinal tear and several smaller transverse tears in the walls of the aorta. Prior to September 26th, deceased was a strong, healthy man and had never suffered from hemorrhages or any trouble with his heart or lungs.

Plaintiff in error contends that there is no evidence to support the award of the Industrial Commission, for the reason that there is no competent evidence to support a finding that deceased sustained an accidental injury arising out of and in the course of his employment. The word "accident" is not a technical legal term with a clearly defined meaning, and no legal definition has ever been given which has been found both exact and comprehensive as applied to all circumstances. Anything that happens without design is commonly called an "accident," and, at least in the popular acceptance of the word, any event which is unforeseen and not expected by the person to whom it happens is included in the term. The words "accident" and "accidental injury," as used in the Workmen's Compensation Act of Illinois (Laws 1913, p. 335), were meant to include every injury suffered in the course of employment for which there was an existing right of action at the time the act was passed; also to extend the liability of the employer to make compensation for injuries for which he was not previously liable, and to limit such compensation. If an injury can be traceable to a definite time, place, and cause, and the injury occurs in the course of the employment, the injury is accidental within the meaning of the act, and the obligation to provide and pay compensation arises. Matthiessen & H. Zinc Co. v. Industrial Bd. 284 Ill. 378, 120 N. E. 249. Where a workman died from a pre-existing disease which was aggravated or accelerated under circumstances which can be said to have been accidental, his death may be said to have resulted from accidental injury. *Peoria R. 651, 15 N. C. C. A. 632; Western Electric Co. v. Industrial Commission, 285 Ill. 279, 120 N. E. 774. In Schroetke v. Jackson-Church Co. 193 Mich. 616, L.R.A.1917D, 64, 160 N. W. 383, the supreme court of Michigan reviews at length decisions on the question of what constitutes an accident under compensation acts similar to ours, and it there holds that where an aged watchman, whose duties were to guard the plant and give alarms of fire, had been afflicted with heart disease, and, on discovering a fire and giving warning, and attempting to extinguish the fire, became excited and died from heart failure, his death was accidental. In Gilliland v. Ash Grove Lime & Portland Cement Co. 104 Kan. 771, 180 Pac. 793, the supreme court of Kansas had under consideration a case quite similar to the case at bar. There a workman's employment required him to break rock in a quarry with a 16-pound sledge and load the rock into a car. At noon he was in apparent good health and spirits. In the afternoon, while at his working place, and shortly after he had been seen beating a large rock with his sledge, he suffered a pulmonary hemorrhage, from which he died before medical aid could reach him. He had been working in the quarry for several months, and before that had worked for three years in the sacking department of a cement plant. The court, after reviewing the authorities, held that the evidence warranted a finding that the physical structure of the man gave way under the stress of his usual labor, and that the workman did not know, or in any event was inattentive to, the limited power of his blood vessels to resist blood pressure aggravated by vigorous muscular effort. This breaking down of a part of this man's body was held to be an accident.

In the instant case all the characteristics of an accident were present. The occurrence was sudden, unexpected, and undesigned by the workman. The circumstances were clearly such that the Commission was justified in finding that the hemorrhage was due to blood pressure intensified by vigorous muscular exertion. Relating the hemorrhage to physical exertion, rupture of the aorta by force from within was as distinctly traumatic as if the canal had been severed by violent application of a sharp instrument from without. There was no direct evidence of extraordinary exertion suddenly displayed. When last observed before the first hemorrhage, the deceased was working in the manner habitual to his employment. The fact remains, however, that an extraordinary and unforeseen thing suddenly and unpremeditatedly occurred, and presence of all the essential attributes of accident cannot be gainsaid. There was ample evidence in the record to justify the finding of the Industrial Commission that the deceased came to his death by accident, and the circuit court therefore properly confirmed the award. Peoria R. Terminal Co. v. Industrial Bd. and Matthiessen & H. Zinc Co. v. Industrial Bd. supra; Western Electric Co. v. Industrial Commission, 285 Ill. 279, 120 N. E. 774; State ex rel. Puhlmann v. District Ct. 137 Minn. 30, 162 N. W. 678.

Counsel for plaintiff in error rely upon Jakub v. Industrial Commission, 288 Ill. 87, 123 N. E. 263, but that case is clearly distinguishable from the case under consideration. In that case the evidence showed that Jakub died from organic heart disease and kidney disease. The court confirmed the finding of the Industrial Commission that the deceased did not sustain accidental injuries arising out of and in the course of his employment. There was no evidence in the record in that case that any part of the body was broken, by exertion or otherwise. That case is further distinguished, so far as a review by this court is concerned, in that this court cannot weigh the evidence, but must confirm the award of the Industrial Commission if there is evidence to support it. Swift & Co. v. Industrial Commission, 287 Ill. 564, 122 N. E. 796. It is essentially a different judicial problem to set aside a decision of the Industrial Commission which finds that a certain state of facts proves that the death resulted from accidental injuries, than to confirm a decision of the Commission that the death was not by accident.

The circuit court erred in entering a judgment directing the payment of the award of the Commission, and ordering execution thereon. The only authority which the circuit court had on review by certiorari was to confirm the findings and award of the Industrial Commission or to set aside the same and enter such a decision as is justified by law, or remand the cause to the Commission for further proceedings. Baum v. Industrial Commission, 288 Ill. 516, 6 A.L.R. 1242, 123 N. E. 625; Otis Elevator Co. v. Industrial Commission, 288 Ill. 396, 123 N. E. 600.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court of Cook county, with directions to enter an order confirming the decision of the Industrial Commission.

ANNOTATION.

Workmen's compensation: hemorrhage as an accident.

It will be observed that some cases have been included which were not strictly cases of hemorrhages, but which involved facts somewhat similar.

It has been held that a hemorrhage was due to an accident within the Workmen's Compensation Acts where it resulted while the workman was engaged in performing his usual work, the injury under such circumstances being unforeseen and undesigned.

England.—Johnson v. Torrington (1909) 3 B. W. C. C. 63.

It will be noticed that in the reported case (E. BAGGOT Co. v. INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION) a finding that the workman's death was due to an accident is held justified where it appears that he was a plumber, and that, while assisting in the work of turning a windlass, in the ordinary manner, he suffered a hemorrhage from a rupture of the aorta, there being no direct evidence of extraordinary exertion suddenly displayed.

And in Gilliland v. Ash Grove Lime & P. Cement Co. (Kan.) supra, where an employee had worked for about three years in the sacking department of a cement plant, which was an exceedingly dusty place, and was subsequently employed in a quarry of the company, loading rock onto cars, a part of his duty being to break rock with a sledge, it was held that the facts indicated an injury by accident, there being evidence that he was in apparently good health at noon; that shortly after he was seen beating a large rock with a sledge he suffered a pulmonary hemorrhage from which he shortly died. The court said: "The word 'accident' does not have a settled legal signification. It does have, however, a generally accepted meaning, which is the same whether considered according to the popular understanding or the approved usage of language. An 'accident' is simply an undesigned, sudden, and unexpected event, usually of an afflictive or unfortunate character, and often accompanied by a manifestation of force. The word 'undesigned' must not be taken too literally in this connection, because a person may suffer injury accidental to him, under circumstances which include the design of another. The same warning may be extended regarding other elements of the definition; but, as definitions go, the one here proposed is correct, at least for present purposes. In this instance all the characteristics of an accident were present. The occurrence was sudden, unexpected, and undesigned by the workman. While no one saw the workman strike a blow with his heavy sledge, or lift a heavy piece of rock the moment before the hemorrhage occurred, the circumstances were clearly such that the jury would have been authorized to relate the hemorrhage to blood pressure intensified by vigorous muscular exertion. Relating the hemorrhage to physical exertion, rupture of the pulmonary blood vessel by force from within was as distinctly traumatic as if the canal had been severed by the violent application of a sharp instrument from without. There was no direct evidence of extraordinary exertion suddenly displayed. When last observed, the deceased was working in the manner habitual to the employment. The fact remains, however, that an extraordinary and unforeseen thing suddenly and unpremeditatedly occurred, and presence of all the essential attributes of accident cannot be gainsaid. . . . It seems quite clear that if, because of some unobserved defect, the car which the workman was loading had broken down under its usual weight of stone, the giving way of the physical structure of the car would have been called an accident. The jury might not have considered they derived much enlightenment from the physician's very indefinite statement that the workman might have expected almost anything after working in the dust of the defendant's sacking department for three years. Certainly he would not expect typhoid fever from cement dust. The evidence warranted a finding that the physical structure of the man gave way under the stress of his usual labor. He certainly did not intend to kill himself by breaking rock and loading cars at a price per car. He did not know, or at any event he was inattentive to, the limited power of his blood vessels to resist blood pressure aggravated by vigorous muscular effort. Out of this ignorance or miscalculation of forces came misadventure, and the term 'accident' applies to what happened to him, as clearly as it would apply to what happened to the car had it broken down under the assumed circumstances."

And in Southwestern Surety Ins. Co. v. Owens (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 198 S. W. 662, where an employee, while lifting heavy cans of paint, strained himself and caused a blood vessel to burst in his lungs, resulting in a hemorrhage and death, it was held that he suffered an accidental injury in the course of his employment. The court here stated that the accidental injuries referred to in the Workmen's Compensation Act were designated accidents only as contradistinguished from intentional injuries.

And in Fowler v. Risedorph Bottling Co. (1916) 175 App. Div. 224, 161 N. Y. Supp. 535, a workman who was engaged in a hazardous employment, and who suffered a cerebral hemorrhage as a result of unusual strain or exertion while prosecuting such employment, was held to have suffered an accidental injury within the meaning of the New York Compensation Act.

And in Manning v. Pomerene (1917) 101 Neb. 127, 162 N. W. 492, it was held that an employee who, while attempting to move iron beams out of his way by pushing against them with his body, felt pain in his stomach, became faint and weak, and was compelled to cease work, and was assisted home, and on the third day afterwards vomited blood, and after that had a paralytic stroke, might be found to have suffered an accident.

And in Clark v. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. (1919) 264 Pa. 529, 107 Atl. 858, an employee was held to have met death as a result of accidental violence to the physical structure of the body where, while engaged in his work, he died from a rupture of the aorta caused by extra effort in vomiting.

And in State ex rel. Puhlmann v. District Ct. (1918) 137 Minn. 30, 162 N. W. 678, it was held that the rupture of a blood vessel might be found to be accidental where the employee was, at the time he was stricken, wheeling a heavily loaded wheelbarrow, there being medical testimony that the rupture resulted from the exertion.

And in Crosby v. Thorp, H. & Co. (1919) 206 Mich. 250, 6 A.L.R. 1253, 172 N. W. 535, it was held that an employee who was a traveling salesman had met with an accident within the Workmen's Compensation Act where he suffered paralysis due to the breaking of a blood vessel in his brain, which was caused by overexertion and excitement in hurrying to catch a train.

And in Johnson v. Torrington (1909) 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 68, the court refused to disturb the finding of fact by the lower court that the death of a fireman on a ship resulted from cerebral hemorrhage brought about by the conditions of his work, and that it arose by accident, there being testimony that while in the fire room he frequently drank water; that soon afterward he became unconscious and died; that there was no post mortem examination, but medical testimony only, which was contradicted, that his death was due to cerebral hemorrhage, brought about by the heat and excessive drinking of water.

The injury has also been held an accident within the Compensation Acts where a hemorrhage resulted while the workman was performing his usual work, although he was, at the time, suffering from a diseased condition. Peoria R. Terminal Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1917) 279 Ill. 352, 116 N. E. 651, 15 N. C. C. A. 632; Indian Creek Coal & Min. Co. v. Calvert, — Ind. App. —, 119 N. E. 519; La Veck v. Parke, D. & Co. (1916) 190 Mich. 604, L.R.A. 1916D, 1277, 157 N. W. 72; Clover, C. & Co. v. Hughes [1910] A. C. (Eng.)

It has been held that the death of a locomotive fireman, who fell from a train and suffered a fractured skull and hemorrhage of the brain, might be found to have resulted from an accident, although the hemorrhage emanated from a soft portion of the brain, caused by disease, where it appeared that the hemorrhage would not have occurred but for the fall. Peoria R. Terminal Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1917) 279 Ill. 352, 116 N. E. 651, 15 N. C. C. A. 632.

And it has been held that a coal miner suffered a personal injury by accident where, a few minutes after assisting in pushing a partially loaded car over a grade, he suffered a rupture of the aorta and hemorrhage from which he died within a short time, although an autopsy disclosed a diseased condition at the point of the rupture, and there existed an unnatural thinness of the wall. Indian Creek Coal & Min. Co. v. Calvert (1918) — Ind. App. —, 119 N. E. 519.

And paralysis due to cerebral hemorrhage, because of prolonged exertion in a hot room in the course of his employment, has been held within the operation of the Michigan act providing for compensation for accidental injuries, although he was suffering from arterial sclerosis. Le Veck v. Parke, D. & Co. (1916) 190 Mich. 604, L.R.A.1916D, 1277, 157 N. W. 72.

And in M'Innes v. Dunsmuir [1908] S. C. (Scot.) 1021, a cerebral hemorrhage caused by exertion in the employee's work was held an injury caused by an accident, although at the time of the first attack the arteries were in a degenerate condition, which rendered such an attack more likely to occur.

And in Clover, C. & Co. v. Hughes [1910] A. C. (Eng.) 242, 79 L. J. K. B. N. S. 470, 102 L. T. N. S. 340, 26 Times L. R. 359, 54 Sol. Jo. 375, 3 B. W. C. C. 275, 47 Scot. L. R. 885, where the workman was suffering from an aneurism in such an advanced stage that it might have burst at any time, and it burst while he was engaged in tightening a nut, which caused a strain ordinary in his work, it was held that there was an accident within the meaning of the English Workmen's Compensation Act.

In Federal Gold Mine v. Ennor (1910; H. C.) 13 C. L. R. (Austr.) 276, it was held that a miner could not be said to have suffered an injury by accident where he was employed in the mine but three days, and the work which he had been doing was of a very light nature, not requiring any great exertion or strain, and on each of the first two days he had complained of illness, and upon the third day, and after a few hours, suffered an attack of cerebral hemorrhage after doing but very little work, and appearing to be ill at ease all of the time.

In Stombaugh v. Peerless Wire Fence Co. (1917) 198 Mich. 445, 164 N. W. 537, where there was evidence that an employee had heart disease so that an exertion might cause a rupture, it was held that a bursting of the wall of an auricle was not an accidental injury, it appearing that it occurred while he was lifting heavy rolls in the ordinary course of his work.

STATE OF WISCONSIN EX REL. DAVID ATWOOD v.

HENRY JOHNSON, State Treasurer, et al.

Wisconsin Supreme Court — November 17, 1910.

(— Wis. —, 175 N. W. 589.)

Constitutional law — power of states to grant bonus to soldiers.

1. The power conferred upon Congress by the Federal Constitution over the Army and Navy, and the act of Congress in pursuance thereof, do not preclude states from raising by taxation a bonus for soldiers who entered the Federal Army from the states, to protect the people from a common disaster.
7 A.L.R.—102.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1636.]

Tax — public purpose — granting of bonus to soldiers.

2. The granting of a bonus to soldiers entering the Great War, from a state, as an appreciation of the character and spirit of their patriotic service and to perpetuate such appreciation as a part of the history of the state, is a public purpose for which the power of taxation may be exercised.

[See 26 R. C. L. 47, 68.]

Constitutional law — effect of practical construction.

3. Long-continued practice of the legislature in raising money by taxation for particular purposes is of great weight on the question of the validity of legislation exercising the power of taxation for a similar purpose.

[See 6 R. C. L. 63, 64.]

— powers of states.

4. Powers not expressly or by necessary implication granted by the Constitution to the Federal government, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states, or to the people.

[See 6 R. C. L. 134 et seq.]

— military policies of states.

5. The states have reserved to themselves, under the Federal Constitution, certain military policies.

— power of states to legislate.

6. In matters of concurrent jurisdiction between the Federal government and the states, the states have the right to legislate where such legislation is not in conflict with the act of Congress.

[See 6 R. C. L. 139, 140.]

Conflict of laws — state and Federal statutes.

7. Statutes of Congress and a state are in conflict when, if one obeys the state law he incurs the penalty of the Federal law, and if he obeys the Federal law he incurs the penalty of the state law.

[See 6 R. C. L. 140:]

Tax — bonus for soldiers — special legislation.

8. A tax at uniform rate upon all taxable property in the state to provide a bonus for soldiers is not objectionable as special legislation, or as violating the provision for equal protection of the laws.

Constitutional law — special legislation — surtax on incomes to raise bonus for soldiers.

9. Imposing a surtax upon incomes of a particular year to raise a bonus for soldiers is not invalid as special legislation.

Tax — income — uniformity.

10. The uniformity clause of the Constitution does not apply to income taxes.

[See 26 R. C. L. 142, 143.]

— classification of income tax.

11. Classification may be upheld under the Income Tax Law if there is no discrimination in favor of one as against another of the same class, and the methods of assessment and collection of taxes are not inconsistent with natural justice.

Courts — power over Tax Law.

12. Unless the court can say that exemptions granted in an Income Tax Law are manifestly unjust, arbitrary, or whimsical, it cannot interfere with the tax merely because it might have reached a different conclusion as to the policy or wisdom of the law.

— income — difference in exemptions.

13. That exemptions in one class are different from those in another is no valid objection to an Income Tax Law, if there is a proper classification.

— discrimination between corporations and individuals.

14. An exemption of $4,000 of income to individuals while allowing only $1,000 to corporations, in an Income Tax Law, does not make the exemption arbitrary or whimsical so as to invalidate the statute.

[See 26 R. C. L. 183.]

— refusal to permit offset of personal property.

15. That an offset of the value of personal property allowed by the general Income Tax Law is not permitted in a provision for a surtax to raise a bonus for soldiers does not render the statute discriminatory.

— deduction of percentage of capital — effect on foreign corporations.

16. No discrimination in favor of foreign corporations is effected by permitting a deduction of 6 per cent of capital stock and surplus before assessing an income tax, if the basis of deduction is the property out of which the income is earned.

Legislation — delegation of power — authority to issue bonds.

17. Permission granted to counties to issue bonds to meet a tax levied by the state is not an unlawful delegation of legislative power.

— conferring ministerial duties on board.

18. The investing by the legislature of a board with merely ministerial duties is not a delegation of legislative power.

[See 6 R. C. L. 179.]

Secretary of state — interference with constitutional powers as auditor.

19. Conferring upon a board control of payments of soldiers' bonuses, with authority to adopt rules for the distribution of the funds and the ascertainment and selection of proper beneficiaries, is not a violation of the constitutional provision making the secretary of state auditor.

Legislature — power to refer statute to people.

20. The legislature may make the taking effect of a law dependent upon a vote of the people.

ON DEMURRER to a complaint by the state on relation of David Atwood, in an action in the Supreme Court, to test the constitutionality of an act known as the Soldiers' Bonus Act. Demurrer sustained and action dismissed.

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

This action was originally brought in this court to test the constitutionality of chapter 667, Laws 1919, known as the Soldiers' Bonus Act, and, if found unconstitutional, to restrain the enforcement of the act. The attorney general declined to commence the action, and upon application the court granted leave to the relator here to institute the action in the name and behalf of the state. The defendants are charged with the administration and enforcement of the act.

The complaint is as follows:

"Now comes the plaintiff in the above-entitled cause, pursuant to leave of said honorable court, and for a complaint against the above-named defendants respectfully shows to the court:

"I. At its last session the legislature of the state adopted an act which is numbered and known as chapter 667, Laws 1919. The act was approved on July 30, 1919, and, at a special election held on September 2, 1919, a majority of the electors of the state voted in the affirmative upon the question embraced in § 9 of the act. Pursuant to § 1 of the act, the governor of the state has appointed W. F. Lorenz as one of the members of the service recognition board, which board has been organized pursuant to the act, and consists of Emanuel L. Philipp, governor, Orlanda Holway, adjutant general, and W. F. Lorenz. Substantial doubt and controversy have arisen as to the validity of said act and as to the right of the service recognition board, the Tax Commission of Wisconsin (now Nils P. Haugen, Thomas E. Lyons, and Carrol Atwood), the secretary of state (now Merlin Hull), and the state treasurer (now Henry Johnson), to estimate, determine, assess, or collect the taxes provided for by the act, to certify or audit for payment or make any payments thereunder, or otherwise to proceed with the administration or execution of the act.

"II. Plaintiff is advised and believes that the act is subject to the following, among other, infirmities affecting its constitutionality, and that by reason thereof it is not a valid law:

"(1) The act provides for the assessment and collection of taxes and the expenditure of the funds thereby collected for other than the estimated expenses of the state, and for purposes which are not public, thereby violating the provisions of §§ 2 and 5 of article 8 of the Wisconsin Constitution and of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, and transcending the limitation, inherent in constitutional taxation, that taxes may only be levied and collected for public purposes.

"(2) The act violates the provision of § 3 of article 8 of the Constitution, which inhibits the giving or loaning of the credit of the state in aid of any individual.

"(3) The act provides for extraordinary expenditures not within the purview of the expenses which the legislature is, by § 5 of article 8 of the Constitution, authorized to provide for by current taxation.

"(4) The act provides for the payment, from moneys raised by taxation, of what is designated by the legislature as a 'bonus' to Wisconsin soldiers, sailors, marines, and nurses who served in the armed forces of the United States. Such forces were the forces of the United States, and not of the state. The Congress of the United States, pursuant to the exclusive power vested in it by § 8 of article 1 of the Federal Constitution, has by numerous laws made provision for compensating its armed forces during their service, for allotments to their families, for additional compensation to them or their dependents in case of disability or death, for vocational training of those disabled, for insurance in case of disability or death, and for the payment of a bonus upon discharge from service. The granting of benefits such as those provided for in said act is a matter of Federal power exclusively, and the exercise of such power by the Congress has excluded its exercise by the state, even though the purpose were otherwise public.

"(5) The benefits provided for by the act are declared to be given as a token of appreciation of the character and spirit of the patriotic service of soldiers, sailors, marines, and nurses who served in the armed forces of the United States during the war with Germany and Austria. The amount of benefits is largely governed by time of service. They are payable only to those of the classes named who were residents of Wisconsin at the time of induction into service. Benefits are payable irrespective of manner of induction or character of service or discharge. Such classification and limitation of beneficiaries is not germane to the consideration of appreciation or gratitude which is the expressed purpose and object of the act. The act, therefore, denies the equality before the law which is guaranteed by §§ 1, 9, and 22 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state, and by § 2 of article 4 and the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

"(6) The act provides for the assessment and collection of a surtax upon incomes, and for the assessment and collection by property taxation of a special tax, not exceeding 3 mills, and it is left to the estimate and determination of the service recognition board as to the amount, within prescribed limits, to be paid to the beneficiaries, and as to the amount, within the limit of 3 mills, to be raised by property taxation, thereby unlawfully delegating legislative power and violating the provisions of §§ 2 and 5 of article 8 of the Constitution of the state.

"(7) The act provides for the levy and collection of a property tax (the rate not to exceed 3 mills) only if and in so far as the prescribed surtax upon incomes may be insufficient to meet the expenditures provided for by the act. The exemptions from income taxes to be collected for the special and extraordinary purposes of the act are different from the exemptions allowed by law in the assessment of income taxes for other and general purposes. The surtax is laid upon a particular class of taxpayers. The act thus constitutes special legislation for the levy and collection of taxes, makes the burdens of taxation and the amount of exemption therefrom dependent on the purpose to which the moneys raised are to be applied, and, for the special purposes of the act, discriminates against particular classes of taxpayers. This violates § 31 of article 4 of the state Constitution, prohibiting special legislation for the assessment or collection of taxes, the rule of uniformity prescribed by § 1 of article 8 of the state Constitution, and the equality and justice guaranteed by §§ 1, 9, and 22 of article 1 of the state Constitution, and by the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, and is violative of the inherent principles of constitutional taxation and government.

"(8) The property taxes provided for by the act are to be levied for the current year. The surtax is retroactively laid upon incomes for the year 1918. In arriving at the surtax a large deduction is allowed to corporations and their stockholders which is not allowed to partnerships or other individuals, thereby violating the rule of uniformity prescribed by § 1 of article 8 of the Constitution of the state, and denying the equality before the law guaranteed by §§ 1, 9, and 22 of article 1 of the state Constitution, and by the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"(9) The provisions of §§ 3 and 4 of the act are in violation of § 2 of article 6 of the Constitution of the state, providing that the secretary of the state shall be ex officio auditor, and invest in such board discretionary powers which the legislature is without power to delegate.

"(10) The act makes the levy of taxes to meet the expenditures provided for dependent upon a majority vote of the electors, thereby unlawfully delegating a power which resides exclusively in the legislature, and contravening the provisions of §§ 2 and 5 of article 8 of the Constitution of the state.

"III. Many of the soldiers and sailors who served with the armed forces of the United States during the war with Germany and Austria have not yet been discharged, but are still serving as a part of the Army and Navy of the United States, and are receiving the compensation and benefits provided by acts of Congress, and are subject to the control and discipline provided by Federal laws and regulations.

"As plaintiff is informed and believes, many of the states of the Union have not adopted laws giving a bonus, gratuity, or other aid to residents of the state who served with the armed forces of the United States during said war.

"The government of the United States is now actively seeking to recruit by voluntary enlistment the Navy and Marine Corps, and measures are in contemplation looking to an increase in like manner of the Army of the United States, and that such voluntary enlistments are being sought in the states which have not adopted laws giving a bonus, gratuity, or other aid to their residents who served in said war, as well as in this state.

"As plaintiff is informed and believes, various measures have been introduced and are pending in Congress having for their object the granting of benefits (additional to those already provided by Congress) to those who served in the armed forces of the United States during said war. Among them is a bill providing for a bonus similar to that provided for by said chapter 667.

"Among the residents of Wisconsin who served in the armed forces of the United States during said war there exists, as is judicially known to the court, differences as regards methods of induction into and discharge from service, time, place, and character of service, effect of service upon health, strength, and ability to earn, financial needs, and as regards other circumstances and conditions. There also exist differences between the character and extent of the service of the military units which composed the armed forces of the United States, which units were not generally made up of the residents of any particular state to the exclusion of the residents of other states, and some of which units composed wholly or in part of residents of other states, had the opportunity to perform and did perform military service conspicuous for its valor and its effect in accelerating the armistice. Some or all of the above and other facts which the court may judicially notice will be referred to upon the hearing hereof.

"IV. The officials constituting the defendants herein are proceeding to the administration and execution of said act as though it were a valid law. Unless restrained by the court, vast sums of money, probably aggregating upwards of $15,000,000, will be collected by taxation and expended in the administration and execution of the provisions of the act. The making of estimates as to the amount to be raised by income taxation, and the amount to be levied by direct taxation is already in process, and the validity or invalidity of the act vitally affects the levy and collection of taxes for the current year throughout the state. Should taxes be levied or expenditures be made under the provisions of the act, and should the act remain in operation for several months, during which taxes were collected and their proceeds disbursed, and then be attacked and held unconstitutional, there would be involved questions as to the duties of state officials with respect to the recovery back of funds expended under the law, of the liability of the state treasurer for the making of such expenditures, of the obligation of accounting and reimbursement by the state for taxes unlawfully levied and collected, and infinite confusion would result. Upon request duly made to the attorney general of the state, he refused, and still refuses, to commence or maintain upon his own motion any action to test the validity of said act.

"V. Relator is a citizen of Wisconsin and a resident of and taxpayer in the city of Janesville, in said state.

"Wherefore, plaintiff respectfully prays the judgment of this court:

"(1) That the validity of chapter 667, Laws of 1919, be determined, and the rights and duties of those charged with its administration be declared.

"(2) That, in case chapter 667, Laws of 1919, be held invalid, its enforcement be restrained.

"(3) That such order and further relief be granted as may be proper."

Mr. Harry L. Butler for plaintiff.

Messrs. John J. Blaine, Attorney General, and M. B. Olbrich for defendants.

Messrs. Crownhart & Wylie for certain soldiers.

Mr. Roy P. Wilcox, amicus curiæ.

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The many difficult and doubtful questions arising upon the validity of the act under consideration in this case, as well as the proper construction and administration of it, if the law be declared valid, rendered it highly important and eminently proper that the present suit be brought for the purpose of finally settling the questions involved.

The able and exhaustive presentation of the case in this court on both sides makes clear the importance of final determination of the issues tendered by the complaint and demurrer.

The defendants, charged with the administration of the law, are entitled to have the question of its validity settled, and, if valid, be advised respecting their rights and duties under it.

The act provides:

"Section 1. Section 1 of chapter 452 of the Laws of 1919 is amended to read: Chapter 452, Laws of 1919. Section 1. The service recognition board is hereby created to consist of the governor, the adjutant general and . . . a returned soldier to be appointed by the governor.

"Sec. 2. For the purpose of raising a sum sufficient to assure each soldier, sailor, marine, and nurse, including Red Cross nurses, who served in the armed forces of the United States during the war against Germany and Austria, and who at the time of his or her induction into the service was a resident of Wisconsin, a sum not exceeding ten dollars for each month of service, with a minimum of fifty dollars, as a token of appreciation of the character and spirit of their patriotic service, and to perpetuate such appreciation as a part of the history of Wisconsin, a tax of not exceeding three mills on each dollar of the assessed valuation in addition to the income surtax hereinafter mentioned is hereby levied and authorized to be included in the next tax levy: Provided that in case any county shall elect by resolution of the county board of such county, adopted prior to the levy of such tax, to raise said amount by a bond issue, authority is hereby conferred upon said county to issue such bonds and thereupon the proper authorities shall remit said levy in such county. If any person entitled to the benefits under this act be deceased before receiving such payment, then the payment accruing to said deceased shall be paid to the surviving widow, child or children, mother or dependent father, in the order herein stated, and in such case July 1, 1919, shall be deemed the date of termination of such service. The benefit of this act shall not accrue to any person for the time spent while taking training in any student army training camp, nor to any person who, although inducted into service, did civilian work at civilian pay.

"Sec. 3. All sums levied and collected by taxation or raised by the issue of bonds by any county shall be paid into the state treasury and held there as a special fund to be known as the service recognition fund and disbursed upon certificates of the service recognition board, as to the persons entitled thereto and the amount to which each person is entitled.

"Sec. 4. The service recognition board shall have complete charge and control of the general scheme of such payments. It shall adopt general rules, uniform throughout the state, for the distribution of said fund, the ascertainment and selection of proper beneficiaries and the amounts to which beneficiaries are entitled, and for procedure, and may select or create such agents as it may deem necessary.

"Sec. 5. Subsection (5) of § 658 of the statutes is renumbered to be subsection (6) thereof.

"Sec. 6. There is added to § 658 of the statutes a new subsection to read: Sec. 658. (5) For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of chapter 452 of the Laws of 1919; but bonds issued in any county for such purpose shall not exceed in amount three mills on each dollar of the total assessed valuation of such county."

Subsection 1 of § 7 provides for a surtax in addition to the normal tax imposed by § 1087m6, Stat., to be laid upon the taxable incomes of individuals, except as otherwise provided by law, in excess of \$3,000, the surtax rate starting with  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent on the fourth \$1,000, and progressively increased until it reaches 6 per cent of \$12,000 or more of taxable incomes.

Subsection 2 of § 7 provides for a surtax in addition to the normal tax imposed by § 1087m6, Stat., upon the incomes of corporations, joint-stock companies, or associations, except as otherwise provided by law, beginning with 2 per cent on the first $1,000, and progressively increasing until it reaches 6 per cent of taxable incomes in excess of $7,000.

Section 7 further provides:

"(3) In computing the tax upon the income of corporations, joint stock companies or associations, there shall be deducted, before such tax is computed, from the net income an amount equal to six per cent of its capital stock, surplus and undivided profits.

"(4) The surtax provided for herein shall be upon the income received during the year ending December 31, 1918, and shall be returned, assessed and collected in the same manner and at the same time as is provided for the return, assessment and payment of the normal income tax provided for under §§ 1087m1 to 1087m30, both inclusive, except as otherwise herein provided.

"(5) Deductions and exemptions as are provided by law in the assessment of the normal income tax under § 1087m6 shall be the same with respect to the assessment of this surtax, but said deductions and exemptions shall not be additional thereto and shall only be made once.

"(6) In the collection of said surtax the tax collector shall give his separate receipt therefor and there shall be no offset upon the personal property tax, and § 1087m26 shall not apply to said surtax.

"(7) The whole amount collected as surtax shall, through the same channels as other income taxes are paid, be paid into the state treasury, and § 1087m23 of the statutes shall not apply to said surtax. The amount so paid into the state treasury shall be set apart for the service recognition fund.

"(8) The service recognition board shall estimate or cause to be estimated the amount which may be collected under this section and determine as nearly as practicable the balance needed for said fund, which balance shall be raised by taxation or bond issues as provided by § 2 of this act.

"Sec. 8. There is appropriated from the service recognition fund in the state treasury to the service recognition board:

"(1) Such sums as may be necessary to pay each soldier, sailor, marine and nurse, including Red Cross nurses, who served in the armed forces of the United States during the war against Germany and Austria, and who at the time of his or her induction into the service was a resident of Wisconsin, a sum not exceeding ten dollars for each month of service, with a minimum of fifty dollars.

"(2) Such sums as may be necessary to cover the cost of administering this act."

Sections 9, 10, and 11 provide for a special election.

The important questions raised by counsel for the relator are: (1) Is the purpose of the act public within the meaning of the Constitution? (2) Does the power of Congress under the Federal Constitution to raise and support armies, and to provide and maintain a navy, exclude state legislation such as here involved? (3) Is the taxing scheme embodied in the act constitutional? (4) Does the act unlawfully delegate the taxing power of the legislature? (5) Does the law in question violate § 2, art. 6, of the Wisconsin Constitution, providing that the secretary of state shall be ex officio auditor?

I. The learned counsel for the relator contends that the money appropriated under the act in question is not for a public purpose, and does not subserve the common interest and well-being of the people of the state; that, where there is no public purpose in the sense of carrying on some part of the machinery of government, there is no power to tax; that, where the public benefit which may come from an exercise of the taxing power is merely incidental or remote, the power is lacking; that there can be no legitimate taxation unless for the uses of the government levying the tax.

These propositions are ably argued by counsel for relator, and it is true that they are among the important questions involved under this head. It may be conceded that the purpose of the law must in some sense be a public purpose in order to justify the exercise of the taxing power. Under the act, the money appropriated is awarded "as a token of appreciation of the character and spirit of their patriotic service, and to perpetuate such appreciation as a part of the history of Wisconsin."

It is insisted that the services performed were performed for the United States, not for the state of Wisconsin, that the beneficiaries did not enter nor remain in the service at the instance of the state, but of the United States, and that there is no reciprocal benefit such as lies at the foundation of constitutional taxation.

However, the benefit which flows to the United States from the services performed is also a benefit to the state. The United States is composed of the family of states which in the aggregate constitute the United States. The common defense by the nation can only be successfully maintained by co-operation of the states; hence, when a war is waged by the nation, those supporting it are performing service as well for their respective states as for the nation. Brodhead v. Milwaukee, 19 Wis. 624, 88 Am. Dec. 711. In the above case, at page 652 of 19 Wis., it is said: "I think the consideration of gratitude alone to

Tax—public purpose—granting of bonus to soldiers.

the soldier for his services, be he volunteer, substitute, or drafted man, will sustain a tax for bounty money to be paid to him or his family. Certainly no stronger consideration of gratitude can possibly exist than that which arises from the hardships, privations, and dangers which attend the citizen in the military service of his country; and all nations have ever so regarded it. Who will say that the legislature may not, in consideration of such services, either directly or indirectly, or through the agency of the municipality or district to which he is credited, give to the soldier or his family a suitable bounty after his enlistment, or even after his term of service has expired? I certainly cannot."

Even in the dissenting opinion in the above case, this doctrine was recognized. At page 665 of 19 Wis., Justice Downer, dissenting, says: "Is the raising of money to pay bounties to volunteers who shall enlist in the service of the United States a public purpose? The whole United States had an interest in putting down the Rebellion. To put it down was a public benefit, a benefit to the Union, a benefit to each state, a benefit to every town, city, and village. Here, then, is a public interest or benefit, in the largest sense of the term. It is sufficient to authorize a state to tax its citizens, or the United States to tax all their citizens."

This court has recognized the doctrine of the Brodhead Case in several subsequent cases, among others: Curtis v. Whipple, 24 Wis. 350, 355, 1 Am. Rep. 187; State ex rel. McCurdy v. Tappan, 29 Wis. 664, 672, 9 Am. Rep. 622; Lafebre v. Superior Bd. of Edu. 81 Wis. 660, 667, 51 N. W. 952; Lund v. Chippewa County, 93 Wis. 640, 650, 34 L.R.A. 131, 67 N. W. 927; State ex rel. Garrett v. Froehlich, 118 Wis. 129, 142, 61 L.R.A. 345, 99 Am. St. Rep. 985, 94 N. W. 50.

While there is language in some of the decisions of this court since the Brodhead Case was decided, which in the abstract might seem out of harmony with the rule of that case, we feel warranted in saying that the doctrine enunciated there has never been overruled by this court. The Brodhead Case has been approved in other jurisdictions. The following are a few of the many cases on the subject: Cass Twp. v. Dillon, 16 Ohio St. 38; Speer v. Blairsville, 50 Pa. 150; Coffman v. Keightley, 24 Ind. 509; Veazie v. China, 50 Me. 518; State v. Holm, 139 Minn. 267, L.R.A. 1918C, 304, 166 N. W. 181; People ex rel. Doscher v. Sisson, 180 App. Div. 464, 167 N. Y. Supp. 801; State v. McClure, — Del. —, 105 Atl. 712; State ex rel. Campbell v. Stewart, 54 Mont. 504, 171 Pac. 755, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 1101; State ex rel. Morris v. Handlin, 38 S. D. 550, 162 N. W. 379; Leavenworth County v. Miller, 7 Kan. 479, 12 Am. Rep. 425; Opinion of Justices, 175 Mass. 599, 49 L.R.A. 564, 57 N. E. 675; Opinion of Justices, 190 Mass. 611, 77 N. E. 820; United States v. Gettysburg Electric R. Co. 160 U. S. 668, 40 L. ed. 576, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427; Judson, Taxn. 2d ed. § 386.

In Judson on Taxation, supra, at page 407, it is said: "Whatever legitimately tends to inspire patriotic sentiments, and to enhance the respect of citizens for the institutions of their country, and incites them to contribute to its defense in time of war, has been held to be a lawful public purpose, such as will justify the exercise either of the power of taxation or of the power of eminent domain."

The doctrine is well stated in State ex rel. Morris v. Handlin, 38 S. D. 555, 162 N. W. 380: "Looking at the substance and general spirit of the situation, we are of the view that any assault upon the government of the United States by insurrection or invasion is also an assault against each and every state government in the Union, and that it is equally the duty of the state to assist in repelling such assaults.

"The services performed while under the draft were public and rendered in part for the benefit of this state as one of the states of the nation. It would seem from a reading of the state and Federal Constitutions that the interests and duties on the part of the state and nation in relation to the common defense, in resisting threatened invasion or insurrection, are so inseparably wound and woven together that it would make but little difference, if any, whether the members of the military organization which were to receive the benefit of the appropriation were state or national."

And in Opinion of Justices, 190 Mass. 611, 77 N. E. 820, supra, it is said: "The doubt which arises as to the rights of the states of this country in this respect grows out of our dual system of government. The Federal government alone has power to declare war, and our soldiers in the Civil War were in the military service of the United States. So far as we have been informed, since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, none of the states has assumed to grant pensions to soldiers for service in the armies of the United States. For such purposes it is generally understood that our government is the Federal government; but for many purposes, and in a certain field, Massachusetts is a sovereign state, maintaining an independent government. In another relation, it is a member of the family of states, and a constituent force in the national organization. We are inclined to the opinion that in this relation it is so identified with the nation that it may treat the services of its citizens who serve to its credit in the armies of the United States as entitled to recognition from Massachusetts as a sovereign state. Each of us is a citizen of Massachusetts, as well as a citizen of the United States. Massachusetts may honor her citizens for what they do for the national government in those fields to which she sends them, as her representatives under the Constitution and laws of the United States."

The gratitude due the soldier is no idle sentiment. He who leaves his home and kindred, enters upon the trials and hardships of a soldier, risks his life upon the battlefield for the good of his country, is certainly entitled to the gratitude of all citizens.

There is another question which is important in considering the public purpose of the law. The assertion of power for a long period of time on the part of the state in adopting legislation similar to that here involved, while perhaps not controlling, is entitled to great weight on the question of public purpose. The state of Wisconsin from early times has passed statutes awarding money by taxation for purposes not more public than the purpose involved in the act under consideration. A long line of legislative enactments of the state of Wisconsin as well as similar legislative enactments in other states are collected in the briefs of counsel for the defendants, which show that not only the state of Wisconsin, but other states, have regarded such or similar purposes as that here involved, public. Such affirmance on the part of the legislatures, and continued custom amounting to practical construction of constitutional provisions, has great weight on the question of validity of the legislation, as appears from decisions not only of this state, but of the United States Supreme Court. State ex rel. Hudd v. Timme, 54 Wis. 318, 11 N. W. 785; Nunnemacher v. State, 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 Ann. Cas. 711; Citizens' Sav. & L. Asso. v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655, 22 L. ed. 455. In the latter case the court said: "They must be governed mainly by the course and usage of the government, the objects for which taxes have been customarily and by long course of legislation levied, what objects or purposes have been considered necessary to the support and for the proper use of the government, whether state or municipal. Whatever lawfully pertains to this, and is sanctioned by time and the acquiescence of the people, may well be held to belong to the public use, and proper for the maintenance of good government, though this may not be the only criterion of rightful taxation."

We have in the instant case not only this assertion of power on the part of the legislature, and long-continued custom, but we also have the overwhelming vote of the people at a special election held for the purpose of ratifying the levy of the tax. A review of the numerous statutes referred to in the briefs will show how liberal our legislature has been in making provisions in aid of soldiers of the Civil War.

We feel warranted in holding upon principle and authority that the purpose of the act is a public purpose within the meaning of the Constitution.

II. It is further insisted by counsel for relator that the power of Congress under the Federal Constitution to raise and support armies, and to provide and maintain a navy, excludes state legislation such as is involved in the instant case.

This contention is based upon § 8, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides:

"The Congress shall have power:

- "(11) To declare war; . . .
- "(12) To raise and support armies; . . .
- "(13) To provide and maintain a navy;
- "(14) To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces;
- "(15) To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions;
- "(16) To provide for organizing, arming and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the states respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress; . . .

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Section 10 of article 1 of the United States Constitution provides that "(3) no state shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops, or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay."

Article 6 of the Constitution of the United States provides: "(2) This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

The following cases are cited in support of relator's position under this head: 12 C. J. 744; Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122, 193, 4 L. ed. 529, 548; Tarble Case, 13 Wall. 397, 405, 20 L. ed. 597, 600; Chinese Exclusion Case, 130 U. S. 581, 604, 605, 32 L. ed. 1068, 1075, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 623; Selective Draft Law Cases (Arver v. United States) 245 U. S. 366, 381, 62 L. ed. 349, 354, L.R.A.1918C, 361, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 856; Ferguson v. Landram, 1 Bush, 548, 562; People ex rel. Barlow v. Curtis, 50 N. Y. 321, 326-328, 10 Am. Rep. 483; Konkel v. State, 168 Wis. 335, 339, 340, 170 N. W. 715.

In considering the arguments of counsel and cases, it may be well to refer to some general provisions involving the relative powers of the state and Federal government. It must be borne in mind that the Federal government under the Constitution has only delegated powers, and powers not delegated to it or prohibited to the states are reserved to the states or to the people of the several states. It follows, therefore, that powers not expressly or by necessary implication granted by the Constitution to the Federal government, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people. United States Constitution, art. 10 of Amendments.

The objection raised by counsel under this head was urged in the Brodhead Case, 19 Wis. 624, 88 Am. Dec. 711, and disposed of as follows: "Still another objection is that the whole power of levying troops, organizing armies, fixing compensation, paying bounties, etc., resides in Congress, and that the states can take no action in the matter. This objection was urged and fully met in the Pennsylvania decision. If Congress has the power and may legislate to the entire exclusion of the states, which is very doubtful so far as state aid to the persons and families of volunteers or drafted men is concerned, still Congress has not done so."

It is clear that Wisconsin has reserved to itself a certain military policy not inconsistent with that granted to the Federal government under the United States Constitution. Under the Wisconsin Constitution the legislature "shall determine what persons shall constitute the militia of the state, and may provide for organizing and disciplining the same in such manner as shall be prescribed by law." Article 4, § 29. "The governor shall be commander in chief of the military and naval forces of the state." Article 5, § 4. "The legislature may also borrow money to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or defend the state in time of war. . . ." Article 8, § 7. "The military shall be in strict subordination to the civil power." Article 1, § 20.

Amendments, Federal Constitution, art. 2, provides: "A well-regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

It is clear, therefore, under the Federal Constitution as well as under our state Constitution, that certain military policy is reserved to the state. See Wis. Stat. 1917, §§ 21.01 to 21.68, and 22.01 to 22.08, and U. S. Comp. Stat. § 3041.

The case of New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. 102, 9 L. ed. 648, involved the power given to Congress under the Federal Constitution to regulate commerce. Under a statute of the state of New York imposing penalties for failure by the master or commander of a ship to make report, it was held that the statute was valid, and that the power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution was not exclusive. At page 139 of 11 Pet. the court said: "That a state has the same undeniable and unlimited jurisdiction over all persons and things within its territorial limits as any foreign nation, where that jurisdiction is not surrendered or restrained by the Constitution of the United States; that, by virtue of this, it is not only the right, but the bounden and solemn duty, of a state to advance the safety, happiness, and prosperity of its people, and to provide for its general welfare, by any and every act of legislation which it may deem to be conducive to these ends, where the power over the particular subject, or the manner of its exercise, is not surrendered or restrained in the manner just stated."

—powers of states.

It may be conceded for the purpose of this case that the power to raise and support an Army and a Navy rests with Congress, and that the states are precluded from adopting laws which may obstruct or embarrass such exercise of power. But the Soldiers' Bonus Law under consideration, does not interfere with the exercise of the power to raise and support an army. Justice Cooley, in his work on Taxation (page 217), lays down the rule as follows: "The general government having authority to declare war and conduct warlike operations, no question can exist of its right to levy taxes in order to pay bounties for military services performed or promised. The several states may with as little question do the same."

In matters of concurrent jurisdiction between the Federal government and the states, the state has the right to legislate where such legislation is not in conflict with the act of Congress. Bosworth v. Harp, 154 Ky. 559, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 692, 157 S. W. 1084, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 277; State v. Holm, 139 Minn. 267, L.R.A.1918C, 304, 166 N. W. 181. This rule is recognized and asserted in Konkel v. State, 168 Wis. 335, 170 N. W. 715. At page 341 of 168 Wis., it is said: "The United States and the states have a concurrent right in respect to the subject-matter here under consideration. The question then arises whether or not there is a conflict between chapter 409 and the Soldiers & Sailors' Civil Relief Act [Act March 8, 1918, chap. 20, 40 Stat. at L. 440, Comp. Stat. 1918, §§ 3078½a-3078½ss, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, pp. 812-825]. If there be a conflict, the act of Congress, by paragraph 2, art. 6, of the Federal Constitution, is made the supreme law of the land."

Now, it is clear from the decisions of this court, including the Brodhead Case, as well as numerous decisions in other courts, that there is no conflict between the legislation here under consideration <sup>—power of states to grant bonus to soldiers.</sup> and the Constitution of the United States and laws passed in pursuance thereof. It is true, as stated in Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122, 4 L. ed. 529, relied upon by counsel for relator, that "whenever the terms in which a power is granted to Congress, or the nature of the power, requires that it should be exercised exclusively by Congress, the subject is as completely taken from the state legislatures as if they had been expressly forbidden to act on it."

The above rule, when applied to the particular facts of the case, is a correct statement of the law, and is as strong authority in favor of the relator's position as any cited by counsel. The point involved in the Crowninshield Case is briefly stated in the syllabus at page 122 of 4 Wheat., as follows: "Since the adoption of the Constitution of the United States a state has authority to pass a bankrupt law, provided such law does not impair the obligation of contracts, within the meaning of the Constitution, art. 1, § 10, and provided there be no act of Congress in force to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, conflicting with such law."

At page 340, Konkel v. State, 168 Wis. 335, this court said: "In certain cases it is held, where the United States and the state have concurrent powers, that the exercise of the power of the United States is exclusive, and the enactment of the state must stand aside. Sturges v. Crowninshield, supra. In certain other cases it is held that the enactments of both the United States and the state may stand together if there is in fact no conflict. Asbell v. Kansas, 209 U. S. 251, 52 L. ed. 778, 14 Ann. Cas. 1101, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485; Savage v. Jones, 225 U. S. 501, 56 L. ed. 1182, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 715. In a particular case classification is often difficult, and the decisions of the Federal as well as of the state courts are not always consistent."

Counsel for the relator have brought to the attention of the court numerous acts of Congress respecting Federal military regulations. We do not feel warranted in discussing at length such legislation; it is sufficient to say that in our opinion there is nothing in the Soldiers' Bonus Law of Wisconsin conflicting with the Federal legislation. The Federal acts relied upon have reference primarily to the status of the soldier, as such, while engaged in the service of the United States. Konkel v. State, supra.

The Soldiers' Bonus Law, based as it is upon the interest of the state in the successful prosecution of the war, and "as a token of appreciation of the character and spirit of their patriotic service, and to perpetuate such appreciation as a part of the history of Wisconsin," does not burden or interfere or conflict with the several Federal acts to which counsel refer.

As pointed out in Southern R. Co. v. Reid, 222 U. S. 424, 56 L. ed. 257, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140, acts of Congress and state laws are in conflict when, if one obeys the state law, he incurs the penalties of the Federal law, and, if he obey the Federal law, he incurs the penalties of the state law. As stated in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Haber, 169 U. S. 613, 42 L. ed. 878, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 488: "A [state] statute enacted in execution of a reserved power of the state is not to be regarded as inconsistent with an act of Congress passed in the execution of a clear power under the [Federal] Constitution, unless the repugnance or conflict is so direct and positive that the two acts cannot be reconciled or stand together."

Without further discussion, we are satisfied that the power of Congress under the Federal Constitution to raise and support armies and to provide and maintain a navy does not exclude state legislation such as that here involved.

III. It is further urged by counsel for relator that the taxing scheme embodied in the act is unconstitutional. This contention is based upon the idea that the law is in conflict with constitutional provisions respecting special legislation, uniformity, equal distribution of burdens, and equal protection of the law; that the surtax provisions of the act in question, constitute special and class legislation. The material points raised under this head are:

Tax—bonus for soldiers—special legislation.

(a) The law is special and prohibited by § 31, art. 4, of the Constitution and § 1 of article 8, which provides that the rule of taxation shall be uniform.

(b) That the special character and inequality of the act as applied to the different forms of taxation is obnoxious to constitutional provisions, because there is no basis for the inequality of burden.

(c) That the surtax provision of the act constitutes special and class legislation.

(1) That it is imposed upon a selected class of 1918 incomes.

(2) That exemptions are unequal and unreasonable.

(3) The provisions with reference to exemptions of personal property are unequal and unreasonable, this provision is claimed discriminatory, not only as between individuals, but as to corporations.

(4) That there is also a lack of uniformity and equality between railroads and others taxed on ad valorem basis.

No time need be spent in discussing the tax imposed not exceeding 3 mills on the dollar upon the taxable property of the state. This provision is included in an amendment to the statute, and provides for a general tax upon all property to meet the burden imposed by the law not covered by the surtax and is levied for a public purpose. The 3-mill tax, therefore, cannot be open to the objection of inequality of burden, special legislation, or want of equal protection of the law.

The principal attack made by relator, as we understand the argument, is upon the surtax. The surtax provision is in effect an amendment to the Income Tax Law by increasing the tax upon incomes. If the surtax be not open to objection under the law relating to income taxation, it must be held valid. The only uniformity required under the Income Tax Law is uniformity within the class. Income Tax Cases, 148 Wis. 456, L.R.A.1915B, 569, 134 N. W. 673, 135 N. W. 164, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1147.

The contention that the law is special and prohibited by § 31, art.

Constitutional law—special legislation—surtax on incomes to raise bonus for soldiers.

4, of the Constitution is without merit. Income Tax Cases, supra. Clearly, the objection cannot apply to the surtax if classification be proper and exemptions reasonable. The argument under this head may be considered under two propositions: (1) Classification; and (2) exemptions. It is said the classification is not valid because imposed upon a selected class of 1918 incomes; hence a closed class, with no opportunity for others to grow into the class. The legislature made no classification. It was confronted with the problem of having to raise a large sum of money for distribution as soon as practicable. To secure such sum it levied the same upon the basis of incomes of 1918, the tax upon which is payable in 1920, and upon the assessed value of real estate and personal property for the year 1919; the same being the resources of the next tax levy as specified in § 2 of the act. There was no more a classification here than there is in any case where an additional sum is added to the usual tax to be raised for any given years.

Under the decisions of this court since the passage of the Income Tax Law we have in this state two independent systems of taxation, namely, property tax and income tax, and, while the uniformity clause of the Constitution applies to property tax, it has no application to income tax. The amendment to the Constitution which is the basis of the income tax provides: "Taxes may also be imposed on incomes, privileges and occupations, which taxes may be graduated and progressive, and reasonable exemptions may be provided."

uniformity.

The proposition which confronted the legislature in the case at bar was to provide for an emergency tax and one which would expire within the time fixed for raising the funds. The legislature, therefore, provided for raising a part of the fund by a surtax or tax added to the normal income tax. So we must test this surtax by the same principles which apply to the original Income Tax Law.

The taxation of persons progressively under the Income Tax Law may be levied by the legislature and reasonable exemptions may be provided. Income Tax Cases, 148 Wis. at page 507. As said in that case: "It clearly appears that taxation of property and taxation of incomes are recognized as two separate and distinct things in the state Constitution; both may be levied . . . because the Constitution says so."

The court further said, at page 504 of 148 Wis.: "With the political or economic policy or expediency of the law we have nothing to do."

As has been repeatedly decided by this court, the legislature has a very broad discretion under the Income Tax Law, and as regards classification it is enough that there be no discrimination in favor of one as against another of the same class, and that the method of assessment and collection of tax is not inconsistent with natural justice. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Powers, 201 U. S. 245, 50 L. ed. 744, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 459; Income Tax Cases, supra; State ex rel. Bernhard Stern & Sons v. Bodden, 165 Wis. 75, 160 N. W. 1077; State ex rel. Manitowoc Gas Co. v. Wisconsin Tax Commission, 161 Wis. 114, 152 N. W. 848; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. State, 163 Wis. 489, 155 N. W. 609, 158 N. W. 328.

It is also insisted by counsel for relator that the exemptions are unequal and discriminatory in many respects, and particularly as between persons and corporations, and also as between corporations. There may have been within the mind of the legislature valid reasons for the exemptions made and which are complained of by the relator, and, unless we can say that the exemptions are manifestly unjust, arbitrary, or whimsical, courts have no power to interfere with the legislative enactment merely because the judicial mind might reach a different conclusion as to the policy or wisdom of the law. We must presume that in laying the tax under the law in question the legislature surveyed the whole field in determining upon a reasonable apportionment of tax burden. And the legislature had a right to take into account, in levying the burdens, who was best able to pay. Income Tax Cases, supra.

In regard to the broad discretion of the legislature we cannot do better than quote from Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. State, 128 Wis. 553, at page 642, 108 N. W. 581: "Under our Constitution, it must be remembered there is the amplest power on the part of the legislature to exempt an entire class of property from taxation, and to make such class very narrow, even excluding from the benefits accorded to the members thereof those owning property of the same general class, so long as the character of that owned by those of the subclass is so far different from that owned by others as, within the boundaries of reason at least, to suggest necessity or propriety, having regard to the public good and the constitutional object to be attained, and limitations in respect thereto of substantially different legislative treatment.

"The discretion of the legislature in this field is so broad that it is not competent for the court to mark the constitutional limitations of it, other than at the farthest one might go without transcending all reason."

What constitutes proper classification has been repeatedly considered by this court, and further discussion is unnecessary. State ex rel. Risch v. Policemen's Pension Fund, 121 Wis. 44, 54, 98 N. W. 954; Johnson v. Milwaukee, 88 Wis. 383, 390, 60 N. W. 270; Wagner v. Milwaukee County, 112 Wis. 601, 607, 88 N. W. 577; Bingham v. Milwaukee, 127 Wis. 344, 347, 106 N. W. 1071; Kiley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 138 Wis. 215, 119 N. W. 309, 120 N. W. 756, 21 Am. Neg. Rep. 394; Ladd v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 142 Wis. 165, 125 N. W. 468; Maercker v. Milwaukee, 151 Wis. 324, 328, L.R.A. 1915F, 1196, 139 N. W. 199, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 199. The classification here is in conformity with the rule of the foregoing decisions. Income Tax Cases, supra.

There is no discrimination within the class. The exemptions in each class apply to every member of the class, and it is no objection that the exemptions in one class are different from those in another where there is proper classification.

The fact that individuals pay on the first $4,000 of income, while corporations, joint stock companies, and associations pay on the first $1,000, does not make the exemption arbitrary or whimsical, because there may have been good grounds for such difference in the mind of the legislature, after a review of the whole field. The legislature obviously sought to make a fair distribution of burdens between the two classes by providing that corporations, joint stock companies, and associations should be allowed to deduct before the tax is computed, from net income, an amount equal to 6 per cent of its capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits. It is well settled that putting corporations in one class and individuals in another is proper classification. This is decided by this court in Income Tax Cases, 148 Wis. 458, L.R.A.1915B, 569, 134 N. W. 673, 135 N. W. 164, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1147, where it is held that there is a substantial difference in situations between individuals and corporations, which justifies the classification. A corporation is an artificial creation of the state, endowed with franchises and privileges of many kinds which the individual has not. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. State, 163 Wis. 484, 155 N. W. 609, 158 N. W. 328.

—income—difference in

Counsel makes the point that since the general law provides that the income taxpayers should be entitled to an offset to the extent of their personal property, and the present act denies the offset against the surtax levied for the particular purpose of the act, the present act is objectionable and discriminatory and a denial of due process. We do not regard this objection tenable. Such offset was sustained by this court in the Income Tax Cases, 148 Wis. 456, L.R.A.1915B, 569, 134 N. W. 673, 135 N. W. 164, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1147, and the same objections which are raised here could have been raised with equal force there. Moreover, what we have heretofore said we think sufficient on this subject.

—refusal to permit offset of personal property.

It is further insisted that the provision allowing corporations to deduct 6 per cent of their capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits, when applied to foreign corporations and companies who derive large incomes from Wisconsin business, though perhaps having but little capital invested in Wisconsin, is discriminatory, because it is applicable without exception or qualification to the income of corporations. A foreign corporation, therefore, although having a comparatively large income from Wisconsin business, with but a small part of its capital invested in Wisconsin, might, by deducting 6 per cent of its entire capital, surplus, and undivided profits, wipe out its entire surtax.

We do not decide whether the section as so construed would be discriminatory or not. We do not think the section should be so construed. Section 7 is in effect an amendment of § 1087m6, Wis. Stat. which is a part of the Income Tax Law. The section, as amended, therefore, must be construed as a part of the Income Tax Act. The following is a part of subdivision 3, § 1087m2: "With respect to other income, persons engaged in business within and without the state shall be taxed only upon such income as is derived from business transacted and property located within the state, which may be determined by an allocation and separate accounting for such income when made in form and manner prescribed by the Tax Commission, but otherwise shall be determined in the manner specified in subd. (e) of subsec. 7 of § 1770b of the statutes, as far as applicable."

Taking the law as a whole, it must be fairly construed to mean that in determining the basis upon which the 6 per cent deduction is to be computed, the capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits must be allocated upon the same basis as the allocation of the income tax is to be made. So construed, all corporations, foreign and domestic, are treated alike, and there is no discrimination in favor of or against foreign corporations. The taxable income is derived from business and property located within the state, and in computing the deduction the basis of the deduction should be made the property out of which the income is earned. This construction is not only just and reasonable, but carries out the legislative intent and avoids the unreasonable conclusion that the legislature intended to permit foreign corporations in many instances to be wholly exempted from the tax.

Point is also made by relator that there is lack of uniformity and inequality of treatment as between railroads and others taxed on the ad valorem basis. The question discussed under this head refers to detail in the administration of the taxing power, and the points urged do not seem to affect the validity of the act in question. We think this quite clear from the cases cited by relator. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. State, 128 Wis. 553, 108 N. W. 557, and Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. v. Douglas County, 159 Wis. 408, 150 N. W. 422, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 1199.

What has been said heretofore we think sufficient to show that the question of uniformity and inequality is not involved in the point raised.

It is further urged that the right granted to county boards to elect to issue bonds is an unlawful delegation of legislative power, and violates the constitutional provision that the rule of taxation shall be uniform. We do not think this position well taken. The right to levy the mill tax is not delegated to counties. The levy is a legislative act, and the right granted to the county to issue bonds is a privilege which it may exercise at its option in making provision for the payment of the tax, and thereby the amount of the levy may be remitted. There is no delegation of power to the county respecting the levy. The tax under the present act is levied by the legislature, and the bond issue is a mere detail regarding payment. The payment is administrative, not legislative. Under this head counsel for relator relies upon State ex rel. Carey v. Ballard, 158 Wis. 251, 148 N. W. 1090, but it will be seen that in that case the legislative power to levy the tax under the act there involved was delegated to a group of freeholders of the county, so there was clearly a delegation of legislative power to levy a tax; hence the case is not in point here. We do not understand that the provision with reference to the issue of bonds was intended to relieve the counties so electing to issue bonds from paying their taxes at the same time and in the same manner as counties that had not issued bonds are required to do, or to spread the period of payment beyond the time for the payment and collection of taxes.

IV. It is further contended by relator that the duties conferred upon the recognition board provided in the act were a delegation of legislative power. We regard this contention untenable. The duties of the recognition board are purely ministerial, and under repeated decisions of this court cannot be regarded as a delegation of legislative power. Re Revisor of Statutes, 141 Wis. 592, 124 N. W. 670, 18 Ann. Cas. 1176; Union Lime Co. v. Railroad Commission, 144 Wis. 523, 129 N. W. 605; State ex rel. Buell v. Frear, 146 Wis. 291, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 480, 131 N. W. 832; Chippewa & F. Improv. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 164 Wis. 105, 159 N. W. 739; State v. Lange Canning Co. 164 Wis. 228, 157 N. W. 777,

—conferring ministerial duties on board.

(— Wis. —, 175 N. W. 589.)

160 N. W. 57; State ex rel. Owen v. Stevenson, 164 Wis. 569, 161 N. W. 1.

Various provisions of the statute recognize this rule. In Income Tax Cases, 148 Wis. 511, L.R.A.1915B, 569, 184 N. W. 690, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1147, it is said: "It is not a delegation of legislative power to vest in the state Tax Commission by law the power of appointing assessors of incomes and fixing their salaries."

In the instant case the legislature has determined the rule of law respecting the duties of the recognition board, and the determination of the facts is vested in the board. 1 Cooley, Taxn. 8d ed. 99, 100; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. State, 128 Wis. 533, 108 N. W. 557; State ex rel. Carey v. Ballard, 158 Wis. 251, 148 N. W. 1090.

In view of the various statutes of this state touching this subject and the decisions of this court, we regard discussion of the subject unnecessary.

V. It is also insisted that the law in question violates § 2 of article 6 of the Constitution, which provides that the secretary of state shall be ex officio auditor. The contention under this head is, in effect, that the power of audit is taken from the secretary of state and given to the service recognition board. We do not regard this contention tenable. The powers given to the service recognition board are of an administrative character. State ex rel. Rosenheim v. Frear, 138 Wis. 173, 119 N. W. 894.

It is true that the law gives the service recognition board charge and control of the general scheme of payments, and is authorized to adopt rules uniform throughout the state for the distribution of the funds and the ascertainment and selection of proper beneficiaries and the amounts to which beneficiaries are entitled. But in the last analysis the secretary of state shall audit and pass upon all matters of which, under the Constitution, he is ex officio auditor. We are satisfied that the law does not interfere with the constitutional authority of the secretary of state as auditor. United States v. Sanborn, 135 U. S. 271, 34 L. ed. 112, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 812; Rinder v. Madison, 163 Wis. 525, 158 N. W. 302; State ex rel. Langer v. Kositzky, 38 N. D. 616, L.R.A.1918D, 237, 166 N. W. 534.

It is further insisted by relator, but we think not seriously, that the provision of submission to the people of the question involved under the law as to whether the tax should be levied renders the act unconstitutional. This court has held that the legislature may make the taking effect of the law dependent upon a vote of the people. Legislature—power to refer statute to people. Smith v. Janesville, 26 Wis. 291; State ex rel. Van Alstine v. Frear, 142 Wis. 320, 125 N. W. 961, 20 Ann. Cas. 633.

In closing this opinion we deem it proper to refer to a misfit of certain administrative details of the act. The proceeds of the property tax will be returned to the state treasurer along with the general property taxes not later than the second Monday of March. The income tax is not required to be returned to the state treasurer until the 1st day of May. Section 1121. The result will be that a portion of the money will be available for the payment of the bonuses at least six weeks before all is available therefor. Either all must wait until the 1st of May, or some will be paid much earlier than others. Either solution may result in an unfortunate misunderstanding, if not dissatisfaction. We see no reason why the legislature could not have required the income tax to be returned with the general property tax, and its failure to do so was no doubt the result of oversight. However, if the various county treasurers co-operate in the spirit prompting the enactment of the law, the administrative hitch pointed out may be avoided. While they are not required under the law to make return of the income tax until the 1st day of May, they are not obliged to withhold such tax until that date, but are at liberty to remit the same as soon as it comes into their possession. We have no doubt that the county treasurers will cheerfully co-operate to the end that the money available for the payment of these bonuses will be seasonably transmitted to the state treasurer, enabling him to make prompt payment, and thus avoid resulting annoyance and misunderstanding.

It follows that the demurrer to the complaint must be sustained.

The demurrer to the complaint is sustained, and the action dismissed.

b. Statutes providing for ratification or reimbursement, 1640.

III. Bounties and pensions for past services:

I. Scope.

The present annotation includes, in general, only those cases which present the question of the constitutionality of military pension and bounty laws, and does not include that large class of cases assuming, apparently, the constitutionality of these laws, and involving merely their construction.

The cases cited in the annotation, except those under III. b, infra, deal with state statutes, usually with those authorizing counties, towns, or cities to pay bounties. The power of Congress in this regard seems seldom to have been disputed. With a few exceptions, the cases are, of course, those arising out of the Civil War.

II. Bounties offered as an inducement to volunteers.

a. In general.

With one or two exceptions, the authorities appear to be agreed that the expenditure of money by a state, or municipal corporation, for bounties to induce men to enter the military forces of the nation in time of war, is for a public purpose, and therefore may be authorized by the state legislature; that legislation directed to this end does not unconstitutionally interfere with the war powers of Congress, and, in case the bounty is offered to relieve the community from a pending draft, is not unconstitutional as unjustly taxing those not subject to the draft to discharge the personal obligations of those within the draft, or as unlawfully taxing a nonresident property owner. In addition to the cases cited under II. b, infra, which in effect support the same doctrine, but hold, further, that the legislature may ratify or legalize action by towns, counties, etc., in offering bounties to induce enlistments, or may authorize municipalities to reimburse private loans to them for this purpose, the view stated above, sustaining the constitutionality of statutes providing for payment of bounties to induce voluntary enlistment in the military forces of the nation in time of war, is supported by the following authorities:

Regarding the power of the legislature to authorize the raising of funds by taxation to pay bounties, or to reimburse towns or individuals for contributions to a common fund used to pay bounties to volunteers, to relieve communities from an impending draft, the court, in Freeland v. Hastings (1865) 10 Allen (Mass.) 570, said: "It certainly cannot be doubted that the duty of procuring volunteers to enlist in the armies of the United States, under calls from the President, did not rest on any particular class of individuals in the community. It is true that those who were liable to draft, in the event of a deficiency of volunteers, had a more immediate interest in increasing the number of those who should voluntarily enter into the service; but no greater or heavier obligation or duty rested on them to procure volunteers than upon any other class of individuals. The war being waged by the constituted authorities in compliance with the will of the majority of the people, as ascertained and declared according to the forms prescribed in the Constitution, the duty of contributing to its support and of adopting means to supply the requisite number of soldiers to carry it on to a successful issue became obligatory upon all, as well those who from age or other causes were not liable to the personal performance of military duty, as on those who in a certain contingency might, under the laws of Congress, be called upon to do a soldier's duty in the field. Neither the officers of the state nor the citizens thereof could refuse their aid or withhold their support from all legal and constitutional measures deemed to be necessary by the government of the United States for the prosecution of the war. Every member of society became bound to bear, according to his position and means, a fair proportion of the burdens incident to the defense and support of the government. It was on this ground that it has been heretofore held by this court that the legislature of the commonwealth has the constitutional power to levy a tax on all the inhabitants of the commonwealth for the payment of bounties to soldiers, and the reimbursement of towns which had voluntarily advanced such bounties without previous legislative authority."

A statute authorizing towns to levy a tax to pay a bounty to persons who should thereafter enlist was held constitutional in Taylor v. Thompson (1866) 42 Ill. 9, as against the objection that the tax was not for "corporate purposes," for which towns were authorized by the Constitution to levy taxes; and this conclusion was held not affected by the fact that some liable to the tax might not be directly benefited thereby, because they were nonresidents, or were exempt from the draft which the statute sought to avoid.

To a similar effect, sustaining the constitutionality of the statute as applied to counties, is Henderson v. Lagow (1866) 42 Ill. 360. The validity of the statute is also upheld in Briscoe v. Allison (1867) 43 Ill. 291, Misner v. Bullard (1867) 43 Ill. 470, and Stebbins v. Leaman (1868) 47 Ill. 352.

Regarding the Maryland Bounty Act of 1864, which authorized the governor to offer a bounty of $300 to every person who should enlist before a certain date, to serve, as part of the quota of the state, in the armies of the United States, the bounty being payable by the state treasurer on lists of volunteers furnished by the county and municipal authorities, the court, in State v. Baltimore (1879) 52 Md. 398, said: "It is now too well settled by authority to admit of doubt that the legislature had the power to pass a Bounty Act like this, appropriating money from the treasury, for the purpose of relieving the citizens of the state from the burden of an involuntary draft, and it could have granted permission to the counties and the city of Baltimore to raise money by taxation for that purpose. . . . This law then, in effect, is nothing more than an appropriation of various sums of money for the relief and for the benefit of the people of the several counties and the city of Baltimore, respectively."

And it was held in State v. Baltimore (Md.) supra, that it was competent for the legislature to impose upon the counties and the city of Baltimore liability to the state for any misapplication of the funds by their officers in the payment of the bounty.

That it is competent for the state to provide for payment of bounties to encourage enlistments in the military forces of the United States, so as to shield the citizens of the state from the draft, is implied in Powers v. Shepard (1867) 49 Barb. (N. Y.) 418, affirmed in (1872) 43 N. Y. 540, which sustained the validity of a provision of a statute forbidding the payment of bounties over a prescribed amount.

A statute authorizing municipal authorities to borrow money and levy taxes to pay bounties to those who would enlist in the Federal army, and thus save the municipality from a draft, was held in Speer v. Blairsville (1865) 80 Pa. 150, not obnoxious to the Federal Constitution as infringing on the powers of Congress to raise and support armies.

So also, in Brodhead v. Milwaukee (1865) 19 Wis. 624, 88 Am. Dec. 711, it was held that a statute authorizing cities to levy a tax to pay bounties to volunteers in the Union Army was not subject to the objection that the entire power of raising troops, organizing armies, fixing compensation, etc., resided in Congress, since, if Congress had the power to legislate to the entire exclusion of the state it had not exercised such power.

It was held also in Brodhead v. Milwaukee (Wis.) supra, that the statute was not subject to the objection that a city ward which had raised, or nearly raised, its quota, would be unjustly taxed to pay bounties to volunteers in other wards of the city which were further in arrears, the legislature not having followed the same system of division as Congress, by which quotas were apportioned to the various wards.

Nor was the statute unconstitutional as requiring payment of a tax by those who had no interest in the question, on the theory that the duty of service in the military forces was personal, and confined to the class named in the conscription. Ibid.

So, the levy of a tax by a county on one about forty-five years of age and therefore not subject to draft, to raise money for payment of bounties to volunteers, in order to enable the county to avoid a pending draft, was held constitutional in State v. Demarest (1866) 32 N. J. L. 528. In reply to the objection that the statutes authorizing the county to levy such a tax were unconstitutional, on the ground that they took private property for private use, the court said: "The taxes authorized by the laws in question were to be assessed to fill up the ranks of the Army of the United States. All alike, whether liable to military duty or not, were interested in the maintenance of the government, to support which the armies were raised. The state of New Jersey, as an organized political community, was interested in supporting the government and strengthening its armies, and when she in her sovereign capacity authorized a tax to be assessed to pay men voluntarily to enter those armies, such tax was for a public and not a private purpose. Besides, such tax was for a public purpose, for the very reason that the intent and effect of raising money thereby was to save a general conscription of those liable to military duty. . . . It is sufficient for the court to say that the taxes authorized by the statutes now under consideration were to raise money to be expended for the protection of the person, property, and rights of the prosecutor, and of every other citizen of the state. This was for a public purpose. The legislature had full power and authority under the Constitution to decide that the public good required that a general conscription should be avoided by the raising of moneys to pay bounties to volunteers. A draft, enforced by the officers of the general government, might have been detrimental to all classes and to the best interests of society. A tax upon all, to save a class from a draft, was no more a tax for a private purpose than a tax levied to promote common-school education. School taxes are levied upon all, for the benefit, in one sense, of a class. But all the citizens are interested in having an intelligent rather than an ignorant population."

The distinction, as regards the constitutionality of statutes providing for bounties to soldiers, between those cases where the bounty was provided to encourage enlistments, and where it was provided for those who had already enlisted, is recognized in Woodall v. Darst (1912) 71 W. Va. 350, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 83, 77 S. E. 264, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1278, in which the court said: "During the Civil War, the legislatures of a number of the Northern states passed acts authorizing towns to raise funds by taxation, for the payment of bounties to volunteers. If those acts encouraged enlistment, and thus relieved the town from an impending draft, they were held to be constitutional, as being for a public purpose. . . . But when the acts authorized the raising of a fund by taxation to pay bounties to soldiers who had previously volunteered, or to repay money to persons who had hired substitutes, they were held by the courts to be unconstitutional, on the grounds that they amounted to an appropriation of public funds to a purpose that was purely private, and that the legislature was without power to make private donations out of the public funds."

However, in Ferguson v. Landram (1867) 1 Bush (Ky.) 548, later appeal (1868) 5 Bush, 230, 96 Am. Dec. 350, statutes authorizing counties to raise funds by taxation, to avoid the Federal draft for soldiers in the Civil War, were held unconstitutional as in violation of the war powers of Congress, and as class legislation. It will be observed that the statutes were enacted for the purpose of raising funds to reimburse loans which had been made, in one instance to avoid the draft, and in another instance, where the draft had taken place, to pay those drafted a certain sum. The decision, however, is placed on the broad grounds above indicated, the court discussing and refusing to follow the decisions in Illinois, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut, which had sustained the constitutionality of bounty statutes. On the later appeal, the court referred to the first appeal as deciding that, "the Federal government having gone directly to the people as a government, and not calling on the different states, as it might have done, to furnish their proper quota, that the state had no constitutional power to levy an involuntary tax on the citizens of the various counties to give to the Federal soldier an additional compensation, nor had it the power to levy an involuntary tax on those not subject to military duty, to aid those who were to escape their responsibility, by way of inducing volunteers for such additional compensation."

b. Statutes providing for ratification or reimbursement.

Statutes authorizing counties, towns, etc., to raise money to reimburse those who, on the faith of the public credit, and with expectation of repayment, advanced money toward a public fund with which to procure enlistments, have been sustained on the ground that there was a moral obligation for reimbursement, that the money was expended in the first instance for a public purpose, and that the legislature might ratify action or provide for reimbursement where it could originally have authorized the expenditure. However, if the money was contributed purely as a gift, without expectation of reimbursement, a statute providing for repayment has been held invalid, since it did not authorize an expenditure for a public purpose. And it has been held, also, that the legislature cannot declare the debt and compel a town or township to pay it.

If it is competent for the legislature to confer authority on the local subdivisions of the state for the payment of bounties to obtain volunteers for military service, it is equally competent for it to legalize what might have been done and to authorize the reimbursement of money already paid or pledged for bounties to volunteers. Cass Twp. v. Dillon (1864) 16 Ohio St. 38.

There is no difference in principle between the precedent authority by the legislature to local authorities for payment of funds raised by taxation for a public purpose, as for bounties to volunteers, and a subsequent authorization of reimbursement for the same thing. Hilbish v. Catherman (1870) 64 Pa. 154.

And in Wilson v. Buckman (1868) 13 Minn. 441, Gil. 404, it was held that, the legislature having power to authorize the levy and collection of a tax by a town to pay bounties to those who would volunteer, if the tax were levied without legal authority, it was in the power of the legislature to ratify and legalize it.

The legislature may legalize acts of county authorities by which bounties were paid to obtain volunteers. Vermillion County v. Hammond (1882) 83 Ind. 453; Sithin v. Shelby County (1879) 66 Ind. 109.

The legislature may ratify and confirm the action of county authorities who, without express authority of law, have incurred an indebtedness to pay bounties to volunteers, to relieve the county from a pending draft, and may authorize the issuance of bonds and levy of taxes by the county to pay such indebtedness. State v. Demarest (1866) 32 N. J. L. 528.

It was held in Winchester v. Corinna (1866) 55 Me. 9, that the legislature might legalize action of town authorities in voting bounties to those who would volunteer, although at the time of such action the town not only did not have power to vote such a bounty, but was expressly prohibited by statute from doing so. The court said: "We cannot doubt that where, as in this case, the action of the town was in relation entirely to public matters of high national concern, and did not in any way touch or affect vested rights or private interests, as distinct from public exigencies, the legislature might ratify and make valid whatever it might constitutionally authorize before action."

The legislature has power to ratify and legalize a bond issued by local authorities to secure a voluntary enlistment. Glenn v. Ayr Twp. (1874) 31 Phila. Leg. Int. (Pa.) 316.

And where towns were, by law, allowed to pay a bounty to soldiers, but were not authorized to bind themselves by the issuance of bonds to procure enlistments, it was held in Kunkle v. Franklin (1868) 18 Minn. 127, Gil. 119, 97 Am. Dec. 226, that the legislature might legalize the issuance by towns of bonds given to procure enlistments during the Civil War. To the same effect is Comer v. Folsom (1868) 13 Minn. 219, Gil. 205.

It was held in Freeland v. Hastings (1865) 10 Allen (Mass.) 570, that it was competent for the legislature to authorize towns to raise money by taxation to reimburse individuals who had contributed to a common fund, raised by the towns to fill their quotas under the call of the Federal authorities, and so relieve them from a threatened draft.

The doctrine that the legislature may constitutionally authorize the raising of money by taxation to reimburse towns or individuals who have contributed to a public fund, which is used to induce enlistments in the Army under a call of the Federal authorities, is recognized also in Mead v. Acton (1885) 139 Mass. 341, 1 N. E. 413, since the money so raised is for a public purpose.

The Massachusetts statute to equalize bounties, enacted in 1863, directing an apportionment and assessment of a tax among the several cities and counties of the state to reimburse them for bounties paid to volunteers, was held constitutional in Lowell v. Oliver (1864) 8 Allen (Mass.) 247, as against the objection that the tax was not equal, just, and proportional, in that the disbursement of the funds raised thereunder was not according to the valuation of the property or population of the several towns, but according to the number of soldiers enlisted as volunteers from each town, and that the several towns did not receive the same sum for each enrolled soldier furnished by them, but only the amount of bounty actually paid each soldier, not exceeding $100. The court said that, conceding this to be a true statement of the mode of distribution of the proceeds of the tax, "we are at a loss to see in what way this alleged inequality of distribution affects the validity of the tax itself. We know of no provision, either in the Constitution or laws, which requires payments to be made from the public treasury according to any principle of apportionment or equality. If the tax is duly apportioned and levied, and the purpose for which the money is raised is within the purview of the objects enumerated in the Constitution, for which the funds in the treasury may be drawn out and expended, there is certainly no violation of any restriction, either express or implied, on the power of the legislature."

It was held also that the statute authorized a disposition of money for a public service, within the meaning of a provision of the Constitution authorizing the expenditure of money raised by taxes "for the public service, in the necessary defense and support of the government of the said commonwealth, and the protection and preservation of the subjects thereof." This constitutional provision was held to relate not merely to the reciprocal duties between the state government and the citizens of the state, but to have reference also to the allegiance owed by the citizens of the state to the Federal government. Ibid.

Regarding the point that the statute was unlawful because it authorized reimbursement of bounties paid, and did not relate to prospective payments of bounties, the court, in Lowell v. Oliver (Mass.) supra, said: "Nor do we see any force in the suggestion that the appropriation of the money raised by the tax in question was unlawful or unauthorized because it was designed to reimburse payments already made by towns and cities, and not for the purpose of meeting present exigencies or discharging prospective liabilities of the commonwealth. If the object of the appropriation is a legitimate one, it is quite immaterial whether the money has been actually expended and the tax is laid to pay a debt previously incurred, or for the reimbursement of sums advanced by third persons for a public object, or whether it is to anticipate expenditures which the future requirements of the public service may render expedient or necessary. We can see no valid distinction in principle between a right to raise money for a specific object yet to be accomplished, and a right to raise it to defray the expense of the same object after it has been attained."

Where the limit authorized by law for the payment of bounties to obtain volunteers was $400, but volunteers could not be obtained for less than $550, and the excess was raised by private subscription, with the general approbation of the citizens of the township, expressed at public meetings, and in concurrence with the action of the township authorities to the limit of the powers conferred on them by law, it was held that the legislature might direct the levy of a tax by the township to reimburse those who subscribed, although the subscription was without any agreement or understanding, or even without a general expectation, that a law would be procured for repayment of the subscriptions. Hilbish v. Catherman (1870) 64 Pa. 154. The court distinguished prior decisions in that state to the effect that advances for bounties could only be refunded where they were made on the faith of the public credit under contract relations, on the ground that the general bounty system of the state required such previous consent or agreement by the local authorities, whereas the particular act in question did not make such requirement. The court said: "We have not decided in any case that an advance of money, made for the actual benefit of the public, cannot be compensated, though made at the time without legal authority, or an expectation of its being repaid. It is not the hope or expectation of repayment which constitutes the ground of authority to refund; but the public benefit received. That it is which creates the moral obligation—that imperfect but conscientious duty, which constitutes a sufficient consideration either for the public or a private agreement to pay for the benefit conferred."

The legislature has power to authorize taxation by a town to refund money advanced by individuals to obtain volunteers, and thus relieve the town from a draft, where the advance is made on the faith that the money will be refunded. Johnson v. Campbell (1868) 49 Ill. 316. To a similar effect, see State v. Sullivan (1867) 43 Ill. 412.

The Ohio Statute of 1866, authorizing county commissioners to levy a tax to raise money for the payment of bounties pledged to volunteers at the time of their enlistment, was held in State ex rel. Anderson v. Harris (1867) 17 Ohio St. 608, not in conflict with a constitutional provision that the legislature should have no power to pass retroactive laws.

A statute legalizing previous payments, by counties and municipal authorities, of bounties to volunteers in the Army or Navy of the United States, was held in Coffman v. Keightley (1865) 24 Ind. 509, not unconstitutional as in conflict with the war powers of Congress. To a similar effect is Miami County v. Bearss (1865) 25 Ind. 110.

In the absence of a constitutional provision forbidding retroactive laws, it was held in Grim v. Weissenberg School Dist. (1868) 57 Pa. 433, 98 Am. Dec. 237, that a statute legalizing the imposition of taxes by a township to pay bounties was not subject to the objection that it unconstitutionally impaired a taxpayer's vested right to recover money which he had been compelled to pay without authority of law.

The constitutionality of a statute authorizing the school directors of a township to levy a tax to reimburse those who had made advances to relieve the township from a draft, with the understanding that the money paid would be refunded, is recognized in Heiser v. Casselberry (1866) 6 Phila. (Pa.) 194, although it was held that the facts alleged did not bring the case within the statute.

The doctrine that the legislature may constitutionally authorize or ratify acts of local municipal authorities for the raising of funds to reimburse those who advanced bounty money to procure volunteers, with the understanding that such money should be refunded, is supported also by Micheltree v. Sweezy (1871) 70 Pa. 278; Weister v. Hade (1866) 52 Pa. 474, and Felty v. Uhler (1873) 10 Phila. (Pa.) 512.

The understanding or agreement must, however, be with the local authorities, and not merely among the parties themselves. West Donegal Twp. v. Oldweiler (1867) 55 Pa. 257.

In Washington County v. Berwick (1867) 56 Pa. 466, and Brecknock School Dist. v. Frankhouser (1868) 58 Pa. 380, the Pennsylvania Statute of 1866, directing payment of bounties to re-enlisted veterans by the local authorities of such counties, cities, and townships as received credit for the re-enlistments, was construed as applying only to those veterans who were induced to re-enlist on the faith of the offer of a bounty. And the court, in the former case was of the opinion that any other interpretation of the statute would render it unconstitutional.

The legislature cannot constitutionally authorize the levy of a tax to raise money to reimburse an association for funds paid voluntarily by it to aid its own members to avoid a draft. Tyson v. School Directors (1865) 51 Pa. 9. It is, however, implied that the legislature may authorize reimbursement of an association for advances to a township to aid the township in enabling its people to avoid a draft, with the understanding that the sums advanced would be repaid.

Although holding that the action of a town in voting to reimburse individuals who had subscribed to raise money for volunteers not as a loan, but as a gift, without expectation of repayment, was without legislative sanction or confirmation, the court in Perkins v. Milford (1871) 59 Me. 315, held also that, even if by a forced construction of any of the confirmation statutes the case could be brought within them, the payment would be for a private purpose and in violation of the Constitution.

And a statute directing the levy of a tax by township supervisors to pay a note which the statute declared a legal debt against the township, and which had been given to raise funds for bounties to enable a town to meet its quota of soldiers, with the expectation that the town would assume the obligation, was held in People ex rel. Gale v. Onondaga (1867) 16 Mich. 254, to violate a constitutional provision prohibiting the legislature from auditing or allowing private claims.

It was held also in State ex rel. McCurdy v. Tappan (1872) 29 Wis. 664, 9 Am. Rep. 622, that a statute was unconstitutional which made it the duty of a town to levy taxes to reimburse the treasurer of a city the amount paid by the latter to a volunteer as bounty, and for expenses and costs incurred in an unsuccessful attempt by such treasurer to collect the same from the town by litigation. After the payment of the bounty by the treasurer of the city he ascertained, so it was contended, that the volunteer was credited on the quota of the town, which had the same name as the city. The amount which the statute directed the town to raise by taxation was to be determined by a certain court. But it was held that the latter acted as a mere referee, and that the statute was invalid as an attempt by the legislature to exercise judicial powers, and as in violation of constitutional provisions that the rule of taxation should be uniform and that the legislature should establish but one system of town and county government which should be as nearly uniform as practicable. The court said that no extended argument was necessary to show that this statute, which singled out this particular town from all the towns of the state, and compelled it, without its consent, to raise money by taxation for purposes not municipal in their character, and for which no other town in the state had ever been arbitrarily compelled to tax its citizens, entirely disregarded the constitutional mandate that taxes must be imposed by a uniform rule.

In Ferguson v. Landram (1867) 1 Bush (Ky.) 548, later appeal in (1868) 5 Bush, 230, 96 Am. Dec. 350, cited under II. a, supra, a statute was held unconstitutional which provided for reimbursement of loans made to procure volunteers to avoid a draft, on grounds which apparently would deny the right of the legislature to authorize the payment of bounties to induce voluntary enlistments.

III. Bounties and pensions for past services.

a. In general; state statutes.

It seems impossible to harmonize the authorities on the question of the power of a state to pay a bounty for past military service, where it is not given as a pension to the indigent or disabled, but rather as a gratuity in recognition of the sacrifice made by the soldier in a patriotic cause during war.

It is said in 26 R. C. L. § 44, that "it is well settled that the public money cannot be used to pay a gratuity to an individual, when he has no legal and moral claim to the money, and when it cannot fairly be said that the public good will be served by such payment."

The answer to the question whether the state may authorize payment of a bounty to a soldier for past services depends, therefore, it would seem, on the view taken as regards the question whether the soldier has a moral claim thereto, or whether the payment will serve the public good. Perhaps, if any, to extra compensation exists primarily against the national government, which called the soldier into service and paid him his compensation while in that service. Yet since the discharge of military duty is clearly also for the benefit of the states as well as of the national government, it is not clear that the states should not be permitted to assume the obligation, if it be conceded that there is a moral duty to pay a bounty on the part of either the state or Federal government. As regards the public good which may result from payment of bounties as gratuities, there seems abundant ground for differences of opinion, and it seems sufficient to say that in such a case the legislature, and not the courts, should be the judge.

Apart from cases involving statutes giving a pension to a disabled or indigent soldier or his family, attention is called to the following cases which sustain the validity of state statutes providing for a bounty for prior enlistment or service in the national military forces. Franklin v. State Examiners (1863) 23 Cal. 173; Leon- ard v. Wiseman (1869) 31 Md. 201; Opinion of Justices (1912) 211 Mass. 608, 98 N. E. 338; Gustafson v. Rhinow (1920) — Minn. —, 175 N. W. 903; State ex rel. Bates v. Richmond Twp. (1870) 20 Ohio St. 362; State ex rel. Snyder v. Abbey (1911) 15 Ohio C. C. N. S. 261; State ex rel. Morris v. Handlin (1917) 38 S. D. 550, 162 N. W. 379; Butler v. Putney (1871) 43 Vt. 481; Brodhead v. Milwaukee (1865) 19 Wis. 624, 88 Am. Dec. 711; STATE EX REL. ATWOOD v. JOHNSON (reported herewith) ante, 1617; State ex rel. Atwood v. Johnson (1920) — Wis. —, 176 N. W. 224.

But in other cases the view has been taken that state statutes providing for bounties for past military enlistment or service, where at the time of entering the service there was no offer or promise of a bounty, are unconstitutional generally, as authorizing an expenditure of public money for a private and not for a public purpose. Beach v. Bradstreet (1912) 85 Conn. 344, 82 Atl. 1030, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 946; Mead v. Acton (1885) 139 Mass. 341, 1 N. E. 413; Opinion of Justices (1905) 186 Mass. 603, 72 N. E. 95; Opinion of Justices (1906) 190 Mass. 611, 77 N. E. 820; Bush v. Orange County (1899) 159 N. Y. 212, 45 L.R.A. 556, 70 Am. St. Rep. 538, 53 N. E. 1121; Washington County v. Berwick (1867) 56 Pa. 466.

In STATE EX REL. ATWOOD v. JOHNSON (reported herewith) ante, 1617, the court sustained the validity of the Wisconsin statute providing for bounties to soldiers, sailors, and nurses who served in the recent war against Germany, and who at the time of their induction into service were residents of the state, the bounties provided being a sum not exceeding $10 for each month of service, with a minimum of $50, "as a token of appreciation of the character and spirit of their patriotic service, and to perpetuate such appreciation as a part of the history of Wisconsin." It was held that the tax provided for by the statute was for a public purpose, and that the statute did not conflict with the powers of Congress or with Federal legislation.

The same court in the recent case of State ex rel. Atwood v. Johnson (1920) — Wis. —, 176 N. W. 224, sustained the validity of the Wisconsin Educational Bonus Law, entitling discharged soldiers, sailors, and nurses in the late war with Germany, who were residents of the state at the time of entering the service, to receive $30 per month while in regular attendance at an educational institution in the state not conducted for profit. Unlike the Cash Bonus Law involved in the preceding case, this statute did not expressly declare the purpose of the bonus, but the court held that the main purpose, as gathered from the statute itself, was to stimulate patriotism, and was therefore public. The court said: "If, as held in the cash bonus case, the giving of money to soldiers which they may spend as they choose is a public purpose, much more so must be the giving to them of an education. . . . It is also contended that the beneficiaries of the act were in the service of the United States, and not in the service of Wisconsin, and therefore our state cannot lawfully spend money in gratuities to agents of another government. The Federal government is our government none the less because we have a subordinate independent government of our own within it. The Federal government in time of war must call upon the citizenry of the states for troops; it has none others. We are an integral part of the nation; hence, a defense of the nation is a defense of us. In furnishing troops to the Federal government we are in reality furnishing them to ourselves, because they are to be used for our benefit. And, since the recipients of the act must be residents of the state, we are limiting the bonus to the military servants furnished by our own state. Whether or not we could lawfully extend it to others it is not necessary to decide." And the court called attention to the fact that, although our country did not enter the late war until in 1917, thirty-eight states besides Wisconsin have enacted over a hundred and twenty laws appropriating money for expenditures incident to the enlistment and service of its soldiers therein, these laws ranging in content from cash bonus, land settlements, extra compensation, memorial funds, exemption from certain public burdens, educational benefits, care for returning soldiers and aid to dependents of soldiers, to the appropriation of money for medals, certificates, etc.; and this legislative construction of the validity of such statutes, the court stated, was very persuasive and would control in the absence of specific, express, or implied constitutional language to the contrary.

It was held that the statute last referred to did not conflict with a provision of the state Constitution prohibiting the extension of the credit of the state to individuals, since the law did not create a debt and established no contract relation; but the tax was levied for the purpose of making a gift or gratuity, revocable at will. Ibid.

The objection that financial benefits accrued to religious schools from the statute was held untenable in view of the provision therein that only actual increased cost to such schools, occasioned by the attendance of beneficiaries, should be reimbursed. Ibid.

An important recent case on the question of the validity of payments by the state of a bonus to soldiers for past services is Gustafson v. Rhinow (1920) — Minn. —, 175 N. W. 903, which sustained the validity of the Minnesota Statute of 1919, providing for payment of a bonus of $15 for each month of service to officers, soldiers, sailors, marines, and nurses, in the military or naval forces of the United States in the late war with Germany, who were residents of the state at the time they entered the service, and were honorably discharged. It was held that the tax authorized by the statute was for a public purpose, and that there was no limitation under the state Constitution to the indebtedness which the state might create for such purpose. The state Constitution provided that a public debt might be contracted for payment of extraordinary expenditures, but limited the aggregate of such debts to the sum of $250,000, and required that the debts so authorized should be contracted by a loan on state bonds. Another provision of the state Constitution declared that "the state shall never contract any public debt, unless in time of war, to repel invasion or suppress insurrection," except in the manner above authorized. This provision, the court held, did not refer simply to an emergency, in time of war, which made necessary the repelling of actual invasion or the suppressing of an insurrection.

It was contended in Gustafson v. Rhinow (Minn.) supra, that the legislation was not within constitutional powers, because the beneficiaries were soldiers of the United States, and that the state was not under such legal or moral obligation to them as would support the taxation provided for in the statute. In reply the court said: "With this construction we do not agree. It is true that the Federal government alone has power to declare war, but, having done so, the government and people of Minnesota became bound to defend and support the national government. While the states of the nation are sovereign in a certain field, they are also members of the family of states constituting the national organization. . . . If Minnesota may properly give the lives of her sons in support of the nation, the withholding of the money of her people from such support would seem to be justifiable only by the clearest constitutional inhibition."

With reference to the public purpose of the taxation authorized by the statute, the court, in Gustafson v. Rhinow (Minn.) supra, stated that any doubt as to whether the purpose is public or private must be resolved in favor of the constitutionality of the law, and that to justify a court in declaring a tax invalid, on the ground that it is not imposed for the public benefit, the absence of a public interest in the purpose for which the money is raised by taxation must be so clear and palpable as to be immediately perceptible to every mind.

The validity of a state statute, providing for payment of a bounty of $5 per month to enlisted men of the California Volunteers in the service of the United States during the Civil War, was sustained in Franklin v. State Examiners (1863) 23 Cal. 173, as applied to one who had enlisted prior to the enactment of the statute. The question considered was whether the statute created an indebtedness above the constitutional limit, under a provision of the state Constitution that the legislature should not create a debt exceeding the sum of $300,000, "except in case of war, to repel invasion or suppress insurrection." The act in question provided for the creation of a debt which might amount to $600,000. But the court held that the legislative declaration that an emergency had arisen, demanding the exercise of the power referred to in the exception above quoted, should not be reviewed or set aside by the court.

It was held in Brodhead v. Milwaukee (1865) 19 Wis. 624, 88 Am. Dec. 711, that the legislature might constitutionally authorize the levy of a tax by a city to pay bounties to volunteers who had previously enlisted, as well as to those who might thereafter enlist, since money expended for such purpose in gratitude to those who assumed a special share of the general public burden and thus relieved the community to that extent from a draft, was for a public purpose. The court said: "The objects for which money is raised by taxation must be public, and such as subserve the common interest and well-being of the community required to contribute. To justify the court in arresting the proceedings and declaring the tax void, the absence of all possible public interest in the purposes for which the funds are raised must be clear and palpable—so clear and palpable as to be perceptible by every mind at the first blush. In addition to these, I understand that it is not denied that claims founded in equity and justice in the largest sense of those terms, or in gratitude or charity, will support a tax. Such is the language of the authorities. I think the consideration of gratitude, alone, to the soldier for his services, be he volunteer, substitute, or drafted man, will sustain a tax for bounty money to be paid to him or his family. Certainly no stronger consideration of gratitude can possibly exist than that which arises from the hardships, privations, and dangers which attend the citizen in the military service of his country; and all nations have ever so regarded it. Who will say that the legislature may not, in consideration of such services, either directly or indirectly, or through the agency of the municipality or district to which he is credited, give to the soldier or his family a suitable bounty after his enlistment, or even after his term of service has expired? I certainly cannot. It is a matter which intimately concerns the public welfare; and that nation will live longest in fact, as well as in history, and be most prosperous, whose people are most sure and prompt in the reasonable and proper acknowledgment of such obligations."

And in Butler v. Putney (1871) 43 Vt. 481, in holding that it was competent for the legislature to authorize towns to vote money to those persons who had volunteered from the towns to serve in the Union Army, as well as to vote money to those who should thereafter volunteer for such service, the court said: "It is conceded that this act is constitutional so far as it authorizes the town to vote bounties to such volunteers as would enlist, but in conferring the power to vote bounties to those who had enlisted, and were in the service, the legislature exceeded its power under the Constitution. The legislature, by the act referred to, intended to give to towns the power over, and the control of, a subject that before the act was not within the authority conferred upon them. It simply gives the towns authority to vote money for a specific purpose, and leaves it to them to say whether they will exercise the power or not. Suppose the legislature should enact a law declaring that any express promise thereafter made, to pay for services voluntarily rendered, either before or after the act, for the party making the promise, shall be binding upon the promisor, and may be enforced in a court of law, can anyone claim that such an act would be unconstitutional? Such an act would go further than the present."

So, a statute directing county commissioners, township trustees, and city councils to issue to each re-enlisted veteran volunteer, credited on the quota of the county, township, or city, under a call of the President for volunteers during the Civil War, who had not received a local bounty for such re-enlistment, a bond for $100, was held in State ex rel. Bates v. Richland Twp. (1870) 20 Ohio St. 362, not to violate a provision of the Constitution that the legislature should have no power to pass retroactive laws. The court took the view that the tax was for a public purpose, even though the payment was to be made without respect to whether the re-enlistment had been on an assurance or pledge of a bounty.

See also, as implying the validity of the statute, State ex rel. Shafer v. Washington Twp. (1874) 24 Ohio St. 608, which involves the question whether by its repeal the right was subsequently taken away.

The constitutionality of the Ohio statute, directing local authorities to issue to re-enlisted veteran volunteers who had not previously received a bounty, a bond or warrant for the sum of $100, is sustained also in State ex rel. Snyder v. Abbey (1911) 15 Ohio C. C. N. S. 261.

The constitutionality of a statute enacted in 1867, which extended statutory provisions for bounties to soldiers, so as to include those who enlisted during a certain period in 1864, who were not within previous bounty laws, is implied in Leonard v. Wiseman (1869) 31 Md. 201, where the court, in construing the statute, stated that where the law is plain and unambiguous, and free from objection on constitutional grounds, passed upon a subject clearly within the province of the legislature, courts have no power to set it aside or evade its operation by forced and unreasonable construction. The unconstitutionality of the statute is asserted in a dissenting opinion.

The validity of the South Dakota

Statute of 1917, providing that every enlisted man in a certain infantry in that state, which had been drafted into the Federal service and had served on the Mexican border, should be paid at the time of his return from the Federal service the sum of $75, and making an appropriation therefor, was sustained in State ex rel. Morris v. Handlin (1917) 38 S. D. 550, 162 N. W. 379. The statute declared that the payment was for the "purpose of encouraging military training, the payment for services of the members of said regiment for Federal services upon the Mexican border, and for continued service in the National Guard Reserve of the United States." The court said it was clear that the appropriation was made for a public purpose advantageous to the welfare of the state; that it was not made as a gift, nor from motives of charity. And it was held that the statute did not violate provisions of the state Constitution that "no indebtedness shall be incurred or money expended by the state, and no warrant shall be drawn upon the state treasurer except in pursuance of an appropriation for the specific purpose first made;" that the legislature should not grant any extra compensation to any public officer, employee, or agent after the service shall have been rendered or the contracts made, nor authorize the payment of any claims created against the state under any agreement or contract made without express authority of law, except that the legislature might make appropriations for expenditures incurred in suppressing insurrection or repelling invasion; and that the legislature should not make donations to individuals, associations, or corporations. See quotation from this case in STATE EX REL. ATWOOD v. JOHNSON (reported herewith) ante, 1617.

But it was held in Bush v. Orange County (1899) 159 N. Y. 212, 45 L.R.A. 556, 70 Am. St. Rep. 538, 53 N. E. 1121, that the New York Statute of 1892, which directed county supervisors, on petition of a majority of the taxpayers, to raise by taxation money to be paid to drafted men, or their heirs, on account of services in the Civil War or the payment of commutation money in lieu thereof, was unconstitutional as taking private property for a private and not for a public use, and as in violation of a constitutional provision prohibiting gifts by counties or municipalities of any money or property to or in aid of any individual, and prohibiting also any county or municipality from incurring an indebtedness except for county or town purposes. See in this connection, IV. infra.

And it was held in Beach v. Bradstreet (1912) 85 Conn. 344, 82 Atl. 1030, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 946, that the expenditure of public funds was unconstitutional authorized for a private purpose by a statute providing for the giving, as state aid, of the sum of $30 annually to every resident of the state, or his widow or parents, who had served in the Army or Navy of the United States during the Civil War and been honorably discharged, without limitation or exclusion as to soldiers and sailors who served to the credit of other states, and without regard to disability or indigence. The court said: "A state's bounty must be limited to her own soldiers and sailors. Service to the credit of other states is not service for her. . . . States have granted pensions to the disabled or indigent soldiers and sailors; but, so far as we have discovered, no state has granted a pension to soldiers and sailors, who have served in, and been honorably discharged from, the United States service, without regard to disability or indigence. . . . We believe no act of so sweeping a character can be found. We think an act which taxes the citizens of our state for the benefit of persons whose only claim to a gratuity is in service long since past, rendered some other state, is a dangerous innovation in legislation and, beyond all doubt, contrary to the fundamental law. If an annual gratuity of $30 for such a purpose as this is lawful, a larger one will be lawful. Its size will be the will of the general assembly. If public funds may be used to benefit resident soldiers and sailors for past services, rendered other states, the principle will permit gratuities to be given all classes of citizens whose past public services entitle them to public gratitude."

In Washington County v. Berwick (1867) 56 Pa. 466, the court, in construing a statute directing payment of bounties to re-enlisted veterans by local authorities as applying only to veterans who were induced to re-enlist on the faith of the offer of local bounties, stated that any other interpretation of the statute would render it obnoxious to the charge of its being a mere legislative rescript for the payment of money by the people of a given district to one to whom they owed no debt and no duty.

A statute of 1882 authorizing a certain town to raise money by taxation to pay a bounty to soldiers who re-enlisted in a specified regiment in 1864, and were credited to the town, was held unconstitutional in Mead v. Acton (1885) 139 Mass. 341, 1 N. E. 413, as authorizing the raising of money by taxation for a private purpose. The court said: "It is not contended that there was any promise by the town, or by anyone acting on behalf of the town, to pay any bounty to these soldiers at or before their re-enlistment.

. . . The cases where the legislature has authorized towns to raise money by taxation, for the repayment of money advanced by towns or individuals, have all been cases where the money has been advanced to pay bounties to soldiers as an inducement to them to enlist; in other words, where the money has in fact been expended for the public service. . . . In the case at bar it seems to us clear that the object for which the town of Acton has raised this money is private, and not public. The town has made no promise to these soldiers, and is not under any obligation to pay them any bounties. The purpose is not to repay any sums advanced them as an inducement to enlist. The bounty to be paid cannot be regarded in the light of compensation for services rendered; for their services as soldiers were not rendered to the town, and the town had nothing to do with their compensation. The war has been over for many years, and the payment of these bounties cannot encourage enlistments, or in any way affect the public service or promote the public welfare. The direct primary object is to benefit individuals, and not the public. In any view we can take of the statute, the payments it contemplates are mere gratuities or gifts to individuals. The principle would be the same if a town should vote a gratuity or a pension to one who had rendered services as an officer, or was in any way entitled to its gratitude. This a town has not the power to do, even with the sanction of the legislature. A statute conferring such power is unconstitutional, because it authorizes raising money by taxation for the exclusive benefit of particular individuals, and appropriates money for a private purpose which can only be raised and used for public objects."

And on the authority of Mead v. Acton (Mass.) supra, the Massachusetts Statute of 1894, directing the payment from the state treasury of a bounty to veterans of the Civil War who served in the Federal Army to the credit of the state, and had not previously received a bounty, was held unconstitutional in Opinion of Justices (1905) 186 Mass. 608, 72 N. E. 95, as authorizing the expenditure of public money for a private purpose.

And it was held in Opinion of Justices (1906) 190 Mass. 611, 77 N. E. 820, that a statute to equalize bounties among the soldiers of the state who served in the Civil War, by payments to certain soldiers, to make the results of their contracts of enlistment more favorable, because the contracts of other soldiers were made on better terms as to bounties, would be unconstitutional, even though it contained a recital that the payments would be made in recognition of valuable services, with a view to the promotion of loyalty and patriotism. The court took the view that such payments would be mere gratuities, and taxation therefore would not be for a public purpose.

But it was held that the statute, in so far as it provided for the reward of services of soldiers deserving special recognition, by payment of sums of money, the erection of statues, bestowal of medals, etc., would be constitutional, where the benefit conferred was an appropriate recognition of such service, calculated to enhance loyalty and patriotism. Ibid.

The Massachusetts court, however, in a later decision, seems, in view of the express legislative declaration in the statute of its enactment for a public purpose, to have departed somewhat from the doctrine of these earlier cases. Thus, it was held in Opinion of Justices (1912) 211 Mass. 608, 98 N. E. 338, that a statute would be constitutional which provided for payment of gratuities of $125 each to veteran soldiers and sailors still living, who volunteered in the Civil War and served to the credit of the state, were honorably discharged, and received no bounty, the gratuity being given for the purpose, as declared in the statute, of promoting the spirit of loyalty and patriotism, and in recognition of the sacrifice made by the soldier for the state and the United States, and for the purpose of promoting the public welfare by giving visible evidence that if danger again threatened the nation and the call should come for men, the state would not forget the great service of those who volunteered. The act also expressly provided that the "gift shall not be a bounty, nor a payment in equalization of bounties, . . . but a testimonial for meritorious service." The court said that the act applied only to those cases where the soldier voluntarily enlisted from purely patriotic motives; that it could not be said that a gratuity given, as the statute declared, as a "testimonial for meritorious service," and in recognition of services rendered and sacrifices made, and not as a bounty, must nevertheless be regarded as a bounty; and that from the fact that one of the conditions was that the gratuity should not be paid to one who had received a bounty, the inference could not be drawn that it was intended as a bounty or a payment in equalization of bounties. The view of the court was that the legislative declaration to the effect that the act would promote loyalty and patriotism and serve the public welfare was not necessarily contradicted by the substance of the act, and that the constitutionality of the statute should be affirmed on the decision in Opinion of Justices (Mass.) supra, to the effect that the legislature might appropriate money in recognition of valuable services performed by the soldiers of the state in the Civil War, if, in the opinion of the legislature, the public good would be served and loyalty and patriotism promoted. There is a dissenting opinion, however, affirming the unconstitutionality of the statute under the former decisions of the state.

Several cases sustain the validity of statutes giving a bounty or pension to the families of soldiers, or to indigent or disabled soldiers.

It was said in Angle v. Runyon (1876) 38 N. J. L. 403, that the power of the legislature to pass the Statute of 1861, giving a bounty to the families of soldiers who enlisted in the service of the United States from that state, was unquestioned and unquestionable. See also State, Brown, Prosecutor, v. Newark (1861) 29 N. J. L. 232, where an ordinance which was enacted pursuant to the statute and authorized the payment of $6 per month to the families of such persons of the state militia, and the widowed mothers of such persons without families, as had been or should be mustered into the service of the state or of the United States, was held valid in so far as it authorized such payment to families and widowed mothers resident in the state, but void so far as it authorized payment to be made to families or mothers having their permanent residence in other states at the time of the enlistment.

And the power of the New Jersey legislature to enact a statute providing for payment to one who had enlisted from that state, but, because he was placed in a Pennsylvania regiment, had been refused the monthly allowance for the relief of his family to which they were entitled under the laws of New Jersey, was conceded in Angle v. Runyon (N. J.) supra.

And the court was of the opinion that the power was unquestionable.

The validity of a statute providing a pension to indigent, disabled Confederate soldiers was sustained in Bosworth v. Harp (1913) 154 Ky. 559, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 692, 157 S. W. 1084, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 277, it being held that services rendered by such soldiers to their states were public within the meaning of a constitutional provision forbidding the granting of separate public emoluments except as consideration for public services, and that the statute was not a special law, within the meaning of a constitutional provision that where a general law may be made applicable no special law shall be enacted.

It was contended in Bosworth v. Harp (Ky.) supra, that statutes granting a pension to indigent soldiers violated a constitutional provision that no money should be drawn from the state treasury except in pursuance of appropriations made by law. But the court held that an appropriation within the meaning of the constitutional provision was made by the statute, which directed that the vouchers issued to pensioners should be paid out of the treasury upon the warrant of the auditor, who was directed to issue his warrant to each person for the amount of his claim.

And in Board of Education v. Bladen (1893) 113 N. C. 379, 18 S. E. 661, it was held that a statute providing for pensions for Confederate soldiers who were disabled during the war, and for their widows, is constitutional. The decision is based on the ground that the state must take care of its indigent and helpless citizens, and that the legislature has the power to authorize counties to care for one class of dependents, and the state to care for another class directly, when, in the judgment of the legislature, the amount of the allowance can in that way be better adjusted to suit the needs of the indigent classes.

It appears in State ex rel. Walker v. Derham (1901) 61 S. C. 259, 39 S. E. 379, that since 1887 it has been the legislative policy of South Carolina to provide pensions for soldiers and sailors, residents of the state who were in the service of the state or of the Confederate states in the Civil War; and it was indirectly held in that case that the state Constitution of 1895 specifically authorizes the legislature so to provide.

A statute providing for the levying of a special county tax for the purpose of raising a fund to help support maimed and indigent Confederate soldiers was held, in Elder v. Collier (1897) 100 Ga. 342, 28 S. E. 116, repugnant to and abrogated by a provision of the state Constitution subsequently adopted, providing that the legislature should not have power to delegate to any county the right to levy taxes for any except certain specified purposes, as education, the building and repair of public buildings and bridges, and support of prisoners and paupers. According to the opinion in this case, it is the settled policy of the state to provide pensions for Confederate soldiers exclusively by state taxation.

And in Verdery v. Walton (1911) 137 Ga. 213, 73 S. E. 390, the court, citing Elder v. Collier (Ga.) supra, said that "the general assembly has and exercises the power of providing by state taxation for the payment of pensions to Confederate soldiers, and can confer no authority for paying pensions to soldiers and their widows out of the funds to be raised by county taxation."

It was held in Woodall v. Darst (1912) 71 W. Va. 350, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 83, 77 S. E. 264, 80 S. E. 867, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1278, that the legislature had power to provide compensation to members of the National Guard, who might be injured while performing any duty lawfully ordered by their superior officer. Such an enactment was an inducement for enlistments in the military service of the state, and money appropriated therefor was for a public purpose.

b. Power of Congress.

The power of Congress to grant pensions to those who have served in the military forces of the nation seems seldom to have been questioned in the courts. This power would appear unquestionable, in view of the fact, as is stated in United States v. Hall (1879) 98 U. S. 343, 25 L. ed. 180, that the Federal pension system had its origin in the Revolution, and beyond question was sanctioned by the framers of the Constitution, who were members of the first Congress and enacted the laws for putting the new government into operation.

It is said also in Manning v. Spry (1903) 121 Iowa, 191, 96 N. W. 873, that the policy of granting pensions has prevailed from a very early period; that the first Continental Congress, in 1776, provided for pensions for soldiers and sailors of the Revolutionary War; and that one of the earliest acts of the Congress was a pension bill, passed in September, 1789.

The power of Congress to grant pensions and bounties to soldiers in the Federal service is implied under the constitutional authority to raise and support armies. United States v. Fairchilds (1857) 1 Abb. 74, Fed. Cas. No. 15,067. See also United States v. Marks (1869) 2 Abb. 531, Fed. Cas. No. 15,721.

IV. Reimbursement to drafted men for commutation money or expense of procuring substitute.

The courts have generally held unconstitutional statutes authorizing the payment of money to drafted men who paid the commutation allowed by the Federal law during the Civil War, or procured a substitute, the view generally being taken that such payment is for a private and not for a public purpose. But there is also authority to the contrary.

A statute requiring school directors of a township to levy a tax to reimburse one who had been drafted and who had paid a commutation for exemption from service, under Federal law, was held unconstitutional in Kelly v. Marshall (1871) 69 Pa. 319, as authorizing the raising of money by taxation for a private purpose.

And a statute authorizing towns to raise and appropriate money to reimburse persons who, during the Civil War, furnished substitutes or paid commutation money, instead of rendering military service as part of the quota of the town, was held unconstitutional in Bowles v. Landaff (1879) 59 N. H. 164, as authorizing unequal taxation for an expense not of a local, municipal character. The court said that the legislature cannot give towns an option of taxation for a purpose not local; that whether all conscripts who performed their several duties by personal service, by furnishing a substitute, or by paying the commutation should be reimbursed for performance of their duties was not a local municipal question; that the expense of paying for the performance of that duty could not be unequally divided among the towns of the state, either by the legislature or by a municipal exercise of delegated legislative power; that "whatever the state can or cannot do towards an equalization of burdens, and whatever it can or cannot do towards the reward of persons who, by service or payment, perform their military or civil duty to the state or the Union, neither the power of taxation, nor any other constitutional power can, in some towns, leave upon the national forces the national duty to which they were called in September, 1863, and in other towns transfer that duty to the taxpayers." To the same effect is Gould v. Raymond (1879) 59 N. H. 260.

Bowles v. Landaff (N. H.) supra, was regarded apparently in Willoughby v. Holderness (1882) 62 N. H. 227, as overruling the earlier decisions in that state cited under II. a, supra, which sustained the constitutionality of statutes providing for bounties to soldiers.

The doctrine was recognized in Heiser v. Casselberry (1866) 6 Phila. (Pa.) 194, that a statute authorizing taxation to repay one subject to a draft the amount he had expended to procure a substitute would be unconstitutional.

It was held also in Freeland v. Hastings (1865) 10 Allen (Mass.) 570, that the legislature could not constitutionally authorize towns to raise money by taxation to reimburse individuals for sums paid by them to obtain substitutes, under the act of Congress providing that if any person enrolled should furnish, previous to a draft, an acceptable substitute, he should be exempt from the draft during the term for which the substitute had been accepted; since money so paid was not for a public purpose.

And in Bush v. Orange County (1899) 159 N. Y. 212, 45 L.R.A. 556, 70 Am. St. Rep. 538, 58 N. E. 1121, it was held that the New York Statute of 1892 which directed county supervisors to raise by taxation money to be paid to drafted men or their heirs, on account of services in the Civil War or the payment of commutation in lieu thereof, was unconstitutional, as taking private property for a private and not for a public use.

A statute authorizing a township to raise money by taxation to pay the commutation money for the exemption from draft of such persons as should be drafted and accepted for the township, pursuant to the act of Congress providing that any person drafted might furnish a substitute, or might pay to the government $300 for the procuring of such substitute, was held invalid in State, Wagner, Prosecutor, v. Jackson (1866) 83 N. J. L. 450, reversing (1865) 31 N. J. L. 189, since, by providing for payment through general taxation of money for those only who refused to serve or provide a substitute, it removed the inducement for those drafted to enter the service, and therefore was in conflict with the Federal statute, the object of which was to procure men for the Army. Five of the eleven judges, however, dissented, on the ground that the act of Congress, in authorizing payment of the $300 commutation money, contemplated the procuring of substitutes with such money by the Federal government, and that the purpose of the act of Congress was therefore not nullified by the statute in question, even though the substitutes were not procured by the drafted man himself or by the local municipal authorities.

It was held also in Thompson v. Pittston (1871) 59 Me. 545, that the legislature could not constitutionally ratify action of a town in voting to pay the commutation of drafted men, since public money would thereby be expended for a private and not for a public purpose. The court said: "We start, then, with the proposition which we think no one will gainsay, that if the grant made by vote of the town is purely a gratuity to an individual, and it is impossible to believe or imagine that the public can gain anything thereby, or that the public welfare can be thereby in any manner subserved, the grant is not lawful, and no legislation can make it so. We think it susceptible of positive demonstration that the public or the general government, which in this matter represented the public, could by no possibility gain anything by the action of certain towns in voting to drafted men sums required to pay commutation, or to reimburse the drafted men for moneys paid for that purpose. . . . In the law regulating the draft, a certain sum was fixed and designated, the payment of which by the drafted man should be deemed an equivalent to the rendering of personal service or the sending of a substitute. The payment of $300 constituted that equivalent. But when an able-bodied man was drafted and accepted, the government held him for the performance of one of the three alternatives. He must either go himself, or send a substitute, or pay the $300. To do one of these three things was a duty which he, as an individual, owed to the country, and his own proper person was pledged for the performance of one of them. If he declined to go or send a substitute, before he could be relieved, he must pay the $300. It was his individual debt. By the draft and acceptance the public had secured the performance by him of one of the three alternatives. It is as plain as anything in arithmetic that by no possibility could the public gain anything by having his town take his place in the payment of the money. . . . In the case of the payment of bounties to those actually entering the service, the public had the benefit of both the service and the money granted, so far as the latter might be supposed to operate as a stimulus to greater exertion on the part of the soldier. But in the case of money voted for commutation, the town's money only goes instead of an equal sum which the drafted man must pay, if he would avoid rendering, either personally or by substitute, the service for which the law deems the money simply an equivalent. The public does not get from any quarter both the service and the money, as it does in the case of money paid for bounties to those actually entering the service. As we have just seen, the drafted man alone can, by any possibility, derive any benefit from the payment." This case was approved and followed in Moulton v. Raymond (1872) 60 Me. 121.

In Ferguson v. Landram (1867) 1 Bush (Ky.) 548, later appeal in (1868) 5 Bush, 230, 96 Am. Dec. 350, cited under II. a, supra, a statute was held unconstitutional which provided for payment of a bounty to drafted men, but the decision is placed on broad grounds, which apparently deny the right of the legislature to provide bounties even to induce voluntary enlistments.

On the other hand, the court in Bartholomew v. Harwinton (1866) 38 Conn. 408, sustained the constitutionality of a statute providing that if any town had appropriated money for assisting persons drafted, who personally or by substitute entered the service of the United States to fill its quota, the action of such town was by the statute ratified and confirmed, and declared to be legal and binding upon the town. The court said that the law was unquestionably retroactive and absolute, but was not contrary to constitutional prohibition, nor so unjust as to violate the principles of the social compact. This case was followed in Potter v. Canaan (1870) 37 Conn. 223.

And the constitutionality of a statute authorizing towns to vote money to drafted men who had personally entered the service of the Union Army, or who had furnished a substitute, was sustained in Laughton v. Putney (1871) 43 Vt. 485, as applied to one who, before the passage of the statute, had been drafted and had furnished a substitute. The court said: "It is said by the defendant's counsel that said act does not profess to have for its object 'the encouragement of volunteering,' but was for the 'aid of drafted soldiers.' From this the counsel argue that the object of that act is private instead of public." But the court took the view that the services rendered by the drafted man were for the public benefit, as were those of the volunteers; that the statute authorizing towns to vote money to volunteers, and the similar act relating to drafted men, were both enacted in view of the large number who would not be required to enter the service, the belief that those who did enter it should receive additional compensation or bounty, which should be paid by all the people; that by the provisions of the statute, the inhabitants of each town could exercise their discretion whether they would grant money to volunteers or drafted men; but that "when any town has, by its vote at a regular meeting, promised to pay such bounty, it is a binding obligation. The consideration upon which money is voted under the Act of 1863, to be paid to a drafted man, whether such consideration be executed or executory, is sufficient. It does not differ in its legal effect from the consideration of a promise, under the Act of 1862, granting money to be paid to volunteers. The benefit a town would derive from the credit of a soldier upon its quota has been held a sufficient consideration to support such express promise. Cox v. Mt. Tabor (1868) 41 Vt. 28. But service rendered by the soldier in the Army, or his promise or obligation to render such service, is the chief consideration of the promise to pay him a bounty. Money thus paid or promised by the town is a consideration for service rendered or to be rendered by the soldier, for the benefit of the public. The service of the soldier is no less valuable because it was rendered before the vote to pay a bounty, or even before the passage of the act authorizing such vote. Such consideration, even though executed, being sufficient to support an express promise if the town had been authorized to make it at the time the consideration was received, is sufficient to support an express promise made after the passage of the act authorizing such promise to be made. We think the law authorizing towns in their discretion to grant and vote money to be paid to drafted men is open to no valid constitutional objection."

It was held also in Brodhead v. Milwaukee (1865) 19 Wis. 624, 88 Am. Dec. 711, that a statute was constitutional which authorized the payment by a city of bounties to persons who should procure substitutes for themselves before being drafted, and have such substitutes credited on the quota of the city. The statute did not provide for a payment of bounties to those who in the past had furnished substitutes, although the court intimated that the public gratitude, even to such persons, would support a levy of a tax to pay bounties as for a public purpose. The court said that the procuring of substitutes was not only proper, but in many cases commendable, and that persons procuring them performed their whole duty under the law, relieving the communities in which they resided the same as if they had themselves enlisted; and that so far as the public interest was concerned, in being relieved from the draft, it could see no distinction between paying bounties to those who furnished substitutes and to those who volunteered.

And the granting by the legislature of a state of bounties to men who should be drafted under Federal law was held in Booth v. Woodbury (1864) 32 Conn. 118, not invalid as contravening principles of natural justice, or a provision of the Bill of Rights prohibiting the taking of private property for public use without just compensation. It was held accordingly that the legislature might authorize towns to confirm or ratify previous action, taken without authority, attempting to grant a bounty to drafted men or their substitutes. The court said: "The first question, therefore, may be further narrowed to the inquiry, whether it is contrary to natural justice that A. and B., and the rest of the inhabitants of the state, should be taxed for gratuities to C. and D., when C. and D. are called upon to render military service to the general government. It should be observed that the bounty contemplated in the case put, as in this, differs from the bounty given by the United States, for that is in part payment for the service. It differs also from any bounty given to the militia in case they are turned over and mustered into the service of the United States, for the organization and support of the militia is the concurrent duty of both governments. . . . Every citizen is bound to take up arms when necessary, in defense of his government, not as a matter of strict law, but as an incident of citizenship; and the selection of a class only, of a certain age, of whom that service is to be immediately demanded in a particular case, although wise, is arbitrary, not based on any peculiar or special obligation resting upon the class, or on their ability alone to render the service, or to render it with less pecuniary or social sacrifice, but on the wants of the government and the supposed fitness of the class to subserve the purposes of the government with more efficiency than others. But if all owe the service, and it is for the common good, and there is the usual provision that it may be rendered by substitute or commutation, it is not easy to see why men above forty-five years of age, if able-bodied, may not be called upon as well as those of less age. . . . It is clearly equitable and just that they equalize the burden by bounties to those who are drafted and serve, or by making provision for the support of their families. On this obvious equity rests the general law making provision for the families of all drafted men and their substitutes."

The provision of the Bill of Rights forbidding the taking of private property for public use without just compensation, was held in Booth v. Woodbury (Conn.) supra, to have no bearing on the case, since it did not apply to taxation by which individuals were compelled to bear their share of the general public burden.

V. Delegation of power to counties, towns, etc.

It seems generally to be assumed in the cases that if the state may pay bounties to soldiers it may authorize counties, cities, or towns to do so. Most of the cases cited in the annotation are those in which there was this authorization, rather than a direct bounty from the state. So, without citing in this connection all the cases which in effect support the doctrine that if the state may pay a bounty to soldiers it may authorize local municipal authorities to do so, attention is called here to those cases in which the point was directly passed upon or was apparently before the mind of the court in rendering its decision.

If the legislature can raise money for bounties to soldiers, there seems to be no good reason why it cannot delegate that authority to the several towns, within their respective limits. Butler v. Putney (1871) 43 Vt. 481.

Instead of exercising the power directly to levy a tax to pay bounties, by a general law, on all the property of the state, with payments directly from the state treasury, the legislature may impose a duty on the several municipal subdivisions of the state to pay bounties to volunteers credited to their respective localities. State ex rel. Bates v. Richland (1870) 20 Ohio St. 362.

It is competent for the legislature to delegate to the several towns or counties of the state power to give gratuities to those who should be drafted into or voluntarily enter the military service of the United States, or to their families, and to tax the citizens generally therefor. Comer v. Folsom (1868) 18 Minn. 219, Gil. 205; Wilson v. Buckman (1868) 13 Minn. 441, Gil. 404.

Legislative power, it was held in Brodhead v. Milwaukee (1865) 19 Wis. 624, 88 Am. Dec. 711, was not unconstitutionally delegated by a statute authorizing cities to levy a tax for the purpose of paying bounties to volunteers under the call of the President in the Civil War.

And it was held in Cass Twp. v. Dillon (1864) 16 Ohio St. 38, that the legislature might authorize counties, townships, and cities, to levy a tax for payment of bounties to volunteers, as well as authorize the payment of such bounties by the levy of a general state tax. That this power would be within the general grant of legislative authority, if not reserved by other provisions of the state Constitution, the court said, did not admit of controversy. But it was contended that such reservation arose by reason of a provision of the state Constitution that commissioners of counties, trustees of townships, and similar boards should have power of local taxation for "police purposes," as might be prescribed by law. It was held that the implied reservation from this provision was repelled, as regards the special object of repelling invasion, suppressing insurrection, and defending the state in time of war, by another provision of the state Constitution that the state should never assume the debts of any county, city, town, or township, unless such debts were created to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or defend the state in war; since the latter provisions clearly implied that counties, etc., might be authorized to create debts for these objects.

Other cases to the effect that the state may authorize towns or other municipal subdivisions to pay bounties to volunteers, as well as provide for such payment by the state itself, are Winchester v. Corinna (1866) 55 Me. 9, and Shackford v. Newington (1866) 46 N. H. 415. But later decisions in New Hampshire have denied the right of the legislature to delegate to local authorities the power to raise money by taxation for payment of bounties to soldiers in the Federal Army. See Bowles v. Landaff (1879) 59 N. H. 164, cited under III. supra, and Wilmington v. Holderness (1882) 62 N. H. 227, cited under VI. infra.

In Speer v. Blairsville (1865) 50 Pa. 150, the constitutionality of a statute which authorized municipal authorities to borrow money and to levy a tax to pay bounties to volunteers, so as to relieve the municipality from an impending draft, was sustained, without the discussion of the question of delegation of power, except that a provision of the state Constitution, forbidding the state to assume any debt of any county, city, borough, or township, unless the debt was contracted to enable the state to repel invasion, suppress domestic insurrection, or defend itself in time of war, was said to imply that a municipality might be authorized to contract a debt for defense in time of war. And the bounty paid to prospective volunteers in the Federal Army was held to be contracted for that purpose.

VI. Repeal of bounty or pension laws as affecting vested rights.

No pensioner has a vested legal right to his pension; pensions are the bounties of the government, which Congress has the right to give, withhold, distribute, or recall, at its discretion. United States v. Teller (1882) 107 U. S. 64, 27 L. ed. 352, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39, citing Walton v. Cotton (1856) 19 How. (U. S.) 355, 15 L. ed. 658.

The above rule is quoted with approval, on facts not within the scope of the present annotation, in Frisbie v. United States (1894) 157 U. S. 160, 39 L. ed. 657, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 586.

It is competent for the legislature to repeal a statute bestowing a pension on a war veteran, since the recipient has no vested right in the bounty of the state. Chalk v. Darden (1877) 47 Tex. 438.

And it was said (arguendo) in Eddy v. Morgan (1905) 216 Ill. 437, 75 N. E. 174, that "a pension is a bounty springing from the graciousness and appreciation of sovereignty. It may be given or withheld at the pleasure of a sovereign power. Because one is placed upon a pension roll under a valid law is no reason why that law may not be repealed and the pension cease."

The legislature may repeal a statute settling an annuity on one to remunerate him for his losses actually sustained, and for his distinguished services in time of war, since no vested contract rights are created thereby before payment of the annuity. Dale v. Governor (1831) 3 Stew. (Ala.) 387.

But a bounty earned by a soldier, under a statute providing for payment of bounties by the state to persons thereafter enlisting, is a vested right of which he cannot be deprived by the legislature. Smith v. Aplin (1890) 80 Mich. 205, 45 N. W. 136.

Also Opinion of Justices (1864) 45 N. H. 593, is to the effect that the legislature cannot repeal a statute authorizing the granting of bounties to volunteers, so as to affect those who have already acquired a vested right to the bounty.

And in Baird v. United States, Dev. Ct. Cl. (Fed.) 88, it was held that a commissioned surgeon who rendered medical services to the United States during the Revolutionary War, before and after a resolution of Congress which provided that all officers on the medical staff who should continue in the service to the end of the war, or be reduced before that time as supernumeraries, should be entitled to receive during life certain allowances, was entitled to the allowance for life, as a right founded upon a contract with Congress, which no subsequent legislation by Congress could take away.

Although not strictly in point on the subject of the present annotation, attention is called to Willoughby v. Holderness (1882) 62 N. H. 227, holding that where one enlisted on the faith of a bounty offered by a town, at a time when the contract was valid under the law as then construed, a subsequent change of construction to the effect that towns could not constitutionally be delegated the power of taxation to pay bounties, since this would result in unequal taxation, not for local purposes, did not invalidate the contract.

Mayfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by appellee, the holder of negotiable promissory notes, against appellants, the makers thereof.

Defendants pleaded the general issue and a special sworn plea denying plaintiff's ownership of the notes. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and resulted in judgment for the plaintiff, from which judgment defendants prosecute this appeal.

The error assigned and most earnestly insisted upon to reverse the judgment is the admission in evidence of a power of attorney purporting to have been executed by one Mrs. M. F. Clements to one F. D. Kirven, the husband of plaintiff, authorizing him, as her agent and attorney, to make loans, collect moneys, satisfy mortgages of record, to assign and indorse notes, mortgages, etc. The main ground of the objection to the introduction of the power of attorney in evidence is that the notary's certificate of acknowledgment of the execution of the power of attorney was not authenticated by the notarial seal of the officer, he being an officer of another state, to wit, Georgia, and the acknowledgment and certificate being made in that state.

The view we take of the case renders it wholly unnecessary for us to decide this question, which is not free from doubt, as is shown by the argument and able briefs of counsel. The question evokes some ancient and technical learning on the subject of the object, purpose, effect, and requisites of private and public seals, scrolls, etc. It is unnecessary to decide whether or not there was error in the admission of this power of attorney, bills of sale, and acts of the attorney thereunder, for the reason, if error, it affirmatively appears that it was without possible injury to the appellants.

The notes sued on were on their face negotiable paper, and were indorsed in blank by the payee, and plaintiff was shown by indisputable evidence to be the holder thereof for value. This, under a long line of decisions of this court, was sufficient to overcome the burden placed on sufficiency of proof to overcome denial of ownership.

the plaintiff by the sworn plea denying plaintiff's ownership thereof. So, if the power of attorney and all acts of the agent or attorney purporting to be done thereunder were excluded, the plaintiff would undoubtedly have been entitled to recover.

It has been held by this court since the case of Riggs v. Andrews, 8 Ala. 628, and probably before that, that a blank indorsement of a note prima facie vests the title in the holder thereof as completely as can be done by another mode. The possession of the note by plaintiff and its production at the trial, it being indorsed in blank by the payee, is prima facie evidence of ownership. Sawyer v. Patterson, 11 Ala. 523; Lake-side Land Co. v. Dromgoole, 89 Ala. 505, 7 So. 444; Berney v. Steiner Bros. 108 Ala. 111, 54 Am. St. Rep. 144, 19 So. 806.

The notes being negotiable paper, the legal title thereto, and not the beneficial interest therein, controls as to proper parties plaintiff in suits for the collection of the notes. The fact, if it was made to appear (which is not done here), that the holder of the legal title is not entitled to the proceeds of the judgment, is no defense to the makers in an action by the holder against them. Hanna v. Ingram, 93 Ala. 483, 9 So. 621; Berney v. Steiner Bros. 108 Ala. 116, 54 Am. St. Rep. 144, 19 So. 806.

The plaintiff being the proper party to bring the action, and being prima facie the owner thereof, it is no concern of the defendants as to who is entitled to the proceeds of these notes when collected. Defendants would have been protected if they had voluntarily paid the amount to the plaintiff, she being the holder of the notes, and they being indorsed in blank by the payee, and, of course, this judgment is and will be a complete bar to any other action by any other party or parties on these notes; and hence the questions as to whether plaintiff paid full value therefor or nothing, so far as any defense was attempted here to be set up to the notes, are of no concern to these defendants.

Judgment—on note—bar to further action.

Notes like the ones here sued on may be and are often indorsed to banks, or other agents or agencies, merely for the purpose of collection, and in such cases, and those like the one now under consideration, it is of no concern to the defendants, or makers, to whom the proceeds will ultimately be paid.

Aside from evidence to which any objection was interposed, the plaintiff was indubitably entitled to recover. The following propositions are well settled, and control the decision as to plaintiff's ownership of the notes sued on: The holder of paper indorsed in blank may fill in the indorsement so as to vest himself with the legal title, but not so as to change liability of indorser. Hood v. Robbins, 98 Ala. 487, 13 So. 574; Lake-side Land Co. v. Dromgoole, 89 Ala. 505, 7 So. 444. A blank indorsement vests title in the holder of a note as completely as any other mode, and it need not be filled up before going to the jury. Riggs v. Andrews, 8 Ala. 628; Sawyer v. Patterson, 11 Ala. 523; Berney v. Steiner Bros. supra. A delivery and transfer of a note transferred in blank passes such title as will support trover against a party who purchases the note from the transferrer. Carter v. Lehman, 90 Ala. 126, 7 So. 735.

Bills and notes—right to fill blanks in indorsements.

Trover—for note—indorsement in blank.

It results that the judgment of the court below will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

Anderson, Ch. J., and Somerville and Thomas, JJ., concur.

A petition for rehearing having been granted, Mayfield, J., on October 30, 1919, handed down the following additional opinion:

On this hearing we have reached the conclusion that we were in error on the original hearing in holding that it was error without injury in admitting the power of attorney in evidence, for the reason that the ownership of the note was proven without dispute by other evidence. We are led to the present conclusion by the opinion and decision in the case of Bank of Piedmont v. Smith, 119 Ala. 57, 24 So. 589.

The record and questions in that case were very similar to the record and questions in this case. They are as near alike as you would expect to find records and questions in different cases; and we feel constrained to hold as was held in that case. In fact, that case, in a sense, construed statutes of this state as to pleadings and practice in such cases, and those statutes have been readopted with that construction on them, and we do not feel at liberty to depart therefrom.

Statutes—readoption after construction—effect.

The fault of our original holding was that the pleadings did not raise the question as to legal title of the negotiable notes in question, but only the question as to the plaintiff's ownership. While the paper was negotiable and was indorsed in blank, it was not sued on as such. The record shows that the trial was had as if it had been an action on non-negotiable, and not commercial, paper, and hence the rules we announced should not be applied to the case under the issues on which the trial was had. A failure to observe this led the writer of the opinion into the error. He desires to say, however, the fault was his, and not that of the attorneys or other justices concurring.

It results, therefore, that the power of attorney was competent and important evidence under the issues on which the case was tried; and, if error to admit it in evidence, the error must work a reversal.

It is insisted that, the power of attorney being executed in the state of Georgia, it was not self-proving. The execution of the power of attorney purports to be under the seal of the grantor, and purports to be acknowledged before a notary in the state of Georgia; and a notarial seal or scroll appears on the instrument. But the acknowledgment of the notary does not refer to the seal, nor does he certify that it was given "under his seal," official or otherwise, but only that it was given under "his hand." The question therefore is presented: Was the execution of the instrument sufficiently proven by the acknowledgment of a foreign notary under his official seal? In other words, was the acknowledgment before a notary properly and legally authenticated by his official seal? While there is on the instrument what purports to be a seal, the notary does not certify that it is his official seal, and makes no reference whatever to it either in the body of the certificate or in the jurat thereof, but the certificate purports to be under "his hand" only, but not under "his seal."

Under our decisions we feel compelled to hold that the power of attorney was not self-proving. The notary's certificate was not attested by his official seal.

While this court has repeatedly held that instruments the execution of which was acknowledged before foreign notaries, whose certificates of acknowledgment were attested by official seals, were self-proving, yet we have never held that affixing a mere scroll or wafer, purporting to be a seal, without any reference thereto by the officer in the body of his certificate, or in the jurat thereof, was sufficient authentication to make it self-proving. See Hart v. Ross, 57 Ala. 520; Alabama Nat. Co. v. Chattanooga Door & Sash Co. 106 Ala. 663, 18 So. 74; Goree v. Wadsworth, 91 Ala. 416, 8 So. 712; Hill v. Norris, 2 Ala. 640; Toulmin v. Austin, 5 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 410.

The case of Wetmore v. Laird, 5 Biss. 160, Fed. Cas. No. 17,467, is in point, and supports our holding, and we believe the reasoning thereof to be sound. We have a line of cases somewhat similar as to what is sufficient to make the execution of a given instrument under seal or not under seal. The following is a synopsis of the holdings of this court as to private seals and what is necessary to make the instrument a sealed or unsealed one: A notarial seal is not necessary to authenticate the certificate of acknowledgment of an Alabama notary. Harrison v. Simons, 55 Ala. 510.

But at common law a notary was simply a commercial officer, and his official acts were known only by his official seals. Dunn v. Adams, 1 Ala. 527, 35 Am. Dec. 42; St. John v. Redmond, 9 Port. (Ala.) 428. An instrument which on its face purports to be under seal will be so considered though there is no scroll opposite the signature. Shelton v. Armor, 13 Ala. 647.

Notary public—necessity of seal.

An instrument signed between several parties, preceded by the words, "Given under our hands and seals," followed by the seal after name of party, is a sealed instrument. Hatch v. Crawford, 2 Port. (Ala.) 54. Merely suffixing a clause containing the word "Seal" or the letters "L. S." after the name of a subscriber to the instrument does not constitute a seal; the purpose to seal it should be declared in the body of the instrument. Breitling v. Marx, 123 Ala. 222, 26 So. 203. The mere suffixing a scroll containing the word "Seal" or the letters "L. S." to the name of the subscriber does not make it a writing under seal. Carter v. Penn, 4 Ala. 140; Blackwell v. Hamilton, 47 Ala. 470.

Seal—necessity of.

—necessity of referring to it.

We therefore hold that the purpose of the notary to affix his seal must appear in his certificate; otherwise the scroll or impression purporting to be a seal may have been placed on the document by another, and without the knowledge or official act of the notary. In other words, we, or the trial court, are not authoritatively informed that the certificate of acknowledgment of the foreign notary was by him authenticated by his official seal. There is no certificate that —assumption as to authenticity.

the scroll or impression is or was his official seal, or that it was so affixed or made by him as such notary.

It therefore results that it was error to admit the power of attorney in evidence, and the judgment below should be reversed. The application for rehearing is therefore granted, the judgment of affirmance set aside, and one of reversal rendered.

Application granted. Reversed and remanded.

ANNOTATION.

I. Introduction and scope.

The present annotation presupposes that a notary's seal of some kind was required. Otherwise no question as to what would constitute a sufficient seal would have arisen. This limitation, of course, excludes all cases where the question was merely whether or not a seal must be affixed, as well as that large class of cases where in it is conceded that no seal was necessary.

II. Substances or instruments used in affixing seal.

It has been seriously maintained that at common law a notarial seal must be impressed upon wax, wafer, or other tenacious substance, so that a mere stamp upon paper itself was insufficient. See Bank of Rochester v. Gray (1842) 2 Hill (N. Y.) 227.

But the modern rule, generally accepted, is that the use of wax or other adhesive or tenacious substance upon which the seal of a notary may be impressed is no longer necessary, the use of such a substance having long since ceased to be regarded as important or necessary. *Pierce v. In Connolly v. Goodwin (1855) 5 Cal. 220, the court discussed this question as follows: "The next point on appeal relies upon the fact that the seal of the notary is made by an impression on the paper only, and not upon wax, as it is insisted it ought to be. This position, it is urged, must be right, because by all the old common-law writers a seal is defined to be an impression made on wax, or wax with an impression, and some of the later authorities, without regarding the reason of the rule, have decided that it should be made in no other way. It is very obvious that at the origin of the doctrine in regard to seals, there existed no other convenient commodity upon which a distinct impression could easily be made. Now, the inventions, discoveries, and improvements of modern days have supplied so much better materials and means that it is highly probable that wax is the most inferior and inconvenient substance which can be resorted to for the purpose under consideration. The object of the law was to have a seal, and this was simply a distinct impression. It was the impression or stamp, and not the wax, which gave character to the instrument, and enabled it to be distinguished or recognized. That the constant use of wax for the purpose, through several centuries, when no better substance was offered, had identified it as a necessary part of the ceremony, and made it to be mentioned as a part of the rule at common law, is perfectly natural, and not at all surprising. But it must be remembered that there is another rule of the common law which must be given full effect. 'Cessante ratione cessat ipsa lex' was not declared in vain, and can never become obsolete; and if ever there was a question to which this wise rule can and ought to be satisfactorily invoked, that under consideration is surely one, as the design, the intent, the object of the law, is better carried out and more effectively secured." And in Pierce v. Indseth (1882) 106 U. S. 546, 27 L. ed. 254, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418, supra, the court quoted as applicable in the case under consideration the following statement by Mr. Justice Grier in Pillow v. Roberts (1851) 13 How. (U. S.) 472, 14 L. ed. 228: "Formerly, wax was the most convenient and the only material used to receive and retain the impression of the seal. Hence it was said: 'Sigillum est cera impressa; quia cera, sine impressione non est sigillum.' But this is not an allegation that an impression without wax is not a seal, and for this reason courts have held that an impression made on wafers or other adhesive substances capable of receiving an impression will come within the definition of 'cera impressa.' If, then, wax be construed to be merely a general term, including within it any substance capable of receiving and retaining the impression of a seal, we cannot perceive why paper, if it have that capacity, should not as well be included in the category. The simple and powerful machine now used to impress public seals does not require any soft or adhesive substance to receive or retain their impression. The impression made by such a power on paper is as well defined, as durable, and less likely to be destroyed or defaced by vermin, accident, or intention than that made on wax. It is the seal which authenticates, and not the substance on which it is impressed; and where the court can recognize its identity, they should not be called upon to analyze the material which exhibits it." And in Carter v. Burley (1838) 9 N. H. 558, where the seal was by distinct impression on the paper itself, the court, in rejecting the contention that such a seal was not good because no wafer or wax was used, said: "Nothing would have been added to its character by wafer or wax; and as this is not an uncommon mode of affixing official seals, we are of opinion that it is sufficient." So in Bank of Manchester v. Slason (1841) 18 Vt. 334, the court said: "The objection that the seal of the notary was not impressed upon wax or wafer is one which cannot avail. It has too long been settled that public seals do not require water or wax to their validity, to be now brought in question. It is now the more common and more convenient mode to impress such seals upon the paper itself."

An impression upon the paper or parchment itself with an intent to make a seal is as good as upon wax or any other tenacious substance. Orr v. Lacy (1847) 4 McLean, 243, Fed. Cas. No. 10,589. In fact, as appears in the quotation above made from Pierce v. Indseth (U. S.) and Connolly v. Goodwin (Cal.) supra, it has been declared with much show of reason that an impression on paper is better than wax.

However, in this connection it also has been said that while an impression in the paper is sufficient, "no adhesive substance is probably so good as wax to receive, retain, and distinctly exhibit the figures and legend or other devices upon a notarial seal," and that after a long time an impression in the paper alone "is apt to grow less distinct, especially if the paper be not of a quality good for retaining it." Bradley v. Northern Bank (1877) 60 Ala. 252.

Regardless, however, of which method is better, it is now almost universally conceded that it is enough, at least in the absence of positive law prescribing otherwise, that the impress of the seal is made upon the paper only.

Under this rule the seal must be legible. Pierce v. Indseth (U. S.) and Bradley v. Northern Bank (Ala.) supra; Stearns v. Chenault (1893) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 347, 23 S. W. 351. For instance in Pierce v. Indseth (U. S.) supra, it has been held that the impress must be readily identified upon inspection. And see Donegan v. Wood (1873) 49 Ala. 242, 20 Am. Rep. 275. And under the rule that a proper impression in the paper is sufficient, it was held in Bradley v. Northern Bank (Ala.) supra, that where the paper in question seventeen years after execution is found to have "a distinct circular outline impression of a seal with an indented inner edge, or rim, and within this a number of stars in a circular row, and between them and the edge the legend 'Notary Public, New Orleans, La.,'" it was sufficient, at least in the absence of any evidence creating a suspicion as to genuineness. And in Kentucky it has been held (Stearns v. Chenault (1893) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 347, 23 S. W. 351) that the impression of a notarial seal was sufficient although it was so dim that it was scarcely perceptible with the naked eye, the required inscriptions, etc., being discernible when a magnifying glass was used.

However, in the absence of statute so providing, an impression on paper is not the exclusive method, and wax or other adhesive substance capable of taking an impression may be used. It was so held in Stooksberry v. Swan (Tex.) supra, wherein it appeared that on the instrument in question was a circle defined by a discoloration of the paper and edged by small particles of red sealing wax, and in which it was ruled that, upon proof of the notary's signature and that he generally used a seal and molten wax, it was for the jury to say whether the notary had used a seal such as was required by statute.

And a notary's seal impressed directly upon paper by a die with which ink was used was held sufficient in Pierce v. Indseth (U. S.) supra. So, a notarial seal consisting of an impression in ink in the form of such a seal stamped upon the paper has been held to constitute a seal. The Gallego (1887) 30 Fed. 271.

On the other hand, in Stephens v. Williams (1877) 46 Iowa, 540, where the statutes required a seal with specified words "engraved" thereon and a "distinct impression" thereof filed, it was held that a wafer with the required words written upon it with a pen, but without any impression, was insufficient as a notarial seal.

III. Inscription on seal.

a. In general.

In the absence of regulating statute notaries public are authorized to provide their own seals with such inscription as their individual fancy or judgment may dictate. Kirksey v. Bates (1838) 7 Port. (Ala.) 529, 31 Am. Dec. 722; Mason v. Brock (1850) 12 Ill. 273, 52 Am. Dec. 490; Flemming v. Richardson (1853) 13 La. Ann. 414. And see Davis v. Roosevelt (1880) 53 Tex. 305. In fact it has been said that since it is the seal, and not its composition or character of words or devices, which raises the presumption of official character, any impression made upon wax or a wafer adhering to the paper, "without any device or words indicative of the particular official," is entitled to judicial sanction as evidence of the notarial character of the individual signing his name as such. Re Phillips (1876) 14 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 219, Fed. Cas. No. 11,098. And in holding that where the law does not specify what shall appear on the face of a seal, a notary may validly use a notarial seal not his own, although it differs somewhat in design from the one ordinarily used by him, the court in Muncie Nat. Bank v. Brown (1887) 112 Ind. 474, 14 N. E. 858, said: "The utmost that can be asserted is, that the notary public did not do his duty as the law requires, by attaching the seal he was accustomed to use. He did, in fact, take the acknowledgment of the mortgagor; he did execute and sign the proper certificate, and he did affix a seal to the certificate. If the acknowledgment must be condemned, it is because the officer did wrong in using a seal not his own. No one can perceive how this breach of duty could have worked injury to any person in the world. Whether the one seal or the other was used did not add to or take from the certificate any real efficacy. If the notary, two hours before the acknowledgment, had thrown away his old seal and adopted another, certainly no real harm to any person could have been done. Nor is it easy to see how the mere use of one seal instead of another, where both are mere general seals, without any peculiar marks or names, could do anybody any harm. Courts ought not, as it seems to us, to strike down a mortgage for such a breach of duty unless the law imperatively requires it. We cannot believe that the law requires such a result in a case where, as here, a notarial seal is used, although not the one the notary kept for use."

Under statutes which prescribe what inscription, emblems, etc., shall appear upon the face of notarial seals, there seems to be a difference of judicial opinion, some of the courts requiring a much stricter compliance with the statutory provisions than do others.

Thus, in Iowa and Texas, where the statutes expressly provide what must appear upon the face of a notarial seal, it has been held that such provisions must be, at least, substantially complied with. Gage v. Dubuque & P. R. Co. (1860) 11 Iowa, 310, 77 Am. Dec. 145; Neese v. Farmers' Ins. Co. (1881) 55 Iowa, 604, 8 N. W. 450; Hewitt v. Morgan (1893) 88 Iowa, 468, 55 N. W. 478; McKellar v. Peck (1878) 39 Tex. 381; Stringfellow v. Thomson (1880) 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 565. For instance, in Iowa it has been held that a statutory requirement that the seal show the name of the officer must be complied with, and that a seal which omits to do so is insufficient. Neese v. Farmers' Ins. Co. (1881) 55 Iowa, 604, 8 N. W. 450, supra; Hewitt v. Morgan (1893) 88 Iowa, 468, 55 N. W. 478, supra. And that the same is true as to the name of the state, see Hewitt v. Morgan (Iowa) supra.

And where the statutes provide that notaries shall verify under their "seal of office," a notary's official seal must be used. McKellar v. Peck (1878) 39 Tex. 381, holding that an acknowledgment sealed by a notary with the seal of the county court instead of his own was a nullity, although it was probably the result of a mistake.

On the other hand, some of the courts have adopted a more liberal policy and have regarded statutes of the character under consideration as directory rather than mandatory. Sonfield v. Thompson (1883) 42 Ark. 46, 48 Am. Rep. 49; Weeping Water v. Reed (1887) 21 Neb. 261, 31 N. W. 797; Stringfellow v. Thomson (1880) 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 565. And see Stearns v. Chenault (1893) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 347, 23 S. W. 351. Thus, proceeding upon the theory that a statute prescribing the emblems, devices, and legends which the impression of a notary's seal should present, is directory, and not mandatory, with respect to such provisions, it has been held that the Arkansas legislature, in enacting a statute providing that notary's seals by their impression "shall" present, among other things, "the emblems and devices presented by the great seal of the state," meant "to direct the use of the state emblems as the best for uniformity," but "did not intend that an instrument should be void without those particular impressions upon the seal, provided the notary should actually use the seal with which he was used to authenticate his official acts." Sonfield v. Thompson (Ark.) supra. And in Weeping Water v. Reed (1887) 21 Neb. 261, 31 N. W. 797, in construing a statute providing that each notary must "provide himself with an official seal on which shall be engraved the words 'Notarial seal,' the name of the county," and "the word 'Nebraska,'" and in addition, at his option, his name or the initial letters of his name," it was held that the words of the statute were permissive only, the court adopting the contention that the proper construction of the section was "that the seal must contain the words provided for, and if the notary so desire, he may add his name or the initials thereof; that he may exercise his option as to either, and that the seal is as good without either as with." And in Texas it has been held that a notarial seal which, instead of having the letters TEXAS around the extreme margin of the seal, had them placed between the several points of the star, was a substantial compliance with a statute directing that they be placed around the outer edge of the seal. Stringfellow v. Thomson (Tex.) supra.

And in Alabama it has been held that the statutory rule is not absolute. Thus, in Kirksey v. Bates (1838) 7 Port. (Ala.) 529, 31 Am. Dec. 722, where the statute provided that every notary must provide a public notarial seal "on which shall be engraved the arms of this territory, and shall have for legend, the name," office, and residence of the notary using the same, it was held that since the territory had no "arms" it was impossible to use the seal required, and consequently that a seal without a territorial coat of arms was sufficient.

And the seal of a notary public of one state is not rendered insufficient in another state simply because it does not contain the inscriptions required by the statutes of the latter state, at least where the laws of the notary's own state do not require him to have a seal of the peculiar design required in the other state. Crowley v. Barry (1846) 4 Gill (Md.) 194.

In the absence of statutory requirement, the seal of a notary public need not contain the name of the official. Re Phillips (1876) 14 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 219, Fed. Cas. No. 11,098; Deans v. Pate (1894) 114 N. C. 194, 19 S. E. 146. And for a statute which makes the placing of the notary's name on his seal optional, see Weeping Water v. Reed (1887) 21 Neb. 261, 31 N. W. 797, as set out supra, III. a.

With respect to the contention that a notarial seal must bear the name of the official, the court in Re Phillips (Fed.) supra, said: "Where has it ever been held in common-law courts that an official's seal must contain his name? We fail to find one in the absence of express legislation. An official seal, then, is the impression on the paper directly or on wax or wafer attached thereto, made by the official as and for his seal. But how are courts to know that it is his seal unless it contains his name, not written, but impressed on the document? The seal of a notary public is taken judicial notice of, the world over. We venture to affirm that the presumption in favor of an official seal does not arise from the name impressed on the paper; on the contrary, it is the seal which authenticates, not the particular name, word, or device on it. This is in harmony with the common-law idea of a seal, viz., the impression, and had its origin in those days when the great men and official dignitaries of earth could not write their names, and so had to sign by the signet, ring, cross, etc. Hence the seal impression placed upon a document by a notary public signifies authentication of his official character. It is the seal, and not its composition or character of words and devices, which raises the presumption of official character, of which courts take judicial notice."

And where the statute does not require the name of the notary to appear on his seal, it has been held that the mere fact that the instrument is signed "Geo. Theo. Sommer," and that the seal bears the name "Theo. Sommer," does not render the seal insufficient. Deans v. Pate (1894) 114 N. C. 194, 19 S. E. 146.

However, it has been said that the seal of a notary public must bear the name of the notary who uses it. Re Nebe (1875) 11 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 289, Fed. Cas. No. 10,073 (expressly disapproved in Re Phillips (Fed.) supra, which is set out and quoted supra this subdivision). And that this is the rule under a statute expressly requiring that the name of the notary appear on his seal, see Neese v. Farmers' Ins. Co. (1881) 55 Iowa, 604, 8 N. W. 450; and Hewitt v. Morgan (1893) 88 Iowa, 468, 55 N. W. 478, as set out supra, III. a. In Re Nebe (Fed.) supra, the court, in discussing the rule that a notary's seal must bear the name of the person employing it, said: "Public seals—and a notary's seal is a public seal—are held to prove themselves. Is any stamp which a notary chooses to affix to his signature entitled to recognition as his official seal? Such a construction strikes me as a burlesque upon the provisions of the act of Congress, which makes both signature and seal necessary to the authentication of the notary's act. And if as a public seal it proves itself, must it not show on its face what it is that it proves; not only that it is a seal, but that it is the seal of a notary public; and in order to show that it is the seal of the notary who employs it, that it must bear his name? If it be admitted that the seal in this case is the seal of a notary public, it is just as clearly the seal of every other of the notaries public, in number about one thousand, who hold office in the county of Wayne; and what then becomes of the provisions of the law which require the notary's act to be attested by 'his official seal?'"

A seal containing the words "notary public," and bearing the name of the officer who signed the instrument, sufficiently sets forth such officer's official character. Goodyear v. Hullihen (1867) 2 Hughes, 492, Fed. Cas. No. 5,573.

c. County and state.

Where the statutes do not require that the seal of a notary public shall state the name of the county in which the notary resides or for which he was appointed, a seal is sufficient although no county is named on the face thereof. Lange v. State (1884) 95 Ind. 114.

Likewise, if the statutes do not require the name of the state to appear on the seal, a seal is not rendered insufficient by an omission thereof. Goodnow v. Litchfield (1885) 67 Iowa, 691, 25 N. W. 882, affirmed in (1887) 123 U. S. 527, 81 L. ed. 194, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 203 (holding that under the facts it would be presumed that it was shown in the trial court that the laws of New York did not require the name of the state to appear on the seal of a notary public thereof).

But that where the statutory provision expressly requires that the "state" and "county" must appear, such provision should be complied with, see Weeping Water v. Reed (1887) 21 Neb. 261, 31 N. W. 797, as set out supra, III. b.

In Stearns v. Chenault (1893) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 347, 23 S. W. 351, it was held that a notarial seal in which the letter "O" appeared instead of the word "Ohio," this being the only departure from the statutory form, was not rendered defective thereby.

And that in Texas under a statute requiring the name of the state to be placed around the margin of the seal, a substantial compliance is sufficient, see Stringfellow v. Thomson (1880) 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 565, as set out supra, III. a.

d. Official and private seals.

Where the statutes expressly require that a notary use an official seal, a scrawl or private seal is insufficient. Mason v. Brock (1850) 12 Ill. 273, 52 Am. Dec. 490; Moore v. Titman (1864) 33 Ill. 358. And see Dumont v. M'Cracken (1842) 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 355. And this although the statute is silent as to the form and character of the seal, and the notary is free to adopt a seal with such an inscription as he may choose. Mason v. Brock (1850) 12 Ill. 273, 52 Am. Dec. 490. In such a case the seal adopted must be capable of "making a definite and uniform impression on the paper

. . . or on some tenacious substance attached thereto, so that when a question arises as to the genuineness of an authentication, it may be determined by reference to the seal in the possession of the officer." Ibid.

And under statutes which provide that the certificate of a notary shall be attested by "his official seal" and that "each notary public shall procure a seal which shall be called the seal of the notary public," it has been held that an official seal is essential, and that the substitution of a scrawl therefor is not warranted. Hinckley v. O'Farrel (1836) 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 185.

But under statutes expressly authorizing a notary to use his private seal until he obtains an official one, an impression by private seal is sufficient provided an official seal has not been obtained. Stark v. Barrett (1860) 15 Cal. 361, holding such to be the law under California Laws 1850, chap. 41. Especially where the certificate expressly acknowledges that the notary has not obtained an official seal. Fogarty v. Sawyer (1863) 23 Cal. 570. And the court in Morgan v. Cox (1886) 27 Fed. 36, seems to have been of the opinion that a notary public, in acknowledging a deed, may use a private seal, where he recites that he has no public seal (but this was without reference to any statutory provision).

And where there is no law requiring a notary public to have a particular style of seal, and it does not appear that such an officer has any other seal, it has been held that a "private scrawl in place of a seal" is sufficient. Flemming v. Richardson (1858) 13 La. Ann. 414. And in the Canadian case of Commercial Bank v. Brega (1867) 17 U. C. C. P. 473, it was held that any seal which a notary public declares to be his official seal is sufficient as an "official seal" under the statutes.

The inscription on the seal must not contradict the recitals in instrument to which it is attached. Thus, in Barber v. De Ford (1915) 169 Iowa, 692, 150 N. W. 86, where the affidavit under consideration recited that it was made before a notary public in and for Polk county, Iowa, but the seal showed him to be a notary public for St. Johns county, Florida, it was held that the affidavit was a nullity. And a similar conclusion was reached in Byrd v. Cochran (1894) 89 Neb. 109, 58 N. W. 127, where the paper itself showed upon its face that it was not executed within the jurisdiction of the notary sealing it.

Where the statutory laws expressly provide that a notary public must authenticate by his notarial seal, the mere affixing or imprinting of a notarial seal to a paper is insufficient unless it expressly appears in the instrument that the notary has so authenticated it by his seal. In other words, it has been held that in such a case the affixing of a notarial seal to an official instrument requiring a seal is insufficient unless it expressly appears in the instrument that the seal has been so attached for the purpose of authentication. Thus, in Wetmore v. Laird (1870) 5 Biss. 160, Fed. Cas. No. 17,467, the use of the expression, "Witness my hand and seal," was held to be insufficient. So it has been said that even though there is on the paper what purports to be a seal, it is not sufficient unless the notary certifies that it is his official seal or makes some direct reference to it either in the body of the instrument or in the jurat thereof. DAWSEY v. KIRVEN (reported herewith) ante, 1658 (holding that a certificate was insufficiently sealed where it merely purported to be under "his hand" without reference to the attached seal). But applying the same rule, it has also been held that the certificate of a notary public which recited, "Witness my hand and seal," instead of "official seal," was sufficient where the statute provided that he must attach "his seal of office," it appearing that the notarial seal was impressed and that the certificate purported to be a notarial act. Monroe v. Arledge (1859) 23 Tex. 478. The court said that under such circumstances there could be no pretense that the seal used was a private seal.

However, in Missouri and Texas it has been held that where an actual seal of office is affixed to a notary's certificate, it is not rendered invalid by the failure of the notary to declare in the certificate itself that the official seal was so affixed. Clark v. Rynex (1873) 53 Mo. 380; Dale v. Wright (1874) 57 Mo. 110; Webb v. Huff (1884) 61 Tex. 677. In the Clark Case the court said: "The point taken is, that the certificate itself must state that the official seal was affixed. This is the usual form; but where the official seal is in fact affixed, that is sufficient without referring to it in the testimonium or body of the instrument. When a scrawl is used in place of a seal, the statute requires that the instrument must on its face express to be sealed. But where an actual seal is used, it need not be referred to in the instrument." These Missouri holdings undoubtedly were influenced by the fact that the statute provided that if a mere scrawl was used in place of a seal, the instrument must recite its sealing. But in Webb v. Huff (Tex.) supra, it was squarely held that it was not absolutely necessary to add the words, "Given under my hand and seal of office," etc., the court saying: "It is objected that the notary did not add the words, 'Given under my hand and seal of office,' etc. These venerable words ought, no doubt, to be used by all notaries, especially as they have been adopted into the form given by the statute (Rev. Stat. 4812); but we do not think that their presence or their absence will affect the validity of the instrument. When the notary has appended his official signature and seal to the certificate, the seal gives authority to the document as well as to the signature. And it will add no weight whatever for him to append the words, 'this is my seal,' 'this is my signature,' or any equivalent words."

V. Place on paper.

It has been held that the fact that a seal is placed upon one part of the paper rather than another is unimportant and does not affect the sufficiency of the seal.

It was so held in Bernheim v. Heyman (1907) 31 Ky. L. Rep. 984, 104 S. W. 388, where the certificate was written in three parts, but the seal was placed between the first and second parts.

And in Osgood v. Sutherland (1886) 36 Minn. 243, 31 N. W. 211, in holding that a notarial seal placed on the right-hand side of the paper immediately below the jurat and above the certificate, which certificate showed that it was intended to be under seal, whereas no jurat was necessary and did not refer to the seal, was sufficient, the court said: "Of course, it is of no importance where a seal is affixed,—whether at the beginning, end, or margin. Assuming that a seal was necessary, we would, upon this state of facts, consider this seal as attached to the certificate. We feel warranted in doing so, inasmuch as the objection is merely formal. The chief object of a seal is as evidence of the official character of the notary, and this purpose is as fully served by this seal as if it were at the end of the certificate, or another one attached there."

So it has been held that where there is but one certificate to which a plainly visible notarial seal could be made applicable, such a seal is sufficient, although on the opposite side and end of the paper from the certificate. Evans v. Smith (1890) 43 Minn. 59, 44 N. W. 880.

Under a statute providing that a certificate shall be "in the form or to the purport hereinafter following," and prescribing a form which places the seal before and to the left of the name of the officer, it has been held that a seal is sufficient, although the seal was at the right instead of the left of the officer's name. Vinson v. Nicholas (1887) 23 S. C. 198, 5 S. E. 357.

v.
KANSAS-OKLAHOMA TRACTION COMPANY, Appt.

Kansas Supreme Court — June 8, 1918.

(103 Kan. 249, 173 Pac. 338.)

Carrier — defect in floor — injury to passenger — res ipsa loquitur.

1. The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is properly applied in case of injuries to a passenger caused by a derailment, the collision with another train, the breaking of a rail, or by some defect in the equipment of the train which the passenger is presumed to know nothing about, for the reason that he has no way of anticipating or ascertaining, either before or after the accident, what occasioned it. It has no application to a case where a passenger is injured by some defect in the floor of the car which is visible to the passenger, and which causes the passenger to fall while attempting to alight from the train at a station.

— care required.

2. "A carrier is bound to exercise the highest degree of care that is reasonably practical in safely carrying passengers and setting them down safely at their destinations."

— how far insurer.

3. But the carrier is not an insurer of the safety of passengers, and an instruction which charged that it is the duty of the carrier to provide for the safe entry and exit of its patrons to and from its cars is subject to criticism, because it makes the carrier the insurer of the safety of the passenger.

[See 4 R. C. L. 1136.]

Trial — instruction — injury as evidence of negligence:

4. In an action by a passenger of an interurban railway to recover damages alleged to have been caused by a defect in the floor of the vestibule of the car in which her foot caught while she was in the act of alighting at a station, it is error to charge that the happening of an accident resulting in injury to a passenger is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the carrier, and that "it will be incumbent upon the company or carrier to produce evidence which will excuse the prima facie failure to do its duty, or, in other words, it has the burden of proof, in order to rebut the presumption of negligence under the circumstances, that the accident could not have been avoided by the exercise of the highest practicable care and diligence."

Headnotes by PORTER, J.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Montgomery County (Holdren, J.) in favor of plaintiff, and from an order overruling a motion for new trial in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John J. Jones and Chester Stevens, for appellant:

The evidence must be confined to the issues as shown by the pleadings.

Western Home Ins. Co. v. Thorp, 48 Kan. 289, 28 Pac. 991; Dodge City v. Wright, 48 Kan. 667, 29 Pac. 1086; Frazier v. Ebenezer Baptist Church, 60 Kan. 404, 56 Pac. 752.

The carrier is not an insurer, and especially is this true of persons boarding or alighting from the carrier's trains or vehicles of transportation.

Lynch v. Missouri P. R. Co. 92 Kan. 735, 142 Pac. 938; 3 Thomp. Neg. § 2763; Le Barron v. East Boston Ferry Co. 11 Allen, 312, 87 Am. Dec. 717, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 760, 5 R. C. L. § 712; 4 R. C. L. § 653.

The instructions given to the jury as to the care required of the carrier were contrary to law.

Elliott, Railroads, 2d ed. § 1585.

The verdict of the jury is excessive and is unwarranted by the evidence.

Tefft v. Wilcox, 6 Kan. 46.

Messrs. Walter S. Keith and S. H. Piper, for appellee:

There is no showing made that the defendant was in any way misled, and any variance there may have been between allegations and proof would not justify the court in reversing the case.

Hutchinson Lumber & Planing Mill Co. v. Baker, 74 Kan. 120, 86 Pac. 1016; Tipton v. Warner, 47 Kan. 610, 28 Pac. 712; Roberts v. Southern Surety Co. 101 Kan. 375, 166 Pac. 498.

Where the evidence shows that the injury resulted directly from the defect in the floor of the vestibule of the car, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies with all its force and vigor.

Topeka City R. Co. v. Higga, 38 Kan. 375, 5 Am. St. Rep. 754, 16 Pac. 667; Tuller v. Talbot, 23 Ill. 357, 76 Am. Dec. 695; Elliott, Railroads, 2d ed. § 1587; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. A passenger, by undertaking to prove some specific cause of accident, does not waive the presumption of negligence arising from the injury to him.

A railroad company is bound to exercise the highest practicable care for the safety of its passengers, in keeping its equipment in safe condition.

Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Sheeks, 155 Ind. 74, 56 N. E. 434.

When plaintiff made it to appear that she was a passenger upon defendant's train, and, while being carried as such, the car in which she was seated left the track and she suffered injuries thereby, she had shown a state of things upon which a presumption of negligence arose against the railroad company, which stood with the force and efficiency of actual proof of the fact, and was available for her benefit until negated and overthrown.

Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Jones, 108 Ind. 551, 9 N. E. 479; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Brandon, 77 Kan. 614, 95 Pac. 573.

The court will not reverse a case and send it back for another trial unless there has been prejudicial error committed.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was a passenger on an electric interurban car of the defendant. In attempting to alight from the car at Coffeyville her foot caught in some manner, and she fell from the platform and sustained serious injuries. She brought suit and charged the defendant with negligence in permitting the floor of the vestibule of the car to be in a defective condition, and alleged that the boards in the floor were old, rotten, worn, and decayed to such an extent that a large opening, the exact dimensions of which she was unable to state, was in the floor, which condition had existed for a long time, making the place unsafe and insecure for passengers attempting to alight from the car. She alleged that while in the act of stepping from the vestibule with her left foot the shoe on her right foot caught and fastened itself in the floor of the vestibule, causing her to be thrown forward and downward upon the pavement. The answer, besides a general denial, alleged that whatever injuries the plaintiff sustained were caused, not from any negligence of the defendant, but resulted through her own negligence and want of care in attempting to alight from the car, and the further defense that her injuries were the result of an unavoidable accident for which the defendant was not liable. The jury returned a verdict in plaintiff's favor in the sum of $3,500. The court overruled a motion for a new trial, and the defendant appeals.

There is a contention that the plaintiff was allowed to recover upon a ground of negligence not alleged in her petition, but we think this complaint is somewhat technical. While there was no positive proof that the boards in the platform were rotten, or decayed, there was evidence that there was an opening or crack in the floor in which the heel of the plaintiff's shoe caught, with the result that she was thrown from the car and injured, and some evidence that the crack in the floor was worn. It is true there was a conflict in the testimony in regard to the condition of the floor, but there was no error in overruling the demurrer to the evidence. The testimony of the defendant's witnesses showed that the floor of the vestibule was constructed with a trapdoor which covers the steps when the car is in motion, but is raised up to permit passengers to alight, and that the edge of the flooring is beveled off so as to permit the door to be lifted, and that the crack was necessary to make the door work, and that it had always been there. Defendant's witnesses also testified that no part of the flooring was split off or missing. On the other hand, the testimony introduced by the plaintiff's witnesses tended to show that there were slivers in the crack, and that the opening was wide enough at one place to catch the heel of plaintiff's shoe, and that this condition caused her to fall.

The defendant requested an instruction as follows: "Negligence is not to be presumed in this case; it is a fact to be proved by the plaintiff as she has alleged it."

The first part of the instruction would have been proper, but there was no error in refusing to give the instruction as requested, because the second clause would have held the plaintiff to the literal proof of every act of negligence alleged in the petition. It was not necessary that she establish the fact that the crack in the boards was occasioned by their being allowed to become old or rotten. There is a complaint that in the instructions given the court assumed some of the facts as alleged in the petition, but we think the jury were not misled by the language used. There is some room for complaint of the trial court's instructions on the ground that they state too strongly the duties and obligations imposed upon a carrier of passengers, and emphasize that feature more than was necessary. Some of the instructions were admirably drawn and state the rule of law correctly. In other instructions upon this branch of the case we think the court committed reversible error. In instruction No. 7 the jury were charged that it is the duty of the carrier to provide for the safe entry and exit of its patrons to and from its cars. The instruction is open to the objection that it makes the carrier the insurer of the safety of the passenger, and this is not the law.

Carrier—how far insurer.

While carriers are the insurers of freight, they are not insurers of the safety of passengers. The court in instruction No. 6 properly charged that it is the duty of the carrier to use the highest degree of care consistent with the practical operation of the road to conserve the safety and security of its passengers, and that such duty continues until the passenger reaches his destination, and repeated the same rule in instruction No. 8. The well-recognized rule as to the duty owed to passengers is stated in the recent case of Lynch v. Missouri P. R. Co. 92 Kan. 735, 142 Pac. 938, as follows: "A carrier is bound to exercise the highest degree of care that is reasonably practical in safely carrying passengers and setting them down safely at their destinations." Syllabus 1.

The most serious complaint of the instruction is that the court applied the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. In the eighth instruction it was charged that the mere happening of an accident resulting in injury to a passenger, due to defect in equipment of a car, is prima facie evidence of negligence. Again, in instruction No. 9, the jury were charged that the happening of an accident resulting in injury to a passenger is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the carrier, "and it will be incumbent upon the company or carrier to produce evidence which will excuse the prima facie failure to do its duty; or, in other words, it has the burden of proof, in order to rebut the presumption of negligence under the circumstances, that the accident could not have been avoided by the exercise of the highest practicable care and diligence."

Again, the doctrine was applied even more strongly in instruction No. 15, which reads: "You are further instructed that, it being admitted that plaintiff was a passenger on defendant's car, and, when it is made to appear that, while attempting to alight therefrom in the manner and form alleged by her, she suffered injuries, she had then shown a state of things upon which a presumption of negligence arises against the defendant company which will stand with the force and efficiency of actual proof of the fact, and is available for her benefit until negated and overthrown, and such presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant can only be overthrown by proof that the casualty resulted from inevitable or unavoidable accident, against which no human skill, prudence, or foresight, as usually and practicably applied to careful railroad management, could provide."

These instructions should not have been given. The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur in cases of injuries to a passenger is properly applied in case of a derailment, or the collision with another train, the breaking of a rail, or by some defect in the equipment of the train which the passenger is presumed to know nothing about, for the reason that he has no way of anticipating or ascertaining, either before or after the accident, what occasioned it. To hold that it applies to a case where the passenger is alighting from a train and is injured in the manner charged in the plaintiff's petition would be to hold that the passenger, in alighting from the train, is not bound to exercise some degree of care. The carrier is bound to provide reasonably safe conditions and appliances to enable passengers to board and alight from its cars. 4 R. C. L. § 653. Some of the exceptions to the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur are those stated in Thompson's Commentaries on Negligence, vol. 3, § 2763, as follows: "It does not apply where the defect, deficiency, or peculiarity in the carrier's means of transportation or accommodation, which was the occasion of the accident, was visible to, seen by, or known to the passenger, as well as to the carrier, and where the accident took place either before the actual commencement of the transit or after its termination, and while the passenger was in the affirmative act of boarding the carrier's vehicle, or alighting therefrom, or coming upon or passing from the grounds of the carrier,—in all of which cases the carrier is not the exclusive bailee of the passenger, but the passenger is required, under the principles of the law, to take reasonable care for his own safety."

The principal cases cited by the plaintiff do not sustain her contention. Thus, in the case of Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Walsh, 45 Kan. 659, 26 Pac. 47, where it was held that proof of the accident and extent of passenger's injury will make a prima facie case in his favor, the passenger was injured by the derailment of the train on which he was riding. It was held in that case that the passenger had made a prima facie case by showing the occurrence of the accident and the extent of his injuries. In the opinion it was said: "It is well settled by the authorities that in such cases a prima facie presumption of negligence on the part of the railroad company arises, which throws the onus upon the company of disproving a want of care on its part." (p. 659.)

Another case relied upon by the plaintiff is Schonleben v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co. 160 App. Div. 790, 145 N. Y. Supp. 682, where the facts were very similar to those in the present case. The floor of the car was covered with wooden slats about one inch apart, fastened by metal screws. One of these projected above the slats, and the plaintiff's shoe was caught, and he was thrown down and injured. The plaintiff had no knowledge of the existence of the screw until he was thrown down, and was not guilty of any contributory negligence. It was held that the mere happening of the accident under the circumstances described imposed upon the defendant the duty of an explanation. The instructions complained of in the present case state the law to be that the mere happening of the accident (without reference to any knowledge the plaintiff might have had of the condition of the floor, or her duty to exercise reasonable care in alighting from the car) makes the rule of res ipsa loquitur apply the same as if the accident had been caused by a derailment or a collision, or something the plaintiff could not know about. Another case cited by the plaintiff is Gleeson v. Virginia Midland R. Co. 140 U. S. 435, 448, 35 L. ed. 458, 463, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 862, where it was said that "it has been settled law in this court that the happening of an injurious accident is in passenger cases prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the carrier, and that (the passenger being himself in the exercise of due care) the burden then rests upon the carrier to show that its whole duty was performed, and that the injury was unavoidable by human foresight." (p. 443.)

The instructions we have quoted from stated the rule too broadly, and left out any consideration of plaintiff's duty to exercise due care. The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur has no application to the present case, and because of the errors in the instructions the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for another trial.

ANNOTATION.

Application of res ipsa loquitur doctrine to injury to passenger from defective or dangerous condition of floor of car.

While the authorities are not agreed in their ultimate holdings as to the applicability of the res ipsa loquitur doctrine to an injury to a passenger resulting from a defective or dangerous condition of the floor of the car in which he is riding, the decisions of the respective courts are not necessarily inconsistent. The question seems to be one of fact rather than of law, the determining factor in each case apparently being the nature of the defect or obstruction which causes the injury. Thus, where the cause of injury is a defective condition which is due to the failure to repair or to keep the appliances of transportation in good working order, and is not visible to or known to the injured person, the res ipsa loquitur doctrine is held to apply. Jorden v. St. Louis & M. River R. Co. (1907) 122 Mo. App. 330, 99 S. W. 492; McRae v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1907) 125 Mo. App. 562, 102 S. W. 1082; Schonleben v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co. (1914) 160 App. Div. 790, 145 N. Y. Supp. 682; Baum v. New York & Q. C. R. Co. (1908) 124 App. Div. 12, 108 N. Y. Supp. 265; Powell v. Hudson Valley R. Co. (1903) 88 App. Div. 133, 84 N. Y. Supp. 337.

Thus, in Jorden v. St. Louis & M. River R. Co. (1907) 122 Mo. App. 330, 99 S. W. 492, supra, wherein it appeared that a trapdoor in the floor of a car collapsed under the weight of the plaintiff, causing her serious and permanent injuries, the court held that such an accident was of itself sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the company within the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. The court said: "It is a mishap of an extraordinary character, to an appliance within the exclusive control of the railroad company, and one that is not likely to happen in the absence of negligence on the part of the company's employees. . . . We consider this one of the clearest cases imaginable for the application of the maxim. The giving way of the floor of a car under a passenger's ordinary tread is more cogent evidence of bad management than the collision of two cars, which is held to bespeak negligence."

Likewise, in Baum v. New York & Q. C. R. Co. (1908) 124 App. Div. 12, 108 N. Y. Supp. 265, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff was injured in consequence of the flying up of a trapdoor in the floor of a car, the court held that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applied, and that it required evidence from the defendant to explain the cause of the occurrence.

In Schonleben v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co. (1914) 160 App. Div. 790, 145 N. Y. Supp. 682, it appeared that the floor of a car was covered with wooden slats fastened thereto by metal screws. One of these screws in the aisle between the seats projected above the slats from one half to three quarters of an inch. The plaintiff, on leaving the car, caught his shoe on this screw and was thrown down and injured. The court held that the mere happening of the accident under the circumstances described made out a prima facie case for the plaintiff under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

In McRae v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1907) 125 Mo. App. 562, 102 S. W. 1082, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff was seriously injured as a result of stepping on a highly electrified metal plate in the floor of the car, the court held that there was no error in an instruction given on behalf of the plaintiff which in effect charged that the injuries sustained raised a presumption of negligence on the part of the company. The court said: "The carrier is not an insurer of the safety of the passenger, and is liable only for injuries inflicted by its negligence, and the burden of proof always is on the passenger to establish the fact of the carrier's negligence by evidence. But, where the passenger shows that his injury was caused by some breaking of machinery, a collision, derailment of cars, or something improper or unsafe in the conduct of the business or in the appliances of transportation, he need go no further, since from any such happening a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier arises. . . . The conceded facts demonstrate that the shock was caused by a defective condition of one of the appliances of transportation. The existence of a highly electrified metal plate in the passageway for passengers constituted such a defect, and the burden was cast on defendant to show that its presence could not have been detected and prevented by the exercise of the highest degree of care."

In Powell v. Hudson Valley R. Co. (1903) 88 App. Div. 133, 84 N. Y. Supp. 337, it appeared that the plaintiff was a passenger in one of the defendant's electric cars, and, there being no seat for her to occupy, was compelled to stand on a plate in the floor directly over one of the wheels. By reason of the overcrowded condition of the car, the plate was pressed down on the wheel and the friction caused by the contact heated the plate to such an extent that the plaintiff was burned. It was held that the heating of the plate raised a presumption of failure on the part of the defendant to exercise due care to protect its passengers.

On the other hand, where the injury results from some defect or from some peculiarity in the construction of the car which is visible to the passenger, the res ipsa loquitur doctrine is held not to apply. Perkins v. Bay State Street R. Co. (1916) 223 Mass. 235, 111 N. E. 717; Farley v. Philadelphia Traction Co. (1890) 132 Pa. 58, 18 Atl. 1090. And see the reported case (CLOUD v. KANSAS-OKLAHOMA TRACTION Co. ante, 1671).

Thus, in Farley v. Philadelphia Traction Co. (Pa.) supra, it appeared that the plaintiff, a passenger on an open street railway car, arose to signal the conductor, and while in this position tripped on a sheathing over a wheel of the car, fell off the car, and was injured. The court held that the happening of the accident raised no presumption of negligence on the part of the company, since the car was not defective in any respect, the obstruction complained of being a conspicuous part of the car, and the manner of construction being the usual manner of construction of summer cars on street railways.

So, in Perkins v. Bay State Street R. Co. (Mass.) supra, it appeared that the plaintiff, while leaving a street car, caught the heel of her shoe in the cleats or guides at the iron threshold of the door, causing her to be thrown into the vestibule and severely injured. The car was new and no claim was made that it was defective or out of repair, but the plaintiff contended that the construction and arrangement of the threshold were faulty and unsafe. The court held that since no part of the car gave way, the mere happening of the accident afforded no presumption of negligence on the part of the company, and the burden was on the plaintiff to show that the company had failed to use due care in the equipment of its railroad.

In the reported case (CLOUD v. KANSAS-OKLAHOMA TRACTION Co. ante, 1671) the court holds that no presumption of negligence arises where a passenger, in attempting to alight, is injured in consequence of catching her foot in a defect in the floor of the car, visible to her. It is said that to hold otherwise would be to hold that a passenger, in alighting, is not bound to exercise some degree of care.

It seems that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur will not be applied where the exact cause of the injury does not clearly appear. Thus, in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Davis (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 161 S. W. 932, the plaintiff alleged that while she was attempting to alight from a train, the lower part of her dress caught on a bolt, nail, screw, or other projection protruding from the platform of the car, as a result of which she was thrown to the ground and injured. It was held that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur had no proper application, the ground of the decision being the failure of the plaintiff's evidence to show the cause of the fall with any degree of certainty. The court said that the existence of a loose screw or other projection on the platform of the car was a mere inference from the fact that the plaintiff's dress caught.

STATE OF MONTANA EX REL. WILLIAM CUTTS, Member of the House of Representatives, Reapt.,
v.

H. L. HART, State Treasurer, Appt.

Montana Supreme Court — December 10, 1919.

(— Mont. —, 185 Pac. 769.)

Officer — members of legislature appointed without authority.

1. One appointed by the governor without authority to fill a vacancy caused by the death of a member of the state legislature cannot compel payment to him of the salary annexed to such office.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1682.]

Legislature — appointment of members — constitutional power.

2. Under a constitutional provision that when vacancies occur in either house of the legislature, the governor shall issue writs of election to fill the same, the legislature cannot, where the Constitution also provides that its provisions are mandatory and prohibitory, authorize the governor to fill a vacancy by appointment, although there is not sufficient time for an election before termination of the session.

Definition — de facto officer.

3. An officer de facto is one in possession of an office and discharging its functions under color of authority or title derived from irregular, informal or defective appointment or election.

[See 22 R. C. L. 588, 594.]

Officer — right of de facto officer to salary.

4. A de facto officer cannot recover the compensation annexed to the office.

[See 22 R. C. L. 599.]

Legislature — effect of admitting illegally elected member.

5. Although the Constitution makes each house of the legislature judge of the qualifications, election, and return of its membership, one admitted to a seat after selection in a manner forbidden by the Constitution cannot secure the aid of the courts to compel payment of his compensation.

Mandamus — to compel payment of salary to officer illegally elected.

6. Mandamus does not lie to compel payment of salary to an officer whose petition shows on its face that he acquired the office in a manner not authorized by the Constitution.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Lewis and Clark County (Poorman, J.) in favor of relator in a mandamus proceeding to compel payment of a warrant issued to him for salary as member of the House of Representatives. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. S. C. Ford and Frank Woody for appellant.

Messrs. Galen & Mettler and E. G. Toomey, for respondent:

The governor, in making the appointment of the relator to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Jerry J. Flannigan, only acted within his right, and simply performed his duty as the chief executive of the state under the Constitution and statutes of Montana.

State ex rel. Chenoweth v. Acton, 31 Mont. 37, 77 Pac. 299; Collins v. State, 8 Ind. 344.

Hurly, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Relator instituted mandamus proceedings against H. L. Hart, state treasurer, to enforce payment of a warrant issued to relator as and for salary as a member of the house of representatives of the fifteenth session. On or about February 7, 1917, Jerry J. Flannigan, a member of the house elected from Silver Bow county, died, and thereupon the governor issued to relator a commission to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Flannigan, no election having been had to fill the vacancy, and on such date relator was seated as a member of such house, and continued as a member thereof. At the close of the session there was issued to him a warrant in payment of his per diem and mileage, pursuant to a resolution of the house, payment of which was refused by the state treasurer, defendant herein. The facts are uncontroverted by the defendant. Judgment was granted in favor of relator in the district court.

Section 9, article 5, of our Constitution provides:

"... Each house . . . shall judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members."

"Sec. 45. When vacancies occur in either house the governor or the person exercising the functions of the governor shall issue writs of election to fill the same."

Section 420 of the Revised Codes provides:

"An office becomes vacant on the . . . death of the incumbent."

"Sec. 422. Whenever a vacancy . . . occurs in either house of the legislative assembly, the governor must at once issue a writ of election to fill such vacancy."

"Sec. 423. When any office becomes vacant, and no mode is provided by law for filling such vacancy, the governor must fill such vacancy by granting a commission to expire at the end of the next legislative assembly or at the next election by the people."

It is contended by respondent that, Flannigan having died during a session of the legislature and there being no mode provided by the Code for filling the vacancy during the time which would elapse before the election could be had, these sections, and particularly § 423, authorized an appointment by the governor, which view was adopted by the house.

Section 29, article 3, of the Constitution provides: "The provisions of this Constitution are mandatory and prohibitory unless by express words they are declared to be otherwise."

In our view, the Constitution (art. 5, § 45, supra) provides the only means for filling a vacancy occurring by death or resignation of a member.

Legislature—appointment of members—
power.

The Constitution being mandatory as to the subjects on which it speaks (§ 29, supra), and having provided that when vacancies occur in either house the governor shall issue writs of election to fill the same, the people retained in themselves, and in themselves alone, the power to fill vacancies in the legislative bodies. There being, by the terms of the constitutional provision above referred to, a "mode . . . provided by law for filling such vacancy," the provisions of the statute (§ 423) do not apply here; and relator's appointment having been made contrary to the provisions of the Constitution, he was at most a de facto officer.

The right of a public officer to compensation for the performance of duties imposed upon him by law does not rest upon contract, but is incidental to the right to hold office. McGillic v. Corby, 37 Mont. 249, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1263, 95 Pac. 1063; 22 R. C. L. pp. 525 et seq. An officer de facto has been said to be one in possession of an office and discharging its functions under color of authority or of title derived from irregular, informal, or defective appointment or election. 22 R. C. L. p. 523, and cases cited.

It is a generally recognized rule that a de facto officer cannot recover the compensation annexed to the office, and that, while the acts of such officer are valid so far as they concern the public or the rights of third persons, when he sues in his own right to recover fees or salary due him by virtue of the office, he must show that he is an officer de jure. People v. Boulware v. Porter, 55 Mont. 471, 178 Pac. 882, this court said: "It is nevertheless the contention that, when he [a public officer] comes into court to enforce the payment of compensation on account of his services, he must assume the burden of showing that he is in right as well as in fact a member of the house. We agree with this contention, for it is the general rule that the emoluments follow the legal title to the office."

While there are exceptions to these rules, this case is not within any of them. On the general subject of actions brought by a de facto officer to recover the salary annexed to the office, see Constantineau, De Facto Doctrine, §§ 236 and 237, and cases cited; Thropp, Pub. Off. § 510; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 331; 22 R. C. L. pp. 321 et seq. As indicating some of the points directly passed upon in the cited cases, the following brief references are given:

One who has occupied an office to which he is ineligible is not entitled to maintain an action for the salary thereof. Vicksburg v. Groome, — Miss. —, 24 So. 306.

When a statute provides that an officer shall be appointed in a certain way, if he be appointed in a manner different from that provided by statute, held, he cannot recover as a de facto officer. Phelon v.

Granville, 140 Mass. 386, 5 N. E. 269.

In Sheridan v. St. Louis, 183 Mo. 25, 81 S. W. 1082, 2 Ann. Cas. 480, the facts were very similar to those here involved. One Vogel was elected as a member of the house of delegates of the city of St. Louis, defeating Sheridan, the plaintiff above named. When the house organized, a contest was initiated against Vogel on the ground that he had been convicted of crime, and hence was ineligible. Upon these charges he was unseated, and Sheridan, having received the next highest number of votes, was declared entitled to the seat by a vote of the house, and during the session the auditor was directed to draw him a warrant for the salary, amounting to $600. After holding that, under the statute of Missouri, Sheridan was not duly elected, notwithstanding the provision of the city charter as follows: "Each house . . . shall be the sole judge of the qualification, election and returns of its own members," etc.—the court held that, it appearing that Sheridan had been declared elected contrary to the provisions of law, his suit for salary could not be maintained, regardless of the action of the house in seating him and authorizing payment of his salary. See also Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 381, and note thereto.

Suppose that one, not an American citizen and who has not even declared his intention to become one, should be a successful candidate at the polls for a seat in the legislative assembly, and seated despite his noncitizenship; what right could be shown in his favor, should he bring mandamus to recover his salary, if his petition disclosed on its face that he was not a citizen? Or suppose that upon the candidacy of such person, proceedings should be brought to prevent his name being placed upon the election ballots; can it be doubted that the court could restrain the placing of the same thereon, when his ineligibility was made to appear, even though, if elected, the legislature might possibly seat him as a member?

People ex rel. Sherwood v. State Canvassers, 129 N. Y. 360, 14 L.R.A. 646, 29 N. E. 345, involved the question whether one who was ineligible under the Constitution of New York to a seat in the legislative assembly, and who had received a majority or plurality in his candidacy for election to the assembly, could compel the state board of canvassers by mandamus to issue to him a certificate of election. The court said: "But it is claimed that we have no jurisdiction to determine that the relator was ineligible to the office of senator, because the Constitution, in § 10 of article 3, provides that each house of the legislature 'shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.' The courts cannot interfere with this jurisdiction of the senate. Whatever may be determined here or elsewhere as to the election or qualification of the relator, or the result of the election in the twenty-seventh senatorial district, when the senate convenes, and not until then, it will have absolute jurisdiction of the whole subject, and may determine which of the two persons claiming seats therein was duly elected and qualified to sit therein; and it may determine that one was ineligible and that the other was not elected, and that thus there is a vacancy in that district calling for a new election. It is undoubtedly true that the courts cannot, by quo warranto, try the title to a legislative office; but this is not such a case. Here the relator comes into court and asks its aid to clothe him with apparent title to an office, and by its affirmative action to remove obstacles which stand in his pathway in his proposed intrusion into the office; and upon the undisputed facts the court is able to see that he is ineligible, and it simply determines that it will not aid him, and in making such determination it in no way infringes upon the jurisdiction confided to the senate. It simply exercises a jurisdiction which he has invoked."

There can, of course, be no question that under the Constitution plenary power is lodged in each house to judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its membership; nevertheless, when it appears that such body has proceeded in an unconstitutional manner, the courts are not required to lend their assistance in aid of one who sues for his emoluments, basing his rights upon such action.

Legislature—
effect of admitting illegally elected member.

We are not concerned here with the right of a de facto officer to sue upon quantum meruit for the value of services rendered. In this proceeding, relator desires the court by mandamus to compel the state treasurer to pay him the compensation which he alleges is due him by reason of his appointment and services. To obtain the aid of a court by mandamus, a party must establish a clear legal right in himself to the relief prayed for, and a violation of duty upon the part of the person or officer, sought to be coerced. Rev. Codes, § 7214; State ex rel. Beach v. District Ct. 29 Mont. 265, 74 Pac. 498; State ex rel. Donlan v. Sanders County, 49 Mont. 517, 143 Pac. 984.

Relator having acquired his membership in the house of representatives in a manner not provided for by the Constitution, and his petition disclosing this fact on its face, he does not bring himself within any rule entitling him to the aid of a writ of mandamus. The judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the District Court to dismiss the proceeding.

ANNOTATION.

Right to salary of one illegally elected or appointed to legislature.

Although the right of a de facto officer to receive the salary or emoluments connected with the office has often been discussed by the courts, the reported case (STATE EX REL. CUTTS v. HART, ante, 1678) is apparently the only case wherein the proposition has been considered in connection with a member of a state legislature. It is therein held that one who is appointed by the governor to fill a vacancy in one of the branches of the legislature, when the method provided by the Constitution for filling the vacancy is by election, is a de facto officer, and as such is not entitled to the compensation annexed to the office.

A few cases have been found wherein the facts were somewhat similar to those in the reported case, although the precise question therein discussed did not arise. Thus, in State ex rel. Boulware v. Porter (1918) 55 Mont. 471, 178 Pac. 832, while it was held that the relator in that case was a de jure member of the assembly, and was entitled to the salary attached to the office, the court said: "Conceding for present purposes that relator is entitled to the privileges and immunities of a member and that he may vote upon pending measures, it is nevertheless the contention that when he comes into court to enforce the payment of compensation on account of his services, he must assume the burden of showing that he is, in right as well as in fact, a member of the house. We agree with this contention, for it is the general rule that the emoluments follow the legal title to the office."

So, in Sheridan v. St. Louis (1904) 183 Mo. 25, 81 S. W. 1082, 2 Ann. Cas. 480, it appeared that the plaintiff was defeated for election as member of the house of delegates of the city of St. Louis. His successful opponent was afterwards unseated on the ground that he had been convicted of a crime, and hence was ineligible, and the plaintiff, having received the next highest number of votes, was declared by the house to be entitled to the seat, and during the session the auditor was instructed to draw him a warrant for the salary, amounting to $600. The court held that under the statute of Missouri the plaintiff was not duly elected, and, as he was not a de jure member of the house, his suit for salary could not be maintained, regardless of the action of the house in seating him and authorizing payment of his salary.

In State ex rel. Thompson v. Kenney (1890) 9 Mont. 223, 23 Pac. 733, an action brought by a member of the legislature to compel the state auditor to settle the relator's claim against the state for his compensation and mileage as a member of the house of representatives, the respondent alleged that another person held a certificate of election to the office which the relator claimed to be occupying, but it did not appear that a contest of election was pending in the house of representatives. It was held that on sufficient prima facie evidence of the relator's membership in the house of representatives, he would be entitled to the relief sought. W. F. F.

Messrs. P. J. Lyons and John E. Bell for plaintiff.

Lansden, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents a question of law, which, so far as we are advised, has not been decided by this court in its exact phases. March 26, 1917, a traveling salesman of plaintiff in error solicited and received from defendant in error, at his country store in Shelby county, Tennessee, an order for certain goods, which he was authorized to sell. Among these goods were fifty barrels of meal. The meal was to be ordered out by defendant by the 31st day of July, and afterwards 5 cents per barrel per month was to be charged him for storage.

After the order was given, the defendant heard nothing from it until the 26th of May, 1917, when he was in the place of business of plaintiff in error, and told it to begin shipment of the meal on his contract. He was informed by plaintiff in error that it did not accept the order of March 26th, and for that reason the defendant had no contract for meal.

The defendant in error never received confirmation or rejection from plaintiff in error, or other refusal to fill the order. The same traveling salesman of plaintiff in error called on defendant as often as once each week, and this order was not mentioned to defendant, either by him or by his principals, in any way. Between the day of the order and the 26th of May, the day of its alleged rejection, prices on all of the articles in the contract greatly advanced. All of the goods advanced about 50 per cent in value.

Some jobbers at Memphis received orders from their drummers, and filled the orders or notified the purchaser that the orders were rejected; but this method was not followed by plaintiff in error.

The contract provided that it was not binding until accepted by the seller at its office in Memphis, and that the salesman had no authority to sign the contract for either the seller or buyer. It was further stipulated that the order should not be subject to countermand.

It will be observed that plaintiff in error was silent upon both the acceptance and rejection of the contract. It sent forth its salesman to solicit this and other orders. The defendant in error did not have the right to countermand orders and the contract was closed if and when it was accepted by plaintiff in error. The proof that some jobbers in Memphis uniformly filled such orders unless the purchaser was notified to the contrary is of no value because it does not amount to a custom.

Custom—what constitutes.

The case, therefore, must be decided upon its facts. The circuit court and the court of civil appeals were both of opinion that the contract was completed because of the lapse of time before plaintiff in error rejected it. The time intervening between the giving of the order by defendant and its alleged repudiation by plaintiff in error was about sixty days. Weekly opportunities were afforded the salesman of plaintiff in error to notify the defendant in error of the rejection of the contract, and, of course, daily occasions were afforded plaintiff in error to notify him by mail or wire. The defendant believed the contract was in force on the 26th of May, because he directed plaintiff in error to begin shipment of the meal on that day. Such shipments were to have been completed by July 31st, or defendant to pay storage charges. From this evidence the circuit court found as an inference of fact that plaintiff in error had not acted within a reasonable time, and therefore its silence would be construed as an acceptance of the contract. The question of whether the delay of plaintiff in error was reasonable or unreasonable was one of fact, and the circuit court was justified from the evidence in finding that the delay was unreasonable. Hence the case, as it comes to us, is whether delay upon the part of plaintiff in error for an unreasonable time in notifying the defendant in error of its action upon the contract is an acceptance of its terms.

Sale-orders taken by salesman-duty to

We think such delay was unreasonable, and effected an acceptance of the contract. It should not be forgotten that this is not the case of an agent exceeding his authority, or acting without authority. Even in such cases the principal must accept or reject the benefits of the contract promptly and within a reasonable time. Williams v. Storm, 6 Coldw. 207.

Plaintiff's agent in this case was authorized to do precisely that which he did do, both as to time and substance. The only thing which was left open by the contract was the acceptance or rejection of its terms by plaintiff in error. It will not do to say that a seller of goods like these could wait indefinitely to decide whether or not he will accept the offer of the proposed buyer. This was all done in the usual course of business, and the articles embraced within the contract were consumable in the use, and some of them would become unfitted for the market within a short time.

It is undoubtedly true that an offer to buy or sell is not binding until its acceptance is communicated to the other party. The acceptance, however, of such an offer, may be communicated by the other party either by a formal acceptance, or acts amounting to an acceptance. Delay in communicating action as to the acceptance may amount to an acceptance itself. When the subject of a contract, either in its nature or by virtue of conditions of the market, will become unmarketable by delay, delay in notifying the other party of his decision will amount to an acceptance by the offerer. Otherwise, the offerer could place his goods upon the market, and solicit orders, and yet hold the other party to the contract, while he reserves time to himself to see if the contract will be profitable.

Writ denied.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following response was handed down on September 20, 1919:

An earnest petition to rehear has been filed, and we have re-examined the question with great care. The petition quotes the text of 18 C. J. p. 276, as follows: "An offer made to another, either orally or in writing, cannot be turned into an agreement because the person to whom it is made or sent makes no reply, even though the offer states that silence will be taken as consent, for the offerer cannot prescribe conditions of rejection, so as to turn silence on the part of the offeree into acceptance."

And further: "In like manner mere delay in accepting or rejecting an offer cannot make an agreement."

It is also said that diligent search reveals only one case holding in accord with the court's decision of this case, and that case is Blue Grass Cordage Co. v. Luthy & Co. 98 Ky. 583, 33 S. W. 835, and it is said this case was overruled by the later case of L. A. Becker Co. v. Alvey, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 832, 86 S. W. 974. We have examined both of those cases, and we do not think either is authority on the question at issue. In the first case the contract was admittedly executed, and the suit was for damages for its breach. The second case does not refer to the first, and is upon another branch of contracts. The quotation from C. J. contemplates the case of an original offer, unaccompanied by other circumstances, and does not apply to this case, where the parties had been dealing with each other before the contract, and were dealing in due course at the time.

It is a general principle of the law of contracts that, while an assent to an offer is requisite to the formation of an agreement, yet such assent is a condition of the mind, and may be either expressed or evidenced by circumstances from which the assent may be in-

They all agree that acceptance of an offer may be inferred from silence. This is only where the circumstances surrounding the parties afford a basis from which an inference may be drawn from silence. There must be the right and the duty to speak, before the failure to do so can prevent a person from afterwards setting up the truth. We think it is the duty of a wholesale merchant, who sends out his drummers to solicit orders for perishable articles, and articles consumable in the use, to notify his customers within a reasonable time that the orders are not accepted; and if he fails to do so, and the proof shows that he had ample opportunity, silence for an unreasonable length of time will amount to an acceptance, if the offerer is relying upon him for the goods.

The petition to rehear is denied.

ANNOTATION.

Effect of delay of principal in disapproving or rejecting orders for goods taken by agent subject to approval.

The reported case (COLE-McINTYRE-NORFLEET CO. v. HOLLOWAY, ante, 1683) lays down the rule that where the circumstances surrounding the parties afford a basis from which an inference may be drawn from silence, acceptance of an offer may be inferred from silence, and applying it holds that a wholesale merchant who sends out drummers or agents to solicit orders for perishable articles and articles consumable in the use is in duty bound, if he does not wish to accept and fill the orders, to so notify his customers, and that if he fails to do so, silence for an unreasonable length of time will amount to an acceptance if the offerer is relying upon him for the goods. However, the court was careful to point out that the case was neither one where the agent was exceeding his authority nor one of an original offer unaccompanied by other circumstances, but on the other hand was one where the parties had been dealing with each other before and were dealing in due course at the time.

And in Peterson v. Graham-Brown Shoe Co. (1919) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 210 S. W. 737, the rule that for a seller to repudiate an order obtained by his salesman, he must notify the giver of the order within a reasonable time, was again applied, and it was held that where no notice was given a buyer that his order for shoes would not be filled, silence for an unreasonable time amounted to an acceptance.

And see Blue Grass Cordage Co. v. Luthy & Co. (1896) 98 Ky. 583, 33 S. W. 835, wherein the court seems to have regarded a failure for twelve days to repudiate an order for binding twine, taken by an agent, as an acceptance of the order.

However, the rule that a principal is under a duty to repudiate orders taken by his traveling salesmen so as to prevent an acceptance by silence apparently is not universally recognized.

Thus, in Metzler v. Harry Kaufman Co. (1909) 32 App. D. C. 484, where a shoe salesman took an order for goods subject to acceptance by his principal, and the question was whether or not acceptance could be inferred from a delay of several months in notifying the purchaser of the rejection of the order, it was held that acceptance of the offer could not be inferred from the silence of the principal during the time which elapsed between the receipt of the offer and the actual rejection thereof,—and this, although there was evidence tending to show that the delay was such as to prevent the offerer from obtaining the goods elsewhere. Shepard, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Silence does not amount to acceptance. 'Mental assent,' as it has been termed,—that is to say, coming to a determination in one's mind to accept,—without communicating that assent, is insufficient." In other words, it was held that where an agent solicits orders subject to acceptance by his principal, the same are not binding until accepted, and that such acceptance must be by affirmative act, and cannot be inferred from the silence of the principal or omission to notify the offerer of the rejection of the offer.

So, in Senner & K. Co. v. Gera Mills (1918) 185 App. Div. 562, 173 N. Y. Supp. 265, proceeding upon the theory that until orders taken by a traveling salesman are accepted by his principal no obligation arises, and that no burden rests upon the principal to repudiate the order at any time, it was held that no presumption of acceptance arises because of a failure to notify the purchaser within a reasonable time after receipt of the order of nonacceptance. The court said: "I know of no presumption in law that when a salesman offers goods to a prospective purchaser, and the purchaser agrees to take the same upon the terms and conditions offered, that the order will be filled by the principal whom the salesman represents. The court correctly charged the jury that a firm dealing with a buyer through its salesman is not in law bound to accept the order which the salesman has taken; but the court incorrectly charged that a duty rested upon the seller, on receiving the order, to notify the buyer within a reasonable time that it would not accept the same, and that in the failure of the firm to so notify the buyer of its refusal it would be deemed to have accepted the order. I know of no such rule of law. The traveling salesman is, at most, a solicitor of orders, and the prospective purchaser dealing with him understands quite clearly that he is not dealing with the principal, but with an agent whose acts must be accepted and ratified by the principal before they become effective. No burden rested upon the defendant to repudiate the order at any time, and no presumption of acceptance arises because of the seller's failure to notify the purchaser of nonacceptance. . . . The law is well settled that, where one deals with a person known to be an agent, he is bound to recognize the agent's status, and that he is merely representing another, who must ratify his acts before a liability is created. The relation of a traveling salesman to a principal is well understood in the commercial world. His function is to solicit orders, which in turn are transmitted to his principal, and by him accepted or rejected. Until the orders which have been transmitted are accepted, no contract obligation on the part of the principal can be said to exist."

And in Gould v. Cates Chair Co. (1906) 147 Ala. 629, 41 So. 675, where a furniture dealer gave a traveling salesman an order for chairs, which was subject to the principal's approval, it was held that the fact that the principal had accepted and filled a previous order, and had held the order in suit from early in September until November 12, did not amount to an acceptance or estop him from urging nonacceptance. This was upon the theory that being only an order which required acceptance to give it the force of a contract, it could have been withdrawn at any time before acceptance, and that the principal was entitled to equal rights as regards rejection. The court said: "There is no time, from the time such an order is received until it is accepted, that the person giving the order cannot countermand it. It is plain that mere silence on the part of the plaintiff [principal] after receiving the order, without any act tending to show an acceptance, would not cut off the right of defendant [giver of the order] to countermand. If not, then it cannot, with show of reason, be insisted that silence alone should constitute an acceptance of the order on the part of the plaintiff." G. J. C.

School — foreign language — discrimination.

1. If the law should be construed to mean that parents or private tutors might teach a foreign language, but that others could not employ teachers to give such instruction in a class or school, it would be an invasion of personal liberty, discriminative, and void; there being no reasonable basis of classification.

Letton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to restrain the enforcement of chapter 249, Laws 1919, on the ground that it violates several of the provisions of the Constitution of this state, and of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Joining with the plaintiffs and asking for the same relief are certain local church corporations conducting parochial schools, certain private schools, and several foreign-language-speaking parents.

In substance, the complaints of the plaintiffs and interveners are that, since the officers and members of the respective churches are largely made up of foreign-speaking people, if the act is enforced their children will be unable to obtain instruction in religion and morals in accordance with the doctrines of the religious denominations to which the parents belong, in the language of their parents; that many of the children cannot understand English, and cannot understand such instruction in that language; that in the parochial schools below the seventh grade the language of the parents is used in order to teach English, and that the children cannot learn English if they do not receive rudimentary education in the tongue the parents use; that property rights in the school buildings and grounds, and in the good will of the schools, will be destroyed; that the defendants, McKelvie as governor, Davis as attorney general, and Shotwell as county attorney of Douglas county, are severally threatening an enforcement of the act by causing the arrest and prosecution of the plaintiffs, officers and teachers.

The enrolled act complained of is as follows, the copy in the published laws being slightly inaccurate:

An Act Relating to the Teaching of Foreign Languages in the State of Nebraska:

Section 1. No person, individually or as a teacher, shall, in any private, denominational, parochial or public school, teach any subject to any person in any language than the English language.

Sec. 2. Languages, other than the English language, may be taught as languages only after a pupil shall have attained and successfully passed the eighth grade as evidenced by a certificate of graduation issued by the county superintendent of the county in which the child resides.

Sec. 3. Any person who violates any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction, shall be subject to a fine of not less than twenty-five ($25) dollars, nor more than one hundred ($100) dollars or be confined in the county jail for any period not exceeding thirty days for each offense.

Sec. 4. Whereas an emergency exists, this act shall be in force from and after its passage and approval.

Laws 1919, chap. 249.

A general demurrer to the petitions was sustained and the action dismissed. Plaintiffs and interveners appeal.

The appellants assert that the act is not regulatory; that it is an unwarranted interference with purely domestic affairs, and an invasion of the inherent discretion of parents in prescribing the course of instruction best adapted to the spiritual and material needs of children of their respective faiths; that the demurrer admits that many parents have reached an age where it is impossible for them to acquire a sufficient knowledge of English to enable them to counsel and admonish their children in matters of faith and morals in the English language, and that the teaching of foreign languages is largely to enable them to participate in the same religious services and exercises in the home and in the church; that the schools are private institutions, and, having discharged their duty to the state by providing instruction equal to that of the public schools, they may not be penalized for giving additional instruction, whether religious or secular; that the understanding of other languages and literature is not harmful to the individual or to the state itself; that, so far as the act imposes a penalty upon teachers for giving instruction in other languages, it is violative of their constitutional right to engage in the practice of their profession or calling. They complain that the act discriminates against teachers who teach foreign languages in schools, and leaves the teacher who gives such lessons in private free to pursue his calling; that, if any teacher should open a night school to instruct those who could not understand English in arts or sciences, he would violate the act, whereas another could form private classes and give instruction in a foreign language without offense.

They also maintain that the 1st section of the act is not within the title; that the state has power to regulate the course of study in the public schools, and prevent the study of any subject not in the course, and can regulate private schools so as to require them to maintain a like course of study, but has no power to prevent pupils in private schools from studying branches in addition to the course of study prescribed by the state; that the state cannot claim a monopoly of teaching; and that the right to study any subject is a personal right which is protected by the Constitution.

Previous to 1919, there was no provision in the statute expressly specifying the branches of study to be taught in the common schools. The operation of the Selective Draft Law (Act May 18, 1917, chap. 15, 40 Stat. at L. 76, Comp. Stat. §§ 2044a-2044k, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1136) disclosed a condition in the body politic which theretofore had been appreciated to some extent, but the evil consequences of which had not been fully comprehended.

judicial notice—
illiteracy. It is a matter of general public information, of which the court is entitled to take judicial knowledge, that it was disclosed that thousands of men, born in this country of foreign-language-speaking parents and educated in schools taught in a foreign language, were unable to read, write, or speak the language of their country, or understand words of command given in English. It was also demonstrated that there were local foci of alien enemy sentiment, and that where such instances occurred the education given by private or parochial schools in that community was usually found to be that which had been given mainly in a foreign language.

The purpose of the new legislation was to remedy this very apparent need, and by amendment to the school laws make it compulsory that every child in the state should receive its fundamental and primary education in the English language.

In other states the same conditions existed, and steps have been taken to correct the evil. In 1919, the legislatures of Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Arkansas, Indiana, Washington, Wisconsin, and New Hampshire passed measures more or less drastic with regard to compulsory education in English, and the prohibition of the use of foreign languages in elementary schools.

It is a general rule that statutes pertaining to the same subject-matter should be construed together, and this is particularly so if the statutes were passed at the same session of the legislature. The general principle is that the legislature must be presumed to have in mind all previous legislation upon the subject, including statutes closely related, so that in the construction of this statute we must consider the pre-existing law, and any other acts relating to education or subjects of instruction, passed at the 1919 session, which may tend to elucidate the intention of the legislature.

The Compulsory Education Act of Nebraska, as amended in 1919, chapter 155, Laws 1919, requires that every child or youth, not less than seven nor more than sixteen years of age, shall, during each school year, attend public, private, denominational, or parochial day school for not less than twelve weeks, and, in the city and metropolitan city school districts, attend the full period of each public school year in which the public day schools are in session, with certain exceptions.

All private, denominational, and parochial schools, and all teachers employed or giving instruction therein, shall be subject to and governed by the provisions of the school laws of the state as to the grades, qualifications, and certification of teachers. They are required to have adequate equipment and supplies, and shall have grades and courses of study substantially the same as the public schools where the children will attend in the absence of private, denominational, or parochial schools. Nothing in the act is to be construed as interfering with the religious instruction in such schools.

Instruction is required to be given in American history and in civil government, both state and national, such as will give the pupils a thorough knowledge of the history of our country, its Constitution, and our form of government, and such patriotic exercises shall be conducted as may be prescribed by the state superintendent. It is also provided that nothing in the act contained shall be so construed as to interfere with religious instruction in any private, denominational, or parochial school.

It is also settled law that where the general intent of the legislature may be readily discerned, and yet the language in which the law is expressed leaves the application of it in specific instances obscure, doubtful, ambiguous, or uncertain, the courts may have recourse to historical facts, or general public information, or the conditions of the country at and immediately prior to the passage of the law in order to aid them in interpreting its provisions. The language may be so indefinite that if construed in one way it may violate the Constitution, while, if construed in another equally permissible manner, its passage would not be inhibited. Since it ought never to be presumed that the legislature intended to violate the Constitution, the obvious and necessary construction to be given is that which will uphold the statute.

From a consideration of both of these statutes, as well as of chapters 248, 250, Laws 1919, it is clear that the purpose of the legislature was to abolish the teaching of foreign languages in elementary schools, when such schools are used for imparting the instruction required in the public schools, or using such languages as the medium of instruction; to provide that the standard of education prescribed for the elementary public schools should apply to all other schools; that the ordinary time and attention devoted to such instruction should not be diverted to other subjects, except as specified in the act; and that the same character of education should be had by all children, whether of foreign-born parents, or of native citizens. The ultimate object and end of the state in thus assuming control of the education of its pupils is the upbuilding of an intelligent American citizenship, familiar with the principles and ideals upon which this government was founded, to imbue the alien child with the tradition of our past, to give him the knowledge of the lives of Washington, Franklin, Adams, Lincoln, and other men who lived in accordance with such ideals, and to teach him love for his country and hatred of dictatorship, whether by autocrats, by the proletariat, or by any man, or class of men.

Philosophers long ago pointed out that the safety of a democracy or republic rests upon the intelligence and virtue of its citizens. "The safety of the people is the supreme law." The concept that the state is everything, and the individual merely one of its component parts, is repugnant to the ideals of democracy, individual independence, and liberty expressed in the Declaration of Rights, and afterwards established and carried out in the American Constitution. The state should control the education of its citizens far enough to see that it is given in the language of their country, and to insure that they understand the nature of the government under which they live, and are competent to take part in it. Further than this, education should be left to the fullest freedom of the individual.

The act as thus construed merely carries out the purpose of regulation to a greater extent than specified in the Compulsory Act. The term "school," as used therein, evidently means a school which presents a course of study such as those prescribed for the public schools, and attendance upon which would satisfy the requirements of the Compulsory Law. The intent evidently is that none of the time necessarily employed in teaching the elementary branches forming the public school curriculum shall be consumed in teaching the child a foreign language, since whatever time is devoted to such teaching in school hours must necessarily be taken away from the time which the state requires to be devoted to education carried on in the English language.

Furthermore, there is nothing in the act to prevent parents, teachers, or pastors from conveying religious or moral instruction in the language of the parents, or in any other language, or in teaching any other branch of learning or accomplishment, provided that such instruction is given at such time that it will not interfere with the required studies. The law only requires compulsory education for children not less than seven, nor more than sixteen years of age, for a period of not less than twelve weeks in certain districts, and a longer period in others. If a child has attended either the public or private school for the required time, it could not have been the intention of the legislature to bar its parents, either in person or through the medium of tutors or teachers employed, from teaching other studies as their wisdom might dictate. There can be no question of the cultural effect of the knowledge of a foreign language. There is nothing in this statute to interfere with teaching the Bohemian language on Saturday or Sunday, as is done by the intervening Bohemian schools of Omaha and South Omaha.

The assertion that it is necessary to teach Polish in order to teach English does not seem well founded. It is said several times in the briefs, and it was said in the oral argument, that a number of statements in the petitions are admitted by the demurrer, and must be taken as true. In a general sense a demurrer admits the allegations of the petition, but it does not admit conclusions drawn from the facts stated. We think we are not bound to draw the conclusion that because children, when they first attend school, cannot understand or speak English, they must be taught the language of their parents, whether Polish or Bohemian, in order that they may learn English, otherwise no children of foreign-speaking parents attending the public schools, wherein no other language than English is spoken, could ever learn the language. It is common knowledge that the easiest way to learn a foreign language is to associate only with those who speak and use it. Of course, the occasional use of a few words of the language of the home in order to explain the meaning of English words would not, if good faith is used, violate the act, as seems to be feared.

The further objection is made by some of the interveners that, while they can understand and speak English to some extent, they are not sufficiently familiar with the language to give religious or moral instruction to their children in that language. There is no necessity that religious or moral teaching be given in English, and a parent who can speak and understand German, Polish, Bohemian, or any other language, can assuredly convey lessons of truth, morality, and righteousness in that language. So with respect to the complaint that the pastor, or the teachers in private or parochial schools, cannot give moral and religious instruction in English; it is not the medium through which such ideas are conveyed that is material; it is the lessons themselves which are essential to right conduct and good citizenship, and, as we construe it, there is no prohibition in the act to interfere with such teaching in a foreign language. The contention made that, by virtue of § 2 of the act, no foreigner may be taught in any other language than English unless the pupil has successfully passed the eighth grade, as evidenced by a certificate issued by the county superintendent, must be taken as applying only to pupils attending public or private schools, and in the sense that a pupil in such schools may not there be taught any language other than English unless he has attained and passed the eighth grade. If the act should be construed to mean that no person could at any time be taught any other language than English unless possessed of a certificate of graduation issued by the county superintendent, it would be discriminatory as being an unreasonable exercise of the police power, and interfering with individual liberty.

If the law means that parents can teach a foreign language, or private tutors employed by men of means may do so, but that poorer men may not employ teachers to give such instruction in a class or school, it would be an invasion of personal liberty, discriminatory, and void, there being no reasonable basis of classification; but if such instruction can be given in addition to the regular course, and not so as to interfere with it, then equality and uniformity result, and no one can complain.

As to the allegations with respect to the invasion of property rights by depriving certain interveners of the value of the "good will" in their schools, no facts are alleged, but mere conclusions which are not admitted by the demurrer.

It has been said that this is a penal statute, and must be strictly construed. In a limited and restricted sense the statute may be penal, but in our opinion it is remedial in its nature. It is designed to remove a condition seriously inimical to the public welfare. It must be reasonably construed, not alone by taking into account the words of the particular measure, but by considering the mischief which the legislature was endeavoring to remedy. If construed as plaintiffs and interveners contend, it could not be applied. If experience shows that the practical working of the act is harsh or inconvenient, even though valid and constitutional, the legislature will no doubt remedy its defects; and, if the legislation is unwise, those who are injured have an incentive to see that their views are represented in another legislature.

As to the contentions that the act is broader than its title, and that the subject of the 1st section is not embraced therein, it must be said that the title is exceedingly broad: "An Act Relating to the Teaching of Foreign Languages in the State of Nebraska." The prohibition of the teaching of any other language than English in the 1st section clearly has relation to the teaching of foreign languages, and is within the title. The other section also "relates" to such teaching.

It has also been urged that the statute is unreasonable, and is therefore void. An unreasonable law is not necessarily unconstitutional, and the remedy for such an enactment is with the legislature, by way of amendment or repeal.

It has been said by the United States Supreme Court in Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. ed. 725, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633, in dealing with the court's interference with the operation of a regulative statute, that "unless the regulations are so utterly unreasonable and extravagant in their nature and purpose that the property and personal rights of the citizens are unnecessarily, and in a manner wholly arbitrary, interfered with or destroyed without due process of law [they do not extend beyond the power of the state to pass, and they form no subject for Federal interference"]. Giozza v. Tiernan, 148 U. S. 657, 37 L. ed. 599, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 721.

Neither the Constitution of the state nor the 14th Amendment takes away the power of the state to enact a law that may fairly be said to protect the lives, liberty, and property of its citizens, and to promote their health, morals, education, and good order. "If the state may compel the solvent bank to help pay losses sustained by depositors in insolvent banks, if it may enact workmen's compensation laws in order that the workman shall have no strained relations with his employer, nor become embittered towards society because, though an industry has crippled him, it has paid him nothing, if acts aiming to make better citizens by diminishing the chances of pauperism are sustained, if it is competent for the state to protect the minor from impoverishing himself by contract, it surely is not an arbitrary exercise of the functions of the state to insist" that the fundamental basis of the education of its citizens shall be a knowledge of the language, history, and nature of the government of the United States, and to prohibit anything which may interfere with such an education. Laws, the purposes of which are, with respect to foreign-language-speaking children, to give them such training that they may know and understand their privileges, duties, powers, and responsibilities as American citizens, which seek to prevent a foreign language from being used as the medium of instruction in other branches, and as the basis of their education, are certainly conducive to the public welfare, and are not obnoxious to any provision of either the state or Federal Constitution.

ANNOTATION.

Validity of statute or other regulations as to the use, or teaching, of foreign languages in schools.

There is very little in the books on this subject.

It will be seen that it is held in the reported case (NEBRASKA DIST. v. MCKELVIE, ante, 1688) that the legislature might provide that foreign languages should not be taught in the public schools except to pupils who had passed a certain grade; but that the court states that if the statute in question should be construed to mean that no person could at any time, in or out of school, be taught any other language than English unless possessed of a certificate of graduation issued by the county superintendent, it would be discriminatory, as being an unreasonable exercise of the police power and interfering with individual liberty.

It may be said, in general, that the matter is in the control of the legislature, and that the teaching of a foreign language does not transgress regulations that the medium of instruction shall be the English language.

Under constitutional provisions that "the general assembly shall provide a thorough and efficient system of free schools, whereby all the children of the state may receive a good common-school education," and statutory provisions that schools "shall be for the instruction in the branches of education prescribed in the qualifications for teachers, and in such other branches, including vocal music and drawing, as the directors, or the voters of the district, at the annual election of directors, may prescribe," in Green v. Chicago (1881) 97 Ill. 370, it was held that there could "be no valid objection to teaching German or other modern language as a branch of study in common schools, 'as the directors, or the voters of the district at the annual election of directors, may prescribe,' where the medium of instruction in such schools is the English language." The court said: "We may take judicial notice of what is generally known,—that the German and other modern languages have been taught in the common schools in many localities in the state. For many years modern languages have constituted 'other branches' of study in the common schools, and the legislature has not seen fit to forbid the course adopted. The teaching of modern languages in our common schools has been too long acquiesced in to be now changed, except by legislative action, if done at all. It ought not to be done by judicial construction."

Where the Constitution provides that "the legislature shall encourage the promotion of intellectual, moral, scientific and agricultural improvement, by establishing a uniform system of common schools, and schools of a higher grade, embracing normal, preparatory, collegiate, and university departments," and it was provided by statute "that in each and every school district shall be taught orthography, reading, writing, English grammar, geography, and arithmetic, and such other branches as may be determined by the district board: Provided, that the instructions given in the several branches taught shall be in the English language," it was held, where a city board of education had power to establish high schools, that Latin and German were properly taught in such high school. The court said: "An education acquired through the medium of the English language is an English education. If the same branches were taught in the Latin or the German language, it would not be an English education; but the mere fact that the Latin and German languages are taught does not change the character of the school from an English one. The common-school medium of instruction is the English language, in accordance with the provisions of the statute." Board of Education v. Welch (1893) 51 Kan. 792, 33 Pac. 654.

In Stuart v. School Dist. (1874) 30 Mich. 69, the court sustained "the right of school authorities, in what are called union school districts of the state, to levy taxes upon the general public for the support of what in this state are known as high schools, and to make free by such taxation the instruction of children in other languages than the English." Cooley, J., said, inter alia: "It now becomes important to see whether the constitutional convention and the people, in 1850, did anything to undo what previously had been accomplished towards furnishing high schools as a part of the primary school system. The convention certainly did nothing to that end. On the contrary, they demonstrated in the most unmistakable manner that they cherished no such desire or purpose. The article on education as originally reported, while providing for free schools to be kept in each district at least three months in every year, added that 'the English language and no other shall be taught in such schools.' Attention was called to this provision, and it was amended so as to read that instruction should be 'conducted in the English language.' The reason for the change was fully given; that, as it was reported, it might be understood to prohibit the teaching of other languages than the English in the primary schools, a result that was not desired. Judge Whipple stated in the convention that in the section from which he came French and German were taught, and 'it is a most valuable improvement of the common-school system.' The late Superintendent Pierce said that in some schools Latin was taught, and that he himself had taught Latin in a common school. He would not adopt any provision by which any knowledge would be excluded. 'All that we ought to do is this: we should say the legislature shall establish primary schools.' This, in his opinion, would give full power, and the details could be left to legislation."

In Newman v. Thompson (1887) 9 Ky. L. Rep. 199, 4 S. W. 341, the court said: "That Latin and Greek are taught in the school is not in violation of the act under which this tax is collected, nor is the teaching of such branches of learning in violation of the common-school law of the state. If the ordinary branches of education are taught, and the school open to all, the fact that the teacher may have a class in Latin or Greek should not prevent the collection of the tax, or authorize an injunction against him or the trustees to prevent it. A system of education adopted in the particular district in aid of the common-school fund authorized by the legislature by which a tax is imposed that the school may be taught the entire year, or the higher branches of education brought within reach of all the children, is not in violation of the Constitution, state or Federal."

In State ex rel. Thayer v. School Dist. (1916) 99 Neb. 338, 156 N. W. 641, the court sustained a statute providing that "in every high school, city school or metropolitan school in this state the proper authorities of such school districts shall upon the written request, when made at least three months before the opening of the fall term of such school, by the parents or guardians of fifty pupils above the fourth grade, then attending such school, employ competent teachers and provide for the teaching therein, above the fourth grade, as an elective course of study, of such modern European language as may be designated in such request: Provided, that not more than five hours each week and not less than one period each day shall be devoted to the teaching of any such modern European language in any elementary or grade school." It was held that the matter was one for the legislature.

The teaching of the German language as a branch of study in "any school of a township, town, or city," which is required by statute, on demand of the parents or guardians of twenty-five or more children, cannot be restricted by the board of school commissioners of a city to schools of certain grades, but may be compelled in any place in the city where a public school is taught with its complement of teachers and scholars." School Comrs. v. State (1891) 129 Ind. 14, 13 L.R.A. 147, 28 N. E. 61, where the statute further provided that "the common schools of the state shall be taught in the English language."

In Roach v. St. Louis Public Schools (1883) 77 Mo. 484, it was held that where the legislature has committed the control over the school fund to the city without conditions, the courts cannot restrict the languages taught.

Messrs. Hall, Monroe, & Lemann, for appellee:

The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur has no application where the thing causing the injury was, at the moment of the accident, being used by the plaintiff himself.

Harrison v. Goldberg, 133 La. 389, 63 So. 59; Schwartzberg v. Schwartzberg, 133 La. 294, 70 So. 230.

The injury to the plaintiff was due to the action of an employee of the Brooklyn Cooperage Company in closing the door under the directions of another employee of the company, and this defendant is not responsible for either.

Gallagher v. Southwestern Exposition Asso. 28 La. Ann. 943; 29 Cyc. 477; Manning v. Sherman, 110 Me. 332, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 126, 86 Atl. 245, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 89; Wright v. Big Rapids Door & Blind Mfg. Dawkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment rejecting his demands for damages on account of personal injuries alleged to have been received through the fault and negligence of defendant. The defense is a general denial, coupled with pleas of contributory negligence and assumed risk.

Plaintiff was employed by the Boylan Detective Agency, a private concern, which, up to July 23, 1917, had furnished the Brooklyn Cooperage Company with day and night watchmen for its building occupying the entire square bounded by Erato, Thalia, South Peters, and South Front streets in the city of New Orleans. About that date, the property was acquired by the defendant herein, who continued the arrangement for guarding the building with the Boylan Detective Agency.

Under his employment, plaintiff was required to report on the premises for duty at 5:30 P. M., and watch the same until 6 A. M., at which hour he was relieved by the day watchman employed by the same agency. His duties required that he pass through the building at regular intervals, and that he register his presence by sending in signals to a central station.

The building was divided into several rooms or compartments, with doors or openings from one to the other, which were kept closed when not in use by large metal fire doors weighing several hundred pounds each; the idea being that, if fire should break out in one compartment of the building, these doors would prevent its spreading to others. The doors were supported by wheels or rollers attached to the tops, which rested and moved upon a stationary rail or bar fastened to the wall above the opening. The rail or track was not constructed exactly on the horizontal plane, but dipped or inclined downward in the direction in which the door moved when closing, so that its weight might aid in closing; and there was or should have been attached to the outer edge or end a weight which was designed for the double purpose of facilitating the movement of the door, and for holding it open when the opening was being used. This weight was suspended on a cord or rope made of a substance which would melt at a given temperature. If fire broke out, the cord would break when that temperature was reached in the building, thus releasing the door and permitting it to close automatically and preventing the spread of the fire. There were some eighteen or twenty of these large doors which plaintiff was required to open and close in his rounds of the building during the night. However, the one by which plaintiff was injured was usually kept open.

On July 26, 1917, plaintiff reported for duty at the usual hour, received the keys from the day watchman, and started on his rounds. He went to the door which opened from the wareroom into the boiler room, and, contrary to custom, found it closed. Taking hold of the edge of the wall or facing with one hand, he endeavored to push the door up and open with the other, when its upper end, in some way, became disengaged from the track or rail, and began to fall forward and toward plaintiff. He attempted to brace or hold it up and off of himself, but, on account of its great weight—some 800 pounds—was unable to do so, and it fell, pinning plaintiff to the floor from above the waist down. There he remained, unable to extricate himself, for about half an hour. Eventually, his cries for help attracted the attention of a passer-by, and through the combined efforts of two or three men the door was removed and plaintiff was taken to the Charity Hospital, where he remained for some two weeks, later being removed to a private sanitarium, and from which he was discharged some time in October.

Plaintiff's injuries in the region of the lower part of his back were quite serious, the fifth lumbar vertebra having been dislocated or fractured, and other bruises and contusions were received from which he suffered severely. Up to the date of the trial in the court below in April, 1918, he had been able to do very little work, and had earned practically nothing. Plaintiff was sixty-eight years of age and had followed the same or similar employment for a long number of years, and his salary at the time was between $45 and $50 per month.

There is evidence in the record tending to show that plaintiff was somewhat rough and careless in handling these doors, as occasionally one had been found off the rail or track early in the morning when no one else had been in the building or had any occasion for opening and shutting them during the previous night but plaintiff. Possibly on two or three occasions, doors had been found down and had been replaced. This method of hanging and operating the doors seems to have been in use in this particular building some twenty-five years, and, while it would seem to the uninitiated, at first glance, that a door of such great weight, in which there existed the possibility of its jumping off the track and falling to the floor, should have been protected by a guard rail or bar which would have held it up under such circumstances, that point is touched very meagerly in the record. However, the evidence shows conclusively that this particular door was kept open, and plaintiff had had no occasion to handle it before; that it had been closed by the engineer on the afternoon of the day that plaintiff was injured, under orders from the manager or superintendent, and was so found by plaintiff when he attempted to open it. It is also fairly established that the weight which should have been attached to the outer edge to facilitate its opening was not there, and that, instead, the door was probably tied to an iron pipe while open. The record further shows that the thing which caused this and the other doors to jump the tracks was rapid closing, which brought their inner edges in violent contact with the bumpers or facings of the doors, thereby causing them to bounce off the rail. We can see no reason, and none has been shown, why the operation of pushing the door open should have thrown it off the track. The conclusion, therefore, seems irresistible that this particular door must have been thrown off the rail by the act of closing it during the afternoon of the day plaintiff was injured, and this is accentuated by the fact that there was no weight attached to the outer edge, and it probably closed more violently than it would have under the steadying effect of a weight. If this were true, the door simply stood in an upright position, in contact with but not on the rail, and, when the force of plaintiff's effort to push it open was applied, it was disengaged and fell upon him.

Plaintiff denied having been warned by the day watchman, under instructions from the manager, on the occasions when other doors had been found off the rails, against such rough handling; but we think the affirmative of this contention is fairly established. Still, we do not see how this can affect the matter in view of the circumstances under which he was injured by the particular door in question. We think defendant is convicted of negligence, both in its failure to have the door in question provided with a proper weight to permit closing normally, and in the act of the engineer, who was instructed to close the door by the manager, in closing it in such a manner as to leave it off the rail, thus forming a trap into which the plaintiff fell when he attempted to push it open.

Plaintiff was not the employee of the defendant, in the strict sense; he having been employed, as above indicated, by the Boylan Detective Agency, who held the watching of the building under contract. But its duty to him, in providing proper tools and appliances, and in furnishing a safe place to perform his duties, was, for all practical purposes, the same as if he had been an employee; not because of any contractual relation, but because of the duty to use "ordinary care" towards those who worked on its premises for its benefit and with its knowledge and consent. See cases cited in note to Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Berry, 46 L.R.A. 52; 1 Thomp. Neg. p. 898, §§ 979, 980; Stevens v. United Gas & E. Co. 73 N. H. 159, 70 L.R.A. 119, 60 Atl. 852; and authorities cited.

tective agency.

Considering his age and earning capacity, we think a judgment of $3,000 would reasonably compensate for his injuries under all the circumstances.

Damages—
injury to spine.

The testimony of the X-ray experts conflicts as to the extent of plaintiff's injuries, but that of the one who made the examination about the time of the accident seems to be corroborated by the physical circumstances, the length of time which plaintiff was required to remain in hospital, and his inability to perform any work of consequence even up to the time of the trial.

It is true that defendant had only acquired the property a few days prior to the accident, but it is not disputed that its legal relation to the matter is the same as would have been that of the Brooklyn Cooperage Company, had the building not been sold.

For the reasons assigned, the judgment appealed from is annulled and reversed, and it is now ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff have and recover of the defendant judgment in the full sum of $3,000, with legal interest from judicial demand, and that the defendant pay costs of both courts.

Monroe, Ch. J., takes no part.

ANNOTATION.

Duty of owner or occupant of building to watchman or caretaker furnished by detective agency.

Although the duty of the owner or occupant of a building to persons on the premises either by express or implied invitation has been considered by the courts in numerous instances, an exhaustive search of the authorities discloses no other cases considering the precise question involved in the reported case (LINCOLN v. APPALACHIAN CORP. ante, 1697). It is held in that case that although a person furnished by a detective agency to guard the interior of a building is not an employee of the owner of the building in a strict sense, the owner's duty to him, in providing proper tools and appliances, and in furnishing a safe place in which to perform his duties, is, for all practical purposes, the same as if he was an employee, not because of any contractual relation, but because of the duty to use ordinary care towards those who work on the premises for the benefit and with the knowledge and consent of the owner.
